“Oh, didn’t you hear?” Nie Huaisang asked, tilting his head in faux surprise. “They did quite a bit together. So much that it’d be weird to justify one and not the other. Off the top of my head, I there was Jin Guangyao recommending Xue Yang as a guest disciple, protecting him, Jin Guangyao and Xue Yang reconstructing the Sygian Tiger Seal together, and Jin Guangyao offering up the whole Tingshan He clan for Xue Yang’s experiments. I believe the reason was ‘the He clan had grown worried about how much influence Jin Guangshan was getting as Chief Cultivator.’ You’re right. He truly had ‘no choice’ in the matter.”

“Nie Huaisang,” Lan Wangji spoke warningly, sternly requesting that the conversation be steered back to more diplomatic terms. As he looked back and forth between Lan Xichen and Nie Huaisang, Wei Wuxian began calculating whether letting the pair speak would do more harm than good.

“The immoral actions he has taken cannot be justified,” Lan Xichen admitted. “However, I think the fact that he has people he loves — people he cares for — shows his potential to… change. If he was truly irredeemable, he would have killed Sisi and left no one to report on his crimes. Doesn’t it say something that it was his acts of love that became his downfall?”

“Being human is not the same as being redeemable,” Wei Wuxian shook his head. “You’re right that he has people he cares about. He bought Jin Ling fairy; he cared for you; he spared Sisi. However, that wasn’t enough to make him stop taking actions that would, even if indirectly, hurt those people.”

Hanguang-jun nodded, “Remember, we won’t be able to physically go there. Any changes done will need to be through our younger selves. I would rather keep the younger version of you away from him.”

Lan Xichen turned, about to protest, only to cut himself off. Could he deny the damage Meng Yao could inflict while sitting here, in seclusion, as a result of the confusion and hesitance Jin Guangyao left him with? Could he truly ask his younger self to shoulder the same burden?

“Then again,” Wei Wuxian said. “Jin Guangyao spent a ton of time and energy making sure Zewu-jun never found out about his true self. Maybe, if we just inform your younger self, that won’t be an issue.”

“No,” Nie Huaisang shook his head. “I refuse to allow him anywhere near my Da-ge. It doesn’t matter how much they know, and it doesn’t matter how ready the watchers are. I won’t have them nearby.”

“It’s not as though Jin Guangyao attacked Da-ge indiscriminately,” Lan Xichen pointed out. “We all agreed that he genuinely cares about certain people. It wasn’t until Da-ge started-”

“He didn’t. Nothing Da-ge did was inherently wrong. It just… they weren’t actions that would lead to the best result. There were better ways to deal with the situation than to push Jin Guangyao down the stairs.”

“Don’t you dare,” Nie Huaisang snapped his fan closed against his hand. “What exactly are you suggesting? That everyone will always need to never say anything against him, no matter what he does? There’s no way to make a world like that. He’s too volatile and snaps at too little-”

“He can change! His personality was influenced by what he went through. He had such a harsh time growing up…. But if we reach him-”

Lan Xichen cut off, seeing a shift in the look on Lan Wangji’s face. After waiting for a moment, Lan Wangji looked up and made eye contact with Wei Wuxian, a stern gaze meeting a curious one.

“Wei Ying, the three of us don’t have room to talk about his upbringing,” Lan Wangji acknowledged. “What do you think? Is the person he ended up becoming to be expected?”

For all the problems between the Lan parents and Sect Leader Nie’s murder, no one could deny that Wei Wuxian had by far the worst childhood. Even Meng Yao had never had to worry about starving overnight or freezing through the winter.

“It’s hard to say,” Wei Wuxian responded. “Jin Guangyao went on to do far worse things for far worse reasons than most people would, but that doesn’t mean there’s nothing we can do. People who lived through the same things as him wouldn’t necessarily become as corrupted as him, but he might change if he receives different help. Honestly, we mostly need more information. None of us know what he was like at sixteen.”

“So you’re still voting to wait a bit longer and see?” Nie Huaisang asked, watching Wei Wuxian nod through narrowed eyes. “Do you really think that’s worth the risk? Right here and now, we have a chance to change things.”

Lan Xichen glared, “Just give him a chance-”

“He’s had all his chances already! He wanted to move up in the Jin, so he killed his supervisor and then realized he might be punished for it. He escaped that, and went to the Wen. He ended that, and went back to the Jin and even after he became Chief Cultivator he never stopped. He had your trust, and Qin Su’s love, and even my love, at one point. You don’t need to look farther than his son to know all he’s ever cared about is himself-”

“And that’s now a crime worthy of death?” Lan Xichen responded. “He hasn’t done anything yet.”

“It means he won’t change!”

“You can’t know that!”

“He isn’t worth my Da-ge’s life!”

“Alright,” Wei Wuxian spoke up. “I think that’s enough for today.”

Three pairs of bewildered eyes turned his way.

“Wei Ying?”

“Come on, Lan Zhan,” Wei Wuxian said, tilting his head towards Lan Xichen. “We talked about a lot, and we can talk about it more later, but I think we all need some time to calm down after that and think this through. Sound good?”

Without waiting for an answer, he hooked his and Nie Huaisang’s arms together and forcefully directed the Nie Sect Leader out. Meanwhile, Lan Wangji began putting away the untouched tea set Lan Xichen had laid out, realizing that his brother was too stunned to make a move.

“Wait, you’re kicking me out?” Nie Huaisang whined, wondering what he’d done wrong.

“Not permanently,” Wei Wuxian assured. “I’m the one who’ll actually be putting whatever we do into effect, and I need some time to think over what you’ve both said. Besides, we’ll be able to make more concrete plans once I try out your ‘how to get little-me to trust me again’ plan. We can meet up again after that. Sound good?”

“...Alright, I guess.”

”Jin Ling!” Wei Wuxian shouted, tightly clutching the boy who had just fallen into his arms. “Jin Ling, wake up!”

The fact that they’d seen Jin Ling’s older self alive and well would be much more reassuring if that same assurance hadn’t been such a catastrophic failure in regards to Wei Wuxian.

“Can you hear me? Jin Ling!”

Still no response.

Frowning deeply, Wei Wuxian reached to the side and grabbed the Jin heir’s wrist, checking his pulse. The steady (if quick) beat reassured him instantly. He let out the breath he’d been holding.

If it had taken them even a minute longer, Jin Ling would have already suffocated.

A piercing look directed his way cut through Nie Mingjue’s composure, but he desperately tried to outwardly maintain it. Wen Ruohan’s curious and opportunistic gaze was resting on the Nie brothers, looking to capitalize on the first sign of weakness.

Nie Mingjue would not let that happen.

Glancing back, Wei Wuxian saw what had made Jin Ling’s fall stutter slightly. The moment the Jin heir had been removed from the dirt, the sword on his back had been caught by something else and consequently dragged it out. Upon a second glance, it was clear what the mysterious object was.

The skeleton of a human arm.

Nie Huaisang paled and stepped closer to his brother, wondering what kind of insane person could possibly have thought putting this horrifying castle together was a good idea.

Setting Jin Ling on the ground next to Lan Wangji, Wei Wuxian grabbed Bichen’s sheath and started to poke around in the dirt, revealing more and more of the remaining bone.

Lan Qiren clicked his tongue, annoyed at the lowly use of his nephew’s sheath despite understanding the reason behind it. Like always, Wei Wuxian was prioritizing getting results over showing the proper respect to sacred objects.

After everything that had happened, Lan Qiren found that he couldn’t blame him.

Just like Jin Ling, the skeleton had been buried into the wall in a standing position. Ghastly pale bones covered in pitch black dirt — the contrast was distinct yet grating to the eyes. Curious, Wei Wuxian dug a bit deeper, and, soon enough, found yet another skeleton nearby.

Unlike the other one, this one wasn’t completely decayed yet. There was still some flesh on the bone, and long, messy hair jutting out of the scalp.

Jiang Yanli turned away, nausea beginning to rise up within her, and heard Nie Huaisang gag from the left. When she glanced over at him, she made eye contact with Wen Qing, whose unfaltering gaze silently asked if she was alright.

After a moment of hesitation, Jiang Yanli nodded.

(And yet, the thought of how close to death Jin Ling had to be to respond to inquiry — how close he had been to becoming just another one of those rotting corpses — left her shaking in her seat.)

When further digging proved that yet another corpse was buried inside to the right, Wei Wuxian decided to stop. He rubbed his head, still trying to work past the tidal wave of turbulent shouts and screeches ringing in his ears.

A reminder of how many spirits there were here.

And how close Jin Ling had been to becoming one of them.

Seeing the way his fiance was trembling in her seat, Jin Zixuan kneeled next to her and attracted her attention. Now didn't seem to be a good time to say anything out loud (especially with the countless questioning gazes being sent a stubbornly silent Nie Mingjue's way), but he hoped his presence would offer her some reassurance.

He tilted his head toward the simulated Wei Wuxian, reminding Jiang Yanli that she didn't need to worry so much; the Yiling Patriarch would take care of their son.

(At this point, Jin Zixuan almost didn't care how he died. This revived Wei Wuxian was someone his family now owed a lot to. From the tentative, sheepish smile that appeared shortly after, Jin Zixuan knew his fiance agreed.)

At that moment, Jin Ling abruptly sat up.

"Jin Ling?" Jiang Fengmian asked, frowning in confusion as his grandson stood.

Curious, Wei Wuxian sat back and allowed Jin Ling to move. Hobbling slowly, Jin Ling did a loop around them until he reached the spot he had just been pulled out of. Without hesitation, he climbed back in.

"What?" Wen Qing raised an eyebrow, turning to Nie Mingjue for answers. He sighed, and looked away.

(He couldn't tell them. His father had warned him to never tell anything about this to anyone. And he definitely couldn't tell his father's murderer about it.)

(But if they were going to find out anyways….)

Wei Wuxian reached forward and pulled Jin Ling out of the wall again, huffing a laugh of amusement until he heard a sound that froze him in his tracks.

Fairy was barking again.

“So the screeching of departed spirits is fine, but a few distant barks are enough to terrify him?” Jiang Cheng scoffed, rolling his eyes and shaking his head in disbelief.

“Well, we understand why now, A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli softly pointed out, making her brother flinch at the memory.

When they had left, Fairy had been obedient, wagging its tail as it sat before the entrance. However, the ferocious and fierce barks now couldn’t be further from the pitiful anxiousness it had exhibited before.

And Wei Wuxian was terrified.

But there was no resentful energy. The watchers couldn’t feel any commands to attack or defend. Surely, if Wei Wuxian was genuinely scared, they would feel something, wouldn’t they?

(Madam Yu looked away, wondering when she had gotten so weak as to be worried over one of Wei Wuxian’s foolish acts.)

“Something is wrong outside the castle,” Lan Wangji observed, reaching forward to take Jin Ling. Before he could, however, there was a tremendous rumble in the castle and dust began to fall from the ceiling.

An earthquake.

Giant blocks of stone fell from the walls, and the ground tumbled like turbulent water. Wei Wuxian looked towards Jin Ling, only to see a thick vine wrap around the Jin heir’s bruised left leg. Before anything could be done, the vine had snapped tight and yanked Jin Ling away.

“A-Ling!” Jiang Yanli screamed.

Wei Wuxian reached forward, only to be cut off by Hanguang-jun.

“We need to leave,” the second jade observed. “Let’s go.”

“What on Earth-”

“It’s the castle!” Nie Mingjue responded, shouting to be heard over the battle (and the still-screaming spirits). “Making the Jin boy walk back inside didn’t work, so it’s trying other ways!”

In the next second, a flash of white cut across the ground, Bichen slicing the vines into ribbons. Wei Wuxian ran forward to grab Jin Ling, red light circulating around his feet.

He jumped.

And shot ten meters into the air.

Wen Chao squealed in terror when a bit of red light got too close to his leg.

A vine that was closer to a tree appeared — at least two meters in diameter — and pounced after Wei Wuxian. The Yiling Patriarch was undaunted, however. Even with Jin Ling in his arms, he managed to dodge the vines coming after him from every direction without rest. A moment later, Lan Wangji ran forward as well and sliced the vines in half, rendering them powerless.

They were a pair, fighting as one without needing to exchange words.

Despite the tense situation, Lan Wangji couldn't help the warm glow that spread throughout his chest.

Dancing around the vines grabbing at their heels, the three men managed to escape, Jin Ling carried in Wei Wuxian's arms. The vines, seeing that their prey was nearly out of their reach, zoomed forward and covered the door to the outside.

A streak of white shot forward, instantly clearing the hallway. The pair followed the path Bichen had made and finally escaped the castle.

Jiang Yanli was far from the only one who let out a sigh of relief at that.

However, it was only once they reached outside that Wei Wuxian remembered what had prompted them to leave. A growl cut through the air, followed shortly after by a bark that made Wei Wuxian jump. They traveled toward the outer gate, where the sound was coming from. When they reached it, they saw Fairy facing away from them, growling at something. As soon as he laid eyes on the dog, Wei Wuxian paused and stepped back.

He forced himself to step forward again shortly after, knowing that they had to keep going-

A growl made him jump back again.

'He's terrified, and yet he's forcing himself to move regardless. Look at him. Look at everything he's doing for your son,' a voice in Jin Zixuan's head screamed out. 'And yet you couldn't even stand up to your father in his defense. After everything you've seen, you know that Wei Wuxian is far more scared of dogs than you are of Sect Leader Jin. But you-'

Jin Zixuan glanced to the side, where his beautiful, bright, perfect fiancee shook in worry for her son and martial brother, and wondered when he'd become such a coward.

Slowly and unsteadily, Wei Wuxian continued to force himself to approach the outside. When the dog heard their approach, it turned around and saw Jin Ling in Wei Wuxian's arms.

It instantly leapt forward.

The scream Wei Wuxian let out as he hid behind Lan Wangji hammered a nail of guilt into Jin Zixuan's heart over and over and over again. On the other hand, Jiang Cheng sighed.

‘I can’t believe he thinks this is more scary than the vines that were literally trying to kill him,’ he thought, then, remembering the cause, amended, ‘I better make sure to keep dogs away from him.’

Terror gripped Wei Wuxian’s mind, and he scrambled for anything that could keep the dog away. Luckily, as Lan Wangji had stepped in front and stopped the dog with a glare, Wei Wuxian managed to keep a hold on Jin Ling (who he had been about to drop, justifying that Fairy wasn’t going to hurt its owner). It was at that moment that Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian noticed that Fairy had something inside its mouth.

Frowning in confusion, Lan Xichen left his brother behind (as Lan Wangji was currently preoccupied with staying as close to the simulated Wei Wuxian as possible) and knelt down next to the dog to get a better look.

It was a segment of fabric — most likely a ripped off piece of clothing.

Seeing that the fabric looked to be in the Nie Sect’s colors, Nie Mingjue gave a long, tired sigh. He wasn’t really expecting to be able to keep it a secret, but he could at least hope that the simulation explaining it would be less painful for him than trying to explain it to the watchers himself.

“Someone came here,” Wei Wuxian realized. “They must have been suspicious, to make the dog react like that. They haven’t gone far yet. Let’s go after them.”

“No need. I know who it is.”

“I do too,” Wei Wuxian agreed.

“...You do?” Jiang Cheng asked, turning to his sister for answers. She could only shake her head, equally confused, and turn to Jin Zixuan, who sent a blank look to Nie Huaisang, who turned to a heavily sighing Nie Mingjue. Intrigued, Lan Xichen and Wen Qing joined them in looking at the Nie Sect leader as well.

Nie Mingjue sighed again.

Wei Wuxian smirked, “Fairy must have found the person who spread the rumors about Xinglu Ridge, let out the walking corpses, set up the maze array, and built the stone castles. And those sabers. But if we don’t catch them now, it’ll be too annoying to try and find them later.”

‘Ah, that explains it,’ Nie Mingjue thought. ‘I was wondering how that charlatan knew so much. Huaisang must have had to spread those rumors.’

Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes, then glanced between the Nie brothers. Given Nie Mingjue’s hesitation, it seemed likely that the incoming answers would reveal a critical weakness in the Nie Sect for others to exploit.

“I will go after them,” Lan Wangji decided. “What about you and Jin Ling?”

“I’ll take him down Xinglu Ridge and settle somewhere in Qinghe, around where we met that charlatan. Let’s meet up there, okay?”

“They’re splitting up?” Lan Qiren gaped, and Lan Wangji felt the same. Was his older-self not worried that Wei Wuxian would run away anymore? Shameless or not, Hanguang-jun was supposed to be intelligent, wasn’t he?

And yet he appeared to be right; if Wei Wuxian was planning on running away, they would most likely have been informed that through his thoughts.

But why wasn’t he? Hadn’t Wei Wuxian wanted to leave no matter what? Now that he had the chance, why would he stay? He’d said he thought Lan Wangji was going to punish him. Had Hanguang-jun’s actions proven that wasn’t the case?

But this had all started with a talk between Lan Wangji and Jiang Wanyin. Someone who had gotten their core (temporarily) destroyed to save Wei Wuxian wouldn’t do something like that, so there would have been no need for Wei Wuxian to disgust them both. Were the attempts to escape just some sort of inside joke?

The watchers were very, very confused.

Seeing the way Lan Wangji was hesitating, Wei Wuxian rushed, “Go! Any later and they’ll have run away. I’ll be back.”

Upon hearing ‘I’ll be back,’ Lan Wangji nodded and began walking away.

They were actually going separate ways-

“Wait! Wait-wait, take the dog with you! Take it!”

Hearing that, Lan Xichen gave a light chuckle. There were many unknowns in place, especially regarding Hanguang-jun’s strange insistence on not expecting a relationship from Wei Wuxian no matter how many opportunities he got. However, for the time being, Lan Xichen felt he could safely say that the concerns the Lans had initially had were quickly proving to have been needless.

Hanguang-jun was everything the future said he was, and Lan Xichen couldn’t be prouder.

With a backward glance, Lan Wangji intimidated the spiritual dog into following after him (though, reluctantly, seeing as it turned to look back at Jin Ling every once in a while). Finally at peace, Wei Wuxian wiped some sweat from his forehead and, after glancing back at the castle once last time, picked Jin Ling up again and walked off.

By now, it was nearly dusk. As the dirt-covered Wei Wuxian walked through town with Jin Ling on his back, quite a few people turned to stare. Ignoring them, Wei Wuxian quickly bought a few new clothes for both himself and Jin LIng using the money he’d taken from Hanguang-jun.

Jiang Cheng fidgeted in his seat, hoping his older self would appear soon. If it wasn’t for Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji, Jin Ling would be dead by now (two times over, if you counted the Goddess Statue as well). And now it was Lan Wangji's money buying Jiang Cheng's nephew and head disciple new clothes.

Noticing the frown on her brother's face, Jiang Yanli reached over and placed her hand next to Jiang Cheng's, the fingers phasing through each other thanks to the 'no-touch' feature of the simulation. Once he glanced over, Jiang Yanli smiled at him, offering what little reassurance she could muster.

After a few minutes of searching, Wei Wuxian found an inn to rest at and got a room. In the dim light of the fading sun, he set Jin Ling down on the ground and brushed some hair out of the boy's face.

Unable to watch, Jin Zixuan looked away, while Jiang Fengmian closed his eyes. Both Jiang Fengmian and the Jin heir were forced to realize the same thing: this scene, before them, went beyond the relationship between a martial uncle and a younger disciple. Partially because of worry that it would spark even more rumors, Jiang Fengmian had always avoided interacting too intimately with Wei Wuxian. When Wei Wuxian was unjustly punished by Madam Yu, Jiang Fengmian would try to stop the individual incident, but never put a permanent end to it. Wei Wuxian had defeated the Xuanwu of Slaughter, and all Jiang Fengmian had said was 'well done.' The Wens attacked, and Wei Wuxian's life was in danger; all Jiang Fengmian had cared about was Jiang Cheng's.

But this, right here, truly made Wei Wuxian look like Jin Ling's uncle.

Wei Wuxian began to peel off Jin Ling's dirt-stained robe.

'This Patriarch is personally changing your clothes for you,' he thought. 'Don't you dare say I don't spoil you.'

And if Wei Wuxian was Jin Ling's uncle, that made him Jin Zixuan's family, didn't it?

And if they were family, then Jin Zixuan didn't even have the excuse of remaining filial to justify staying silent about his father's thoughts. His father's plan to chain Wei Wuxian up and force a bond between him and a sect.

And if he didn't have that excuse….

'Pathetic, useless,' both Jiang Fengmian and Jin Zixuan mentally cursed. 'Coward.'

However, it was at that moment that Wei Wuxian pulled off Jin Ling's boots and froze. He quickly rolled up Jin Ling's trousers, and found a black bruise trailing up all of Jin Ling's leg.

And not just any bruise, but a curse mark.

"Can he not have one day of peace?!" Madam Jin snapped, annoyed at the seemingly countless life-or-death events her grandson was being put through.

Curse marks signified that the bearer had offended something containing extreme malice. If it left such a mark, it would be able to find the bearer no matter where they were or how long it took. The consequences ranged from having the associated body part removed, or just death.

"Are curse marks usually that big?" Nie Huaisang quietly asked, staring nervously at the gargantuan mark stretching up the entirety of Jin Ling's leg, continuing endlessly as Wei Wuxian raised Jin Ling's pants higher and higher. In response to the question, Lan Xichen, Wen Qing, and Nie Mingjue shook their heads.

Jiang Cheng sighed, "Nothing in this stupid show is ever normal, huh?"

Sweat dripped down Jin Ling's forehead, and he shifted this way and that in his sleep.

'Some curse marks cause hallucinations,' Wei Wuxian thought, placing two fingers on the center of the mark. 'The stronger the hatred, the greater the hallucination…. Jin Ling, what are you seeing?'

"...A-Die," Jin Ling muttered. "A-Niang."

The pair flinched back, and Madam Jin sucked in a gasp of air. They might have agreed to not kill the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian, but the fact that he would ~~supposedly~~ go on to kill the couple had never left their minds.

Then, before the watchers could see Wei Wuxian's reaction to those words, the world faded to black. For a moment, they wondered if the simulation was over already. Then, a child's voice appeared.

"Orphan!" the boy shouted. "Orphan!"

As the shouting continued, it soon began to echo as multiple voiced overlaid on top of the first. The crowd of kids began to chant the word "orphan," scorn and mocking clear in their tones.

"Orphan! You're an orphan!"

The chant was replaced by a yelp as light brought them to a hallway in Koi Tower, and the child's voice cried out, "Ow! Why did you hit me?!"

"A-Ling," Jiang Yanli gasped out, covering her mouth with a hand.

And, before them, was a trembling eight year old Jin Ling, who could only shake as the kids shouted at him.

"Your mom was no good!" the retreating child continued. "Even your dad didn't like her!"

As Jiang Yanli flinched, Jin Zixuan felt his heart momentarily stop. Both Madam Yu and Madam Jin drew themselves up, fully prepared to break the laws of physics if that was what it took to slap the simulated children.

“What do you know?” Jiang Cheng glared. “Stupid kids.”

Unwilling to engage in an actual fight, the children turned on their heels and began to run, shouting over their shoulders, “Maybe that’s why they abandoned you!”

The child Jin Ling could only throw a stick of tanghulu after them, and watch as it broke into pieces upon contact with the ground.

“A-Ling,” Jin Zixuan whispered, moving to kneel beside his son with his fiancé. They knew it was just a simulation, but they couldn’t help but hope that, somehow, the boy would be able to feel their presence.

Unfortunately, unable to sense them, Jin Ling could only continue to shake and cry alone, his broken tanghulu rolling across the ground. One of the pieces stopped, making contact with an adult’s black boot.

“Wei… Ying?” Lan Wangji asked.

An elegant hand reached down and picked the ball up, raising it to eye level so that Wei Wuxian could take a closer look. This wasn’t the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian, who the watchers had grown to know, nor was it Wei Wuxian in Mo Xuanyu’s body, who they had learned to connect with the younger version.

This was the Yiling Patriarch, eyes silver rather than the malicious red the watchers had come to identify with him.

(Which shouldn’t be a surprise. It was quickly becoming clear that resentful energy was nowhere near as corruptive as they’d once assumed it was.)

Wei Wuxian glanced to the left and laid eyes on the crying child, pity and mourning clear in his expression.

Wen Chao flinched and darted back, unable to face even this calm version of the Yiling Patriarch after what he had seen. On the other hand, Madam Yu felt her burning anger freeze.

The expression on Wei Wuxian’s face could best be described as sympathetic. And why wouldn’t it be? How many times had Madam Yu said the exact same thing to him?

No, that wasn’t a fair comparison. No matter how cruel children were, they simply didn’t have the knowledge or power to leave the same impact Madam Yu could. How many times had she called Wei Wuxian a bastard child and the son of a servant in the same sentence? And how many times had she made a nine year old boy feel like he genuinely had to hide food in case he was one day kicked out? How many times had she called his mother not just “no good,” but a “slut” and a “whore” and a “vixen” and a “beast?”

(Except that first one didn't make any sense, so it would be silly of him to be bothered by it. And she hadn't actually kicked him out, so maybe that was fine. They had all seen first hand just how resilient he could be.)

Except Wei Wuxian's resilience didn't stop him from getting hurt. As she watched Wei Wuxian gaze down at the child Jin Ling, she couldn't help but ask herself what she had actually gained from doing all that.

'Mind the master behind the dog you're trying to mess with!' Madam Yu hissed, glaring down at Wang Lingjiao. There was nothing those words would help her with, and she had no reason to say them.

She had just believed it, and therefore wanted to.

Frustrated and desperate to hide his tears, Jin Ling sat down in a small gazebo, facing a large portrait. In it, adult versions of Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli gazed at each other, warmth clear in their smiles.

Seeing that, the real Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan made eye contact, copying the portrait.

Hearing someone approach, the young Jin Ling glanced back to see a man with long, flowing black hair standing beside him. A look of confusion crossed the boy's tear-stained face.

"Who are you?" he asked.

With a graceful swish of his robes, Wei Wuxian knelt beside the boy and thought for a moment before smiling and gently responding, "I'm your Shishu."

'My son's martial uncle,' Jin Zixuan thought again. 'Who I didn't do anything to help.'

"Shishu?" Jin Ling repeated. "Then, do you know my father and mother?"

"Of course."

The softness in Wei Wuxian's voice was completely at ends with the watchers' current understanding of the Yiling Patriarch. It was more than a little strange to see. However, remembering the joy the nine year old Wei Wuxian had felt upon meeting the gentle Jiang Fengmian, no one could say they were surprised, either.

(It really wasn't appropriate considering the current situation, but Lan Wangji couldn't help but think that Wei Wuxian's voice while he was speaking to kids was the most beautiful thing he had ever heard.)

"Really? You've met them?"

"Mn."

After a moment, the elation that had spread across Jin Ling's face collapsed into sadness.

"They said my mother was a bad person-"

“Jin Ling,” Wei Wuxian raised an arm to pat his nephew’s head. “Ignore them. Your mom was very kind.”

Lan Wangji truly and honestly had no idea how Wei Wuxian’s voice could possibly be so lovely. And, with that thought, came another, far more sinister one:

‘I would be able to hear that voice every day if we raised a kid together.’

As soon as he thought that, he flinched back, blushing, and cursed his own shamelessness. He would not be his older-self; he would not give in to temptation; Wei Wuxian did not want him. He would never forget that.

Then, Jin Ling shook Wei Wuxian’s hand off his head and asked, “And my dad?”

A pained expression crossed Wei Wuxian’s face as he turned toward the painting, answering, “Your A-Die… loved your mother. More than anything.”

His current relationship with his fiance had already made Jin Zixuan fairly sure that was true, but to hear that — to receive confirmation that he’d learned to love his wife — reassured him more than words could describe.

“He hadn’t always, however,” Lan Jingyi explained.

Jin Zixuan’s smile crumbled.

And with that, a memory formed.

Jin Zixuan — young enough to look identical to the real one watching the simulation — slammed his hand against one of the Cloud Recesses’ doors and demanded, “Wouldn’t it be better to ask what about her I could be satisfied with?!”

Neither Jiang Yanli nor Jin ZIxuan could resist flinching again, and Jiang Cheng turned to hiss at a quietly snickering Wen Chao.

On the boats of Caiyi town, Jin Zixuan glanced away and said, “Just make sure the Jiang Clan of Yunmeng stays away from me.”

Madam Jin released a frustrated huff of air.

A bowl of soup crashed against the ground.

“Wait, what was that?” Nie Huaisang blinked.

“I… I’m not sure,” Jiang Fengmian responded, looking around.

“If one were to ask why Wei Wuxian hated Jin Zixuan so much, it would require a lengthy explanation.”

“Hey, you don’t have to say he ‘hated’ my father!” Jin Ling protested. “They just… weren’t friends.”

Said boy flushed and sank in on himself, unable to deny the words but nonetheless annoyed that they were spoken aloud. He really, really wished he could interfere with the simulation.

(Though, some small part of him couldn't help but feel childish when he thought that. After all, no matter how embarrassing watching this was, it was still better than watching fierce corpses fight to tear Wei Wuxian apart in the Burial Mounds.)

"Don't look at me, Little Mistress! It's not like I'm the one who wrote the script; Zizhen did!"

"Hey, it's not my fault!" said boy protested. "I just wrote down what Sizhui said!"

There was a suppressed laugh from Sizhui:

"I'm sorry, Jin-gongzi. I was just translating what the spirits said through inquiry. If it makes you feel better, you can read the rest of this passage."

Lan Qiren nodded in approval.

"Fine," Jin Ling finally decided, and there was a shuffling of papers, and then a cough to clear his throat. "Anyways, the question of why Wei Wuxian was not best friends with my father would require a lengthy explanation. My grandmothers used to be close friends. They promised each other in their youth that if both their children were boys, they'd become sworn brothers; if both were girls, they'd become sworn sisters; if one was a son and one was a daughter, they'd of course become husband and wife."

As the reasoning behind the engagement was read aloud, the people involved shifted awkwardly. Arranged marriages weren't necessarily uncommon, but their knowledge of all the pain it caused made those excuses quite awkward — especially given the Madams' now fractured friendship.

How different would things have been if they hadn't tried to force those two to be together? Allowed Jin Zixuan to become friends with Jiang Yanli, Jiang Cheng, and Wei Wuxian first? If that had happened, maybe those two wouldn't have died so young.

"The mistresses of the Jin and Jiang Sects had a good relationship, and their family backgrounds aligned as well. Almost everyone called the pair a match made in heaven, but the two involved felt… differently."

Although they continued listening to the narration, most of the watchers found themselves distracted by what was occurring in the simulation around them. Cultivators armed to the teeth sat in groups, and a large field was covered with the unconscious bodies of soldiers who had been injured in battle.

"Is this…" Nie Mingjue looked around, eyes wide. "The Sunshot Campaign?"

Withholding a curse, Wen Ruohan memorized every detail of the scene around him.

Unaware of what was being shown to the watchers, Jin Ling continued his narration: "Ever since he was born, my father was… he had been… 'a moon worshiped by the stars' — are you serious?"

"Hey, I spent a lot of time on that line!" Ouyang Zizhen protested.

"It's quite nice," Lan Sizhui assured him.

"Let me finish!" Jin Ling snapped. "Fine; ever since he was born, my father had been a moon worshiped by the stars. He was born fair skinned and delicate. With a mark of vermillion on his forehead, along with his elite background and exceptional intelligence, he was loved by almost everyone he met."

Although he was quite used to such praise, the smile Jiang Yanli sent him as those words were said left Jin Zixuan a puddle of embarrassed goo.

"Madam Jin had brought him to Lotus Pier several times. Neither Wei Wuxian nor Jiang Cheng wanted to play with him, so it was only my mom trying to connect and feed him the food she'd made. Jin Zixuan, however… didn't really like paying attention… to her."

"...Sorry," Jin Zixuan muttered as quietly as he possibly could.

Jiang Yanli just shook her head, "I understand. You're not obliged to fall in love with me just because we're engaged. Though I'm… I'm happy you've changed... your mind?"

"I have," Jin Zixuan instantly agreed, ~~for once~~ leaving no room for misunderstandings.

Jin Ling cleared his throat, "This made Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng furious on quite a few instances. Therefore, when Jiang Fengmian dissolved the engagement after Wei Wuxian's actions in the Cloud Recesses, both boys were pleased. They only realized afterward that mom was feeling quite dejected on the inside!"

With every word, Jin Ling's tone became happier and happier, and Jin Zixuan's face became lighter and lighter.

"Then, in the middle of the Sunshot Campaign, the Yunmeng Jiang Sect headed to Langya to assist the Lanling Jin Sect."

Several annoyed looks turned his way in regards to the lack of help, but Jin Guangshan paid them no mind. Instead, his thoughts were consumed by the narration which had just occurred.

Only the Yunmeng Jiang Sect was sent over. Only a sect that was already nearly destroyed was sent over. Even the few Jiang disciples who hadn't been present at the massacre had their numbers dwindled further during Wen Chao's last attack.

Which meant the assistance being given by "the Yunmeng Jiang Sect" was most likely just another way to say help being given by the human weapon that was Wei Wuxian.

The more he saw, the more Jin Guangshan hungered.

“Because the Yunmeng Jiang Sect was short on hands, A-Niang went as well. She knew that her cultivation wasn’t high, so she did what she could, busying herself with the meals of the cultivators. In the beginning, neither Wei Wuxian nor JiuJiu — I mean, Sect Leader Jiang — agreed, but Mom had always been adept at cooking. She was happy, had good relationships with the others, didn’t force herself, and was actually quite safe. The two had to admit, it wasn’t a bad idea.”

‘More positive reinforcement,’ Jiang Fengmian reminded himself, turning to nod proudly at his daughter once they’d made eye contact. She smiled warmly and made glanced at Jin Zixuan, happiness clear in her expression.

“Due to the difficult conditions, the meals were very bland. To counter this, Mom began secretly making two extra bowls of soup for Wei Wuxian and Jiu-Sect Leader Jiang. Then mom-”

“You know, if you're referring to your Uncle as 'Sect Leader Jiang,' you should probably stop referring to Madam Jin as ‘mom,’” Ouyang Zizhen whispered.

“Shut up. You said you would let me handle this, and I will!” Jin Ling snapped, then hurriedly continued. “Anyways, she also made some for A-Die, and it… didn’t go over well.”

“...You sure changed a lot of the script.”

“I’m not going to call my father things like that!”

Jin Zixuan had a very bad feeling about this.

The narration vanished, allowing them to tune in to the words spoken by the people inside the simulation. One cultivator, dressed in the robes of Lanling, took a bite of the watery porridge being offered to them and groaned as that action strained a wound on his arm.

He turned to the cultivator sitting next to him and grumbled, “The Wen Sect’s offensive was very aggressive this time. Though, thanks to Young Master Zixuan’s apt command, we didn’t lose more people.”

A proud look came Jin Zixuan’s way from both his parents, but he had trouble smiling back. Not only was it clear that this was only the setup to something awful, but receiving praise from his father (something that had always brought him joy) suddenly left a bitter taste in his mouth.

Nodding, the female cultivator next to the man sighed, “And we have no way of knowing when this Sunshot Campaign will come to an end.”

“Yeah,” the first cultivator agreed, sighing as well.

Then, from within a nearby building, another person sighed.

“A-Li?” Jiang Fengmian asked, and Madam Yu narrowed her eyes.

“Okay,” Jiang Yanli stepped forward and, with a tentative heart, opened a door.

She froze.

“Young Master Jin!” she gasped, eyes wide.

“A-Li,” Jin Zixuan spreaked out. “B-before this starts, please… let me apologize.”

She gave him a shaky smile and a nod, before forcing herself to turn her attention back to the simulation.

“Jiang Yanli?” her former fiance asked. “Why did you come out of my room?”

“Oh! S-sorry. I went to the wrong place. I thought this was A-Cheng’s room.”

“Sect Leader Jiang is staying in the North Wing. This is the South Wing. How could you have gone in the wrong direction? It would’ve been more believable if you’d said you mistook it for Wei Wuxian’s room.”

“Foolish girl,” Madam Yu grumbled, turning on her daughter and only belatedly realizing it would be impossible to pinch her while in the simulation. “Honestly, what were you thinking? You can’t just go into the rooms of unmarried men! Especially your former fiance!”

She shrank down.

Jin Zixuan scoffed, “Jiang-guniang, one moment you say you’ve mistaken it for Sect Leader Jiang’s room, the next you say you’re here to find Wei Wuxian. Who are you trying to fool? Just tell me; what were you doing in my room?”

“I… I…” defeated, her expression fell and she sighed. “Young Master Jin, that wasn’t my intention. I came to deliver soup. Right now, the Wen Sect’s offensive is aggressive and I can’t do much to help. I’ve been doing some support work in the kitchen, so I made some soup to deliver to everyone.”

Jin Zixuan just laughed.

Under a roll of her mother’s eyes, Jiang Yanli just shrank in on herself even more.

“A-Li,” Madam Jin said. “I appreciate what you were trying to do in looking after my foolish son, but sneaking around like that was perhaps not the best way to do so. Nor was lying so many times.”

Clenching her fists to stall her tears and ignore Wen Chao’s snickers, Jiang Yanli nodded.

That out of the way, Madam Jin turned to glare at her idiotic son, who was making this into a genuine disaster.

However, unable to hear his other self's frantic prayers to make him stop, the simulated Jin Zixuan continued, "Lady Jiang, you really don't think your lies through. You saw the soup in my room and immediately made up an excuse. You think I don't know who's been delivering the soup all along?"

"You know?"

"Of course. I've seen with my own eyes Lady Song departing from here after delivering soup. I asked her, and she didn't want to admit it, unlike some people… who try to steal credit for things they haven't done."

When Wen Chao snorted despite Jiang Cheng's furious glare, Lan Wangji found himself mentioning, "Regardless of who is actually lying, we can all agree that stealing credit for soup is less dishonorable than pretending you've single-handedly killed the Xuanwu of Slaughter."

Wen Chao's laughter cut off into a glare, and Jiang Cheng sent Lan Wangji an appreciative look.

"I don't know who Lady Song is, but I really did deliver the soup," Jiang Yanli objected. "I am not lying."

"Alright. If you want to claim you made it, then show me some evidence. Hm?"

Watching both the real and simulated Jiang Yanli flinch at those words made Jin Zixuan curse his other-self's line for generations.

(Then, he remembered that included Jin Ling, and quickly took the curse back).

"Young Master Jin… we've already had our engagement cancelled. I was afraid that people would find out about me delivering soup to you and spread slanderous rumors. So… so I haven't told anyone about this. If you want evidence, I… I really don't have any to give-"

"Enough! You don't need to continue."

'Stop,' Jin Zixuan mentally begged. 'I know you think you're right, but you're wrong. Please just stop.'

"You know, when I'd heard about you following us onto the battlefield, I'd wondered why," he clicked his tongue. "Now, I finally understand. Everyone is bravely fighting bloody battles, yet you're here scheming for petty reasons!"

'Stop. Stop. Stop. Stop-'

"Well then, Honorable Lady Jiang, I hope you weren't planning on stealing credit and trampling on other people's efforts just because of your high status," he reached forward and snatched her wrist, pulling her close to hiss, "Some people have lowly backgrounds, yet their characters are much nobler! Please have some self respect."

‘Shut up! Shut up! Shut up!’

“Self respect…” Jiang Yanli looked up, her eyes watering with tears. “Jin-gongzi, we basically grew up together. After all these years… in your eyes… am I such a shameless, obstinate person?”

“You-”

Unable to withstand it anymore, Jiang Yanli began crying in earnest.

‘I-’

“Shijie? What’s wrong?”

But she was crying so much she couldn’t speak and then-

“Hey-”

Whatever Jin Zixuan had been about to say was cut of as Wei Wuxian flashed forward and punched him to the ground.

“Oh, thank god,” Jin Zixuan gasped out, collapsing in his seat. He could vaguely hear his mother raging a storm and shouting at him, but had been too distracted to pay that any mind. Everything had been spiraling downhill, and he had no one but himself to blame.

But now, it would be fine. Wei Wuxian was here. No matter what the Yiling Patriarch (supposedly) ended up doing, Jin Zixuan knew he could trust Jiang Yanli’s safety with him.

What had his other self said just a little while ago? That ‘some people with lowly backgrounds are much nobler than those of high birth?’ Now that he thought about it, he couldn’t imagine a better way to describe Wei Wuxian.

Glaring, the simulated Jin Zixuan sat up from where he had been knocked down to. The terrifyingly cold eyes of the Yiling Patriarch glared down at him, Wei Wuxian standing protectively in front of Jiang Yanli.

“Shijie, what happened?” he asked.

“A-Xian, I-I’m fine. Let’s go.”

Madam Yu sighed; Wei Wuxian’s and her daughter’s foolishness was truly unmatched.

“Jin Zixuan, how dare you bully my Shijie?!”

“No, I-”

“A-Xian!”

“You-” Jin Zixuan stood. “Don’t cross that line!”

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli tried again.

“You worthless dog!” Wei Wuxian shouted, jumping forward.

“Don’t fight!” she shouted, tears running down her cheeks. “A-Xian!”

But the two paid her no mind.

“I’m sorry,” Jin Zixuan whispered, voice trembling. “I am so, so sorry. I-I promise I won’t… I won’t ever hurt you in the same way. I promise. I-”

“A-Xuan, it’s fine,” she whispered back. “It’s… it’s like with MianMian. You were trying to help someone at a lower social class than yourself. I… I think that’s admirable-”

“Though the execution leaves a lot to be desired,” Nie Huaisang muttered. When Lan Wangji glared with a warning ‘let them talk to each other,’ Nie Huaisang held up his hands in surrender and walked away, giving them some privacy.

Finally alone again, Jin Zixuan cleared his throat, “I-I know this doesn’t excuse anything — and I’m not trying to say it does — but, at Koi Tower… someone doing what I accused you of just… it wouldn’t be a surprise. Anyways, what I’m trying to say is that, I think… I think you’d make the Jin Sect a better place. And me! I mean, I’d be a better person, not a better place. If you’re still interested. What I mean is-”

“I know,” Jiang Yanli laughed. “A-Xuan, don’t worry. I’m not going anywhere.”

However, unlike their real counterparts, the simulated Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan didn’t understand anything about each other. As a result, Jiang Yanli was still crying and trying to break up the fight, and Jin Zixuan was still battling Wei Wuxian.

“What’s going on?” a nearby cultivator asked. “Why are they fighting? What’s wrong?”

Her friend took a closer look and exclaimed, “It’s Young Master Wei and Young Master Jin!”

“Lady Jiang is there too! Quick, stop them!”

Right as a cultivator shouted that, Wei Wuxian slammed Jin Zixuan into a nearby wall. The entire compound shuddered on impact.

“Hey-”

“The building is going to come down!”

“Stop fighting, stop fighting! Let’s resolve this with words!”

But, no matter how many times they said that, no one stepped forward to actually stop them. Watching the expressions on the nearby crowd carefully, Wen Ruohan soon determined the reason why.

No matter how much they respected Jin Zixuan or how much damage the fight caused, they were too scared of the Yiling Patriarch to take action. Demonic cultivation was too useful for their leaders to refuse during a war, but people's nervousness remained. After all, for how long could they trust the son of a servant with that kind of power?

(If this was the terror Wei Wuxian could spark without a golden core, then Wen Ruohan would curse every day that that potential had been snuffed out so soon.)

With a powerful kick, Wei Wuxian sent Jin Zixuan flying once again.

"A-Xian-"

"Jin Zixuan! You're a fully grown man, and yet you have the gall to bully my Shijie?" Wei Wuxian shouted, too angered to concede to his martial sister's tearful request.

"Enough, A-Xian!"

"I didn't bully her!" Jin Zixuan responded, throwing a punch of his own. "She lied and falsely claimed someone else's merit. Am I supposed to just go along with that?"

"I did not!" Jiang Yanli pleaded, voice breaking as she spoke.

'Beat him up, Wei Wuxian,' most people, including Jin Zixuan, mentally requested.

"How dare you falsely accuse her?!" Wei Wuxian demanded, his eyes flashing a deadly red.

Wen Chao felt his soul instantly rise out of his body.

"You — how is this a false accusation? She was sneaking around here, so I asked her what she was doing. She evaded, not wanting to answer, then decided to lie, saying she was delivering soup!" Jin Zixuan explained, jumping back to gain some distance.

When he phrased it like that, Jiang Yanli could somewhat understand why her mother was mad. She had nothing but the best of intentions, but-

"I already know that the one who was delivering me soup was Lady Song! She falsely claimed Lady Song's-"

"Hey! You!" Wei Wuxian paused in his attacks, turning to address one of the cultivators on the side.

"Huh?"

"Drag that Lady Song or whatever here!"

"Uh, yes Sir!"

So, Wei Wuxian was still considered important enough for his commands to be followed and respected. Wen Ruohan wondered how long it took for that to change.

“Wei Wuxian, what are you trying to do?!” Jin Zixuan asked as the low-ranked cultivator ran off. “One should take responsibility for oneself. Whatever this is, come at me! If you’re a man, then don’t bully a weak woman!”

“Shut up! Isn’t my Shijie also a woman?! Yet you’re bullying her!”

‘You tell him, Wei Wuxian,’ Jin Zixuan thought, giving the Yiling Patriarch a mental cheer.

“You dared to accuse my Shijie of lying! I’ll bring the relevant parties over. Then we’ll see who’s telling the truth!”

Excited, gossipy mouths turned to each other and whispered, “Is this really Yunmeng Jiang’s eldest lady Jiang Yanli?”

“Look at how angry Young Master Wei is. There’s no doubt.”

Madam Jin could only sigh.

“Is the Lady Song they’re talking about the same Lady Song who was elevated to guest disciple status just a short while ago by Young Master Jin?”

“I think so.”

“I see,” Lan Xichen said, turning a sympathetic gaze on Jin Zixuan. “You’re trying to look past class prejudice and help someone at a disadvantage. That’s admirable.”

“Except you chose the wrong person and allowed it to blind you,” Nie Mingjue pointed out, sighing heavily (the exact same way he did whenever Huaisang ‘accidentally’ dropped his saber out the window). Considering Jin Ling had already confirmed that Jiang Yanli was the one who was sending him soup, Jin Zixuan had no response.

Then, following a patter of hurried footsteps, the cultivator who had left to grab Lady Song appeared from behind a nearby tent. A moment later, his companion appeared as well.

“Just what is happening?” a woman with sea green eyes asked. “Why did you call me here so urgently?”

“Lady Song, we’re here,” the cultivator explained. “Please go over there.”

“You’re never going to live this down,” Wen Qing muttered.

Jin Zixuan could only pout, “Why are my moments only the most embarrassing ones?”

Lan Wangji glanced back at him and nodded once, a show of comradery for a fellow warrior. Quietly, Jin Zixuan wondered if the two of them should make a club for ‘people whose crushes on Yunmeng children cause untold embarrassment to fall upon them.’

“What’s this?”

“You’re Lady Song?” Wei Wuxian asked, receiving a nod in exchange. “Lady Song, Jin Zixuan said the soup in his room was delivered by you. He also said that my Shijie has lied to falsely claim your deeds. Is that true?”

“That-I… No! This is a misunderstanding! Yes, a misunderstanding!”

Hearing her frantic insistence to that (obviously wrong) fact, Nie Huaisang felt his pity for Jin Zixuan double.

“A misunderstanding?”

“I-I also don’t know why he thought that. One day, I passed by Young Master Jin’s room and he suddenly asked me if I had delivered some soup to him. I told him I hadn’t, but he didn’t believe me.”

“Sorry,” Jin Zixuan mumbled, not even sure who he was apologizing to anymore.

“Anyways, this… this really is a misunderstanding,” she concluded.

Jin Zixuan, who had turned to glare back at Wei Wuxian, did a double-take: “It wasn’t you? Then why have you been appearing near my room so often?! And, when I asked you, why did you answer so vaguely, as though you were embarrassed to admit it?”

“That… that’s probably a coincidence?”

Nie Mingjue snorted.

“Young Master Jin, that day you interrogated me so suddenly that I….”

One of the watching support staff members abruptly straightened up, realizing, “Oh, wait, I remember now. I’ve seen Lady Jiang making soup in the kitchen before.”

A cultivator nodded, “That’s right. When I’m on my guard shift, I usually see Lady Jiang come by in the afternoon. It’s always around this time.”

Jin ZIxuan was astounded: “Could it be… that this is really all a misunderstanding?”

“A misunderstanding?!” Wei Wuxian’s eyes flashed an even darker red than before. “Jin Zixuan, you don’t think you can get away simply by saying that it’s a misunderstanding, do you?”

In the next second, Jin Zixuan crashed against the ground again, Wei Wuxian’s fist having nearly broken his nose.

Through the shame, embarrassment, and guilt he was experiencing, Jin Zixuan managed to muster up just enough thought to be grateful that Wei Wuxian was there.

“A-Xian!”

“Stop! Stop fighting!”

“Shijie, don’t stop me!” Wei Wuxian responded, tackling Jin Zixuan to the ground.

“Enough! A-Xian! Stop, A-Xian!”

Wen Chao was infinitely grateful that Wei Wuxian wasn’t angry enough to use resentful energy for this fight. Even now, the burning rage he felt was enough to make nearby spirits feel like static was running up their arms.

(Needless to say, it terrified the Wen heir.)

Wen Qing was just glad she had already mostly separated from the Wen. She wanted nothing to do with the the pathetic, broken mess that was Wen Chao.

“Sect Leader Jin and Sect Leader Jiang are back!” someone called out.

“Quick, get them to stop this!”

Jiang Cheng came around, pulling Wei Wuxian off Jin Zixuan by his arm, while Sect Leader Jin tried desperately to calm Wei Wuxian’s temper from behind his son.

Although Wei Wuxian backed off, his anger hadn’t faded one bit.

“Jin Zixuan, one day — one day I’ll make you die by my hands!”

Like a missing piece had suddenly clicked into place, the watchers froze and observed the picture being put together before their eyes. Yes, Wei Wuxian killing Jiang Yanli was unbelievable, and likely to be at least somewhat hearsay.

Wei Wuxian killing Jin Zixuan, on the other hand, was seeming more and more likely by the second.

(And Jin Zixuan couldn’t even say he blamed the Patriarch.)

“A-Xuan, stop that,” Madam Jin scolded, realizing what he was thinking instantly. “You behaved poorly and should have done a proper investigation first, but your heart was in the right place. You certainly don’t deserve death for this!”

“I know,” he assured her. “I just… it’s like watching a carriage crash in slow motion.”

“Don’t say that,” Jiang Yanli insisted. “Your response was understandable. I… I was trying to help, but there may have been better ways I could have gone about doing that.”

Finally, as the conflict came to an end and the crowd dispersed, Jin Ling’s narration returned: “Soon, the truth of the incident was fully revealed. Lady Song had seen Jiang Yanli delivering the soup, and followed her out of curiosity. It had only taken a few times for Lady Song to figure out what was happening.”

Despite her parents’ and brother’s gazes telling her not to blame herself, the revelation of how it had gone wrong left Jiang Yanli feeling more than a little foolish. She blushed an rosy pink and looked down.

“One day, after Jiang Yanli had brought the soup, Lady Song had waited outside of Jin Zixuan’s room and purposefully allowed him to see her shadow.”

Jin Guangshan wanted to sigh at his son’s foolishness. If Zixuan hadn’t allowed himself to get so emotionally invested in a random woman, he wouldn’t have had to face such a humiliating situation.

“Afterward, although Jiang Yanli continued to work in Langya, she kept to herself. Not only did she stop bringing Jin Zixuan soup, but she refused to give him even a proper look. Shortly after the crisis of Langya was solved, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng brought her back to Yunmeng.”

“How on earth did Jin Ling happen, then?” Madam Jin wondered.

Seeing the complicated look on his ally’s face, Lan Qiren turned to Jiang Fengmian and said, “Perhaps it’s all for the best. Given everything that had happened, their relationship was a bit unbalanced, with your daughter always feeling one-sided affection. This might be an opportunity for them to meet as equals.”

Agreeing completely, Wen Qing sent Jiang Yanli a reassuring nod.

“Nevertheless, Wei Wuxian never forgave him.”

“Of course not,” Madam Jin sighed, feeling like everything was clicking into place. They could all see where this was going to end, but, it being a simulation, there was nothing they could do to stop it.

When light returned to the blackened world, they were back in the future. Wei Wuxian (in Mo Xuanyu’s body) still had his arm outstretched over Jin Ling, Wisps of black traced their way in a maze across his hand, and a sheen of sweat had begun to cover his face from the exertion.

(‘Ungrateful, ignorant fool,’ Wen Ruohan thought in response. ‘Even after all this, you refuse to appreciate the treasure you have at your disposal.’)

“A-Xian,” a voice called out, and the watchers were pulled back inside the curse-based hallucination. The Yiling Patriarch looked around the lotus pond, trying to see where the voice had come from.

“A-Xian?” the real Jiang Yanli asked.

“A-Xian,” they heard again, and Wei Wuxian flinched.

“Shijie?” he asked. “Shijie, where are you?”

“A-Xian,” she said again. “A-Xian, look.”

He turned around, and saw a replica of the figures who had been in the painting Jin Ling looked at. Jiang Yanli — Madam Jin — held an infant Jin Ling in her arms, Jin Zixuan lovingly wrapping an arm around her.

"Well, it's… nice that they're assuring us it'll all work out at the end," Nie Huaisang supposed.

Wei Wuxian smiled and reached towards her.

The watchers flinched at the same time he did.

With shaking limbs, he slowly turned his hand around so that his palm would face him, and saw that it was drenched in blood. A shock of static striked at the watchers' heads, and when they opened their eyes again the waters were painted red. Wei Wuxian stood in the center, eyes wide and face frozen in shock.

He looked around, a lost child among a sea of death. Then, to his left, a hallucination of the adult Jin Zixuan collapsed to his knees.

There was a hole in his chest.

'Wei Wuxian is a monster! Yanli treated him like her own brother!' a man revealed.

Just a short while ago, they had been sure that, due to the lack of psychological damage resentful energy caused, Wei Wuxian couldn't have been the one to kill Jin Ling's parents.

But if he remembered this — if he'd been there-

"No," Wei Wuxian whispered, stepping back. "No-"

"A-Xian," Jiang Yanli's voice whispered, and a drop of blood fell off a lotus petal.

Wei Wuxian's eyes were drawn in the direction of that voice just in time to see a blade pierce through Jiang Yanli's chest. Her hand fell, and her corpse collapsed onto the ground.

Now, suddenly, the watchers were a lot less sure.

Wei Wuxian stared in horror at the scene before him. He shook his head in denial, and tears of grief began to flow out of his eyes. Genuine reactions. Negative emotion.

Strong enough to manipulate resentment.

Wen Chao shrieked and jumped back as resentful energy screamed..

"No!" Wei Wuxian shouted, sucking in the power only to blast it out in a tremendous shockwave. The force sent countless lotus petals flying into the air, but removed the lingering resentful energy as well.

The water had returned to a clear blue.

“Okay,” Nie Huaisang grumbled from where he’d been knocked onto the ground. “I have no idea what just happened.”

Were those Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan’s deaths? They’d barely seen any of it, so it was impossible to tell what had happened. The only things that were undeniable were this:

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan had been killed.

They were speaking to Wei Wuxian when it happened.

They didn’t want to believe it, but would someone else really have been able to kill those two if Wei Wuxian was with them? He would have stopped any attempt, right?

Unless that was the outcome he’d wanted.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji whispered, stepping close.

Right before he could reach Wei Wuxian, however, another hand beat him to it. It was the child form of Jin Ling, who had grabbed Wei Wuxian’s finger with his own. Wei Wuxian flinched and glanced down, only to find the boy he had orphaned staring up at him.

“Shishu,” the child’s eyes watered. “Why did A-Niang and A-Die abandon me?”

Wei Wuxian sucked in a breath and looked away, but forced himself to respond, “They… they didn’t abandon you.”

“Then where are they? Why haven’t they come to me?”

Rushing forward, Jiang Yanli knelt down beside her son, wishing that she could help. As she saw this, Madam Yu couldn’t shake the feeling that, had she been allowed to live, Jiang Yanli would have become a much better mother than she ever was.

(Was she not already? Jiang Yanli had done far more than her to parent Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng, after all.)

(And now Wei Wuxian was repaying the favor.)

And, proving her point, Wei Wuxian smiled and knelt down before Jin Ling, answering, “They’re very far away. Come, I'll take you to find your family.”

After thinking it over for a moment, Jin Ling glared and ordered, “Don’t lie to me!”

“I won’t,” Wei Wuxian promised. “It’s dangerous here. Come, Jin Ling.”

He held a hand out. Jin Ling took it.

The hallucination faded away.

“Thank you, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian whispered.

Wei Wuxian opened his eyes, and looked down at the unconscious Jin Ling. He frowned as he stared.

'This is a complicated one,' he thought. 'I got some of it, but the rest… I might not be able to unravel it. Should I-'

Before he could finish that thought, Jin Ling opened his eyes.

"A-Ling!"

After taking a moment to blink away his exhaustion, Jin Ling realized three things. One, that he didn't know where he was. Two, that his insane uncle was leaning over him. Three, that he was mostly undressed.

"W-what are you doing?!" he demanded, immediately getting up.

"Oh, hey. You're awake!" Wei Wuxian grinned.

"That is not an appropriate response!" Wen Qing protested.

Jin Ling jumped back, straightening out his clothes and demanding, "What do you want? Where are my clothes? Where's my sword? And my dog!"

"I was just about to put your clothes back on you," Wei Wuxian explained, clearly far too amused by the situation.

"I'm not a cut sleeve!" Jin Ling protested.

Jiang Yanli frowned at the disgust in the tone, instantly reminded of the 'damn gay' Jin Ling had used to describe Mo Xuanyu upon their first meeting.

"What a coincidence," Wei Wuxian beamed. "I am!"

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted, annoyed at such a tone being used on someone other than him.

Jin Ling snatched the sword that laid beside the bed in a manner so serious that Wei Wuxian couldn't help but laugh, "Why are you so scared? I'm just kidding! I spent so much effort digging you out of that wall, and you don't even thank me."

"Be polite to your Shishu, A-Ling," Jin Zixuan muttered.

Hearing that, Madam Jin turned a disapproving gaze on her son. Yes, it was true that she trusted the current and past Wei Wuxian, but the Yiling Patriarch was a different story. Considering him Jin LIng's "Shishu" before understanding what happened was naive at best.

As if in agreement, Jin Ling scrambled away and tried to fix his messy hair, threatening, "I-if not for the fact that you dug me out, you taking off my cl-clothes would have meant I'd have killed you a thousand times over!"

“Please don’t. Dying once was already painful enough.”

“Weren’t you trying to keep your identity hidden?!” Wen Qing lectured.

Smiling warmly, Lan Xichen leaned close to Lan Wangji and whispered, “It’s a good thing he now has you to look after him.”

After a moment of hesitation, Lan Wangji nodded in agreement.

“You-”

“There, there,” Wei Wuxian sighed, smile teetering the edge of patronizing. “No need for that. Go on, put the sword down.”

With a muddled look, Jin Ling did as he was told.

A warm smile crossed Jiang Yanli’s face. It wasn’t perfect — her son was still fairly rude, even if in a childish way — but it was, undeniably, progress. Although Jin Ling’s memories of his rescue were hazy, he clearly remembered the terror of feeling himself slowly begin to suffocate in the wall, and knew that the person who had saved him was the cultivator before him. To realize that his mysterious savior was “Mo Xuanyu” left him more confused than anything else.

But it was progress nonetheless.

Glancing outside, Jin Ling saw at once that it had become dark, with a few stars already appearing in the sky. Eyes wide, he immediately leapt out of bed and snatched his clothes out of Wei Wuxian’s hands, running outside. Wei Wuxian, who had expected Jin Ling to be exhausted after what had just happened, was completely blindsided.

‘He still has the curse mark!’ Wei Wuxian realized, eyes widening with horror. “Jin Ling, wait!”

Wei Wuxian gave chase.

“What number is this? It’s like the fourth time since Wei Wuxian’s come back that he’s had to go and save Jin Ling’s life! What is with that kid’s luck?!”

Outside, Wei Wuxian followed after the fleeing Jin Ling and shouted, “What are you running away for?! Come back!”

“Don’t follow me!” Jin Ling responded, hurriedly putting on his sect robe. Unfortunately, Jin Ling’s higher cultivation soon allowed him to pull ahead. Wei Wuxian had lost him.

Twilight approached, and Wei Wuxian continued to search. He walked through the streets and listened carefully to nearby conversations and even asked a few people if they’d seen the boy, but it was hopeless. The dwindling number of people on the street correlated with the latening hour, and Jin Ling was nowhere to be found.

‘Jin Ling,’ Wei Wuxian cursed. ‘Where did that damn kid go?’

Lan Qiren couldn’t help but think that Wei Wuxian absolutely deserved this after all the pain he’d put the simulated Lan Qiren through while in the Cloud Recesses.

“Jin Ling!” a voice snapped.

“A-Cheng?”

“You disappeared after I said just a few things about you! Are you a young mistress? Your temper has been growing worse and worse.”

Nie Huaisang made an “oh” sound, finally understanding the reason Lan Jingyi had called Jin Ling “young mistress” earlier.

Having recognized the voice of his former shidi, Wei Wuxian slid behind an alleyway to listen closely. A moment later, Jin Ling’s voice responded to his uncle.

“I’ve come back perfectly fine, haven’t I? Stop nagging!”

“‘Perfectly fine?’” Wen Qing parrotted, raising a judgmental eyebrow.

‘So Jin Ling didn’t come to Qinghe by himself,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Jiang Cheng had come to help Jin Ling at Dafan mountain as well. It makes sense that he’d be here now.’

Jin Ling had almost died at Dafan mountain too, hadn’t he? With that in mind, Jiang Cheng mentally promised himself to make Wei Wuxian create a Compass of Evil that pointed at Jin Ling instead of spirits. As far as he could tell, that would be the only way to keep his absolutely insane nephew safe.

“Perfectly fine?” Jiang Cheng repeated, even more disbelieving than Wen Qing had been. “You look like you rolled around in a muddy ditch and you call yourself perfectly fine?! Aren’t you embarrassed to be wearing your sect’s uniform? Speak. What did you run into today?”

“I already told you: I didn’t run into anything!” Jin Ling lied. “I tripped, and it was a waste of time — Ow! Don’t tug me like that! I’m not three!”

“You think I can’t discipline you anymore? Let me tell you, even when you’re thirty I’ll still be able to do this! Next time, if you run around without telling anyone again, the whip awaits you!”

“I went alone because I didn’t want anyone to help or discipline me!”

‘I don’t know about those other things, but Jiang Cheng had a point when he said Jin Ling’s temper was just like a young mistress’,’ Wei Wuxian thought.

The longer Lan Wangji watched the amusing interaction, the more he wished they would be able to meet up with Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi again. Watching his older self’s teaching style would provide valuable inspiration for Lan Wangji to apply once he left the simulation.

Sighing, Jiang Cheng moved on and asked, "So? What now? What did you catch? Where's the spiritual dog your uncle gave you?"

Lan Xichen smiled and, along with Wei Wuxian, thought, 'It's been chased into a random corner by my broth-'

Two barks came from the distance and Wei Wuxian shrieked, jumping out of the alleyway right as Fairy went barreling into Jin Ling's arms.

For a moment, everything paused, and Wei Wuxian made eye contact with Jiang Cheng, terror still clear in his expression.

Now, finally, Jiang Cheng could relax. It was true that Zidian hadn't worked, but now that the older Jiang Cheng had seen 'Mo Xuanyu's' fear of dogs, it would be obvious that this was Wei Wuxian.

At long last, Wei Wuxian could come home.

Except, when Wei Wuxian got over his shock, the first thing he did was turn and flee.

Jiang Cheng glared. There was a flash of purple light, and a crack of Zidian sent Wei Wuxian flying forward and tumbling across the ground.

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli yelped, running over at once.

"Look who we have here," Sect Leader Jiang smirked, sending a line of purple lightning forward to hold Wei Wuxian in place. "What? Lan Wangji didn't tie you up in his home after Dafan Mountain?"

"What is he insinuating?" Lan Qiren gasped out. Everyone else was too shocked by the glee in Jiang Wanyin's voice to pay that any mind.

"Hey, Sect Leader Jiang, why did you hit me with purple lightning again?" Wei Wuxian grumbled, shifting to face his former shidi despite the lightning binding him in place. And he raised a good point; if Zidian hadn't expelled his soul the first time, it wouldn't the second either.

'It doesn't mean anything,' the simulated Jiang Cheng had thought as 'Mo Xuanyu' got up after the strike from Zidian. 'I should first find an excuse to take him back and use every possible method to get information out of him. It's impossible for him to not confess anything or give himself away. I've done things like this plenty of times already.'

They hadn't completely believed it then.

But now-

Jiang Wanyin walked forward and snatched the back of Wei Wuxian's collar, yanking him up and making him hiss as a few strands of hair got caught by Jiang Cheng's hand. Then, without another word, Jiang Cheng walked to a nearby shop and kicked the door open.

“A-Cheng?” Jiang Yanli asked, worry taking over. She made eye contact with her family, seeing equal amounts of worry on all of their faces. Yes, she could understand why her brother felt motivated to do that (Wei Wuxian had made his refusal to even talk to Jiang Cheng very clear) but this still seemed excessive.

In the back of her mind, she prayed that was all it was.

The shop owner squeaked in fright, seeing the obvious wealth and power of the man who entered.

(The expression on Sect Leader Jiang’s face certainly didn’t help. If you asked the shop owner, wouldn’t be surprising if Jiang Cheng disemboweled Wei Wuxian on the spot!)

It was a little funny to Jiang Yanli to see how much worse at expressing his emotions her brother had gotten. If she didn’t know him better, she would have thought he was actually going to hurt Wei Wuxian.

(Luckily, Jiang Cheng had run out to distract the Wens, proving his love. She didn’t need to worry.)

Then, even without prompting, a Jiang disciple went up and whispered something in the man’s ear, handing over a few pieces of silver. Trembling further, the owner nodded once and fled the building through a back door. Immediately after, the Jiang disciples spread out, preventing anyone from entering or exiting the building.

Lan Qiren frowned, “...Sect Leader Jiang?”

“They…” Jiang Fengmian paused. “They must be realizing how excited A-Cheng is. I’m not completely sure how they all knew to do that, but… they must just know A-Cheng really well.”

That made sense. The only other explanation was that this was something they did often, but Jiang Cheng shouldn’t have more than one family member who was unwilling to speak with him, so that didn’t make sense.

(Though, if you asked the snickering Wen Chao, he’d say it was clearly a trained response. After all, he’d taught his own Wen disciples to do the exact same thing.)

Meanwhile, Jin Ling stood on the side, looking completely lost.

“Uncle, why are you taking this damn cutsleeve?”

Instead of answering, Jiang Cheng kicked the restrained Wei Wuxian, making him whine pitifully.

Hearing the clearly-exaggerated act, Lan Wangji managed to calm momentarily. Yes, this was just like what was happening with the future Hanguang-jun: Wei Wuxian not wanting to talk to people who cared for him.

(And yet, he couldn’t keep himself from mentally praying for Wei Wuxian’s safety.)

“I’ll take care of you later. Stay here,” Jiang Wanyin ordered to his nephew. Without sparing a second glance, he walked up the stairs toward one of the rooms, dragging the captive Wei Wuxian with him.

The nephew he’d left behind stared up in horror.

‘For as long as I can remember… has Jiuju ever looked like that?’ he thought. ‘Jiujiu’s led the Jiang Sect since he was young, so he’s always been… cold and dark.’

Jiang Cheng flinched.

’But, right now….. He was trying to suppress his expression. And his face has always been clouded by arrogance and satire-’

‘Unfilial brat,’ Madam Yu mentally hissed.

(Had her own children thought the same things about her?)

‘Right now, it looks like every corner of his face has come alive. I-I don’t even know what that was.’

Vengeful wrath, fathomless hatred, or raving ecstasy.

Having seen the future Jiang Cheng’s expression for themselves, there was nothing the watchers could say in response.

“Jin Ling,” Jiang Cheng spoke again, having reached the top of the stairs. “Lend me your dog.”

It took at least three seconds for those words to register.

And in that time, a frozen Wei Wuxian was thrown into an inn room, Fairy following shortly after at Jin Ling’s reluctant whistle.

“...A-Cheng?” Jiang Yanli asked, staring blankly at him.

He could only gape, too shocked to speak.

Within the room, Wei Wuxian sat in a crouch, ready to flee at a moment’s notice. His eyes weren’t on Jiang Cheng, but rather the loyal dog waiting patiently by the door, guarding his only exit.

‘Jiang Cheng really knows the best way to deal with me,’ he thought, his eyes glued to the beast before him.

The words were said with a self-deprecating humor, but none of the watchers managed to crack a smile.

Meanwhile, Jiang Cheng sat down at a nearby table and poured himself a cup of tea. For a moment, no one spoke. Then, Jiang Cheng glanced towards him.

"...Don't you have something to say to me?" he asked, his lips curling up into a cruel smile.

"I don't know what to say to you," Wei Wuxian replied sincerely.

"Say what?" Nie Mingjue asked, his eyes glued disbelievingly onto the scene before him. In the third segment, he had been shocked by their apparent closeness. Now, he was abruptly recalling the reason for that.

"Do you… want an apology?" Lan Xichen asked. And if Jiang Cheng was truly demanding something like that, then had Wei Wuxian actually been responsible for Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli's-

"You really don't learn, do you?"

"And I see you haven't made any progress either."

Jiang Cheng flinched. No matter how many times they fought — how many times they argued — how many times Jiang Cheng had mocked his fear of dogs — Wei Wuxian had always still had affection for him.

He had never sounded so cold.

Enraged, the simulated Sect Leader Jiang laughed: "We'll see who hasn't made any progress."

And, with a whistle, he made Fairy run forward.

"Ah!" Jiang Yanli shouted as she fell to her knees. And she was far from the only one; the piercing shriek ringing in everyone's minds made the earlier castle's spirits sound like a lullaby by comparison. The pressure of the energy slammed against them as well, preventing even the steady from speaking.

'Help!'* Patriarch's commands screamed. *'Help! Help! Get it away from me-'

'No, stop. Don't do anyth-'

'Help me!'

Their bodies numbed and their panic grew in synch with Wei Wuxian's.

'No, please, teeth, it's going to bite — help! I-'

'No! Stay still! Stay calm! Don't-'

'Don't touch me! Don't let it touch-'

'It'll bite and tear and rip and chew-'

'Don't! It's-'

'Help me!'

"What did you just say?" Jiang Cheng demanded, pulling Fairy back by its collar.

"Huh?" Wei Wuxian asked.

A sudden lack of terror appeared as the resentful energy abruptly cut off, making many of the watchers feel like a drunk lightheadedness. Nie Huaisang even laughed a bit as a bubbly sensation spread through his chest.

Lan Wangji turned to his uncle, "What… was that?"

"I almost forgot to ask," Jiang Cheng added on. "Since when have you been so close to Lan Wangji?"

"I… I…" Wei Wuxian heaved frightened, panicked breaths. "I called his name?"

After such a scene, not even Lan Xichen could be happy with the proof of the couple's growing relationship. It seemed like such a pathetically minor victory in comparison to the shock they had just received.

"And last time, on Dafan mountain… he went so far to protect you," Jiang Cheng thought aloud. "No, he wasn't necessarily protecting you. After all, Gusu Lan hasn't forgotten the people you killed with that loyal dog of yours. Someone so celebrated for his righteousness wouldn't tolerate the likes of you. Maybe he was just protecting the person whose body you stole."

"Watch your language," Wei Wuxian snapped, unable to tolerate the faux-politeness covering cruelty.

"No, Wangji knew," Lan Qiren shook his head, then abruptly flinched back.

That was the answer to everything, wasn't it? The reason behind Hanguang-jun's behavior, and even Wei Wuxian's reactions. If Lan Wangji knew that Jiang Wanyin was a genuine danger to Wei Wuxian — that he might kill him again — then bringing Wei Wuxian under his protection was no surprise at all, no matter what it took. And Wei Wuxian?

He'd continued trying to escape what he thought was a genuine punishment because that was what would happen if anyone else had found him. But Wangji had proven his desire to help Wei Wuxian time and time again, until the Yiling Patriarch had begun to trust him.

(Until Wangji's name was the one Wei Wuxian called out when scared.)

Jiang Cheng laughed, "You really have the audacity to tell me to watch my language? Back on Dafan mountain, which one of us didn't watch what they said while talking to Jin Ling?"

Wei Wuxian stiffened.

"Wei Ying, it wasn't your fault," Lan Wangji whispered.

Having regained the upper hand in the conversation, Jiang Cheng sneered and continued, "'I suppose you didn't have a mother to teach you?' Hitting where it hurts the most, huh? Have you forgotten who's the reason Jin Ling has had to face so many whispers behind his back? You're quite the forgetful old man. You've forgotten the things you've said, the promise you made…."

"Promise?" Jiang Cheng asked, unable to register anything else.

"But don't you dare forget how his parents died!"

"I haven't forgotten! I only… I-"

Jiang Cheng's untouched cup of steaming tea shattered against the wall behind Wei Wuxian, a few drops landing on his uncovered skin and making him wince.

"Only what? You can't say it?" Jiang Cheng laughed. "That's alright! You can say your excuses as you kneel before my parent's graves!"

It really was an apology he wanted. No, it was more than that: he wanted Wei Wuxian to admit that he'd been wrong.

(If he'd really killed Jiang Yanli, was this unjustified? And no matter the animosity between them, Jin Zixuan had done nothing to justify his murder.)

So this-

Wei Wuxian looked away: 'I've always wanted to return to Lotus Pier. But… not the tattered Lotus Pier of today.'

"Tattered?!" Jiang Cheng stood up, then froze, unable to say anything while remembering the way Yunmeng Jiang's disciples had cut off the building's exits without needing orders to do so. And, despite all the screaming Wei Wuxian had done, had not come up to check.

Which meant they'd expected this.

Which meant-

Suddenly, a series of hurried footsteps approached.

"Uncle!" Jin Ling knocked furiously. "Uncle!"

"Didn't I tell you to stay where you were? Why are you up here?"

"Uncle, I have something really important to tell you!"

"Then why didn't you say it while I was scolding you? Why bother me now?"

“I couldn’t say it because you were scolding me! Are you going to listen or not? If not, I’m not going to say anything-”

“Just tell me!” Jiang Cheng commanded, finally opening the door.

Jin Ling immediately stepped inside and explained, “I actually did encounter something extreme today. I think I ran into Wen Ning!”

“What?” Wen Qing gasped.

“Where? When?!” Jiang Cheng demanded, his expression hostile.

“It was this afternoon. There’s a worn-down house about a dozen miles south of here. I went because I’d heard something strange had happened, and there was a fierce corpse inside!”

“But… he was at the castle… this afternoon.”

“Why didn’t you say so earlier?!”

“I wasn’t sure! I’d just seen a blurry figure! But I heard chain noises like the ones he made on Dafan Mountain! If you hadn’t scolded me like that, I would have told you earlier. Blame your bad temper, not me!”

Jin Ling tried to step further inside, but Jiang Cheng had become so angry that he slammed the door in his nephew’s face.

By this point, even Jiang Yanli was too mentally and emotionally exhausted to say anything about that.

When Jiang Cheng spun around, Wei Wuxian quickly arranged his face into a surprised ‘oh no, my secret was discovered.’ Jin Ling was actually quite clever, making an excellent lie given the limited information he had.

“Well, well,” Jiang Cheng glared. “You really bring that dog of yours everywhere, don’t you?”

“Don’t call him that,” Wen Qing demanded, now knowing full-well exactly what a “dog” meant to Wei Wuxian.

With a sigh, Wei Wuxian pointed out, “He’s been dead for years. I’ve died once, too. What more do you want?”

“So what? Even if he dies a thousand times my hatred will never fade! I’ll burn him right now, and scatter the ashes right in front of your face!”

‘What has Wei Wuxian done to deserve this?’ Jiang Cheng thought, staring in disbelief at his older-self. ‘I can’t imagine… did he really kill A-jie? I….’

“A-Ling,” he spoke. “Keep a close eye on the person inside. Don’t believe or listen to anything he says! Don’t let him make a sound. If he tries to whistle or play his flute, block his mouth. If that doesn’t work, just cut off his tongue!”

‘Break his legs? Haven’t I told you? When dealing with those without honor, just kill them and feed them to your dog.’

He’d meant that literally. And, unlike when they’d first heard those words, the watchers now had no doubt that everything being shown by the simulation was real.

“I know, I’ll watch him,” Jin Ling promised, unaware that those words had been said more as a threat to Wei Wuxian than anything else. “Uncle, why did you shut yourself inside here with this damn cutsleeve? What did he do this time?”

“Don’t ask. Remember to watch properly. If I return to see that he’s disappeared, I’ll break your leg for sure!”

That was a threat he didn’t mean. Like the A-Cheng Jiang Yanli knew, he was acting more angry than he actually was, and speaking threats he and the target knew he wasn’t going to follow up on.

But he had used a dog against Wei Wuxian. If Jiang Cheng told Wei Wuxian that he was going to send dogs to chew Wei Ying to shreds, he’d mean it. And both of them knew it.

“Let’s go!” Jiang Cheng ordered.

“Yes, sir!” his disciples responded, not a single one of them showing concern over the things he might have done to “Mo Xuanyu” (whose greatest crime, as far as they knew, was tripping Jin Ling when the boy attacked him).

The door slammed shut.

The Jiang parents had to look away.

After all, Wen Ning was the only reason their bodies’ hadn’t faced the same fate as what Jiang Cheng had just mentioned. Wen Ning had found their corpses and allowed them to get a proper burial. And now their son, who Wen Ning had saved, was going to try to scatter his ashes.

What had happened?

“Damn cutsleeve,” Jin Ling began.

Jiang Yanli sighed, now realizing that the phrase had become so ingrained into Jin Ling that he didn’t even think before saying it.

“What were you talking to my uncle about? Why didn’t he let me listen?”

“Adults were speaking, why would we involve a child like you?” the restrained Wei Wuxian responded, his smile shockingly teasing for someone being held captive.

However, a moment later, he frowned, watching Jin Ling dart his eyes around the room nervously.

A moment later, the Jin heir put a finger in front of his lips, walked forward, and whispered something.

Zidian disassembled.

"A-Ling?"

It reformed into a silver ring in Jin Ling's palm. He looked around one last time, then whispered:

"Let's go."

Genuine smiles warred with stunned disbelief in the watchers' expression. It was heartwarming that Jin Ling was helping Wei Wuxian. It was a level of bravery and righteousness that they honestly hadn't expected.

And yet any joy they might have felt for that was destroyed by the fact that it was Jiang Cheng who had prompted those actions. After all, and even if Wei Wuxian had saved his life, Jin Ling thought of Mo Xuanyu as a "damn cutsleeve lunatic," who he was embarrassed to have as an uncle. And yet he'd still thought Wei Wuxian needed to be saved.

"A-Cheng?" Jiang Yanli whispered, seeing the far away look in her brother's eyes. He didn't respond.

Several more people glanced over, and saw the denial clear in his expression. Everyone knew what he was thinking. That couldn't have been him. He must have been possessed or controlled by someone else, but….

No matter what the simulated Jiang Cheng did, Wei Wuxian hadn't been surprised.

(Like a twist on an already present knife, this realization stabbed deeper into the existing wound of Wei Wuxian's similar lack of surprise when Jiang Fengmian prioritized his blood child's life over Wei Wuxian's.)

And yet, could they be mad at Jiang Cheng for this? He had been just as surprised as the rest of them.

They wanted to. Consciously, many of them wanted to be mad. Lan Wangji especially wanted justice for what had happened. And yet, over time, the simulation had hammered into them time and time again how misleading the thirteen years later future was. The simulation had given them all proof that Jiang Cheng valued Wei Wuxian's life when he sacrificed himself to distract the Wens. Yes, a Jiang Cheng had set a dog on Wei Wuxian, but the one with them hadn't.

And the one with them wouldn't.

So, what were they supposed to do now?

Someone cleared their throat.

“Hi, Shijie, Jiang Cheng, Uncle Jiang, Madam Yu, sect leaders,” a chipper voice greeted them. “Is now an okay time?”

“Ah… welcome back, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian responded. “Is something wrong?”

“Nah, it’s all fine. I just made it back from the conference and thought I’d check in with you. So, how’s it going? Is the information you’re getting still just as important as ever? Or are you like me, realizing that the information you wanted to know is actually really boring when told by a bunch of dusty, old-”

“Wei Wuxian!” Madam Yu snapped, furious that he would insult sect elders in front of so many people.

“I… sorry, Madam Yu.”

“Don’t apologize, you… I….”

She couldn’t finish.

The way Wei Wuxian had simply shut down as she spoke was unbelievable, especially considering how ~~brave~~ reckless he’d been while going up against Wen Chao. No matter how bad she was, he couldn’t possibly believe she’d throw him into the Burial Mounds. Why would he still react that way?

Why did his voice sound so much like Jin Ling’s had when the simulated Jiang Cheng started dragging Wei Wuxian upstairs? There had, for a moment, been genuine nervousness on Jin Ling’s face. And now….

(Perhaps her husband would like a prize. Jiang Fengmian had always made it very clear that he felt like their son had inherited all her worst traits. It seemed he was right.)

(Which was probably why he hadn’t wanted to get married to her in the first place.)

But it was different. Her son was (supposedly) torturing demonic cultivators and anyone who reminded him of Wei Wuxian. He was using dogs against Wei Wuxian, and even she’d never done that ~~aside from the few times she’d threatened to throw him back out onto the streets~~. The situations weren’t alike at all.

~~Though, given what Wei Wuxian had done to deserve it those respective times, she knew saying that they were different actually made her look worse, rather than better.~~

Her son cleared his throat, “...Wei Wuxian.”

“Jiang Cheng?”

“I… whenever you’ve slept in and I tell you that, like, dogs are coming or something, you know I’m lying, right? You’re an idiot, but you're not that much of an idiot.”

“Well, yeah. Of course,” Wei Wuxian answered, then paused. “Wait, are you feeling guilty over it? Aw, A-Cheng, I didn’t realize you cared. What, did something in the simulation make you think of it?”

“What? I… of course not! I was just wondering,” Jiang Cheng denied, relaxing greatly at those words.

“We were just worried,” Jiang Yanli confirmed.

“Whatever you say,” Wei Wuxian agreed easily. “Well, since Shijie’s so worried, can you make me something to eat when you get out of the Great Sleep? I’ve been really missing your soup!”

“Oh, don’t be such a baby!” Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes. “You can survive without her soup for a few days!”

At those words, Lan Wangji and Wen Qing had to try very, very hard to not imagine the starving eight year old Wei Wuxian, who very nearly hadn’t.

“Doesn’t matter, Shijie loves me! Right, Shijie?”

Jiang Yanli laughed, “Of course, A-Xian.”

“My god, you’re so annoying,” Jiang Cheng glared. “You know, if you were more normal I might not have used Fairy to-”

“A-Cheng!” Jiang Fengmian interrupted at the exact moment Jiang Cheng realized what he had been about to say. Horror spread across his face. Yes, he wasn’t going to do that, but that didn’t make his older self doing it any less disturbing.

“What?” Wei Wuxian asked. “What’s ‘Fairy?’”

“Nothing, Wei Wuxian,” Madam Yu responded. “Go on. Has anything been happening outside?”

As Wei Wuxian began a general report on the outside world, the Jiang family made eye contact with each other. Seeing his father’s disapproving gaze instantly sucked all the energy out of Jiang Cheng’s body and left him shaking in both anger and shame at the fact that this happened in front of everyone.

(Not that there was much room for secrets in here.)

“A-Cheng, I-”

Even whispering those words wasn’t enough to soften their blow. When Jiang Cheng flinched, Jiang Fengmian forced himself to stop talking. It wouldn’t do to make Wei Wuxian panic before they were shown why Jiang Cheng had grown up into someone like that.

On the other side, Jiang Cheng was a tidal wave of thoughts crashing against rocky shores. Guilt, uncertainty, embarrassment, denial, and a crippling fear of abandonment warred within him, and he cursed himself for saying something so stupid. And now his father refused to talk to him because now he hated-

'A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.'

Even if his father didn't hate him, Jiang Cheng knew he was disappointed. But that wasn't fair.

"He deserved it," Jiang Cheng whispered. "He must… somehow."

There was no doubt in Jiang Cheng's mind that what they were being shown was their actual future. But if that was him, then-

"He must have done something so horrible that I don't have a choice. Like-like killing Jin-gongzi. We all agreed that was possible."

"A-Cheng, y-"

"Is he wrong?" Madam Yu asked. "Even Wei Wuxian admitted that this wouldn't normally have happened. And yet his future self wasn't surprised, so something must have changed."

"But, A-Niang he-"

"Wangji, don't," Lan Xichen hissed, seeing the way his brother looked like he was about to declare war on the Jiang Sect.

"And that about sums it up. Any questions?" Wei Wuxian concluded, forcing the watchers to tune in to what he was saying again.

The long pause that followed made it painfully clear that no one had been listening.

"Wei Wuxian," Lan Qiren rushed to fill the silence. "Would you be able to pass on a message to Lan Ziming for me?"

"Sure."

"Good. Tell her to check the shelves to the left of my personal desk. They have the organizational reports she'll need to resume night hunts farther away."

And if Lan Qiren's actions just so happened to create a relationship between Wei Wuxian and the Lan Sect, that was no one's business but Lan Qiren's. His sudden relief over the true nature of his nephew's relationship with Wei Wuxian had nothing to do with it.

(He definitely hadn't already started mentally planning a wedding. That would be absolutely ridiculous and he was above such frivolous behavior. The knowing glint in Lan Xichen's eyes meant nothing.)

And besides, it might be best for everyone if Wei Wuxian took a break from the Jiang Clan.

“Got it, anything else?”

After taking a quick scan around the room, Wen Ruohan decided, “No, that seems to be it. Thank you for your help, Wei Wuxian.”

Wei Wuxian laughed in response, then paused. As the watchers spoke, he couldn’t help but remember the odd way Wen Xu had spoken in his defense to Jin Zixun. The way he seemed to be internally mocking everyone else’s stupidity, as if they should have more information than they did.

And, considering the watchers’ previous questions….

“Um… Uncle Jiang?”

“What is it, A-Xian?”

“I might be going completely off track, and if I am, go ahead and tell me. Just… did the simulation… mention something about me?”

Absolute silence greeted his question. The correct answer was obviously ‘yes,’ but a simple yes was so much of an understatement that it practically counted as a lie. And how were they supposed to describe the truth?

Jiang Cheng could picture it already: ‘Guess what Wei Wuxian. I just saw first-hand why you’re so scared of dogs. And you wanna know what came right after? Watching my future self use one to torture you! Isn’t that just neat?’

(Some small part in the back of Jiang Cheng’s mind was genuinely starting to hate his older-self.)

Of course, it was hard to tell how he should feel. They knew so little about what was going on that nothing made sense. Jiang Cheng knew himself (and was sure he wouldn’t act that way for no reason), but that was almost worse.

‘Hey, Wei Wuxian, we’re debating the likelihood of you brutally murdering A-Jie for no reason. Any thoughts on the matter?’

“So?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Anything about me?”

“A bit,” the answer came.

“Nie-xiong?” Wei Wuxian asked, surprised that he was the one who’d answered.

“The simulation covers a lot of stuff. It’s full of information on our world. I’m sorry to say, but it included a bit on you too,” he frowned, making his regret clear in his voice. “It told us about your time on the streets, after your parents died.”

“...Oh. That makes sense,” Wei Wuxian said at last.

What the watchers didn't realize was that, in the process of explaining one confusion, they'd accidentally opened up about twenty more holes in the process. After all, Wen Xu, the only person to have left the simulation, had recently told Wei Wuxian that the watchers were being shown information about "Mo Xuanyu's" world.

And Wei Wuxian surely had nothing to do with Mo Xuanyu's world, right?

"Is there anything else?" Jin Guangshan asked, sensing the awkward air.

"No, that's it. I'll contact you all soon."

With a click, he disappeared.

And Jiang Cheng finally breathed out a sigh of relief.

"God, that was stressful," Jin Zixuan sighed. "I didn't even say anything, and I still felt like Wei Wuxian was about five seconds away from going full-Yiling Patriarch on us."

"Oh, don't worry so much," Nie Huaisang assured him. "You made Jiang-guniang cry, and the worst he did to you was punch you. I think we can all agree you deserved that much."

Jin Zixuan was forced to shrug in a form of reluctantly-grateful agreement.

"As interesting as my son's changing relationship with A-Li is," Madam Jin began, "We're on a limited time frame here. I suggest we move on to the more important parts of this segment."

There were nods of agreement from all around. The only people who seemed hesitant were the Jiangs, who had no idea where to begin in terms of what they'd just found out.

"So," Wen Qing prompted. "I guess those particular rumors weren't so exaggerated after all."

The fierce glares Jiang Cheng and Madam Yu turned her way did nothing to disrupt her steely confidence. As the only doctor present, she knew better than anyone just how dangerous Wei Wuxian's battles with the dogs would have been to such a young and weak child.

The mental scars it left him with were far from a surprise, even for someone who was normally so resilient.

"Can we pass any judgement on this?" Madam Yu asked. "We have no idea what caused it."

"We've certainly tried passing judgement on most of the things Wei Wuxian did," Nie Mingjue pointed out.

"And we were wrong those times."

"What could possibly justify this?" Lan Xichen asked, still making eye contact with his brother and silently requesting that the second jade keep a tight grip on his temper.

"If Jiang Yanli-"

Nie Mingjue scoffed, “Are we really going to keep swinging back and forth on this? We clearly don’t know enough to come to any sort of conclusion on what’s happened.”

“That’s exactly what we’re saying,” Jiang Fengmian replied. “We don’t know; we need to see what’s led up to it. Jin Zixuan's murder could be the result of another misunderstanding. And as for A-Li, regardless of whether it’s due to demonic cultivation, if A-Xian does go insane-”

“I don’t believe that's plausible.”

“Pardon?”

By then, even Lan Xichen’s panicked, wide eyes and mouthed “please please please stay calm” could no longer hold Lan Wangji back:

“I said, I don’t believe that,” he repeated. “He’s survived the fall of Lotus Pier, being thrown into the Burial Mounds, and the Sunshot Campaign. No matter what happens after, I can't think of anything that would cause Wei Ying to kill innocents.”

“But I would? Is that what you’re saying?” Jiang Cheng glared, knowing that if demonic cultivation wasn’t inherently corruptive, him attacking Mo Xuanyu at Dafan Mountain couldn’t be excused.

“You-”

“The point is,” Lan Xichen interrupted, “Whether the one at fault is you or Wei Wuxian or both or neither, we won’t let it happen.”

“That’s all you’re going to say?”

Frowning minutely, Lan Xichen thought for a moment then added, “I agree with Wangji. I don’t think Wei Wuxian could be brought to that point.”

“You can’t know that,” Madam Yu glared, rolling her eyes at the teenager. “Your naive hope-”

“On the contrary,” Lan Qiren spoke. “I also agree with Wangji’s claim. And regardless of what Wei Wuxian has or has not done, we all agree on his core character. He did not deserve what the future’s Sect Leader Jiang did to him.”

Here, Wen Ruohan could barely withhold a laugh. It wasn’t as though he didn’t understand where the Jiangs were coming from (the simulation certainly loved flipping their expectations on their heads), but, in this particular case, he had trouble taking their side. After all, if he and Wen Qing were right about whose core was revolving around in Sect Leader Jiang’s chest — the core that had whipped Wei Wuxian with Zidian and restrained him so a dog could pounce — then what had just happened between the two would take on an entirely new light.

Although he was unaware of the information Wen Ruohan had, Nie Huaisang’s thoughts were also drawn to that very memorable scene.

“You know, it’s kinda ironic,” Nie Huaisang hummed. “We had originally wondered if Weixiong was faking his fear of dogs since we didn’t feel any reactions from resentful energy. But, now that we’ve felt some, it’s pretty clear that’s the opposite of what was actually going on.”

Ordering them to help, then to stop, then to fight, then to not. Over time, it had become clear that Wei Wuxian’s uses of resentful energy were at least somewhat tied to emotion. The songs Wei Wuxian performed controlled the emotions of nearby resentful creatures; when angered, Wei Wuxian’s eyes would flash red; even leaving all of that aside, it was resentful energy — a concept literally built around emotions.

And yet, no matter how scared Wei Wuxian had gotten while facing down dogs (a level of emotion the Xuanwu and Wen Zhuliu and Wen Chao combined couldn’t generate), the nearby resentful energy hadn’t done anything.

(Until that last time.)

“...And what would you say is ‘actually going on?’” Lan Wangji wondered.

“I’m not really sure! Da-ge, what do you think?”

Frowning slightly at the blatant misdirection, Nie Mingjue nonetheless responded, “It seemed like his body was trying to instinctually react, and he was consciously preventing it. Almost like… he was so afraid of what he might end up doing in response, that he’d focused almost all the energy he’d had left on not doing anything.”

“Because he didn’t want to hurt the dogs,” Lan Xichen agreed. “He… knows it’s not their fault that he’s scared of them, so he just tries to control himself, rather than them.”

(And it was quite likely that he didn’t want to hurt Jiang Cheng either, but, after what they’d just seen, it would have felt wrong to bring that up.)

Hearing that, Jin Zixuan looked down and cursed his own foolishness yet again. Wei Wuxian could make sure he didn’t hurt the dogs who terrified him; why couldn’t Zixuan say anything against his father when it was Wei Wuxian who might be in danger because of it?

People had always whispered that cultivators in Lanling were selfish; for the first time, Jin Zixuan was starting to believe it. A similar feeling came over Nie Mingjue, who knew full-well that his eventual, inevitable qi-deviation was likely to be far more destructive than what Wei Wuxian had done.

On the other hand, Nie Huaisang and Lan Wangji both felt their hearts overcome by grief for Wei Wuxian.

(They couldn’t help but wonder if the series of tragedies occurring at the end of Wei Wuxian’s life had anything to do with why he was so scared of losing control.)

“I see,” a quiet voice whispered. “No matter what happens, he won’t attack them.”

Which meant it was their only chance at having power over the unconquerable.

Two pairs of eyes turned the voice's way. Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan were the only people close enough to hear Wen Chao say that, and it was instantly clear what the Wen heir meant. In all honesty, Jin Guangshan could see the boy's point. Now, they finally had a foolproof method to punish Wei Wuxian during the boy's initial training period; this was one of the most useful segments yet.

To Jin Guangshan's left, Wen Ruohan found himself frowning deeper and deeper the longer he considered the idea. To use dogs against Wei Wuxian would be effective and efficient, gaining huge results for a very small cost. All it would take was a growl from one, and Wei Wuxian would be trapped in a full-blown panic attack within seconds. It would be a good option to keep in mind, even if it seemed a bit unconventional.

And really, what was the harm? He wouldn't die to mere dogs. They would be easy to control. Wen Ruohan would simply tell them to attack or keep him in place or terrify him and-

And risk damaging that beautiful, brilliant, irreplaceable mind?

His plans for the battles which would eventually result in the Sunshot Campaign were still incomplete, but the incentive was already there. Every day, as he saw the Sects accept more and more from the Wen Clan — practically already viewing them as their leaders — taking over seemed like the obvious option. Especially with how incompetent they all were.

Not individually (he'd be the first to admit how his heirs paled in comparison to the others), but, rather, as a collective. Given the reactions to Wei Wuxian during the soup incident, what had happened to Wei Wuxian's core was still unknown. The boy's general illogical feelings about the Jiangs indicated there was probably an emotional reason for keeping the secret; that didn't change the fact that there was a practical one too.

If the world were to find out that Wei Wuxian had no core, the little respect he'd managed to maintain would disappear at once. Even those who supported him wouldn't be able to say anything against the shouts of the others. Wen Ruohan could hear it already.

'Not even a core? I'd accepted him before, but we were tricked into thinking he was still a cultivator then! A living being operating only on resentful energy? Isn't that just a demon? If he's not even human anymore, then we need to exterminate him.'

('Or enslave him for ourselves,' the more ambitious ones would think.)

It was a foregone conclusion. The cultivation world was made up primarily of fools who cared more about tradition than someone's use. None of them knew how to use the resources at their disposal, which was a large part of the reason why Wen Ruohan had needed to set up supervisory offices. They couldn't be trusted with the cultivators working for them.

Now that he'd learned about Wei Wuxian's fear of dogs, he would need to decide what to do with it. Only a fool would discount the possibilities entirely.

(But, the more he thought about it, the less Wen Ruohan liked the idea of using it.)

The uncharacteristic fear that had stained Wei Wuxian's perfect mind displeased him more than he'd thought it would.

He didn't know what to do about that.

(On the other hand, Wen Chao was nearly drooling with delight as he fantasized about the information's potential. How large could dogs grow, anyways? Would he be able to find one large enough to swing Wei Wuxian around by his arm, just like those dogs had done to the child Wei Ying? What expression would the young Yiling Patriarch make if he was faced with an army of them? Wen Chao was sure he would enjoy the sight of those dangerous silver eyes shining with tears.)

It would be quite the experience. Wen Chao couldn't wait to get out.

Chapter End Notes

The Audio Drama Extra was called Delivering Soup! Also, the 'Wei Wuxian is suppressing his demonic cultivation around dogs' thing is just my headcanon. I've got basically no evidence to support it, so if you disagree with it then feel free to just ignore it. It won't be important later, I promise!

"I'm just saying, it's not my fault the ceiling ended up covered by bees. How was I supposed to know there would be so many nearby?" Lan Jingyi protested enthusiastically. "And Senior Wei's the one who said it would be funny-"

"Jingyi, if you try using that excuse, Lan Qiren-xiansheng is just going to be more mad," Lan Sizhui pointed out. "Just try explaining the situation to him without mentioning Senior Wei. He'll understand."

With an especially dramatic sigh, Lan Jingyi forced himself to continue walking with Sizhui toward their terrifying teacher (who would undoubtedly give Jingyi an additional three weeks of punishment). In hindsight, maybe he should have tried coating his own ceiling with flowers before working on the ceiling of Lan Qiren's office. But he didn't have a choice; it was meant to be a surprise! It would have all been ruined if Lan Qiren found out about it ahead of time.

Lan Sizhui — the traitor — clearly had no sympathy for him.

Desperate for something that would stall his inevitable murder at Lan Qiren's hands, Lan Jingyi began looking around for some sort of distraction that would work on Sizhui. Food wouldn't work (that would never distract the other Lan), books wouldn't work (that wasn't time-sensitive, so Sizhui could always read them later), an emergency wouldn't work (because there wasn't one happening around them), and Jin Ling and Zizhen, the only people who Jingyi might have been able to trust to help him distract Sizhui, were nowhere to be found.

Nonetheless, Jingyi continued to look around frantically for inspiration. The trees all along the Cloud Recesses' paths were (unfortunately) just as healthy as ever, and the crisp, cool fog that had settled over the area impeded most of Jingyi's vision. However, a moment later, Jingyi perked up, noticing something different than usual. In the distance, a large carriage was being filled with various treasures and trinkets from the Cloud Recesses. Someone was apparently on their way to a diplomatic negotiation.

Or — and here was the thing that might momentarily stall Sizhui — someone was stealing from the Cloud Recesses!

"Sizhui, Sizhui!" Jingyi tugged at his friend's arm, frantically pointing at the crime scene up ahead. "Look! Look! Over there! Isn't that — wait. Is that…."

“Senior Wei?” Lan Sizhui asked.

Hearing his name, said man glanced back at the two, face switching to a blindingly bright smile as soon as he recognized them.

“A-Yuan, Jingyi!” he waved. “On your way to Lan-xiansheng?”

“Yes,” Sizhui answered. “Jingyi-”

“Really missed Lan-xiansheng!” Jingyi hurriedly interrupted, not willing to reveal the catastrophic failure he’d just had to the most legendary student the Cloud Recesses had ever met. “Anyways, what are you doing here?”

“I’m on my way to visit someone to ask them for a favor. Zewu-jun suggested that I bring along a few gifts from Gusu to make the whole exchange easier, so now I have to take a whole carriage instead of just flying over. Can you believe how cruel my dear brother in law is?”

Intrigued, Lan Sizhui walked closer to observe what was being put into the carriage by one of the Lan Sect’s servants. Seeing that, Lan Jingyi gave a mental cheer. If there was one thing even Lan Sizhui couldn’t resist, it was their Senior Wei. Lan Jingyi couldn’t have thought up a better distraction if he tried to!

A large jar of alcohol was stuffed into the back of the carriage.

“...Senior Wei?”

“Yes, my little radish?”

Slowly, Lan Sizhui turned to his Xian-gege and asked, “Isn’t that jar some of the alcohol Sect Leader Nie brought over for your wedding celebration? Before he realized it wasn’t actually a celebration, that is.”

“Very astute, my clever little radish!”

Lan Jingyi did a double take, “Wait, you’re re-gifting Sect Leader Nie’s wedding supplies to ask someone else for a favor?! How shameless could you possibly be?"

"You should know better than to underestimate the Yiling Patriarch, Little Lan!" Wei Wuxian cackled dramatically.

"If you need things to send over, our Sect has plenty! Just ask Hanguang-jun!”

“Yes, yes, but this is more of a personal matter. I didn’t want to delve into the Sect’s reserves for that!”

Like he’d just been slapped, Lan Sizhui flinched back before glaring up and all-but-shouting, “Senior Wei, you are a member of the Gusu Lan Sect. As Hanguang-jun’s husband, you are well within your rights to use the Sect’s wealth for whatever you wish — especially with how much money your inventions have made. No one has a right to deny that of you!”

With a gasp, Wei Wuxian stepped back and covered his mouth, eyes wide.

“Senior Wei?” Sizhui asked.

“Oh my god, you sounded like a baby Lan Zhan when you said that!” Wei Wuxian cooed, clearly not having paid attention to anything Sizhui said. Considering he had undoubtedly gotten (and subsequently ignored) the exact same speech from Lan Wangji, Jingyi couldn’t say he was surprised.

“Where is Hanguang-jun, anyways?” Lan Jingyi asked.

“If I’m being perfectly honest, Lan Zhan doesn’t want me to do this at all,” Wei Wuxian revealed. “So I figured I’d head over while he’s busy with being a grand and important Chief Cultivator so that he doesn’t notice!”

An unnerving shiver ran up the two radishes’ spines. When Lan Wangji found out what Wei Wuxian had done, his hate for the position of Chief Cultivation would multiply beyond their wildest dreams. The two of them couldn’t help but send sympathetic prayers towards the pitiful Headshaker, who Hanguang-jun was going to force the position on as soon as humanly possible.

“Um, if Hanguang-jun thinks it’s a bad idea, then why are you going?” Jingyi asked. “And, for that matter, what’s this all about? Why are you being so secretive?”

“Lan Zhan’s just being overprotective,” Wei Wuxian answered with a dismissive wave of his hand. “And as for why I’m doing this at all… it turns out that, a week ago, a quartet of radishes snuck into my lab and activated one of my inventions. I need this person’s help to fix things up.”

An ocean of guilt slammed onto Lan Sizhui.

“I-in that case,” Lan Jingyi stepped forward. “We already know about it, so there’s no need to keep things hidden from us! Can we help?”

“There’s really no need for that,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “Or do you not trust your Senior Wei to take care of it himself?”

“I do,” Lan Jingyi assured him. “But it’s sorta our fault too, right?”

Lan Sizhui nodded, “Senior, please let me speak to the person you’re-”

“No.”

Both Lan boys froze. Although Wei Wuxian had continued to smile like usual, the rejection of Sizhui’s offer had left no room for confusion. From someone who would usually pull the conversation this way and that to get them to choose what he wanted them to, the simple ‘no’ was more than a little concerning.

“But-”

Sizhui cut off, seeing Wei Wuxian simply shake his head, watching Sizhui with an almost haunted look in his eyes.

“Sorry, A-Yuan, but I’d rather go alone. I’m not bringing Lan Zhan either, right? Well, in his case I’m not bringing him because he gets a little obsessively cautious about this, but still.”

“I can help!” Sizhui tried.

“I’m not saying no out of a lack of trust for you, it’s out of a lack of trust in the person I’m going to visit,” he explained, then, seeing the panic quickly spreading across their faces, rushed to explain, “I doubt anything will happen, but I’d still rather you stay away from the person I’m going to see. Honestly, at most he’ll probably just throw a few cups at me and shout a lot. He’s gotten much better than he used to be! And besides, I’m the Yiling Patriarch! You really don’t need to worry about little old me.”

Although still skeptical, Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi nodded in defeat.

“Great! Then run along, you two. You said you were on your way to Lan-xiansheng, right? Off you go!”

With heavy hearts and slouches in their steps, the two juniors forced themselves to walk away. Even Jingyi couldn’t make himself be pleased over how well his stalling efforts had worked, too worried for Wei Wuxian to pay that any mind.

As he watched the pair go, the smile on Wei Wuxian’s face molded into a far more bittersweet one. He took a deep breath, then entered the carriage.

“Sir?” the servant Zewu-jun assigned to be his driver spoke. “Where to?”

“Yunmeng Jiang,” Wei Wuxian answered. “I have an appointment with the Sect Leader there.”

The longer Jiang Yanli waited for the next segment to start, the happier she felt. The unease hadn’t gone away yet (the glare Lan-er-gongzi was levelling at her brother made the simulated Jiang Cheng’s actions impossible to forget), but she was nonetheless pleased. After all, right at the end of the last segment, everything had changed.

Jin Ling — her A-Ling, her son — had helped Wei Wuxian. All this time, he had described his uncle Mo Xuanyu as a “disgusting cutsleeve lunatic,” who wasn’t worth his time. Just a short while before, Jin Ling had run away from him despite Wei Wuxian’s shouts to stop. Although she didn’t want to admit it, Jiang Yanli had been a little worried; she would love her son regardless, but his character hadn’t been something she had been able to support. After all, Wei Wuxian had saved his life multiple times, yet Jin Ling seemed to meet him with nothing but disgust and hate.

And then Wei Wuxian had been captured, and Jin Ling decided to repay the life debt he owed.

She hadn't expected that. Wei Wuxian hadn't expected that. Jiang Cheng clearly hadn't expected that, considering the simulated version left Jin Ling in charge of Wei Wuxian. And yet he had anyways. There was nothing Jin Ling could possibly gain from this, he had just done it because he thought it was right.

Jin Ling hadn't even been born yet, but, right now, she was so indescribably proud of her son that she felt like she could burst. A warm flush began to glow on her cheeks, and her happiness became unrivaled.

Unfortunately, she seemed to be the only one who felt that way.

Her poor brother had been more shocked than anyone by what had been shown. Nearly all the blood had left his face, and the little that remained was in the form of an angry flush that responded to Lan Wangji's silent accusations. She couldn't necessarily blame Lan-er-gongzi for his anger after what they had seen, but he also clearly didn't know her brother like she did.

~~It would be fine. It would have to be, because if it wasn't then she didn't know how to fix it.~~

Even putting aside the ~~glaring~~ staring contest going on between Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng and the same one occurring between her parents, not even her fiance could bring himself to smile. Instead, his face had been set in a deep frown as he glared at the ground, silently interrogating it.

Jiang Yanli leaned closer.

"Don't worry so much," Jiang Yanli whispered. "I know A-Xian was angry at you after what happened with Lady Song, but I know him — he wouldn't kill you over that. If he's still the same A-Xian I know, that's not what happened."

"I… yeah, I know," Jin Zixuan responded, forcing a smile. Jiang Yanli was about to insist upon her point, only to realize that Jin Zixuan was being honest when he said he knew. Wei Wuxian had grown up with her, but now all the watchers (even the people who had never met Wei Wuxian before) knew him almost as well as she did. They knew about his fear of dogs; Jiang Cheng had told them about his love of spice; they had all seen first hand how Wei Wuxian would react to situations Jiang Yanli hadn't even dreamed of.

It would be strange when they all got out. Lan-er-gongzi would probably have an especially hard time interacting with Wei Wuxian now that his feelings had changed so much.

"A-Li?"

"A-ah," Jiang Yanli squeaked. "Sorry. What I… what I was trying to say was that…."

She bit her lip.

'You don't need to look so guilty over it. It's fine; it was partly my fault, anyways.'

"A-Li, you can't blame yourself either," Jin Zixuan shook his head. "The soup you left for me was a level of courtesy I… I didn't deserve, after what I'd said about you in the Cloud Recesses. I started taking the soup without knowing who sent it, and I'm the one who picked a fight with you. I'm sorry-"

"No, I'm sorry. You don't need to keep apologizing-"

"I do," Jin Zixuan shook his head. "I don't want… I don't want A-Ling to have to grow up with us if I haven't apologized about this. I know it wasn't me, but it would have been me, so… I'm sorry."

The two stared at each other, equally annoyed that the other refused to accept their apologies, until Jin Zixuan snorted and Jiang Yanli began to giggle.

"Apology accepted," she said at last. "You too?"

"Yeah. Apology accepted," he shook his head. "I can't believe it took us so long to understand each other in the simulation. At least we get together eventually."

"At least there's that," Jiang Yanli agreed. When the last segment had ended, everyone had been too shocked by what happened with Fairy to focus on the other things they had been shown. It was only now, after they'd had some time to process those revelations, that they could focus on what had come before.

"I…" Jin Zixuan flushed bright red and looked away. "I really like you. I promise I'll be worthy of you. I promise."

'And the first step to that will be keeping Wei Wuxian away from my father,' Jin Zixuan thought, then flinched back — stunned at himself, but unable to deny it.

As Jin Zixuan found himself at conflict between his filial loyalty and honor, a very similar battle was going on in Nie Mingjue's mind. On one hand, he could let the simulation take care of it. It would happen with or without his influence, and would be a far more controlled environment that he could try to react to.

On the other hand, what had Huaisang done to deserve hearing the secret of their cultivation for the first time from someone other than Nie Mingjue?

As much as Chifeng-zun wanted to keep silent, he knew he was running out of time. Whether he told Huaisang or he didn't, his brother was going to find out. The only question was how.

"Huaisang," he spoke up, making his brother flinch. Nie Huaisang was seated directly between Lan Wangji and Jiang Wanyin, refusing to pick a side in their staring contest.

"...Da-ge?"

"Come over here," Nie Mingjue gestured with a beckoning motion. Huaisang followed his instructions at once, sitting across from Nie Mingjue and frowning nervously at the grim expression on his brother's face. The two stared at each other for a moment, neither knowing what to say.

Then-

“Is this about the castle, Da-ge?” Nie Huaisang asked, tilting his head questioningly. He wished he had his fan to hide behind, but he supposed staring with unblinking eyes would be a bit more effective, in this case.

Nie Mingjue pursed his lips. Where would he even begin in explaining this? He had hoped he would have some time to plan out his speech before telling his brother, but the simulation had given them so much to think about that it hadn’t occurred to him until now. Should he start with the sabers? The hall? His own qi deviation foretold by the simulation? And what about Wen Ruohan? He was obviously going to listen in. What if Nie Mingjue accidentally revealed a weakness in the Nie Sect that wouldn’t have been known otherwise?

“Da-ge?”

“...You’re right. It’s… about the castles. Listen carefully. The castle, it’s not malicious. It’s a burial ground. And it’s necessary for us to use. It-”

However, at that moment, the simulation started again. The world darkened at once, and the chirps of crickets cut through the silence.

Nie Mingjue cut off with a flinch, not having realized the simulation would already be starting.

When light returned, the simulation showed the Qinghe inn where the future Jiang Cheng had brought the captive Wei Wuxian.

And a dog.

Jiang Cheng internally cursed and shook his head, unable to understand how what had been shown in the last segment could be possible.

“I…” Nie Mingjue hesitated.

Frowning at the panic spreading across his brother’s face, Nie Huaisang offered, “Just tell me later, Da-ge. We can’t risk missing something in the simulation.”

Somehow, those words only seemed to distress Nie Mingjue further.

Due to Jiang Cheng’s senseless orders, the Yunmeng disciples had ended up scattered all over the place. This allowed Wei Wuxian and Jin Ling to stealthily flip out of the windows, escaping without detection. As soon as they made it out of the shop, they broke into a sprint.

Then, as they entered a forest, Wei Wuxian heard a strange noise.

He yelped.

“Why is it still here?” he demanded, laying eyes on Fairy. “Tell it to go away!”

Lan Wangji clenched his fists, “Wei Ying-”

Jin Ling whistled twice and, whimpering softly, Fairy forced itself to leave dejectedly.

"Good boy," Jin Zixuan muttered, mentally weighing how difficult it would be to own a dog, but still keep it away from Wei Wuxian. If they could train it to always avoid him, it might be possible.

(Just like it 'might be possible' for Jin Zixuan to extend a hand to Jin Guangyao, the person who had gotten his son Fairy. It didn't mean he would be able to bring himself to do it.)

~~(Coward.)~~

Rolling his eyes, Jin Ling gave an unimpressed sneer and scoffed, "You're such a loser. Fairy never bites, it just looks scary. It's a spiritual dog trained to only attack resentful beings! Did you really think it was a regular dog?"

"Hold on, what did you call it?" Wei Wuxian asked, vaguely remembering having heard the name before.

"Fairy. Its name."

"You named your dog something like that?" Wei Wuxian demanded disbelievingly, starting to walk again.

Jiang Yanli giggled, 'Of all the things to inherit from A-Cheng.'

"What's wrong with calling it 'Fairy?' When it was younger, I called it 'Little Fairy.' Now that it's grown up I obviously can't keep calling it that!"

"No, no, no. The point isn't whether it's little or not!"

Jin Zixuan snorted again, and even Lan Wangji seemed to crack a slight smile (to Lan Xichen). Meanwhile, Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes, Wen Qing fought to keep down a smile, and Jiang Yanli chuckled freely.

"My god, he's just adorable!" Nie Huaisang cooed, unable to believe that the simulated Jin Ling was about the same age Wei Wuxian was when he fought the waterborne abyss.

Wei Wuxian sighed, "Who in the world taught you to name things this way?"

Jiang Cheng felt a foreboding chill creep up his back.

'It must have been his uncle,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Back in the day, Jiang Cheng also had a few puppies. Their names were 'Jasmine,' 'Princess,' 'Little Love,' and so on. If I didn't know better, I would have thought they were the names of expensive courtesans.'

"Courtesans?!" his ears flaming red. "They were perfectly acceptable names!"

"They are not," Wen Qing calmly disagreed, then raised an eyebrow. "Sect Leader Jiang named Wei Wuxian's sword, 'Suibian,' correct? And now with Jin Ling…."

“Maybe it runs in the family,” Lan Xichen suggested, making Jiang Cheng blush further and Jiang Fengmian laugh warmly. Watching that scene, Lan Wangji found himself disappointed in his own behavior.

(The real Jiang Cheng hadn’t done anything to Wei Wuxian, so Lan Wangji couldn’t do anything in response. In fact, the real Jiang Cheng was shocked by what his older self had done. The real Jiang Cheng wouldn’t tie Wei Wuxian up and force Fairy in front of him. Lan Wangji had no right to be angry at this one.)

(But the real Jiang Cheng might later, and Lan Wangji wasn’t sure he could forgive that.)

Scowling in offense, Jin Ling stormed forward and concluded, “Real men don’t bother with trifles like that! Why are you stressing over such details?”

Wei Wuxian gestured for them to stop. By now, the pair had gotten close to where Wei Wuxian had met the charlatan earlier, so Lan Wangji would most likely be waiting for him nearby.

‘He really came back to me,’ Lan Wangji realized, eyes widening in disbelief. He had figured that was the case, but somehow, until now, it hadn’t occurred to him that he’d tempered his hopes in preparation for possible disappointment.

But that was unnecessary. Wei Wuxian trusted him enough to return (and knew Hanguang-jun wasn’t going to do what Sect Leader Jiang had just done to him). He had come back.

‘I don’t care if he doesn’t love me. If I can get the real Wei Ying to trust me not to hurt him, I’ll be satisfied with that.’

Scowling in a put-upon annoyance, Jin Ling informed Wei Wuxian, “Now that you’ve offended my uncle, you’re already half dead. Me letting you go now means we’re even, got it?”

“You’re just letting me go?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Do you know what your uncle wants with me?”

“Yeah, he thinks you’re Wei Wuxian.”

‘It’s not merely ‘suspects’ this time,’ Wei Wuxian thought, a bitter smile making its way onto his lips.

A huffed laugh escaped Madam Yu.

“Then again, maybe Jin Ling’s reaction shouldn’t be a surprise. Someone coming back to life is more than a little unbelievable,” Lan Xichen acknowledged. “Especially after thirteen years.”

“Perhaps,” Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes. “Although everyone in this future seems willing to believe the Yiling Patriarch is capable of just about anything, so maybe it’s a matter of perspective.”

“That certainly implies quite a bit,” Jin Guangshan agreed.

“Then, what about you?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Do you believe it as well?”

“It’s not the first time my Uncle’s done something like this. He never lets any of them go, even when he’s caught the wrong ones,” Jin Ling revealed, then paused, as if lost in memories.

All at once, a realization clicked into place for Jiang Fengmian and Jiang Yanli. They had wondered for quite some time as to why Lan Wangji hadn't faced further objections; now, they had an answer. It was horrifying and unbelievable, but the longer they thought about it, the less they could deny it.

That said, they still couldn’t say it.

(And how could they? They’d been with Jiang Cheng since the day he was born. They’d seen him as an infant and a toddler and a child, growing and learning and struggling as he came to learn about the world. Surely, their A-Cheng couldn’t be the person Jin Ling was talking about just now.)

Wen Qing, on the other hand, had no such hesitation.

“I see. Maybe Jiang Wanyin has accused so many people of being Wei Wuxian that, even when he says it, no one believes him. That would certainly explain why the Great Sects aren’t reacting to his claim of the Yiling Patriarch’s return.”

“You-!”Jiang Cheng turned and growled, only to hesitate at the last second and switch his protest to: “It can’t have been that common. My disciples believed me!”

“Did they?” Lan Wangji couldn’t resist asking.

But if they didn’t-

No one was willing to respond to that.

“Anyways,” Jin Ling continued. “Zidian couldn’t draw out your spirit, so I’m gonna trust that you’re not him. Besides, he wasn’t a cut sleeve, and yet you’ve even dared to harass….”

He couldn’t finish, cutting off into a disgusted look, but the words were heard regardless.

His crazy Uncle Mo Xuanyu had even dared to harass Hanguang-jun! And then got taken home by him!

While most of the watchers reacted with amusement toward the misunderstanding, Jiang Yanli just sighed. If Jin Ling felt instinctively disgusted at the idea of two men being together, then she wasn't sure she could do anything about that. What she could change, however, was whether or not Jin Ling was polite to other people, regardless of whether or not they were cutsleeves.

(Something her simulated self hadn't managed to do.)

(Because she had been dead.)

Like a click, Jiang Yanli abruptly felt her knowledge of her incoming demise turn from a theoretical fact to an understanding of what it meant. A bout of nausea twisted in her stomach.

Finally, Jin Ling shook himself out of those thoughts and made a shooing motion as if driving away flies, "Anyways, from now on, you have nothing to do with the LanlingJin Sect! If you're gonna go at it again, find someone who's not part of my sect! Or else, I won't let you off!"

The more he heard, the more curious Lan Qiren became about who 'Mo Xuanyu' actually was.

After walking a few steps, Jin Ling abruptly spun back again to shout, "Why are you still standing there? Go! Are you waiting for my uncle to come and get you? I'll have you know, my uncle really hates Wei Wuxian! Anyone like the Yiling Patriarch will suffer at his hands!"

Jiang Cheng was going to kill his alternate-future self. No, he didn't care if that was impossible. Yunmeng Jiang's motto told him to attempt it anyways, didn't it? And Wei Wuxian had been the one to tell him he deserved to be Sect Leader. Killing his other self was the least Jiang Cheng could do.

(No, no. He couldn't just trust what the simulation was saying. It made no sense; he'd never do that.)

(Right?)

As Jiang Cheng's thoughts reached their conclusion, Jin Ling continued explaining to 'Mo Xuanyu' how much Jin Ling's maternal uncle hated Wei Wuxian. In response, the Yiling Patriarch just gave a sad, nostalgic smile.

'He hates me?' Wei Wuxian mentally repeated. 'I guess that isn't a surprise.'

The sheer resignation in his voice honestly scared Lan Xichen. Wei Wuxian's acceptance of the fact that his shidi hated him was far too similar to Nie Mingjue's easy acknowledgement of his own death.

Neither of them had ever given up on anything for as long as Lan Xichen had known them. And yet, now, neither of them were willing to put up a fight.

Just as Lan Xichen had sat down (too emotionally stunned to trust himself to keep his balance), the world around the watchers shifted and twisted. When it reformed, the simulation had brought them back to the piers of Yunmeng.

Wen Chao grinned, recalling the amusing sight these same piers had made when the Wen Sect attacked.

A child's tearful whines and terrified whimpers cut through the silence.

The Jins and Jiangs all tensed up, remembering the same cries being let out by the child Jin Ling not so long ago. Their concern for his safety (or, in Jin Guangshan's case, the weakness that would reflect on the Jin Sect) made them all zero in on the source of the noise.

A moment later, a few high pitched barks appeared.

"Little love?" Jiang Cheng couldn't resist asking as a light colored puppy formed before their eyes.

With an aggressive bark, it pounced after the child in front of it, who could only cry out "Stay away! Don't bite me!" His eyes were shining with tears, but it was quite clear who this boy was.

Both Lan Wangji and Wen Qing paled, instantly recalling the way a large dog had nearly broken Wei Wuxian's bones while he was living on the streets. And the dog's owner had been so callous — so completely indifferent to Wei Wuxian's suffering-

"Coward," another voice huffed. "What's there to be afraid of? Look how cute they are! They won't bite you!"

It was a child Jiang Cheng, his arms crossed adorably as he frowned at Wei Ying's (seemingly) illogical reaction to his adorable puppies. Jasmine, Princess, and Little Love all gathered around Wei Ying, reminding the formerly-homeless boy of the way wolves would circle around their prey to cut off all escape routes.

His tears doubled, but — too terrified to look away for even an instant — he forced himself to watch.

'Jiang Wanyin,' Lan Wangji's rage grew. 'You insensitive, illogical… is that how you felt while choking Wei Ying? His pain means nothing! All that matter to you is-'

He cut off, abruptly realizing how pathetic it was to hold such anger towards a child. The person watching with him wasn't the man who had kept Wei Wuxian restrained while Fairy approached, and the boy before them in the simulation was a child who couldn't even understand what was happening.

Wei Wuxian wouldn't hold a grudge over this. Wangji's sect had taught him to not hold grudges at all. And he, himself, knew better than to be resentful over something like this.

He took a deep breath, and forced himself to let his anger go.

However, in the next moment, footsteps approached, and Jiang Cheng's eyes widened in shock. Then, two hands picked Wei Ying up from behind, making the young boy yelp.

It was Jiang Fengmian, lifting him off the ground to keep him away from the dogs.

"A-Die!" Jiang Yanli gasped out, smiling warmly.

"Huh?" the child Jiang Cheng asked, before realizing what was happening and pouting in a way that puffed up his cheeks until his head resembled a watermelon.

Wen Qing cracked a smile at the sight, while Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang tried (and failed) to stifle their snickers. The blush that had been rapidly spreading across Jiang Cheng's face nearly doubled in color.

At Jiang Fengmian's gentle instructions, Jiang Cheng's dogs were temporarily brought away. Combined with the sight of Wei Wuxian, this made Jiang Cheng (who couldn't even remember being picked up by his dad five times) furious.

Seeing that, Lan Qiren withheld a sigh. By now, it was clear that Jiang Cheng had felt unloved by his father even before Wei Wuxian arrived; that didn't change the fact that Wei Wuxian's arrival had undoubtedly worsened the situation. And the one who had felt the brunt of that was Wei Wuxian.

The Chief Cultivator agreed.

'Really, everyone would have been happier if Wei Wuxian had just been a member of the Wen Clan from the beginning,' Wen Ruohan thought, frowning deeply.

"A-Ying," Jiang Fengmian whispered. "The dogs are gone. It's time to get down."

"No! No!" Wei Ying shouted, burying his face in Jiang Fengmian's chest. "No, please. No!"

The world shifted, and they were brought a few hours later in the day.

"How about now?" Jiang Fengmian offered. "See? There aren't any dogs around here."

"No," Wei Ying whimpered. "No, please don't make me. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. Please-"

And a few hours later again, until it was late afternoon.

"A-Ying, it's okay. There's nothing here."

Wei Ying just trembled, silently begging Sect Leader Jiang to not let him down. The terror in his eyes was more than understandable, after what they had been shown of his childhood.

"It's like when you met, isn't it A-Die?" Jiang Yanli asked softly. "You saved him from dogs then too."

So Wei Wuxian viewed Jiang Fengmian as a safe zone where dogs couldn't hurt him. Seeing it like that, Wei Wuxian's current reaction couldn't be a surprise.

To the child Wei Ying, Jiang Fengmian was safety.

~~How long had it taken Wei Wuxian to realize that Jiang Fengmian would choose Jiang Cheng over him without a second of hesitation? The more Jiang Fengmian thought about it, the less he wanted to know.~~

Night came, and Wei Ying was still wrapping his arms around Jiang Fengmian's neck. By this point, Sect Leader Jiang had given up on trying to coax the child version of Wei Wuxian down. Even as Wei Ying's arms had trembled from the strain of holding himself up, he had continued clinging to Jiang Fengmian.

Clearly, something else would have to be done.

Jiang Cheng had forgotten how long it had taken for Wei Wuxian to come down. Yes, he could remember being annoyed at how long Wei Wuxian had been carried, but he had been a child; he hadn't understood why it was happening.

Now, seeing this, his father's decision to give away Little Love, Princess, and Jasmine made a lot more sense.

"On the second day," Lan Sizhui revealed. "Jiang Wanyin's puppies were given to someone else."

The simulation revealed that very scene, as a distraught Jiang Cheng watched in horror as his beloved puppies were sent away for the sake of the boy who had gotten his father's affection all day. The sight angered Jiang Cheng so much that he threw a big tantrum, whining loudly, breaking things, and bawling his eyes out.

Wen Chao's lips flicked up in amusement, making Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng glare at him. To Jiang Cheng's surprise, after a moment, Lan Wangji joined them in glaring as well.

(The Second Jade of Lan had promised to not hold people accountable for things they hadn't done yet. If that was the courtesy Wei Wuxian deserved, then Jiang Wanyin deserved it as well. Slowly, he was forcing himself to accept that fact.)

However, as Jiang Cheng's distress increased, Wei Ying's elation did as well. Now, finally, Jiang Fengmian could set him down.

The shaking which had overwhelmed Wei Ying's body for hours upon hours finally disappeared.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered, instantly moving to kneel beside the boy.

Wei Ying sat on the ground, looking around with a disbelieving hope as there continued to be no dogs in sight. Now, for the first time he could remember, he was safe.

When Lan Xichen saw the blinding smile on his brother's face, he felt his own heart ease as well.

Behind Wei Ying, however, the child Jiang Cheng continued to shake in rage.

"A-Cheng," Jiang Fengmian said, kneeling beside his son.

"No matter how many times Jiang Fengmian comforted Jiang Wanyin gently, telling him that he and Wei Wuxian could be 'good friends,' Jiang Wanyin refused to talk to Wei Wuxian," Sizhui explained.

"Of course that didn't help," Madam Yu scoffed. "You never realize what the actual issue is."

"I-"

Before Jiang Fengmian could finish, Sizhui continued, "Quite a few days later, Jiang Wanyin's attitude had softened. Jiang Fengmian wanted to strike while the iron was still hot, so he told Wei Wuxian to sleep in the same room as his son, hoping they'd grow fond of each other. At the beginning, though still sulking, Jiang Wanyin was on the verge of agreeing. However, when Jiang Fengmian began to rejoice, he took Wei Wuxian up and let him sit on his arm."

That scene played out before their eyes, concluding with Jiang Cheng being shocked speechless, and Madam Yu giving a bitter laugh as she stormed out of the room. The couple had important matters to deal with later; they'd separated in a hurry to avoid having another argument.

There was nothing Jiang Fengmian could say after what had been shown. For all the time he spent trying to comfort his son, he had never gotten to the crux of the matter: Jiang Cheng's mistaken assumption that he wasn't loved.

As a teenager, Jiang Fengmian's son had thought Fengmian loved Wei Wuxian more than him. Wei Wuxian had known Jiang Fengmian loved Jiang Cheng more than him. Jiang Yanli might have not even considered where she stood in his ranking, too accustomed to being pushed to the background to pay that any mind.

Was it even possible to do worse than that?

(And what about Wei Wuxian? No matter how much he wanted to deny it, Jiang Fengmian knew internally that it was more likely for Jiang Cheng to be torturing innocents than for Wei Wuxian to be. And yet he hadn't picked a side when his wife had spoken up against Wei Wuxian.)

(The word 'failure' rang in his head yet again.)

As he watched the thoughts flying through Jiang Fengmian's brain, Nie Mingjue felt himself grow apprehensive. As a nine year old boy, Jiang Cheng's reaction was understandable, and Jiang Fengmian had treated it as such when he tried to comfort his son. It was true that there were many things Jiang Fengmian could have done better, but it was also true that, by that point, it seemed like every choice Jiang Fengmian could make would turn out badly for him. If this was what getting married entailed, Nie Mingjue was more than happy just making Huaisang his heir.

The sky darkened, and the sun switched to a moon. It was the night of the same day.

"Shidi. Shidi!" an adorable voice called out. "Please let me in!"

"Don't call me that! Go away!" Jiang Cheng shouted back. The words made the child Wei Wuxian flinch, and he hurriedly lowered his hand.

'A child. This is a child. It doesn't matter what he does when he's older. Right now, he's a child,' Lan Wangji reminded himself, forcing his fists to unclench.

The child Jiang Cheng continued, "Leave! This is my room! Are you even trying to take my room from me?"

"It's not like that. Jiang-shushu told me to stay with you-"

"Go away!" Jiang Cheng slammed against the door, making it shake violently. "Don't let me see you again, or I'll call my dogs over to bite you!"

'What? We're real!' Jiang Cheng shouted when Wei Wuxian had been led to believe the watchers were illusions. 'I'm serious! You-the first day you arrived at Lotus Pier, I-I threatened you with Princess and Love!'

"I'm leaving! I'm leaving!" Wei Ying shouted. "Don't call the dogs!"

Inside the room Wei Ying had been locked out of, Jiang Cheng glanced toward the door, the anger on his face giving way to concern instead.

If Madam Yu remembered correctly, when he'd first arrived, Wei Wuxian had been a much more obedient child. He had only gone where Jiang Fengmian told him to, and had only ever eaten what he had been given (even if he hoarded that food like precious treasure). As the child Wei Wuxian walked around, not knowing where his room was and too scared to knock on other people's doors, Madam Yu felt her heart sour.

It was embarrassing to show such foolishness before the other sects, but she could accept that. Right now, the simulation was showing Jiang Cheng as a child. If this child thought Wei Wuxian was truly there to steal his place, then that would be the fault of his father, not him.

(It might also, just slightly, be her fault.)

(~~As always.~~)

Having nowhere to return to, Wei Ying did what any homeless child would do: he searched for a corner where there was no wind. He laid down there, his face not showing even a hint of bitterness or resentment.

‘Of course,’ Jiang Cheng thought bitterly. ‘I lose in every way when it comes to him, don’t I? In cultivation, in social activity, in heroism, and now even in this.’

No matter how hard he tried, he couldn’t get the image of his future self sending Fairy after Wei Wuxian out of his head.

However, despite his initial contentment, the longer Wei Ying stayed there, the less he could relax. Jiang Cheng’s threat played on repeat in his head, and his nervousness grew.

He heard a snap and sat up instantly, only to see that it was a nearby squirrel stepping on a branch rather than a pack of dogs out to get him. He forced himself to relax, only to snap up once again when a fish splashed in the nearby pond.

Unable to stand it any longer, Wei Ying leapt up and fled Lotus Pier.

Watching the scene play out before his eyes, Jiang Cheng felt his guilt multiply. It was silly — everything had turned out fine, and what he had done wasn’t unexpected for someone his age — but the sight of Wei Wuxian running away still made him feel sick to his stomach.

After all, a child illogically blaming another child for his father’s lack of attention was understandable; a teenager blaming another teenager for the destruction of their sect was less so.

(And an adult blaming dozens of demonic cultivators for reminding him of Wei Wuxian was the least justifiable of all. Jiang Cheng wasn’t sure he believed that had actually happened, but not being able to say for sure that it hadn’t terrified him more than words could describe.)

Finally, huffing and puffing, Wei Ying found a place he could hide from the dogs. There was a flash forward, and Wei Ying had somehow made it to the top of the large tree, where he hugged the trunk desperately.

“...Sorry,” Jiang Cheng mumbled.

Hearing that, Lan Wangji glanced over and gave the real Jiang Cheng a long, assessing look.

(A little twelve year old Jiang Yanli. He vaguely remembered her from when they’d interacted as children, but it had never occurred to him before how absolutely adorable she was at that age.)

“A-Ying, where are you?” she asked, looking around. The only source of light she had was the dim lantern she carried in her hand, illuminating the path for her.

Wei Ying could vaguely remember her as being Jiang Cheng’s sister. Unwilling to confront her, he stayed quiet, hoping that she wouldn’t find him.

‘Sorry,’ Jiang Cheng thought, mentally apologizing yet again.

Jiang Yanli stepped a little closer, and the light of her lantern illuminated the patch of grass around the tree. In it, a black boot lay abandoned on the ground.

“How did this shoe fall off?” Jiang Yanli asked. “Was it too big?”

“No, they fit well,” Wei Ying answered, only to belatedly realize he was supposed to be hiding and darted out of sight behind the trunk again.

“Oh,” Jin Zixuan muttered, looking down. Once again, Jin Zixuan had forgotten that it didn’t matter how shamelessly confident and unfairly talented Wei Wuxian seemed: Wei Wuxian had spent years living a life Jin Zixuan couldn’t even imagine.

(A very similar feeling fell over Madam Yu, who couldn’t help but wonder how different things would have been if she hadn’t been there at all.)

(She shook that ridiculous thought out of her head a moment later, but the lingering ~~guilt~~ bitterness remained.)

“You can come down,” Jiang Yanli offered. “Let’s go back.”

“I-I’m not going down! There are dogs!”

“A-Cheng was just making that up. There are no dogs here. Besides, you don’t have anything to sit on. You’ll fall soon.”

But Wei Ying just shook his head.

“How does the teenage Wei Wuxian always seem so unaffected?” Lan Qiren muttered, cursing himself for the endless string of snide, judgemental words he’d levied at the boy before.

‘A-Xian was born with a smiling face,’ the Jiang Clan remembered their eldest young miss saying. ‘No matter what tragedies befall him, he won’t cling to them. No matter where he is, he’ll be happy.’

Wei Ying had continued to stubbornly hang on to the rough tree, refusing to let go for even an instant. The jagged bark dug into his young skin and scratched deep lines into it every time he started to fall. However, to Wei Ying, that pain was a worthwhile tradeoff if it meant avoiding the dogs.

Trembling, he whimpered.

(Wen Chao smirked in glee.)

Afraid that Wei Ying would hurt himself, Jiang Yanli set her lantern down by the tree and stood under where Wei Ying was, extending her arms to catch him when he fell.

Jiang Yanli heard a huffed laugh, and glanced to the side to see Wen Qing smiling at the scene. Noticing her gaze, Wen Qing glanced back, allowing the two to make eye contact with each other.

They both smiled in shared understanding.

"Thirty minutes later," Sizhui explained, and yet neither Jiang Yanli nor Wei Ying had moved an inch.

"That's some impressive stubbornness," Nie Mingjue observed, sending Jiang Yanli a nod of approval. She blushed and nodded back, pleased that this was being shown after all the suffering the watchers had been forced to observe.

At that moment, Wei Ying couldn't hold himself up anymore. He slipped off the tree and fell down. Jiang Yanli hurried to catch him, but Wei Ying slammed against the ground regardless.

Nie Huaisang winced at the scene, and Wen Qing and Lan Wangji rushed to Wei Wuxian's side.

"My leg is broken!" Wei Ying cried, clutching it tightly.

"Is it?" Lan Wangji demanded, eyes wide in panic.

Wen Qing leaned close, equally frantic, but was unable to get a good view of something she couldn't actually examine.

"It's not broken," the simulated Jiang Yanli informed them. "Does it hurt a lot? It's fine, don't move. I'll carry you back."

Relieved, Wen Qing nodded at her and agreed, "That's the best you could have done, given the situation."

It was meant to compliment her good judgement and critical thinking. Instead, the words 'given the situation' meant all Jiang Yanli heard was a vicious whisper from her subconscious.

'You didn't have the strength to catch him. It doesn't matter how good your intentions are if you lack the power to actually improve the situation.'

Noticing her sudden dejection, Jin Zixuan instantly moved closer to his fiance, hoping to offer her some privacy from everyone else, at the very least.

"Here," Jiang Yanli offered, positioning herself so Wei Ying could easily get on her back.

Still sobbing, Wei Ying nervously looked around and asked, "Are… are there dogs?"

"No. And if dogs come, I'll chase them away for you."

Jiang Cheng looked away. He had promised Wei Wuxian the same, hadn't he? And yet, when the 'Wen-dogs' came, he had blamed Wei Wuxian for their arrival instead.

(And then used Fairy on him.)

Seeing Wei Ying's continued hesitance, Jiang Yanli instead moved to pick up the boot he had dropped and observed, "They really don't fit, do they?"

"They fit," Wei Ying insisted again.

"In truth, they didn't fit. They were quite a few sizes too large," Sizhui explained. "But it was the first pair of shoes Jiang Fengmian had bought him. Wei Wuxian was too embarrassed to make him go out of his way to buy another pair, so he had said that they weren't too big."

'Really Ziyuan?' Madam Jin thought. 'This is the being you decided was your sworn enemy?'

A moment later, she frowned.

~~After all the times she'd refused to allow those bastard children into the Sect, did she really have any right to think that?~~

Without saying another word, Jiang Yanli helped him put his shoe on, then pressed down on the hollow tip.

"It's a bit big," she decided. "I'll fix it for you when we get back."

Hearing this, Wei Wuxian sunk in on himself again as if he'd done something wrong.

'This is Jiang-shushu's home,' he recalled, his lower lip trembling. With that, a memory formed. It was an older woman who, going by her state of dress and general cleanliness (or lack thereof), was also homeless.

'Listen to me, young man,' she said. 'When you're in someone else's home, the worst thing you can do is make trouble for your hosts.'

"Oh, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli gasped.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered. "Make as much trouble as you want. Just…."

When Lan Qiren had found out about the state of things at Yunmeng Jiang, Wei Wuxian's rebelliousness at the Cloud Recesses had taken on a whole new light. It was still annoying and disorderly and shameless, but him messing around was a sign of comfort and safety. Now, even the general muteness he'd had around Madam Yu became an indication of more perceived security than Lan Qiren could have possibly imagined it as.

The panic growing within Wei Ying had nearly enveloped his entire being, however, before it could, Jiang Yanli reached over and plopped a now very-confused Wei Ying onto her back. The change in weight was almost too much for Jiang Yanli's body, but she forced herself to walk on wobbling steps.

By this point, Jin Zixuan's eyes were filled with so much awe that they were practically glowing.

"A-Ying, don't worry about what A-Cheng told you," Jiang Yanli advised. "He doesn't have a good temper, so he's always at home playing by himself. Those puppies were his favorites. A-Die sending them away made A-Cheng upset, but he's actually very happy you're here with him."

Meanwhile, Nie Huaisang snickered at the description Jiang Yanli had given of the young Jiang Cheng, and laughed harder when Jiang Cheng's attempts at hitting him to make him shut up only phased through. It was annoying and incomparably embarrassing for Jiang Cheng to hear himself described as having had no friends before Wei Wuxian, but those feelings were tempered slightly by the current state of things.

(His father had spoken with him; he had gotten closer to Nie Huaisang even without Wei Wuxian; Jin Zixuan and even Lan Wangji seemed to not be holding his future self's actions against him.)

As he was now, things were fine.

However, in the back of his mind, he couldn't help but wonder whether his adult self — the powerful and respected Sect Leader he had always dreamed of becoming — had anyone who cared about him.

"You were gone for so long," Jiang Yanli continued, stumbling slightly from the weight yet again. "Actually, I only came out here because A-Cheng was worried about you and came to wake me up."

The maturity in the twelve year old Jiang Yanli's voice was stunning. Impressed, Wen Qing sent her another nod of acknowledgement, sending a pink blush blooming across Jiang Yanli's cheeks.

Then, once again, Jiang Yanli stumbled and was forced to adjust Wei Ying to keep him from slipping off. Her mature voice was at ends with the weakness in her body. That lack of strength, however, didn't matter to Wei Wuxian.

Right now, he almost felt more secure in Jiang Yanli's arms than he'd felt in even Jiang Fengmian's.

'What about mine?' Lan Wangji wondered, then flinched and cursed himself. It was one thing to do that between children (and Jiang Yanli was so close to him she might as well be his sister). Now that Lan Wangji had realized the true depravity he was capable of imagining, he would never allow himself to embrace Wei Wuxian.

Suddenly, the night wind carried forth a series of sobs.

“What’s that sound?” Jiang Yanli asked fearfully.

Nie Huaisang squeaked and slipped inside his brother, asking “Is that a ghost? There shouldn’t be any in Yunmeng, right? What’s making that sound?!”

“How could you possibly find a common ghost scary after watching what Wei Wuxian can do?” Jiang Cheng demanded.

“I trust Wei-xiong to make the right decision! I can’t predict a ghost!!!”

Hearing that, Nie Mingjue scowled deeply, unable to deny his brother’s claim. But, if they agreed Wei Wuxian could be trusted with his power, then that was all but making a direct accusation against Jiang Wanyin.

(And themselves. They had all been part of the siege on the Burial Mounds, after all.)

“Did you hear it?” Jiang Yanli asked.

“I heard it. It came from inside that pit.”

Carrying Wei Wuxian, Jiang Yanli cautiously walked to the pit and looked down inside. A small silhouette laid face-down at the bottom. He lifted his head up, allowing them to see two streaks on his muddy face, washed off by tears.

“A-Jie!” Jiang Cheng cried out.

Trembles attacked Lan Xichen’s body as he fought desperately to keep himself from laughing at the adorableness of the scene. Seeing that, Lan Wangji sent his brother a highly unimpressed look.

It only succeeded in making it even harder for Lan Xichen to hold in his laughter.

Jiang Yanli sighed in relief, “A-Cheng, didn’t I tell you to gather the others and search for him together?”

In response, Jiang Cheng could only shake his head. The world shifted and brought them back in time half an hour to show Jiang Cheng waiting impatiently as his sister searched for Wei Wuxian. As time went on, he began to fidget as if he was sitting on pins and needles, and soon stood up, unable to take it anymore. He ran after his sister and Wei Ying, but, in his hurry, forgot to bring a lantern. The expected result occurred: he tripped on something halfway down the road and fell into a pit.

Wen Qing gave a massive sigh, having been forced to heal up Wen Ning far too many times after the boy had sustained similar careless injuries.

A warm smile on her face, Jiang Yanli reached forward and helped pull her brother out of the pit. She took out a handkerchief and dabbed it against Jiang Cheng’s bleeding forehead, scratched when he’d fallen.

‘Such a mom,’ nearly every watcher thought.

On the other hand, Jiang Cheng appeared to have sunk in on himself, deflating in his dejection. As Jiang Yanli worked, Jiang Cheng’s black pupils kept drifting to look up at Wei Ying, quickly darting back down again each time.

Noticing this, Jiang Yanli asked, “A-Cheng, don’t you have something to say to A-Ying?”

‘Such a mom,’ Yu Ziyuan thought again, then- ‘Has anyone ever thought the same of me?’

She paused for a moment.

‘Wei Wuxian certainly hasn’t.’

Jiang Cheng appeared reluctant to speak, but both Jiang Yanli and Wei Ying were content to wait patiently. In the meantime, Jiang Yanli finished cleaning up the blood, and handed the handkerchief over to Jiang Cheng.

Pressing the handkerchief against his forehead, Jiang Cheng quietly mumbled, “I’m sorry.”

Jiang Yanli smiled in response.

The trio began making their way back, but, due to both Wei Ying and Jiang Cheng having injured legs, Jiang Yanli was forced to carry one on her back, and the other in her arms. Both boys had their limbs wrapped around her, allowing them to cling to her like monkeys as she hobbled back to the Sect. The strain was so great that she had to stop and take a breath every few steps, barely able to continue.

“A-Li,” Jiang Fengmian spoke softly, not wanting to be heard by the others. “In a situation like this, you can come get some help. I wouldn’t have minded you waking me up.”

Jiang Yanli froze at those words for a moment, before finally nodding and responding, “I-I know. I apologize, A-Die. We just-”

“Just what am I supposed to do with you two?” Jiang Yanli asked. Pitifully, Wei Ying and Jiang Cheng just hugged her neck even tighter.

“I…” Jin Zixuan tried. “I mean, we’re not ready for kids yet — obviously, I mean. It’s just….”

Jiang Yanli smiled at his adorable, flustered manner of speech, waiting patiently for him to continue (and grateful that she had an excuse to not respond to Jiang Fengmian).

“Just… A-Ling will be lucky to — I mean I will….” Jin Zixuan took in a deep breath, reminding himself of the importance of stating his feelings clearly and honestly (as proven by the painful endeavor that was watching Lan Wangji fight his own feelings about Wei Wuxian). “What I-what I’m trying to say is that I’m lucky to have you in my life and-and you’re really cool?”

After watching the soup incident, Jin Zixuan knew he had a lot to make up for. Given the smile that had appeared on Jiang Yanli's face, he could only hope that he had started to.

Turning to look down, Jiang Cheng's attention was drawn to Wei Wuxian's injured feet. There was a large bruise coloring his leg purple and scratches covering the rest of the skin. As he stared, Jiang Cheng's face was quickly consumed by a frantic nervousness.

'I even went out of my way to search on my own in case whoever I asked told, but now, since we're going to the healers…' Jiang Cheng clenched his tiny fists. 'If A-Die finds out about this, about how I threw Wei Ying out and made him hurt his leg, he'll definitely dislike me even more!'

"Dislike you?" Jiang Fengmian repeated disbelievingly. Jiang Cheng shrunk down at the words, but Jiang Fengmian found his mind too consumed by conflict to respond.

The conversation Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng had after the Xuanwu had made Jiang Fengmian's failure clear: his son thought he was unloved, and believed Wei Wuxian was the preferred child.

'It serves you right to be bored to death! You shouldn't have played hero, and you shouldn't have cared for such a hell of a thing! If in the beginning you didn't-'

'Jiang Cheng,' Jiang Fengmian interrupted sternly.

Jiang Fengmian's son hadn't been born with values that matched the Yunmeng Jiang Sect ~~to the point where Jiang Cheng's older self had disciples~~ accustomed ~~to abiding by torture~~. Jiang Fengmian didn't love him any less for it, but it was nonetheless true that Jiang Fengmian wanted to steer him away from that track. And yet, every time he had tried to give his son advice, it had always failed.

Even before Wei Wuxian had arrived, any disapproval from Jiang Fengmian was interpreted as dislike, rather than an offer for help. And he had done nothing to fix that.

"I'm sorry," he whispered, too quietly for anyone but his children to hear. They spun towards him, eyes wide in confusion, and watched as he gave them a small bow of apology. His wife was undoubtedly responsible for what Jiang Cheng had thought as well, but Jiang Fengmian wasn't blind to the way his own (lack of) actions contributed.

(Watching this, Lan Qiren found himself wishing his brother could be half the father Jiang Fengmian was.)

"Don't worry," a cute, high-pitched voice spoke up.

"Wei Ying?"

"I won't tell Uncle Jiang!" Wei Wuxian winked. "I just hurt myself since I suddenly wanted to climb a tree last night!"

Wen Ruohan's relaxed smile instantly disappeared.

‘Taking the fall for him as always? First after the party at the Cloud Recesses, then worrying about him after the Xuanwu, then letting him get away with choking you, then giving your core to him?! Surely, Jiang-guniang won’t let them-’

“You can relax as well,” Jiang Cheng promised, sighing in relief. “Any time I see a dog, I’ll chase it away for you!”

‘But he hadn’t. He had tied Wei Wuxian up and brought Fairy and-’

“That’s the spirit,” Jiang Yanli praised.

‘Of course,’ Wen Ruohan scoffed. ‘You’ll just let him do that. He’s new and the Madam doesn’t like him and he has far more to lose if he makes Jiang Fengmian and Yu Ziyuan angry, but that’s all fine so long as you’re not involved.’

They were children. It was ridiculous for Wen Ruohan to imagine such long lasting consequences due to such a small moment. They barely knew each other by this point; if the siblings went too far, Wei Wuxian would just tell them to stop.

‘When you’re in someone else’s home, the worst thing you can do is make trouble for your hosts.’

It didn’t matter if Wei Wuxian thought he owed them. The boy was confident and capable and knew his limits. He would know better than to comply if they asked for too much.

~~But if his core wasn’t too much, then what would be?~~

The memory faded away, returning them to the Wei Wuxian (in Mo Xuanyu’s body) and the teenaged Jin Ling. The boy had his head turned away as he continued to ramble on and on to Wei Wuxian about the many things Jiang Wanyin would have done to “Mo Xuanyu” if he’d had the chance.

Jin Ling finally faced Wei Wuxian again, scoffing, “Let me tell you — don’t think I’ll be grateful just because you saved me! Don’t expect me to say anything cringe-worthy either!”

“A-Ling, you’ve already shown your gratitude plenty,” Jiang Yanli laughed.

‘Undoubtedly more than those Wei Ying saved in the Xuanwu cave,’ Lan Wangji mentally added. ‘So long as you don’t take part in a siege against him, you’re doing fine.’

But Wei Wuxian just gave an indescribably sad smile in response, “Young man, there are two cringe-worthy phrases that must be said no matter what.”

“Hm?”

“Which two?”

“‘Thank you’ and ‘I’m sorry.’”

Wen Qing frowned, noticing the level of emotion behind Wei Wuxian's voice as he said them. She stepped closer, only to force herself back, remembering that there was nothing she could do.

Jin Ling clicked his tongue and mocked, "And what will happen to me if I don't say them? I told you, I'm not thanking you!"

"Someday, you'll say those words in tears."

Jin Ling just laughed.

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes as well, wondering where Wei Wuxian got the idea that he had any right to lecture their nephew when he-

"I'm sorry."

"What?"

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji asked, moving to stand next to Wei Wuxian. The expression on Wei Wuxian's face was a mixture of bittersweet sorrow, guilt, and regret, all piled together into a package that was nothing but genuine.

"I'm sorry for those words I said to you on Dafan mountain," Wei Wuxian clarified.

"...It's no big deal," Jin Ling shrugged, awkward in the face of such a sincere apology. "You're not the first person to tell me that. It's true anyways — that I had no mother to teach me."

And Jiang Yanli would have been such a perfect mother, if she'd gotten the chance.

In the silence that followed, Jin Ling shifted awkwardly again. Although many people had told him the same after seeing his attitude, no one had ever apologized to him in such a serious manner before.

'And no one will have to,' Jin Zixuan promised. 'We'll change things. It won't be the same.'

After another second of hesitation, Jin Ling shook those thoughts away and insisted, "But it doesn't matter! I won't be inferior to anyone, regardless of that! In fact, I'm gonna open everyone's eyes and make them see that I'm stronger than all of you!"

"That doesn't mean you should run off to fight Goddesses," Jiang Cheng mumbled, then cut off, understanding his nephew's feelings of inferiority all too well. As she watched that reaction, Madam Yu felt the alarms in her head screech.

Her son was desperate to prove himself, and her grandson was even more so. So desperate, in fact, that he had nearly gotten killed two times in less than a month, only saved by Wei Wuxian's coincidental appearance.

Honestly, shouldn't her son know better? If he felt the same way, he should realize Jin Ling would need to be watched more carefully!

‘Because you’ve always watched after your children?’ a snide voice in Madam Yu’s head scoffed. ‘After seeing what your daughter is capable of, do you really have the audacity to claim to be better?’

Then again, it would have been much easier for her to show such weakness if she hadn’t had to worry about her son so much. He hadn’t even managed to become head disciple. If Wei Wuxian had just-

‘Blaming him again? Didn’t you just see first-hand that you’d made this into a problem even before he arrived? Is your memory truly so poor that it doesn’t remember something as obvious as that? By now, you of all people should know that it was never Wei Wuxian’s fault.’

Madam Yu had nothing she could say in response, so she cut off that train of thought and did her best to muffle the voice that continued to laugh in the back of her mind.

“Alright, I’m going to head back now,” Jin Ling decided, frowning nervously at the thought of his uncle’s inevitable anger. Wei Wuxian smiled and was about to respond when he suddenly flinched back.

“Jiang Cheng!”

Jin Ling spun around, his guilt over letting Wei Wuxian go making him react instinctively, only to fall to the ground unconscious a moment later. Wei Wuxian had just knocked him out.

Jin Zixuan, who, along with many other watchers, had turned in the direction Wei Wuxian had jumped back from, hadn’t seen what happened. He blinked twice, then turned to his fiance.

“What just….”

“Ah, A-Xian isn’t a fan of politics, but he’s very good at lying when he wants to,” Jiang Yanli explained, then, remembering Wei Ying trying to make her believe his shoes fit, giggled and added, “Or, at least, he is now.”

Remembering the same, Lan Wangji found himself comparing his own childhood against Wei Wuxian’s. They both had grown up to value the same things, but the Lans’ strict, “no lying” rules, rigid values, and plentiful wealth couldn’t have been further from Wei Wuxian’s experiences growing up.

‘You haven’t even talked to him,’ Lan Wangji reminded himself. ‘There’s so much you still don’t understand about the person he is.’

By the time Lan Wangji’s thoughts reached their conclusion, Wei Wuxian had set Jin Ling down against the ground and rolled up his pants, revealing the curse mark yet again.

“...You know, I completely forgot about that,” Nie Huaisang admitted.

Frowning, Wei Wuxian reached forward. Before Jin Ling had run away, Wei Wuxian had tried burning the mark off with stronger resentment, overpowering it, and diving deep inside to see if he could identify the source. All those methods had proven useless one by one.

Luckily, there was one more thing he could do.

There was a bright red glow from the mark, and it crawled up Wei Wuxian’s arm and down to his own leg. When it faded, the bruised outline had moved from one person to another.

Wei Wuxian had transferred the mark to himself.

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered, feeling her eyes start to water. Just a short while ago, she had watched her younger self carry Wei Ying to help his hurt leg. It seemed Wei Wuxian was paying back everything that had been done for him ten-fold.

Jin Zixuan looked away. On some level, this shouldn’t have been as surprising as it was. Wei Wuxian was the adult here; of course he would help his martial nephew out in such a way. Besides, he would be able to take care of it just fine; despite Jin Ling’s talent, it seemed likely that it wouldn’t be anywhere near as easy for him. Any reasonable, responsible adult in his situation would have obviously done the same.

‘But would your father do the same for you?’ a voice in Jin Zixuan’s mind asked him. He glanced to the side, where Jin Guangshan was watching the simulation with a layer of carefully-hidden boredom, and found he wasn’t willing to contemplate the answer to that question.

Then, with a small grumble, Jin Ling began to stir. His eyes blinked open and he glanced up. It took him a few seconds to shake away his drowsiness and realize what had just happened.

“Wha-” he jumped up and sped back. “Did you knock me out? You actually hit me?! Even my uncle hasn’t hit me before!”

Playing the fool, Wei Wuxian tilted his head and asked, “Doesn’t he frequently tell you he’s going to break your legs?”

“He was just saying that! You damn cutsleeve-”

Jiang Yanli sighed.

“-What on earth do you want? I-”

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian jumped up as well, looking just behind Jin Ling as he exclaimed, “Ah, Hanguang-jun!”

Terrified, Jin Ling snapped up and fled at once, shouting, "You damn cutsleeve! Disgusting maniac! I'll remember you! This isn't over yet!"

He disappeared into the distance, and yet the Hanguang-jun he so feared wasn't present. A moment later, Wei Wuxian started laughing so hard he couldn't breathe and collapsed to his knees.

"...I can't believe he did the same thing twice."

"I can't believe the same thing worked twice," Nie Mingjue added on to Lan Xichen, giving a reluctant smile at the way Nie Huaisang had doubled over laughing from the scene. Although Nie Mingjue wasn't able to read Lan Wangji in the same way Lan Xichen could, he had a feeling the other boy was also feeling somewhat amused (from a fondness for Wei Wuxian, if nothing else). After all, if this had happened around the Lan Wangji of a week ago, Nie Mingjue had no doubt the boy would have gaped and raged over Wei Wuxian's 'shamelessness.'

Instead, all he did was tilt his head, his eyes softening at the open happiness in Wei Wuxian's expression.

After nearly a minute of laughter, Wei Wuxian coughed a few times and gasped in a handful of deep breaths. Soon enough, his breathing had returned to normal, and his body had become calm once more. He stood up again, but, this time, the only humor to be found in his expression was a bitter laughter at the world's idea of irony.

'I always thought Jiang Cheng would be on my side, and that Lan Wangji would be on the one opposing me,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Who would have guessed, in reality, it's the opposite.'

Jiang Cheng flinched at the words, and the rest of the Jiangs were left speechless.

Shaking her head, Madam Yu cursed, "How could the future be wrong in so many ways?"

For once, Wen Ruohan was in complete agreement. Based on the future Jiang Wanyin's actions, it was starting to seem like Wei Wuxian truly had murdered Jiang Yanli, and yet Wen Ruohan simply didn't see how that was possible.

(But then, the citizens in the future had been wrong about so many things, hadn't they?)

'The Jiangs raised him as their own, but almost all of them were killed because of him!'

Why hadn't Jiang Wanyin corrected that assumption?

'The Wens would have come regardless of what Wei Wuxian did,' Jiang Cheng knew. 'But-but maybe they would have come a little later — maybe we would have had a little more time.'

Wei Wuxian had been on the run from the Wens immediately after Lotus Pier, but once he'd come back he was the Sunshot Campaign's most valuable fighter. Why wouldn't he have corrected the public? Why wouldn't he reveal Madam Yu's incomparable grudge against him? Why let the world eventually brand him as a traitor?

‘Don’t worry, I won’t tell Uncle Jiang!’ Wei Wuxian winked. ‘I just hurt myself since I suddenly wanted to climb a tree last night.’

‘That’s the spirit!’ Jiang Yanli praised.

Some part of Wen Ruohan told him it was ridiculous to take a conversation between children and apply it to the interactions between adults. The rest of him was too annoyed at the Jiangs to pay that any mind.

If he’d had Wei Wuxian during the war, things would have turned out very differently.

Unaware of the thoughts of the watchers, Wei Wuxian continued walking back to where he’d agreed to meet up with Lan Wangji. The streets were now completely empty, the moon high in the sky. With the situation as it was, the blinding white of the Gusu Lan Clan’s robes made Lan Wangji appear to glow, his very presence illuminating the entire street.

Wei Wuxian froze, staring at the scene.

And the watchers did as well.

In the cultivation world, Gusu Lan’s twin jades were famous for their perfection. No matter how late it was, or how boring their classes and conferences were, the two of them would never show the slightest lack of discipline. Slouching was an impossibility, no matter the circumstances.

And yet, now, the motionless Lan Wangji stood with his head hung low, scarlet streaks in the corners of his eyes.

Desperation. Hopelessness. Despair.

To Lan Xichen, those emotions were reflected clearly in his brother’s face. Although they couldn’t read Lan Wangji themselves, the rest of the watchers understood far more of the context than Wei Wuxian did.

“Did he…” Nie Huaisang paused, looking up at the pitch black sky. “Did he think Wei-xiong had run away?”

Lan Wangji flinched back, horror flooding through his veins at the mere suggestion. When they had separated, Hanguang-jun had done nothing to ensure Wei Wuxian would actually return. Both he and Wei Ying had prioritized solving the case over staying together, and had acted accordingly. At the time, Lan Wangji had been grateful (if confused); it showed that his other-self’s temporary insanity hadn’t overcome his commitment to dealing with evil.

But then, after having been separated from Lan Wangji for a mere hour, Wei Wuxian had been found and tortured by Jiang Wanyin.

And just like that, the watchers had been forced to realize that the danger Lan Wangji was trying to protect Wei Wuxian from was very, very real.

How long had Hanguang-jun waited, not knowing if Wei Wuxian would return? How long had he stood there, thinking that his love come back from the dead had vanished, leaving him behind a second time? For how long had he been there, wondering if he'd missed his second chance and Wei Wuxian was dead again?

How long would Lan Wangji have continued to stand there, waiting for him to return?

Then, even without Wei Wuxian making a sound, Lan Wangji looked up and saw him. After some hesitation, he walked over with a dark expression.

Startled, Wei Wuxian took a step back.

And promptly twisted his ankle.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji jumped forward, then watched, aghast, as the illusion phased through his body.

Hanguang-jun snapped forward and caught him by the wrist to steady him, much like he had on Dafan Mountain. With that, Wei Wuxian managed to regain his balance.

Seeing that Wei Wuxian had been steadied, Hanguang-jun got down on one knee to examine his leg.

"No, no, Hanguang-jun, you don't have to do this!" Wei Wuxian insisted.

'Don't listen to him,' the shaking Lan Wangji told his other self. 'He needs help. You should help him regardless of what he-'

Lan Wangji flinched back. When Hanguang-jun had dragged the Yiling Patriarch back to the Cloud Recesses, the real Lan Wangji had been horrified. Hanguang-jun had ignored Wei Wuxian's cries and taken him somewhere he didn't want to be out of a misplaced desire to protect him.

(But it was so much more complicated than that.)

(But it wasn't. Nothing they'd discovered changed what had happened. Lan Wangji couldn't allow himself to forget the big picture. It would be wrong to ignore Wei Wuxian.)

He could not become Hanguang-jun.

"Really, Hanguang-jun. Stop."

The simulated Lan Wangji had heard Wei Wuxian's protest and had glanced up, only to look down again and roll up Wei Wuxian's pants. Kept in place by Hanguang-jun's grip, Wei Wuxian could do nothing but look at the sky.

Within seconds, a curse mark covering Wei Wuxian's entire leg was revealed.

"...Where did it come from?"

“It just… kind of randomly… I don’t know how… it just came on its own.”

Jiang Cheng facepalmed and gave the lowest, longest sigh the watchers had ever heard in their lives.

“Stop trying to skirt over the issue,” Wen Qing demanded, then looked towards the ceiling, and muttered, “A-Ning, you better be watching him closely.”

“It was on Jin Ling,” Hanguang-jun correctly assumed. “You could not clear it away, so you simply transferred it to your own body.”

“Uh, that’s about right,” Wei Wuxian admitted, making Lan Wangji’s eyes darken even further. “I-it’s not like there was any other option!”

“...Thank you, Wei Wuxian,” Jin Zixuan muttered for what felt like the thousandth time.

“Anyways, I have a lot of experience dealing with these kinds of things,” Wei Wuxian declared.

A sharp exhale from Hanguang-jun told Wei Wuxian exactly what he thought of this solution.

“Wangji,” Lan Xichen whispered, watching the war of emotions in his brother’s eyes. “It’ll be fine. Wei-gongzi is the Yiling Patriarch, remember? The chance of something being more powerful than him is slim to none.”

Silence was his only response.

After staring at it for a while longer, Lan Wangji clenched his fists: “I only left for a few hours.”

Despite the serious situation, Nie Huaisang couldn’t help but snort at the frustrated tone, laughing “Ah, Wangji-xiong. You should know better than to underestimate the kind of trouble Wei-xiong can get into!”

Wei Wuxian shrugged, “A few hours is a long time. Anything can happen. There, there, straighten up.”

With his hand grasping Lan Wangji’s own, Wei Wuxian pulled the other to a standing position again. By now, luckily, he appeared to have mostly dropped the “insane Mo Xuanyu” act, and was allowing himself to behave normally again.

“It’s only an average curse mark,” Wei Wuxian assured him. “We can just kill it when it comes to find me. Hanguang-jun, you’ll have to help me. If you don’t, I won’t be able to handle it!”

“...I guess he hasn’t dropped the act completely,” Lan Xichen acknowledged, forcing Lan Qiren to withhold a sigh at the ridiculous claim of weakness.

“Anyways, have you caught the person Fairy found? Is it him? Where is he now?”

In response, Lan Wangji looked in the direction of a shop a few buildings down the street.

Resisted the urge to shudder, Nie Mingjue silently directed Huaisang to move closer to him. His brother complied, but also lost all the cheer he'd had previously.

Whatever Nie Mingjue had been trying to tell him was clearly going to be revealed soon.

'Idiot,' the Nie Sect Leader cursed himself. 'If you had just gotten over yourself and told him before the simulation, you wouldn't be having this problem right now.'

"Let's deal with the stone castle issue first," Wei Wuxian suggested, beginning his journey toward the shop. As he walked, he noticed that his leg had become a bit numb, most likely from the force of Zidian.

'It's a good thing Jiang Cheng controlled Zidian's force enough that I wasn't turned into a lightning-scorched corpse,'* Wei Wuxian laughed.

The only person who found that funny was Wen Chao, who sincerely wished that had happened. Plenty of things wouldn't be a problem then. After all-

He froze, all the blood leaving his face at once as his memories of the Yiling Patriarch spilled forth, taking over his mind. He had done everything in his power to suppress them, made easier by the fact that the current Wei Wuxian was in Mo Xuanyu's body, rather than his own.

But he would never forget those burning crimson eyes.

'Remember the dogs,' he told himself. 'You'll be fine. You'll be fine. Just surround yourself with dogs that can tear him to shreds.'

(Right?)

Ignorant of Wen Chao's thoughts, the people in the simulation continued unimpeded. The few people in the street began turning off the lights, and a child was pulled indoors by his mother. Rubbing (Mo Xuanyu's) leg, Wei Wuxian forced himself to continue walking. He sighed:

"You really will need to help me with all of this, Hanguang-jun. It's too much for me on my own."

He stretched his arms.

"Honestly, I have no idea-"

"Wei Ying."

Everyone stilled in synch with Wei Wuxian.

"...You know," Wei Wuxian realized. "For how long?"

“Fairly early.”

“...Ah,” an awkward expression came over Wei Wuxian’s face as he remembered all the things he did while trying to escape. The bed and the whining and claiming to be a cutsleeve all flashed through his mind.

“He knew?” Jiang Cheng gaped, then glared. “Then… why didn’t he say anything? Why let Wei Wuxian make a fool of himself like that?! You-”

“Maybe it was to not hold him?” Nie Huaisang suggested.

Lan Qiren’s eyes seemed to cloud over as he nodded, “It isn't a coincidence that he chose to reveal it now. Wei Wuxian returned to him of his own free will. Revealing he knows Wei Wuxian’s identity won’t be seen as a threat, anymore.”

Lan Xichen made eye contact with his brother, the both of them truly and completely speechless.

“You met Jiang Wanyin,” Lan Wangji stated, his eyes glued to the mark Zidian had made atop the curse mark.

‘Why is everyone assuming I’m the biggest danger to Wei Wuxian? Someone else could have had a lightning whip!’ Jiang Cheng internally demanded. Despite asking that question, he found himself unwilling to actually search for an answer.

The possibilities were terrifying enough.

Wei Wuxian shrugged carelessly, “As long as the two of us are alive in this world, it’s inevitable that we’d meet again sooner or later.”

Lan Wangji frowned, “Stop walking.”

“If I dont walk, how am I supposed to leave?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Are you going to carry me on your back or something?”

“You!” Lan Wangji glared. “Shameless.”

Even as he said that word, however, he couldn’t tell if he was referring to Wei Wuxian or himself. After all, it was impossible for him to ignore the small part of him that sang at the image Wei Wuxian’s words provoked. A hot blush full of both excitement and shame spread across his ears.

The simulated Lan Wangji stepped forward, and Wei Wuxian’s expression twitched, a foreboding sensation coming over him. His fears were confirmed a moment later.

Lan Wangji had kneeled down before him, fully prepared to carry Wei Wuxian on his back.

“Wangji!” Lan Qiren snapped. “Regardless of how you feel about Wei-gongzi, by the Heavens maintain your dignity!”

Unfortunately, Lan Qiren's words simply washed over his younger nephew, whose mind was too preoccupied with the audacity of the supposedly honorable Hanguang-jun to pay it any mind.

"Stop, stop, I wasn't being serious!" Wei Wuxian protested, shock clear in his face. "It's only numb 'cause I got hit by Zidian a few times, it's not broken. Really, a full grown man getting piggyback carried? That'd make me look bad."

'At least he still has some decency,' Jiang Cheng sighed.

Lan Wangji frowned, "Would it look bad?"

"Would it look good?"

"But… you carried me on your back before."

"He did?" Madam Jin asked.

"Oh, oh!" Nie Huaisang jumped up. "In the Xuanwu cave! Right after everyone agreed to call for help! Because of Lan-xiong's injured leg! And-and-"

"How do you remember this?" Nie Mingjue asked.

"Of course I do!" his brother responded, backing away from him as if affronted by the implication of the scene's unimportance. "Don't be silly. I've cataloged each and every moment between those two. For future reference, of course."

"Good work," Lan Xichen complimented, enjoying the nearly-purple color spreading across Lan Wangji's ears.

However, after thinking it over for a moment longer, Wei Wuxian could only respond, "Did that happen? Why don't I remember?"

"World's. Weirdest. Memory," Jiang Cheng decided, unable to believe Wei Wuxian would remember the song Lan Wangji had hummed while he was practically hallucinating, but not this.

"You never remember such things," Lan Wangji replied indifferently.

"Everyone says I have a bad memory," Wei Wuxian acknowledged. "Alright, fine. Anyways, I'm not letting you carry me on your back."

"Are you sure?"

"I'm sure."

"Don't be so stubborn!" Wen Qing ordered. "You have a curse mark all over your leg. You're in no position to argue!"

Wen Ruohan sighed, wishing he could take just the tiniest bit of his second son's selfishness/fear of pain and transfer it to Wei Wuxian. Everyone would be much happier then.

Then, having thought the problem over for a moment, Hanguang-jun came to a conclusion. He stepped forward and placed one arm on Wei Wuxian's back and the other behind his knees.

"Hm?" Wei Wuxian asked, only to squeak slightly in embarrassed horror as he was suddenly picked up!

"What?!" Lan Wangji shouted, unable to believe the lengths his other self would go to. He heard Nie Huaisang cheering in the background along with Wangji's brother — his own brother! That traitor! — but was too distracted to pay that any mind.

A loud siren screeched through Lan Wangji's head, bringing all thoughts to a halt and replacing them with sheer, unadulterated panic.

'What?' he thought. 'What? What? What? What? What? What? What? What? Wha-'

"Lan Zhan!!!" Wei Wuxian shouted, horrified.

"And he's back to using your first name too," Lan Xichen teased. "You must be happy about that."

But Lan Wangji wasn't. He was only thinking one thing:

'What? What? What? What? What? What? What? What?'

"Ah, Wangji-xiong, your romantic mind puts the rest of us to shame," Nie Huaisang sighed, giggling at the way Lan Qiren broke out into coughs after swallowing down the wrong pipe.

(Jiang Cheng was stunned. What was wrong with those two?)

Without missing a step, Lan Wangji explained, "You said you didn't want to be carried on my back."

"I didn't say I wanted to be carried like this either," Wei Wuxian protested.

Fortunately, it was already late at night, meaning the streets were too empty for anyone to see them.

'Thank god,' Jiang Cheng thought. 'Those two — if anyone had seen them, their reputations would never recover. I can't believe even Lan-er-gonzi is going along with this!'

Then, after Lan Wangji had walked for a few steps, Wei Wuxian looked like he came to an understanding. Smirking, he brought up his hand to (pretend to) tug teasingly at Lan Wangji's robe.

"So, you want to see whose face is thicker?" Wei Wuxian asked, narrowing his eyes seductively at the challenge.

The endless stream of ‘what’ going on in Lan Wangji’s head was quickly replaced by a raging siren alerting the rest of his body to the emergency before them. Clenching his teeth, he quickly stood up and turned around, unable to storm off while in the simulation, but unwilling to watch for even a second longer.

Wei Wuxian was befuddled:

‘I never would have expected Lan Zhan to be such a vindictive person,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘He’s making me pay for all the times I teased him back then. This is too much progress. Not only has his cultivation improved, but his tolerance has also improved!’

Leaning close to Wangji, Lan Xichen whispered, “Your older self is much better at dealing with Wei-gongzi than you are. Perhaps you should watch so that you can follow his example later.”

“Xiongzhang!” Lan Wangji hissed back. “I… he-”

“Lan Zhan, you’ve known it was me ever since Dafan Mountain, right?” he asked.

Jiang Fengmian and Lan Qiren (who had been turned away, embarrassed by the flirting between their nephew and ward) turned back to face the two at those words.

“I have,” Lan Wangji answered, calmly.

“How could you tell?”

“You told me yourself.”

“Myself?”

“Wow, you’re really making him pay for all the teasing he did to you, huh?” Jin Zixuan asked, then flinched minutely at the terrifying glare Lan Wangji levied his way.

(The second jade was absolutely not in denial. He had thought this through very carefully, and he fully, completely, and utterly did not believe that the soul inhabiting his body was his own. It was clearly some sort of Nan Gui — a powerful demon who had appeared on earth with the goal of seducing and ravishing the poor, innocent, pure, newly-returned Wei Wuxian!)

Despite having spent a moment to think about Lan Wangji’s answer, Wei Wuxian could not figure out what the Second Jade meant.

“Because of Jin Ling? Or Wen Ning? Or how I acted around Jiang Cheng? None of those, right?”

It seemed as if something had sent ripples through Lan Wangji’s eyes. However, those slight waves faded almost immediately, returning his eyes to a still pool of water again.

“Think,” he commanded.

“I’m only asking you because I can’t think of anything!”

“Why is he still carrying him like that?!” Jiang Cheng shouted, unable to hold it in anymore. Hearing that, Jiang Yanli could only laugh at his reaction.

Lan Qiren gave a ~~fond~~ sigh.

Despite Wei Wuxian’s pleading eyes, Lan Wangji refused to answer. Instead, calm as always, he stepped into an inn. Inside, the desk clerk saw how Wei Wuxian was being carried and promptly choked on water.

Now that someone had actually seen them, Jiang Cheng felt his embarrassment meter overflow. He gave a heavy groan and folded in on himself, burying his face in his hands.

“Oh, don’t be like that, Jiang-xiong!” Nie Huaisang told him. “Of course they don’t mind showing the world! It’s true love!”

“Huaisang, stop,” Nie Mingjue begged.

Jiang Cheng scowled, “They’ve never actually met! It’s not true love-”

“Doesn’t matter,” Wen Ruohan interrupted, making most of the watchers jump.

Wondering if he'd misheard, Jiang Cheng looked over and gaped, "I...”

Wen Ruohan’s ice-cold eyes glanced back: “Regardless of whether the real versions have met, these two have. What we've seen of their relationship should be more than enough reason to allow them to meet, once the simulation is over. After that happens, I don't imagine it will take long for things to progress.”

More than one person was gaping at the Chief Cultivator in slack jawed silence, but he saw no reason to pay them (or the heavily blushing Lan Wangji) any mind.

Hanguang-jun walked up the stairs until he reached a closed door.

Wei Wuxian sighed in amused defeat, “Alright, we’re here. You should let me down now. You need to open the door-”

There was a loud crack as Lan Wangji kicked the doors open.

“Hanguang-jun, I don’t know! I don’t know! I…” Nie Huaisang paused, finally noticing the unbelievable sight before him. “...I really don’t know.”

Given the way Nie Mingjue had been acting, no one could really say they were surprised be the revelation of who the mysterious 'him' was.

(That didn't make them any less curious as to what was about to be revealed.)

Almost completely ignoring Nie Huaisang, Lan Wangji brought Wei Wuxian inside the room and delicately set him down on a bamboo mat, treating him with all the care and delicacy a merchant would show a priceless piece of pottery. In the meantime, Nie Huaisang snapped open his fan and covered his face, as if he couldn't watch.

When Nie Huaisang perked up and bounced over to observe his future-self, Nie Mingjue hurried to follow after, unwilling to separate a such a crucial time. This allowed both of them to get a clear view of the simulated Nie Huaisang, having moved near enough to see around the obstructive fan.

To the Nie brothers' delight, Nie Huaisang's future self was clearly far less changed than Jiang Cheng's — a fact which was obvious on first glance.

'Although Nie Huaisang was born with an elegant, attractive face, his expressions and demeanor always make it seem like he wouldn't resist no matter what you did to him. His stylish outfit shows a fine taste in clothing as well as the thought he's put into it. Rather than a sect leader… he looks more like a wealthy idler,' Wei Wuxian thought.

'If only!' Nie Huaisang agreed, not at all offended. 'And I won't have to be anything else, so long as I manage to keep Da-ge alive this time.'

"I don't know what you want me here for," the simulated Nie Huaisang repeated.

Without speaking, Lan Wangji held up the scrap of fabric Fairy had ripped off, comparing it against the obvious tear in the simulated Nie Huaisang's sleeve. Noticing that, Nie Huaisang felt along and realized the same.

He could only miserably respond, "I-I just happened to pass by. I really don't know anything."

"Ha! Who would believe that?" Wen Chao scoffed. "What a moron."

"Considering how your encounters with Wei Wuxian ended, I'd love to see you do better," Nie Mingjue growled, glaring at Wen Chao ferociously. He had expected Wen Chao to respond regardless, but, instead, the second young master of the Wen Sect simply froze.

All the blood left his face, and the string of memories returned.

~~The Yiling Patriarch had come for him.~~

Indifferent to his pathetic second son's suffering, Wen Ruohan merely narrowed his eyes, observing illusion of the new Sect Leader Nie closely.

"I…" Nie Huaisang looked away and concluded "Hanguang-jun, when I arrived at the hill, a dog attacked me. So I really didn't go anywhere."

‘Dogs appear to be amusingly effective against both of them,’ Jin Guangshan thought, glancing between Wei Wuxian and Nie Huaisang. He didn’t personally have a reason to go after the second Nie brother, but he knew Wen Ruohan well enough to realize the other man was treating Nie Huaisang weirdly.

He made a mental note to keep a closer eye on the boy.

“I-it’s been hours,” Nie Huaisang mumbled. “Can you please let me go? I promise, I don’t know anything.”

“Alright,” Wei Wuxian agreed easily. “If you don’t know anything, I’ll talk. Maybe listening to me will help you jog your memory on a few of these things.”

With a deceptively warm smile lit by the dim glow of candles, Wei Wuxian sat down and began pouring a cup of tea.

“Why did we have to be shown the Yiling Patriarch’s power before this scene?” Nie Huaisang complained. “That makes Wei-xiong so much more scary!”

“You should have just told us,” Lan Wangji calmly advised. “If you had, this wouldn’t be happening.”

“Wangji-xiong, you’re heartless!”

Unaware of the surrounding conversation, the simulated Wei Wuxian began:

“In the towns around the Xinglu ridge, there are many rumors about a ‘Man-Eating Castle’ and a ‘Man-Eating Ridge,’ but there aren’t any actual victims. It might just be hearsay, but it’s more than enough to keep normal people from approaching the castle. Thus, it’s intended purpose is to serve as the first defense line.”

Behind his careless, awkward smile, Nie Huaisang felt his intrigue grow. He might have nowhere near the same level of night hunting experience as Wei Wuxian, but he knew just enough for the ‘castle’ to have raised alarms in his mind — especially with the way Nie Mingjue had been acting.

Now, he would get to figure out the truth.

“If there’s a first, there must be a second. In this case, that second was the walking corpses on Xinglu Ridge. Even if someone ignores or forgets about the rumors, they’ll flee after they see the walking dead. Luckily, those corpses are also weak enough that they won’t cause anyone real harm.”

Silently, Lan Xichen moved closer to Nie Mingjue and Nie Huaisang, who had backed away from the latter’s older-self over time. It was true that he was concerned about the secrets Nie Mingjue had apparently kept, but that hadn’t overpowered his worry for his increasingly stressed friend.

Besides, the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun were the ones investigating. Every watcher had no doubt that the truth would be revealed soon enough.

“The third defense is the formation around the stone castle. The maze array on Xinglu Ridge is very sophisticated — defending against cultivators, rather than ordinary people. Without a spiritual beast good at following scents or being as powerful as Hanguang-jun is, you’d undoubtedly get lost. The castle has no doors, no windows, and a strong barrier around it,” Wei Wuxian continued, his silver eyes piercing through the room. “Without a sufficiently powerful spiritual weapon, it would be difficult to get in.”

Looking a second away from squirming, Nie Huaisang tapped the fan against his nose, as if wishing he could hide his entire body behind it.

‘It’s fine,’ Nie Mingjue reminded himself. ‘You’ve seen Lan Wangji’s and Wei Wuxian’s righteousness first-hand. You know you can trust in it. Huaisang will be fine.’

He bit his lip.

‘Probably.’

“These measures keep the Xinglu Castle hidden from the public, and make the people responsible for the castle quite clear. This is the Nie Sect’s area; they’re the only ones who would be capable of setting something like this up.”

“...It sounds really obvious when he says it like that.”

“Don’t feel bad,” Wen Qing advised, glancing between Hanguang-jun and Wei Wuxian. “That’s just… how those two are.”

“What exactly is the QingheNie Sect’s goal in building the castle?” Wei Wuxian asked, standing up without regard for the curse mark growing up his leg. “Where did the corpses in the wall come from? Were they eaten?”

Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan both smirked like vultures, waiting for their prey to reveal its weakness.

“Sect Leader Nie,” Wei Wuxian smirked, stepping behind Nie Huaisang and forcing him to look back. “If you don’t give us a proper explanation, I’m afraid that the the clans will soon come to find out about it.”

He leaned forward, practically standing side by side Nie Huaisang, and yet threateningly looming over the other all the same.

It was similar to the closeness they’d shown each other in the Cloud Recesses, and yet, just like Wei Wuxian’s relationship with Jiang Cheng, so, so different.

“The clans will undoubtedly come to interrogate you,” Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes. “At that moment, even if you try to explain things, no one is going to believe you.”

‘Was that advise based off personal experience?’ Lan Wangji wondered. ‘Wei Ying… what happened to you?’

Nie Huaisang gave a nervous swallow.

“Hanguang-jun…” he said. “And… Young Master. Can you swear to me that, whatever I tell you, you won’t spread it around? Even if just for the sake of the long relationship between our sects, our brothers were sworn brothers! And, if the secret is exposed in the future, I’d greatly appreciate it if you two could say a few good things as witnesses.”

The more Wen Ruohan heard, the more anticipatory he became.

“You have my word,” Lan Wangji calmly agreed.

Wei Wuxian nodded, “We won’t tell anyone.”

He held out the cup he’d poured to Nie Huaisang, and Sect Leader Nie enthusiastically took a big gulp. Clearly, this would be very difficult for him to say.

Unconsciously, Nie Huaisang found himself sneaking closer to his brother yet again.

A moment later, the now-empty cup was slammed onto the table.

“...What?”

“Ancestral burial ground? Whose ancestral burial ground buries sabers instead of corpses?!” Wei Wuxian asked.

Everyone but Nie Mingjue was thinking the exact same thing.

“You said that it’s not a Man-Eating Castle. Does that mean it hasn’t eaten anyone?”

Clenching his teeth, Nie Huaisang reluctantly answered, “...It has.”

“Wow.”

“What? Da-ge!” Nie Huaisang cried out.

Nie Mingjue just sighed.

“But only once!” Nie Huaisang rushed to say.

Jin Zixuan raised an eyebrow, “Because that’s so much better?”

“And we weren’t the ones at fault for that! Besides, it was dozens of years ago!”

“Must you meander around the issue?” Lan Qiren frowned. “I told you, when constructing argument, begin with-”

“Uncle,” Lan Xichen whispered. “Now might not be the time.”

“The rumors of the Man-Eating Castle on Xinglu Ridge also started after that! I just… fanned the flames a little.”

And that answered Nie Mingjue’s question regarding how the charlatan knew so much. Now that he thought about it, it actually wasn’t a bad way to deal with non-Wei-Wuxians-and-Lan-Wangjis.

Provided the Nie Sect survived what was about to be revealed to Wen Ruohan.

Barely moving, Lan Wangji glanced over and requested, “The details, please.”

His polite words were just as powerful as a threat would be.

“Wangji-xiong!” Nie Huaisang cried, hoping to release the tension in his body. “Why are you and Wei-xiong bullying me like this?! You know I don’t stand a chance!”

The second jade remained wholly unsympathetic.

“Hanguang-jun,” Nie Huaisang began. “You know that my Sect — the Nie Sect — has always been different. Our founder was a butcher, so we cultivate with sabers instead of swords.”

As though they were the ones who had been asked, Jiang Cheng, Jin Zixuan, Jiang Yanli, and the real Nie Huaisang all nodded in agreement.

“Since we’re so different from the other sects, it’s only natural that blood has been shed. The sabers of our past leaders are all heavy with hostile energy and killing intent. That’s why almost all of our sect leaders have met sudden ends due to qi deviation. Our irritable tempers also have a lot to do with this.”

Neither Nie Huaisang nor Lan Xichen had forgotten the far too easy way Nie Mingjue had accepted his own death.

And now-

“This is getting quite close to demonic cultivation,” Wei Wuxian observed.

“It’s different!” Nie Huaisang protested. “Demonic cultivation is only demonic cultivation because it uses human lives! My Sect’s sabers use the lives of evil spirits and beasts.”

“...Da-ge?”

“I’m here,” Nie Mingjue answered, meaning it in both the reassurance of protection, and in the promise that he wouldn’t run away from Huaisang’s later anger and questions.

Not much point in trying to hide it now.

“Throughout their whole lives, my sect’s sabers have been killing evil things. Once their owners die, they aren’t able to kill any longer, and cause trouble, disrupting the sect. A saber spirit only deems one person its master, and won't allow anybody else to use them. And it's not like we can just melt the sabers! Not only would it be disrespectful to our ancestors, but it's entirely possible that wouldn't solve the problem."

That was indeed quite the puzzle.

"Is it only the Sect Leaders' sabers that tend to cause trouble?" Wen Qing asked. "It's not like your outer-disciples are buried there."

"Correct," Nie Mingjue confirmed, his tone as blank as Lan Wangji's. "It takes a lot of power for them to do that."

Wei Wuxian smirked, "Those sabers are quite full of themselves, aren't they?"

Nie Huaisang sighed, "The sabers who fought and cultivated alongside our ancestors are in a position to be full of themselves."

As Nie Mingjue sat here, watching the conversation take place, he couldn't help but feel his thoughts drift towards Wei Wuxian. He had spent years agreeing with his sect's cultivation style and training in it. It provided a great deal of strength, wasn't a shortcut (as it still required normal cultivation), and was the legacy he was meant to inherit. Most who cultivated in his style experienced no problems, so he didn't need to feel guilty in that regard. Even now, he still was committed to cultivating in the Nie Sect style.

And yet, his reasons paled in comparison to what forced Wei Wuxian to study demonic cultivation. And while it was true that manipulating human souls was a far greater sin, his reasoning for falling to it was so much stronger.

And yet, in the beginning of the simulation, Nie Mingjue had condemned Wei Wuxian for it without even asking about the circumstances that led up to it.

(Would the simulated Wei Wuxian do the same thing to Huaisang?)

(No, he didn't have to worry about that. After all, Wei Wuxian was a much better person than he was.)

Clearing his throat, Nie Huaisang continued, "As the generations went on, the Sect Leaders had higher and higher levels of cultivation, and the problem worsened. That is, until the sixth leader came up with a solution!"

"The Man-Eating Castle?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Unconsciously, Lan Xichen found himself clenching his fists.

"No, no. They're connected, but that solution appeared later. The sixth sect leader built two coffins for his father's and grandfather's sabers, then dug a tomb. Inside the tomb, rather than valuable treasures, he put corpses that were about to transform."

"What?" Lan Qiren gasped.

Lan Wangji frowned.

“Hanguang-jun, I can explain! We didn’t kill them! We just gathered them from around! We also bought a bunch of them for a high price. The sixth sect leader said that, if the saber spirits want to fight evil beings, then give them evil beings to fight forever!”

That was slightly better than Wei Wuxian going around digging up graves during the Sunshot Campaign.

But only just slightly.

“The saber spirits suppress the transformation of the corpses, and the corpses calm the sword spirits’ fury. Things would continue like this, the two sides keeping each other in check. This would allow the future generations to live in peace.”

“Then why was the stone castle built afterwards?” Wei Wuxian pressed. “Why were the corpses buried inside the walls? And didn’t you say it did end up eating a few people?”

“Scary, Wei-xiong,” Nie Huaisang whined.

“These are all the same answer, I guess. You can say it ate people, but it wasn’t on purpose! Our sixth sect leader made them look like average tombs, and the following generations followed his lead. But, about fifty years ago, those tombs were dug up by some grave robbers!”

Wei Wuxian made an “oh” sound.

“Ah.”

“Well, that explains it.”

“Those idiots,” Jiang Cheng cursed. Rolling her eyes at the described men’s stupidity, Madam Yu sighed.

Also in agreement, Wei Wuxian shook his head and thought, ‘Undoubtedly a case of poking a sleeping dragon.’

“...Didn’t he dig up numerous graves throughout his life?” Wen Qing asked.

“Ah, but you see, he can take care of himself,” Nie Huaisang pointed out. “Besides, he’s got Lan-er-gongzi to help him if something goes wrong!”

A bright flush began to glow in Lan Wangji’s ears yet again.

Clearing his throat, Nie Huaisang continued, “For something as big as a tomb, no matter how hard you try, it’s impossible to go completely unnoticed. The grave robbers peered into the matter, and decided the tomb was undoubtedly left over from past dynasties. They planned it out for a long time and came prepared. A few in the group were genuinely skilled, allowing them to locate the position and pass by our maze array.

They'd seen plenty of dead people in their lives, so they didn't bat an eye at the corpses in the walls. While they were searching for gold and treasures, these young men — full of yang energy — ended up breathing all over the corpses."

Just like Jin Zixuan's son had.

"Ten or so corpses — which, even before the men's arrival, had been about to transform — woke up due to the men's actions. In a surprising turn of events, the grave robbers were skilled enough to kill the walking corpses which attacked them. They realized it was too dangerous to stay, but, just as they started to leave, they were eaten by the castle!"

Just like Jin Zixuan's stupid, stupid son.

(He wondered if he'd be able to convince Wei Wuxian to secretly babysit Jin Ling on every night hunt the boy went on. The LanlingJin Sect would certainly have the money to pay for it.)

"You see, the number of corpses in the castle needed to be strictly controlled. Just enough to balance the sabers without overwhelming them. It would've been fine if the grave robbers just caused the transformation — if they'd done that, everything would have still balanced itself out — but they'd destroyed the corpses! There were fewer corpses than there had been at the start, the ones that had once been there were now cut to pieces. So, to ensure there was still a balance, the castle could only… it could only close itself off and trap them inside the tomb to make up for the shortage."

"Surely there's a better way to go about this?" Madam Yu asked, raising an eyebrow. "Something that volatile-"

"Do you have a better suggestion?" Nie Mingjue asked. As he'd expected, Madam Yu put far too much value in filial behavior to consider suggesting he stop cultivating in the Nie Sect way, and even those who looked like they wanted to say that (Lan Xichen and Wen Qing) understood the complexity of the decision.

(Still, Nie Huaisang wished it wouldn't lead to his brother just accepting the fact that he would die before he was thirty!)

"...What about A-Xian?" Jiang Fengmian asked.

"A-Die?"

After glancing for a moment at Jiang Yanli, Jiang Fengmian continued, "Using animal cores rather than human souls does make this significantly different than demonic cultivation, but there are still a few similarities. Perhaps A-Xian will be able to figure out a better solution to this problem — or at least a way to increase the defenses."

"Sect Leader Jiang," Lan Wangji stood up. "I was led to believe that we were trying to steer Wei Ying away from demonic cultivation. Regardless of whether it's actually corruptive, society's view of it will cause them to turn against him once he's no longer needed to ensure our safety."

There words were spoken so politely that even Madam Yu had trouble disagreeing.

"In addition," the second jade continued. "We've already realized just how dangerous it can be to believe he can do anything. I ask that you don't expect him to come up with miracles upon request."

"He can at least take a look at it," Jiang Cheng suggested. "I'm sure he'll be able to figure out something."

Lan Wangji pursed his lips, neither agreeing nor disagreeing with the statement.

"Ah, anyways," the simulated Nie Huaisang continued. "Since the saber tomb was destroyed, the Nie Sect had to think up a different method. They chose a different spot on Xinglu Ridge and built a saber hall, rather than a saber tomb. The Sect Leader hid corpses in the wall as a disguise in case grave robbers came again."

Lan Wangji's eyes flicked to the side, in the direction where said sword hall stood.

"This was the rumored 'Man Eating Castle.' When those grave robbers came to Qinghe, they pretend to be hunters. They never returned and left no corpses behind, so people started to say they had been devoured by a monster on the ridge. Then, after the stone castle was built but before the maze array was set up, a passerby stumbled across the castle and a rumor that the monster lived there was born. We thought the rumors would help keep people away, so we interfered with the rumors a bit and the 'Man Eating Castle' was born."

The world faded to black.

"...So."

"So?"

"At the very least, that does answer the questions we had," Jiang Fengmian supposed. "That must be the resentment A-Xian noticed around Sect Leader Nie's body when he went to inspect them."

Hearing that, Wen Ruohan smirked, "And to think, you were so against Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation at the beginning. Did you not stop to think about the consequences?"

"It's completely different," Lan Qiren argued. "Carefully selecting the appropriate bodies versus digging up and disturbing random souls cannot be considered equal, even if we now understand why Wei Wuxian acted in such a way."

"Really? Because I seem to recall the Nie Sect's main complaint being the danger of corruption demonic cultivation contained. And yet, that seems to be a far bigger concern for their own cultivation than his."

“Did we know that at the beginning?” Nie Mingjue glared. “By the time that became apparent, the Nie sect had already accepted his choices.”

“Perhaps,” Jin Guangshan allowed, remembering how the Nie were some of the first people to side with Wei Wuxian. “Nevertheless, don’t you think we should turn that same lens upon you?”

“The Nie Sect has been using this cultivation for years,” Lan Xichen pointed out, moving to stand beside his friend. “If it hasn’t been a concern for the other sects all this time, then I don’t see why we should get involved now.”

“Except for when Wei-gongzi can offer some help?”

“If he’s wiling to.”

“Besides, Your Excellency,” Wen Qing began. “This helps Wei Wuxian as well. If the Nie Sect can be accepted by us, there should be no reason for anyone to attack Wei Wuxian over demonic cultivation. It will provide an extra safety net for him, if things do go wrong.”

The Jiangs swerved her way, wondering how pointing that out was supposed to help the Nie cause. Wouldn’t that just incentivize Wen Ruohan to not accept this, allowing him to take out two of his strongest enemies at once? And yet-

“I see,” Wen Ruohan responded.

And that was that.

(Most of the other watchers made bewildered eye contact with each other, not understanding what just happened. In that pause, Nie Mingjue glanced over at Wen Qing, who simply continued making unflinching eye contact with her sect leader.)

“...Are you planning on revealing this to the whole world?” Nie Mingjue asked, crossing his arms.

“Answering how we found out about this would most likely lead to things we don’t want known being exposed,” Jin Guangshan acknowledged, backing off at once now that Wen Ruohan was stopping.

Hearing that, Lan Xichen smiled and told his friend, “It’s like the simulated Huaisang said. Now that we all know, if your secret does get out, the Great Sects can all support the truth of the situation.”

Nie Mingjue nodded.

‘That’s all well and good,’ Nie Huaisang thought. ‘But none of that actually solves the problem of the fact that Da-ge is going to die from a qi deviation soon enough and doesn’t seem at all inclined to stop it. Nor how the other Sect Leaders now know the Nie Sect’s greatest weakness, and can use it against us even without revealing the information!’

Nie Huaisang glanced to the side, and saw Lan Wangji frowning minutely into space, thinking through something.

'Sorry, Wangji-xiong. I get what you're saying, but, since it's probably the only way to save Da-ge, I think I'll be getting Wei Wuxian involved in all this regardless of what you say.'

Meanwhile, the Jiang Clan was consumed by a solemn silence. On one hand, seeing their past-selves had reminded them of the happiness that awaited them outside, should they manage to prevent the war. On the other, none of them could deny that the glimpse they'd had of the past showed the seeds of everything that would later form between Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian.

Especially in the case of Jiang Fengmian.

'A-Cheng wasn't willing to ask me for help. He was scared of me,' he thought. 'Scared I'd be disappointed, at least.'

And Jiang Fengmian probably would have been. Just like any parent would have been. That shouldn't mean all his children should decide that keeping it from him was the solution to that problem.

During the simulation, Jiang Fengmian had spoken to his children. He had made his true feelings clear, and stated them explicitly. That didn't change what was surely years of habits ingrained in all of them. Yes, things had been going better for now, but would it return to the way it had been before as soon as they left the simulation?

(And what about with Wei Wuxian? Would his family go back to treating Wei Wuxian the same way they had before?)

Clearly, Jiang Fengmian should have done something differently long before Wei Wuxian had arrived. He should have spoken with his wife and made it clear-

No, their conversations had always just became one sided arguments on her part. It was unlikely that would have fixed anything. She never heard anything he was trying to say.

Then he should have spoken to his children.

And told them he loved them? He had tried. He had never managed to speak above Yu Ziyuan's shouts of his favoritism. Even now, after he'd made his feelings clear during the tenth segment, things weren't fixed. He wasn't so delusional as to think the fact that he'd talked to Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli would automatically solve everything. Once they left, there was no telling what they would divert to.

So therefore he should have silenced his wife?

Maybe. Or that would have just made more problems. He truly, honestly did not know.

(And maybe that was the problem all along. He'd never been able to decide on what to do, so he'd just done nothing and allowed this whole charade to continue.)

Some distance away, the twin jades approached each other.

“Wangji?” Lan Xichen asked. “Is something wrong?”

The second jade had been frozen for most of the in-between period (so still he looked like he was genuinely made of jade, and so lost in thought that he had barely blinked since he’d last spoken).

“Xiongzhang, do you remember all the things Wei Ying told me in the Xuanwu cave. For everything the did, he never wanted to receive thanks.”

‘Alright, the bad blood’s out. No need to thank me!’

‘How could Lan Zhan do this to me?’ Wei Wuxian thought after being bitten. ‘He might have saved me, but you could say I saved him as well, didn’t I? It’s not that I wanted him to thank me or anything, but why is it that we still can’t be friends, even after so much has happened?’

Then Lan Wangji had actually thanked him, and Wei Wuxian had rejected it:

‘No need to thank me. I really can’t stand when others thank me, especially not when they do it so seriously. It gives me goosebumps. And kowtowing is even more unnecessary.’

“It’s hard to tell with him,” Jin Zixuan, who had been near enough to hear, interjected. “Maybe he just didn’t want to make it seem like he’d done with with the expectation of being thanked?”

“Or maybe it’s because he wanted to be close to you as a friend,” Lan Xichen suggested. “He didn’t want you to befriend him out of a debt, so he made it clear that thanks weren’t required.”

“So he doesn’t want to be close to Jin Ling?” Lan Wangji asked.

Fidgeting awkwardly, Jin Zixuan muttered “Well… if he’s as involved with my and A-Li’s deaths as those memories implied, then — oh, not that I think he killed me! You’re right, I can’t imagine a scenario that would make him want to kill innocents. Just… maybe he still feels responsible? So he’s trying to….”

From the side of all this, Wen Ruohan gazed over the crowd, frowning deeply. The segment had many things for them to think about, the most interesting of which being the truth behind the Nie Sect. And yet, despite the initial uproar about it, everyone had mostly settled down, accepting the clan’s cultivation.

Cultivation that wasn’t as much of an insult to tradition as demonic — explaining Lan Qiren’s lack of opposition — but was still somewhat dangerous to the user, not explaining the acceptance from all the other sects. Was it simply that understanding and supporting Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation made them more willing to accept this less-severe one?

Or were the cultivation world's leaders being as foolish as always, and accepting it simply on the basis of Nie Mingjue being the leader of an honored and powerful sect, rather than the son of a servant.

(It was probably a mix of both, but the mere inclusion of the latter option infuriated Wen Ruohan beyond belief.)

If only Wei Wuxian had been part of his sect.

"God, I wish I was part of the Wen Sect!" Wei Wuxian declared, draping himself over Wen Ning's shoulders. "Yunmeng has no books on any of this! Even Qinghe's studies on the effects of resentful energy are pathetic! No one knows anything!"

"W-well," Wen Ning stuttered. "Qinghe might not have a lot of medical texts, but GusuLan is also a good source."

"Oh, good point! Okay then, we'll start a plan to infiltrate the GusuLan Sect posthaste! Certainly sounds more fun than dealing with the Jiang elders again. God, I can still hear them. 'No,' they say. 'We don't have enough money to devote to more experiments. Just focus on running the sect.' We have plenty of money! They're just too lazy to want the competition there would be if I wake the other Sect Leaders up!"

"R-right, but-"

"Oh, and there's also the Lanling Jin Sect. I bet they have enough money to run some experiments if I wanted to. The elders wouldn't be able to use that excuse then!"

"Of course, but, um-"

"Worst comes to worst, I could try to branch out and find Baoshan Sanren's mountain-"

"Sir?!"

Here, at long last, Wei Wuxian glanced over.

"R-regardless of whether or not you've been able to research… shouldn't we worry about that first?"

The 'that' Wen Ning was referring to was, of course, the red arry glowing in the middle of the air. It was another message from Mo Xuanyu — the first one they'd gotten since Wei Wuxian informed him that they were leaving the watchers inside. Wen Ning had somewhat hoped that ignoring it would eventually lead to it losing energy and going away.

The longer they waited, the more obvious it was that that wasn't going to work.

"What would you suggest we do?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"I-" Wen Ning paused and looked back at it. "Well, we can't do nothing, right? What if it's important?"

“Really? But what if activating it blows Yunmeng up?”

“WHAT?!”

As Wei Wuxian grinned, Wen Ning gradually began to realize he was just being messed with. Nonetheless, he couldn’t shake that fear from his mind.

“W-will it?”

“No. It’s definitely a different array than the ones before, but it has nowhere near enough energy to do that. At most, it’ll blow up this room.”

Wen Ning eeped, nervously backing away from the red light and asking “S-should we evacuate the-”

“No, no, no,” Wei Wuxian assured him. “It seems to just be altering the speed of the connection and such. The only part that might be a cause for concern is those few new characters in the bottom right.”

Frowning, Wen Ning bent forward and observed the dozens of pages Wei Wuxian had covered with notes on the new array. He’d spent the past few hours working on them, and had become increasingly tense as time went on.

“What do… what do those characters do?”

“I’m now pretty sure they’re receiving information,” Wei Wuxian said. “Which probably means we should check it out as soon as possible, just in case it’s here to spy on us.”

Wen Ning instantly paled.

Another beat of silence passed as Wei Wuxian’s silver eyes narrowed in on the array. If Wen Ning wasn’t mistaken, they seemed to be gaining a faint red tint as Wei Wuxian's annoyance increased. Not that Wen Ning didn’t understand his frustration.

(On one hand, it could be dangerous. On the other, the watchers were all lying to them, and this was their only chance at getting some real information that, for all they knew, would be needed to save the watchers.)

(They couldn’t risk giving this up.)

Wen Ning clenched his fists and looked toward the array as well. It’s ominous red light seemed to signify an incoming danger, but Wen Ning knew the danger of missing information was just as big as the danger receiving that information could pose. He had no idea what to do.

Then he saw Wei Wuxian give a truly vicious smile.

“Wen Ning, do you remember how to activate the voluntary ejection array? The one that will allow the watchers to leave the simulation?”

“Uh, yes?”

“Okay then. Give me a moment. I’ll activate Mo Xuanyu’s message soon, but I figure it can’t hurt to be careful.”

Understanding instantly, Wen Ning nodded.

When the light of the array finally faded, Wei Wuxian found himself in a large room made of light colored wood, much like those he’d seen at the Cloud Recesses. In the center of the room, Mo Xuanyu an an unknown man in a dark cloak stood, facing him. Directly in between him and them was an array of light that seemed to be carved into the ground.

His exit, in case things went poorly.

Raising an eyebrow, Wei Wuxian waited for them to proceed.

“Welcome, Wei-gongi!” a cheery voice greeted him. “I’m Mo Xuanyu. I’m the one who made the array that was used to put together the simulation your sect leaders are currently watching. Thanks for opening this message!”

“And for taking forever,” the man in the cloak grumpily added on.

Instantly, Wei Wuxian felt his tension rise. How would they know how long it took? And why were they saying that? Had they just assumed he would be cautious, and wanted to add something to make him tense? Were they admitting to the attempts to spy on him, even indirectly? Was this message all supposed to be a threat?

“So,” Mo Xuanyu continued. “Given that you refused to comply with taking your sect leaders out of the simulation, I figured I’d probably lost your trust somewhere along the way. And I guess I can’t blame you-”

The man in the cloak snorted.

“-I mean, I might have stretched the truth a bit a few times.”

Here, even Wei Wuxian couldn’t help but roll his eyes at the absurd understatement.

“Hey! Don’t roll your eyes at me, brat. You could at least pretend to be respectful.”

Wei Wuxian felt his blood freeze.

“What?”

Mo Xuanyu smirked.

“You…” Wei Wuxian gaped opely. “You’re here? You can hear — you can talk to me?”

“Yup! I admit, it’s kinda my fault I lost your trust. But, in my defense, some things were hard to explain when we could only send messages. So I improved it! Now, we can just talk directly to each other!"

"But how would you even do that?" Wei Wuxian asked. "The distances these messages have to cross-"

"No, no. Our perception of time is slowed down in here."

"Like the simulation."

"Right! So it can pass so long as it has the connection-"

"Which is what the energy trail I felt was!" Wei Wuxian realized. "So every second you're recording what I say and sending it back — oh, that was what the recording characters were for-"

"Right! And I had to maintain the energy balance-"

"Of course! Because it would have destabilized otherwise-"

"And then blown up-"

"Oh! Which is why the path between us was written first! Because it needs to-"

"Build on that base!' Mo Xuanyu agreed. "Unlike the former-"

"Which prioritized a complete-"

"Package that didn't lose-"

"Any information and-"

"Would you two focus!" the man in the hood snapped, startling both Wei Wuxian and Mo Xuanyu out of their excitement. "What are you even talking about? Packages?"

"Er, information packages," Wei Wuxian explained. "I mean, not really. It's just-"

"Don't worry about him," Mo Xuanyu shook his head. "He doesn't get talismans."

"Shut up! With the number of disasters your inventions have caused-" the hooded man cut off, watching Mo Xuanyu pale at his words. A moment later, they both looked back at Wei Wuxian, not bothering to elaborate on that.

"Anyways," Mo Xuanyu said. "I acknowledge that I've been keeping too much from you. Honestly, I shouldn't have been surprised that you picked up on the stretched truths I used. But that's all over now! I'm going to tell you exactly what the watchers are seeing, and why I wanted to hide all this from them."

"Are you?" Wei Wuxian raised a skeptical eyebrow.

"I will. So tell me: what do you think of time travel?"

Thrown back by the abrupt topic change, Wei Wuxian paused for a moment to wonder if this was just meant to be a distraction. It was entirely possible it would be best for him to just leave now.

But if they were serious….

“I don’t believe in it,” he responded.

“Yes, I thought you might say that,” Mo Xuanyu sighed. “So, I brought along a guest!”

With a flourish toward his hooded partner, Mo Xuanyu stepped aside and allowed the unknown man to take off his hood. Two purplish-grey eyes glared at Wei Wuxian, uncompromising and determined.

And familiar.

“Jiang… Cheng?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Wei Wuxian,” the man — his shidi grown up into a man — greeted back.

As Wei Wuxian soared through the air — accompanied by Wen Ning and two elders from Yunmeng Jiang — he found himself lost in thought for what seemed like the millionth time that week. That afternoon would mark eleven days since the sect leaders had fallen unconscious due to the Píngxíng Gateway. Eleven days since he'd been forced to (temporarily) take over Yunmeng Jiang.

Because of time travel. Apparently.

It would be a lie to say Wei Wuxian completely believed Mo Xuanyu's story, but the "older Jiang Cheng" had been unnervingly realistic. A bit more genuinely angry and stressed than Wei Wuxian would say his shidi was, but other than that it was completely on point. Which, unfortunately, meant Wei Wuxian had to at least consider the explanation he'd been given.

So: time travel. And a "Sunshot Campaign" against the Wens with the sects being assisted by the mysterious "Yiling Patriarch," the grandmaster of demonic cultivation. Supposedly, the ability to manipulate resentful energy like Mo Xuanyu (and, later, Wei Wuxian) could do was invented by that man. Then again, the future Jiang Cheng had laughed when Mo Xuanyu started describing the Patriarch's accomplishments, so Wei Wuxian was half convinced Mo Xuanyu had just made up the Yiling Patriarch and he wasn't a real person. After all, plenty of the things they told him were fairly difficult to accept.

'What about me, A-Cheng?' Wei Wuxian had asked, tilting his head teasingly. 'If this really is the future, why not have my future self come and visit? It would be impossible to deny that.'

Jiang Cheng's teeth had gritted together (as they always did when he was caught off guard), but Mo Xuanyu had just given him a bitter smile and said, 'I apologize, Wei-gongzi. In our world, you die when you're twenty two.'

So, that was fun. And more than a little hard to believe, even if it would explain the adult Jiang Cheng's general demeanor.

At that moment, Wei Wuxian passed over the town he had been looking for. With a single gesture back to the trio flying with him, he began to descend into Mo Village.

What Mo Xuanyu had told him was hard to believe, but some of it could be confirmed pretty easily. Wei Wuxian had never heard of a 'Mo Xuanyu' before, but if a four year old was actually here — if his living conditions were exactly what the future one had described — then Wei Wuxian might have to reconsider his doubt.

He approached the manor.

“Uh, Young Master?” a guard asked, meant to dissuade intruders, but too scared of the cultivators to do so. “Is-is there something I can help you with?”

Wei Wuxian nodded once and asked, “Is this the residence of Mo Xuanyu?”

The servant’s eyes dropped to the blade at Wei Wuxian’s side. He glanced back at the house, made eye contact with his partner, then found his eyes returning to the blade again.

“...Ah, right this way,” he reluctantly admitted, allowing them inside.

For a moment, Wei Wuxian wondered the two men had somehow recognized Suibian. It seemed unlikely that they’d allow random people (even cultivators) inside without asking for more information. A moment later, he heard a servant girl mutter ‘I thought the Jin Clan wore gold’ and realized what had happened.

They thought he was here to pick Mo Xuanyu up on behalf of Jin Guangshan, the boy’s father.

(Well, that confirmed one part of Mo Xuanyu’s story. Looking good so far.)

Rather than to Mo Xuanyu himself, Wei Wuxian was then brought to a dining hall and asked to wait while Mo Xuanyu and the boy’s mother were fetched. He and Wen Ning made eye contact, watching the servants’ pandemonium as they rushed around. Refreshments were brought to the cultivators in a frantic attempt to keep them occupied.

Fifteen minutes later, the boy was brought out. As soon Wei Wuxian made eye contact with the boy, he found himself wondering if the wait had been to give the clan time to prepare Mo Xuanyu before presenting him. After all, it was clear on first sight that Mo Xuanyu had been freshly washed, styled, and coated in heavy sploches of makeup. Perfect, for hiding any possible scars.

Wei Wuxian couldn’t even claim to be surprised; Madam Yu had done the same to him plenty of times.

(The adult Mo Xuanyu had certainly implied a less than ideal childhood. Wei Wuxian supposed this was another point in the man’s favor.)

“Welcome, Gongzi,” a woman stepped forward and bowed respectfully. “I am the Madam of this household. May I ask what you wanted to see my sister and nephew for?”

Technically, now that Wei Wuxian had seen them and confirmed Mo Xuanyu’s existence, he didn’t need them for anything. Technically, he could just make up an excuse and leave.

But the boy’s bright, hopeful eyes which warred between elation and nervous anticipation reminded him far too much of some of the friends he’d made on the streets.

(The ones who hadn't been found by the leader of one of the Great Sects. The ones who, as far as he knew, had probably died anywhere from years to days after he'd left.)

Madam Mo had taken control fairly recently, and so it would be all too easy for Wei Wuxian's high rank, entourage, and expensive clothing to gain her respect. And now that he had an actual goal in mind….

"Thank you for coming to meet with me. My name Wei Wuxian. I'm the head disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect," he introduced himself. "And I have come to invite Mo Xuanyu into our sect as an outer disciple."

"The Jiang Sect?" Mo Xuanyu's mother gasped out. "No, but — but the Jin! A-Shan told me-"

"Silence!" Madam Mo hissed. "You're being disrespectful to the Young Master. You delusional-"

She abruptly cut off, unwilling to say anymore, and spun back to Wei Wuxian. Her worryingly frantic eyes frightened Mo Xuanyu slightly, but his attempts at slipping away were cut off when Madam Mo reached out and snatched his wrist, pulling him close. A slight frown formed on Wei Wuxian's face.

Madam Mo cleared her throat, "I apologize for the complication. May I ask how you came to find out about my darling nephew, Young Master? Are you an acquaintance of Sect Leader Jin, perhaps?"

"Of course," Wei Wuxian allowed, eyes becoming colder and colder as Mo Xuanyu began to shake in the Madam's grasp. "As I'm sure you've heard, the Great Sleep has affected the leaders of all the great sects. The main branch of the Jin Clan is currently out of commission, and so several jobs have been delegated to myself, given that the Madams of our sects are so close."

"I see, I see," Madam Mo lit up and pulled the shaking Mo Xuanyu even closer. "Ah, but you see, A-Yu is very important to our family. I would hate to-"

"W-wait!" Mo Xuanyu's mother spoke up. "A-Yu isn't going anywhere. He needs to meet his family in the Lanling Jin Sect. A-Shan told me that that's where our son belongs. He'll become an heir there!"

"Ah, my sister doesn't mean that-" Madam Mo defended.

"Yes, I do. Thank you young master, but we-"

"Be silent, you wretch-"

Wei Wuxian held up a hand in a calming gesture, and the two Madams instantly stopped. Gritting his teeth together to keep a smile on his face, Wei Wuxian continued:

"I understand your concerns, Ma'am. I apologize; I should have sent notice ahead of time before I sprung this on you. I can personally assure you that, after the Great Sleep has ended, you may choose to switch to the Lanling Jin Sect, if you so please. I'll even write a letter of recommendation for you."

"Eh?" Mo Xuanyu's mother asked.

"Ah, that would be greatly appreciated, Young Master," Madam Mo rushed to assure him. "But, as I was saying earlier, I don't want my beloved nephew to get lonely. Would you be able to bring his cousin along as well? I feel like he'd be much more comfortable then."

Every single cell in Mo Xuanyu's body tensed instantly.

"I apologize, but I'm afraid I have only received permission to bring Mo Xuanyu along," Wei Wuxian lied. "Perhaps next time. Those with family in the sect are certainly much more likely to be allowed in later."

"I see," the Madam said, her initial disappointment fizzling away at those words. "In that case, of course. We'd be more than happy to allow A-Yu to go with you."

"Wait-"

But before Mo Xuanyu's mother could finish, one of the servants snapped forward and grabbed her arm, pulling her away from the table. In response, she screeched.

"What are you doing?" Madam Mo yelled back.

"No! Stop it!" Mo Xuanyu's mother shouted. "A-Yu needs-"

"You insane, delusional-"

"Enough," Wei Wuxian spoke, and all the fighting ended at once. Rather than addressing the Madams again (far too drained to bother keeping up the polite mask anymore), Wei Wuxian stood up and walked over to Mo Xuanyu, who trembled as he hid behind the table.

"A-Yu, right?" Wei Wuxian asked. "I'm sorry if I've scared you a little."

"I'm not scared!" the trembling boy whimpered.

"I know, you're very brave," Wei Wuxian agreed. "A-Yu, would you like to come and learn cultivation with me? If it gets to be too much, I promise you can return here at any time."

Mo Xuanyu jumped, suddenly overwhelmed by the possibility of choice, and spun towards his mother. She, still restrained by two of the Mo family's servants, looked at her sister, her son, and finally at Wei Wuxian.

"I'll keep him safe, I promise," Wei Wuxian swore.

Slowly, hesitantly, Mo Xuanyu's mother nodded once at her son.

The light that spread across Mo Xuanyu's face was radiant in its intensity.

When Wei Wuxian stretched his arms out, Mo Xuanyu didn't hesitate for even a second before jumping into them with an excited squeal, allowing himself to be picked up without complaint. Wei Wuxian laughed at the boy's excitement, and bounced him slightly to hear even more of it. As she watched, Mo Xuanyu's mother gradually began to relax.

Wei Wuxian would love to offer to take her as well, but, after having refused to bring along Mo Xuanyu's cousin, he felt that any sort of offer to that nature would be regarded with suspicion.

That was fine; Wei Wuxian could handle it. What was more important was that Wei Wuxian now had to consider the things the adult Mo Xuanyu had said. Every bit of information the future Mo Xuanyu and Jiang Cheng had given him had been true; Wei Wuxian was becoming more and more convinced that Mo Xuanyu truly was from the future.

(And, if that was what was being shown to the watchers, then their continued vagueness made a lot more sense.)

Mo Xuanyu and the future Jiang Cheng had given Wei Wuxian a brief summary of what the simulation was going over. As shocking as it should have been, Wei Wuxian could already see the earliest traces of what would eventually become the "Sunshot Campaign." It also explained why Mo Xuanyu had wanted Wen Ruohan out of the simulation as fast as possible. Unfortunately, not only would Wei Wuxian need Wen Xu's permission to use a talisman that would force them out, but it was too late now. They had already learned everything Mo Xuanyu hadn't wanted them to know. He didn't really explain what that was, of course, but Wei Wuxian supposed he'd learn as soon as the watchers woke up.

These days, it was starting to feel everyone but Wei Wuxian knew what was going on. Though, based on what his grown-up shidi said, that might not be entirely true.

('How'd other people get access to the Pingxing Gateway in the first place? Wouldn't the Jiang Sect put it in the artifacts hall? Did they somehow break in?' Wei Wuxian had asked.

An awkward expression came over Mo Xuanyu's face: 'Ah, I'm not part of the Jiang Sect. We just… we just know each other.'

'Well, maybe consider it next time then,' Wei Wuxian suggested. 'Nothing will keep your inventions safer than that! Right, 'Sect Leader Jiang?''

But Jiang Cheng hadn't reacted to his teasing at all, instead rolling his eyes and muttering, 'Well, that would require 'Mo Xuanyu' over here actually trusting me with information. Believe me, there's no chance of that.'

All the warmth left Mo Xuanyu's face and he frowned, muttering, 'Jiang Cheng, if this is about Baoshan Sanren's mountain, then now is not the time-'

'Oh, I was referring to what Jin Ling said about what he saw of your time in the Burial Mounds! You know, the stuff you, to this day, never told me about? But sure, Baoshan Sanren is a good second!'

‘The Burial Mounds?’ Wei Wuxian had asked. ‘Baoshan Sanren?’

Mo Xuanyu swerved to him and forced a laugh: ‘Don’t worry about it-’

‘Yeah, it’s apparently nothing for us to worry about,’ Jiang Cheng had hissed. ‘Because clearly, I can’t be trusted with-’

‘Jiang Cheng! Enough!’ Mo Xuanyu had snapped.)

At that moment, the child Mo Xuanyu fidgeted slightly in Wei Wuxian’s arms, and he quickly realized that he’d started unconsciously squeezing too hard while lost in memories. With an apologetic smile, he relaxed his grip. This was the person the watchers apparently valued enough to hide him from Wei Wuxian, and a person Jiang Cheng was willing to help despite the obvious bad history between them. As Jiang Fengmian’s temporary representative, Wei Wuxian would need to be careful with him.

“Well, there’s no need to rush things,” Wei Wuxian said, bouncing the quietly laughing boy up and down in his arms. “I’ll have someone return in two days to pick Mo Xuanyu up. If you change your mind by then, just tell him, and he’ll accept that.”

“Thank you, Young Master,” Mo Xuanyu’s mother said, bowing deeply. Wei Wuxian nodded once, and smiled at the sheer and utter relief spreading across the mother’s face.

He glanced down at the happily bouncing Mo Xuanyu, and wondered how it was possible for such an expressive boy’s adult-self to be so hard to read. After all, despite having actually ‘spoken,’ Wei Wuxian had no idea how many things Mo Xuanyu was still hiding from him. And the future Jiang Cheng had seemed like an older Jiang Cheng, but….

For a brief moment there, the adult Jiang Cheng’s expression had shifted, and Wei Wuxian had felt genuinely scared.

Toward the end of their conversation, Wei Wuxian had asked how old Mo Xuanyu was in his timeline. In response, he had gotten the answer ‘four or five,’ too young to start cultivating, but old enough to begin the theoretical training. Wei Wuxian had been impressed.

‘Wow, it’s been twenty years?’ Wei Wuxian had asked, staring at Jiang Cheng. ‘I never would have guessed! I mean, I guess you do look a little older, but still. Just physically, I would have thought you were twenty-two at most, instead of an old man!’

‘Old man?!’” Jiang Cheng had indignantly snapped while Mo Xuanyu openly laughed.

‘Oh, don’t be mad, A-Cheng. It’s a compliment! Good job, Shidi! I always knew you’d be able to form a super strong golden core-’

He cut off and flinched back. Jiang Cheng’s expression had turned darker than the blackest night.

Sighing once, Wei Wuxian smiled brightly and started his journey back to Yunmeng, quietly wondering when his life had gotten so complicated.

Back in the tavern room from the end of the last segment, Nie Huaisang continued his explanation. Reaching inside his robes, he pulled out a handkerchief and a white stone the size of a garlic head. After using the handkerchief to wipe away his sweat, he passed the stone over.

"Take a look at this," he instructed.

The real Nie Huaisang paled and jumped farther back, but the rest of the teenagers were curious enough to step closer.

Wei Wuxian frowned, 'Rather than a rock, that looks like… the bone of a human finger.'

"I suppose he'd know better than anyone," Wen Qing muttered with a smirk.

Nie Huaisang wiped his sweat once again as he continued, "That… Young Master Jin…. He suddenly made a huge explosion, creating a hole in the wall. To break such a thick wall… he must have carried some very powerful spiritual tools with him."

"Those were supposed to keep him safer," Jiang Cheng growled, annoyed at the whole situation.

"Oh, sorry! That's not the point. Anyways, what I'm trying to say is that the area he blew up was the saber hall we built earliest, back when we didn't have as many countermeasures. We hadn't thought of using stone bricks on both sides of soil to prevent yang energy from going in, so the corpses in this hall could transform much more easily. When Young Master Jin made the opening, he hadn't realized that, in the process, he'd destroyed one of the skeletons inside. Before long, he was sucked into the walls to replace the corpse he'd blown up."

"Thank you, Lan-er-gongzi," Jiang Yanli whispered. "I apologize for the trouble."

In complete agreement, Jin Zixuan nodded with a speed that was only barely kept down due to his mother's watchful eyes. Lan Wangji got that feeling that, if it had been just the two of them, Jin ZIxuan would have gotten down on his knees in a full kowtow of gratitude.

Wangji gave a single nod back.

After taking a deep breath, Nie Huaisang continued, "Every so often, I go to Xinglu ridge to check things out. Today, when I arrived, I found this."

He gestured at the stone in his hand.

"Right as I picked up the stone, the dog came after me!" he continued miserably, the words causing a trace of pity to flash across Wei Wuxian's face. "This place is pretty much just our ancestral hall… I really…. Most cultivators know this is our area, so they never night hunt around here. Who knew that…."

Who knew that his luck would be so bad as to involve the Jin heir, Wei Wuxian, and Hanguang-jun!

Watching the simulated Nie Huaisang melt into a depressed puddle of goop, Nie Mingjue sighed and knelt down beside him, wishing there was some support he could offer.

(But he had died, so now Huaisang was alone.)

"Hanguang-jun, I've already said this, but you really can't tell anyone about the tomb! Or else…."

'Or else it would be disaster,' Wei Wuxian mentally finished. 'Given the Nie Sect's lacking situation under Nie Huaisang, if this was released to the public, Huaisang would become a sinner and a disgrace to his ancestors even after he's died. It's only natural that he'd rather be the laughingstock of all the sects instead of focusing on cultivation or daring to sharpen his saber's blade. If his cultivation reaches a certain level, he'll start becoming more irritable and, eventually, die in an anger-induced qi deviation just like his brother and ancestors did. Even after death, his saber will haunt the world. Between those two options, being seen as a worthless person is greatly preferable.'

"Also, training isn't any fun," Nie Huaisang cheerily added on, then frowned and looked at his brother. Nie Mingjue had been the strongest Nie in decades, and had known exactly where that would lead him. Why would he push himself to that end? Was the power really worth that much to him? It wasn't like their parents were the Jiangs — unlike with Jiang Wanyin, Nie Mingjue's sense of self worth wasn't dependent on his cultivation, so why? Because he couldn't see another option? Because their ancestors had done the same? It was true that it would have taken years for Nie Mingjue to find a new path to teach (crippling the sect in the process), but still. He couldn't even try?

Wen Ruohan smirked, and the answer abruptly appeared before Nie Huaisang's eyes.

If Nie Mingjue wasn't strong enough, Wen Ruohan would have acted far sooner. Regardless of the strange emotions the Chief Cultivator was currently directing at Wei Wuxian, Nie Huaisang would never forget that Wen Ruohan was responsible for his father's death. And Nie Mingjue, who valued righteousness above all else, would think being strong enough to stop that was worth his inevitable, painful death.

Nie Huaisang sighed. It was completely unfair to Wei Wuxian, but Nie Huaisang was going to put the baby Patriarch to work the second he got out.

As the real Nie Huaisang thought through his emerging plans, the simulated one bowed and hurriedly left, having satisfied Wei Wuxian's and Lan Wangji's questions. On the way out, he reminded them numerous times to not tell anyone.

Jin Zixuan had to admit, he felt a little guilty about finding out this way. The Nie brothers had forced themselves to accept it, but they clearly weren't happy.

(Then again, they were far from the only ones who had something they'd rather keep hidden revealed.)

Wei Wuxian, who had been sitting in deep contemplation for some time, took a second to notice Lan Wangji walk over and kneel in front of him. Without further warning, Hanguang-jun reached forward and began rolling up Wei Wuxian's pants.

"Wait, again?!"

"Oh, my," Lan Xichen whispered. "Wangji, I didn't realize you had it in you to be so aggressive-"

"Xiongzhang, please," Lan Wangji begged. "I won't — that's not-"

"We will remove the curse mark first," Lan Wangji explained, observing the revealed leg. Fuzzy black marks like a painting made of ash covered creamy white skin, standing out starkly. This effect was increased by the pair of powerful hands wrapped around the leg as Lan Wangji to inspect it closely.

"I would never do that," Lan Wangji spoke calmly, shaking his head. Not a single person believed him.

(Especially not after seeing how effective Hanguang-jun's ~~flirtatious~~ interactions with Wei Wuxian had been.)

Lan Wangji pushed the pants up further.

"I'll do it myself!" Wei Wuxian rushed to say, quickly pushing away Lan Wangji's hands.

'It's finally over,' Lan Wangji breathed out in relief.

'Lan Zhan's already knelt before me so many times in these past few days; I really can't take it anymore,' Wei Wuxian thought. He quickly finished rolling up his pants, only to see that the curse had already wound itself up the entire lower half of his leg. Frowning, he rolled his pants up more and more, revealing inch by inch of ivory skin.

Lan Wangji instantly spun around, feeling like steam was leaving his ears (and noticed, to his great relief, that his other self had done the same). They, along with most of the other watchers, were awkwardly looking away at the shameless display of skinship.

(But, to Jin Zixuan's growing horror, Jin Guangshan was not among them.)

"Lan Zhan?" Wei Wuxian asked, seeing the way Hanguang-jun had turned around. Hearing that, Lan Wangji turned back to face him again, keeping his eyes awkwardly directed to the side of Wei Wuxian, rather than at him.

An urge to tease suddenly overcame Wei Wuxian.

A foreboding shudder ran up Lan Wangji's spine.

Luckily (or unfortunately, in Nie Huaisang's opinion), before anything could be said, there was a loud slam and a shuddering from the desk. Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji turned toward the source of the noise, and found a Qiankun Pouch in a pile of white shards of porcelain — the tea pot and tea cups had shattered against the ground. The bag excitedly bounced up and down, paying no mind to the puddle of tea rapidly spreading around it.

It almost looked as though the contents were eager to come out.

And, as important as the investigation was-

"It ruined their moment!" Nie Huaisang shouted indignantly. Right then and there, he decided he didn't care what sort of unfortunate history the corpse had gone through; Nie Huaisang would never forgive it for ruining that scene.

Reaching down, Wei Wuxian felt around for the bamboo flute he'd been keeping by his waist, only to come up empty handed. He looked back, and found the desired flute in Lan Wangji's hands.

With precise movements, Lan Wangji began carving into the flute, refining its coarser edges and smoothing out the holes. A moment later, he handed it back to Wei Wuxian.

"Play it properly," he ordered.

Wei Wuxian burst out laughing.

"Thank the Heavens," Lan Qiren mumbled, certain that his ears would have started bleeding if he'd been forced to hear Wei Wuxian intentionally playing horribly even one more time.

When Wei Wuxian finally managed to catch his breath, he thought, 'Poor Lan Zhan. Tolerating it must have been so difficult for him these past few days!'

With a smile still on his face, he reached forward and took the flute. The two began to play together — skill incomparable to the tragedy of their earlier attempts — and yet, only a few seconds into it, the Qiankun Pouch suddenly bulged and straightened up.

Wei Wuxian raised an eyebrow, "Has it gotten too used to the bad playing? I'm playing properly for once, and yet it looks like it disapproves."

"Just focus, Wei Wuxian!" Jiang Cheng scolded.

The arm swayed left and right, gaining a sense of balance. It paused, aligning itself perpendicular to the floor. For a moment, everything was still.

Then, it pounced.

Lan Wangji snapped out of his seat like a slingshot, and watched with visible relief as the simulated Hanguang-jun launched an attack at the arm, keeping it pinned with a fiercer melody from his guqin. He looked over at his shameless older self, and wondered how it was possible to simultaneously be so proud with and horrified by the person he had grown to be.

Seeing that the arm had been subdued to the point of stillness again, Lan Wangji resumed playing a duet of Rest with Wei Wuxian. Now that the Yiling Patriarch was no longer intentionally messing up his playing, it was easy to see why the two of them had both become known for their skill.

Smirking, Nie Huaisang scooted closer to Lan Wangji and whispered, "Say, Wangji-xiong, the real Wei-xiong knows how to play the flute, right? He's already a master of the six arts. Maybe you can do a duet together during your first date!"

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue scolded.

As Lan Wangji's ears flushed bright pink, Jin Zixuan glanced to the side. His fiance was watching the performance with interest, smiling warmly at the comment Nie Huaisang had made.

Perhaps, if the others were up to it (and, given Wei Wuxian's love of his shijie, Jin Zixuan knew he would be), Zixuan and Jiang Yanli could have their first real date at the same time as Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian did. At the ice cream parlor in Caiyi town, perhaps.

('Deal with your father first,' a traitorous voice in his head whispered. 'The rest can come after.')

Finally, after nearly ten minutes of continuous playing, the arm settled down again and the pouch returned to its original size. An intrigued smile crossed Wei Wuxian's face as he hooked his flute back onto his hip.

"It hasn't acted like that for days. Do you think it was provoked by something?"

"It was something on you," Lan Wangji theorized.

Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow, his eyes darting down to the leg bearing the castle's curse mark. His curiosity had already been piqued by the simulation's frequent focus on the arm investigation, but now, with this….

Whoever's body that was had quite the complicated past, didn't they?

Also understanding Lan Wangji's words, Wei Wuxian had similarly looked down at the curse mark growing across his leg. He had gotten it from Jin Ling, who had gotten it from something at the castle.

"Do you mean that another part of the body might be within the Nie Sect's Saber Hall?"

"Why do we have something so scary?!" Nie Huaisang whined, mentally cursing whoever had put that terrifying body in his sect's Saber Hall.

The next voice that appeared was Lan Jingyi's, as he explained, "The next morning, Hanguang-jun and Senior Wei departed for the Saber Hall again."

The world shifted and molded itself accordingly, proving the accuracy of the narration yet again. However, this time, neither Wei Wuxian nor Lan Wangji appeared to be in a rush.

“To investigate the hall as thoroughly as possible, Hanguang-jun had requested the assistance of the Nie Sect,” Lan Jingyi explained, a dreamy quality of thick admiration soaked into his every word. “Unfortunately, the possible danger meant they wanted to wait until it was brighter before doing anything. In addition, it would most likely take a bit of time for Sect Leader Nie to arrive, so the pair needed to wait for a while.”

A cheerful bounce in his step, Wei Wuxian began zig zagging back and forth from the stalls on the left to the stalls on the right. At every stop, he made a friendly (or flirtatious) comment, instantly winning the hearts of everyone he interacted with.

Wen Chao shuddered, struggling to understand how this could be the Yiling Patriarch.

A moment later, Wei Wuxian felt a nearby trace of resentful energy flaring up, as if its source was panicked. Curious, he looked to the left, then the right, then smirked.

A pitifully weak corpse, hiding behind a wall, flinched at the look.

The words [The Yiling Patriarch] appeared above Wei Wuxian, helpfully added in by the spirits.

The watchers, like all resentful beings, could feel the unquestioned control Wei Wuxian had over the energy in the vicinity. They understood those words all-too-well.

‘Pitiful corpse,’ Wen Chao thought miserably, showing sympathy for the first time in his life.

The corpse shook and shook and shook, and then, copying the corpses who were the Nie Sect’s second ‘line of defense’ stumbled away at full speed. Wei Wuxian laughed at the sight.

“Oh. Awesome, Hanguang-jun! You scared the walking corpse away with just your presence!” he praised, applauding freely. Despite the blatantly false statement, Lan Wangji enjoyed the reference to Wei Wuxian’s earlier (terrible) attempts at hiding his identity enough to not object. A cluster of sparkles appeared around him as a visual depiction of Wei Wuxian’s imagination. It made him shine like a heavenly light that could purify evil instantly, as though the spirits thought the watchers needed help to appreciate Hanguang-jun’s beauty.

Nie Huaisang had never been more offended in his life. He would show them what true beauty was! If he just had his paints, he’d be able to depict Hanguang-jun as far more ethereal than their measly sparkles could manage!

At that moment, however, a blinding light began to radiate from a far corner, sending the earlier corpse tumbling away.

The watchers and Wei Wuxian winced and closed their eyes.

“Woah. So dazzling!” Wei Wuxian commented, trying to peek through his tightly shut eyes. “What’s that light?”

At that moment, it faded just enough for the watchers (and Wei Wuxian) to see the source for themselves. It was a beautifully constructed portrait of Hanguang-jun, the guqin Wangji balancing evenly in his arm.

"Oh. 'Light-bearing Lord.' I get it now."

"Hanguang-jun?" Wei Wuxian read aloud, observing the script just below the poster. "Wow. You've truly been honored for all the times you've defeated demons and ghosts! It's just a picture, but it's still so dazzling."

As Madam Yu raised a reluctantly impressed eyebrow, Jiang Cheng reflexively shrank away, feeling an unspoken judgement. Seeing that, Jiang Yanli instantly moved closer, her kind eyes prepared to offer her brother comfort.

(Their family might be better now, but they were still far from perfect.)

By now, the poster of Hanguang-jun had finally stopped blinding them with its light, allowing Wei Wuxian and the watchers to actually see again. Slowly, Wei Wuxian's eyes drifted to the side, where a far more grotesque poster was pinned to the other door. He observed it for a moment, then sighed.

"Meanwhile, this one is so ferocious. How could it be on the same door as you?!"

Lan Xichen discretely sent his brother a nod, loving the way Wei Wuxian constantly valued the simulated Lan Wangji over all others.

But he had a point. This picture had bulging eyes, sharp teeth, hairy limbs, wild locks, a pig-like nose, and a depiction of the cheapest robes imaginable.

"Whose portrait is this anyways?" Wei Wuxian wondered, glancing down at the characters below. "Eh? Yiling Laozu?!"

"Huh?"

"But… but that one looks nothing like the one the charlatan had!" Madam Jin gasped. "The proportions are completely different, and the face — I…."

"...Both seem equally far from the actual appearance of the Yiling Patriarch," Lan Xichen offered. "I suppose the common folk really just… know nothing about Wei Wuxian."

Lan Qiren humphed, "Different people all telling fantastical, ridiculous stories? Someone has done a very poor job of maintaining accurate historical records."

'That,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'Or someone's intentionally manipulated the records.'

He tilted his head, observing the speechless Patriarch closely.

Wei Wuxian was forced to take a step back, "Wha — that — I was known as an attractive and handsome man! I ranked fourth among the young masters! What is this?!"

Jiang Cheng groaned, "Don't just say that!"

Abruptly realizing he had just admitted his identity to any passerby who happened to be close enough to hear, he quickly amended, "Er, no, let me explain. I… I just think this isn't fair to our Patriarch!"

"Well, that settles it," Nie Mingjue muttered to Lan Xichen. "If we're ever worried about Wei Wuxian hiding somewhere, we just need to spread around ugly posters of him to make him reveal himself."

Lan Xichen grinned and nodded in agreement.

Crocodile tears poured from Wei Wuxian's wide eyes, but the simulated Lan Wangji's were glued to the Patriarch's poster.

"Lan Zhan?" Wei Wuxian asked, frowning and reaching forward to wave a hand in front of Lan Wangji's face. "Hanguang-jun? Hey, what's wrong with you?"

But Lan Wangji remained enamoured by whatever redeeming qualities he saw in the painting.

"Is it because of the wicked energy?!"

"A-Xian, it'll take more than that to corrupt Hanguang-jun," Jiang Fengmian laughed.

And yet, the horrifying portrait remained reflected in Lan Wangji's unblinking eyes.

"Some time later, and the Nies were still not ready to help out-"

"Jin Ling, be polite," Lan Sizhui scolded.

"What? I'm right!"

Wen Chao smirked at Nie Huaisang, only to pale slightly when Nie Mingjue directed a truly heart-stopping glare his way.

Using the fastest walking speed he could get while being just short of running, Lan Wangji darted through the town. Watching him from within one of the nearby shops, Wei Wuxian frowned.

'Lan Zhan's acting really weird,' he thought, then smirked. 'Why don't I go see what this 'wicked energy' is up to.'

Back at the door guards, Lan Wangji was hard at work. He stood in front of the Yiling Patriarch one, covering up the watcher's view of it as he toiled away. Spying from behind a nearby tree, Wei Wuxian quickly recognized the location.

'Huh? Weren't we just there?' he thought, then jerked back as realization struck him. 'Wait, is he — even though the picture's ugly, that's the place for the Yiling Patriarch!'

“Next to you?” Lan Xichen suggested, enjoying the way his brother seemed to melt into an embarrassed puddle at the words.

‘I have to stop him!’ Wei Wuxian thought.

Without a second of hesitation, he jumped forward.

“Lan Zhaaaaaaaaaaan!” he shouted. “Stop-”

Right at that moment, Lan Wangji turned to face him and moved just close enough to mess up Wei Wuxian’s intended landing area. They collided.

A cloud of dust exploded into the air.

“Wei Ying?” Lan Wangji asked. On the side, Jiang Cheng gave what seemed like his millionth eye roll of the past hour.

Having bumped his head in the crash, Wei Wuxian spun around for a few times, seeing stars. As soon as he had recovered, he looked up to see what Lan Wangji had replaced his portrait with.

“...Oh.”

It was an expertly crafted painting of the Yiling Patriarch, showing every inch of the attractive face Wei Wuxian had been so proud of.

“Oh my God!” Nie Huaiasng squealed. “That’s so cute!”

“Wangji, you shouldn’t change the seals over someone else’s house without permission,” Lan Qiren mumbled, more for the sake of putting up some form of protest than anything else. In response, Lan Wangji just nodded once and bowed in apology, clearly completely unrepentant.

Finally able to stand up again, Wei Wuxian approached the painting and gasped out, “This is….”

After a few moments, Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, finishing, “An attractive man.”

Wei Wuxian’s face was glowing in blush.

And Lan Wangji’s was too.

“E-eh,” Wei Wuxian could barely speak. “H-hanguang-jun… good job.”

“Mn.”

“How do you do it?” Jiang Cheng shook his head disbelievingly. “No one can ever get that idiot to hesitate or blush, and yet your older self does it time and time again!”

The pink spreading across Lan Wangji's ears seemed to blanket him in an aura of warmth. Even just watching the interactions unfold had filled him with a level of emotion he hadn't experienced since his mother's death.

Was this something he'd be able to do once he was with Wei Ying?

But Hanguang-jun had been so shameless-

But it had worked, hadn't it?

Jin Ling sighed, "At long last, Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun were finally able to return to Xinglu Ridge."

The simulation shifted to present itself accordingly. As Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji stepped forward, Nie Huaisang (who had apparently misunderstood their message) had just finished refilling the wall up with new corpses. He gazed upon the tightly stacked bricks with a warm satisfaction.

'My poor, poor other self,' Nie Huaisang thought miserably.

However, as he turned around, his legs almost gave out; with a shaky smile, he said, "Hanguang-jun, and… you."

"Sect Leader Nie!" Wei Wuxian cheerfully called back, waving enthusiastically. "You're building walls?"

If Lan Xichen wasn't mistaken, his brother had just fallen in love with Wei Wuxian's smile (for what, by his count, was the twenty-third time).

Huffing slightly, Sect Leader Nie nodded and pulled out a handkerchief, wiping his forehead so many times he almost took off a layer of his own skin. His eyes began nervously drifting back and forth between the pair (unsure of who he needed to watch out for the most).

'Wei Wuxian!' Wen Chao thought confidently. 'Keep your eye on that one. You can't risk looking away for even a moment.'

Then, he remembered the unbridled fury that formed on Lan Wangji's face when Wei Wuxian had been thrown into the Burial Mounds, and decided that maybe keeping an eye on Hanguang-jun as well wasn't a terrible idea.

"My apologies," Wei Wuxian began, his voice loaded with empathy and a dash of timidness. "I'm really sorry for the inconvenience, but you might need to rebuild the wall again in a little bit."

"Yes, ye — What?!" Nie Huaisang did a double-take. "What-"

Before he could finish his question, Bichen flashed out and broke down the newly repaired wall.

“Wangji-xioooooooooong,” Nie Huaisang whined. “Why is every version of you so mean to me?”

“People will die if the corpse isn’t dealt with.”

“Oh, yeah? And what was your excuse for when we were children?! Were people going to die then too?”

“You mean all those times he punished you for breaking the rules?” Nie Mingjue interjected. “Which you did do?”

“Precisely!”

Wei Wuxian immediately got to work, deconstructing the wall and removing the bricks at a speed that greatly eclipsed the rate at which Nie Huaisang’s crew had put them back together not too long ago. The handful of Nie cultivators who had joined their Sect Leader awkwardly shifted from side to side — unhappy, but not stupid enough to oppose Hanguang-jun either.

As he watched, Nie Huaisang trembled and gaped, gripping his fan tightly. Lan Wangji was trying to explain the situation to him, but the words seemed to be going in one ear and out the other. His shakes soon made it clear that he was on the verge of tears, but Nie Huaisang could do nothing but watch as all his hard work was destroyed.

Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng both awkwardly gave Nie Huaisang sympathetic looks, finding the absolute devastation on his virtual self’s face to be more than a little worrying.

“Are you alright?” Jiang Yanli asked him, seeing the way the real one had started trembling as well.

“I don’ wanna become sect leader,” the boy miserably replied. Nie Mingjue flinched at those words, and found any reassurance he’d been about to offer die in his throat, making him swallow heavily. Similarly, Jiang Cheng, whose greatest goal had always been to become sect leader, didn’t know what to say.

Jin Zixuan was too awkward to even try.

“What?! Nonsense! That’s utter nonsense!” Nie Huaisang suddenly declared, making the heirs flinch at the sudden change in volume. “My Saber Hall only uses complete corpses — ones with all limbs attached. It’s impossible for there to be some ‘armless male corpse.’ If you don’t believe me, I’ll help you take apart the wall and prove it! But we need to put them back as soon as possible. After all, this is the Nie Sect’s ancestral burial grounds.”

“Who wants to bet that they’ll find it?” Wen Qing asked, making Nie Mingjue give a tired half-laugh in response.

The Nie Sect disciples who had been waiting on the side then got to work, joining Wei Wuxian in deconstructing the wall. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian backed off a few steps and watched them work.

“About an hour later,” Lan Sizhui explained.

By now, the wall Jin Ling had been buried in was mostly taken care of. Some disciples had put on face masks, while others were regularly swallowing red pills that would keep their yang energy from disturbing the corpses. In the black dirt, ashen hands and rotted limbs poked out, tangled up in the masses of greasy, grimy black hair that was littered everywhere.

Although they were too proud to turn away, Madam Yu and Madam Jin gave identical looks of disgust at the scene before them.

To the side, each and every male corpse that had been found was being cleaned up and laid side by side on the ground. Some were rotting, others were fresh; nonetheless, it was clear at a glance that each and every one of them had their arms.

As much as he wanted to feel reassured by that, Nie Mingjue knew this wouldn’t be shown unless the spirits had seen something interesting in the mess.

“Taking apart this one wall is enough, right?” Nie Huaisang asked, leaning away from Lan Wangji warily. “D-do any more need to be taken down? Probably not, right?”

‘See Da-ge, look at how terrible at this I am,’ Nie Huaisang thought. ‘You can’t leave the Nie Sect to me! Y-you have to make me an uncle. And a grand-uncle! You always said I needed to follow Lan Qiren’s teachings right? So you need to live long enough to make me those things.’

Wei Wuxian squatted down by the rows of corpses, observing them intently and thinking, ‘Given the darkness of the curse mark on Jin Ling, it’s obvious that it has to have been from one of the corpses here.’

At the reminder of the danger her grandson had been in, Madam Jin sent a fierce glare toward the corpses on the ground.

After thinking for a moment longer, Wei Wuxian glanced back at Lan Wangji and asked, “Should we get the Qiankun pouch?”

“Be careful, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian muttered. If two limbs were brought close to each other, there was a chance that they would agitate each other and trigger a dangerous situation. With all the resentful energy gathered around the saber hall, the consequences could be multiplied.

‘And where was that concern for him when Lotus Pier was burning?’ a voice in his head asked. ‘Where was that concern when you volunteered him to the Nie Sect? You only realized what you’d done after Lan Wangji spoke up.’

Taking a deep breath, Jiang Fengmian tried and failed to shake away the feeling that, if he was still alive, Wei Changze would be indescribably disappointed in him.

'It's too dangerous to use the arm,' Wei Wuxian eventually decided. 'But what else can we do? We weren't able to find the missing arm on any of the people here. Maybe the arm doesn't belong to a man? No, that's impossible. I was able to tell at first sight that it was a man's arm. Does the owner have three arms?'

"No, you idiot!" Jiang Cheng shouted, a bright flush crossing his face at the fact that these thoughts were being broadcasted to all the sects.

"The legs," Lan Wangji realized, cutting off Wei Wuxian, who had been about to laugh at his own thought. In a flash, the spirits brought forth a memory; no matter how much time had passed, the curse mark never went higher than the legs.

"Good work, Wangji," Lan Qiren nodded, prouder than he was technically supposed to be.

"I see," Wei Wuxian lit up. "The pants! Take off the pants!"

"Wha-"

"What are you saying in front of Hanguang-jun?!" Nie Huaisang gasped out, shocked beyond belief.

However, not showing an ounce of shame, Wei Wuxian shrugged and said, "We're all men; it's not that shameful. Help me take off the corpse's pants. Only the male corpses! This has nothing to do with the female ones."

"Well, this is certainly not going to help Mo Xuanyu's reputation," Madam Jin muttered, still annoyed at the scandal that constantly followed the Jin Sect.

(And still wondering whether she had followed Yu Ziyuan in being personally responsible for much of that scandal.)

"Here, let me," Wei Wuxian decided, reaching forward to take off the belt of one of the corpses. The paleness that suddenly washed over Nie Huaisang's skin made him look like one of the corpses, and he could only watch helplessly as disaster approached-

"I'll do it," Lan Wangji decided, stepping forward.

"What?!" Lan Qiren hacked.

"You'll do it?" Wei Wuxian repeated. "You're going to do something like that?"

The corners of Hanguang-jun's brows twitched slightly, making the usually-unreadable man appear as if he was holding himself back. He took a deep, silent breath.

"Do not move. I will do it," he repeated. Nie Huaisang nearly fainted.

A snicker broke through the silence.

"Aw, I see," the real Nie Huaisang grinned. "I understand; I get it. Corpses or not, Wei-xiong taking off another man's pants must be-"

“Nie Huaisang!” Jiang Cheng shouted, standing up. “You — that-”

Before Jiang Cheng could put together words that would properly describe his feelings, Bichen flashed forward and sliced through the clothing on the corpses’ legs.

‘Thank the Heavens,’ Lan Qiren thought. He hadn’t actually expected his nephew to lower himself to taking off the corpses pants with his hands, but Hanguang-jun had surprised him so many times throughout the simulation that he couldn’t be sure.

A light chuckle escaped Lan Xichen when he realized that Lan Qiren’s blatant relief was matched by Wangji’s own.

“I found it,” the simulated Lan Wangji reported, gazing down at a corpse by his feet. Everyone else allowed their eyes to fall down there as well, enabling them to see a corpse with two light, circular marks on its thighs. Upon closer inspection, it became clear that there was a faint difference in the skin tones above and below the marks.

The legs had been sewn on.

“What the-” Nie Mingjue gaped openly, unable to believe his eyes. “How… who would have even been able to sneak in here? Was it put here by one of the ancestors?”

“Maybe they were already on when you bought the corpse,” Madam Yu suggested. Nie Mingjue could only shake his head in response, looking only a little less shocked than the two Nie Huaisangs did.

Narrowing his eyes, Wen Ruohan gave the simulated Nie Huaisang a long, intense look. No matter how much the boy hated cultivation, it had become clear that he was far from unobservant. The surprised face the new Sect Leader was putting on was quite convincing, but, given how exaggerated the stories of the boy’s incompetence had become, Wen Ruohan was wary.

Did Nie Huaisang really not know anything?

“Who chooses the corpses the Nie Sect uses in its Saber Hall?” Wei Wuxian asked to the speechless Nie Huaisang.

His eyes glazing in shock, Huaisang replied, “Usually, the past Sect Leaders would choose and store them throughout their lifetimes. My brother passed away pretty early, so he didn’t have enough. I had to chose some for him.”

A stab of shock cut into the real Nie Huaisang at those words. His other self had just talked about his brother’s death like it was nothing. Or, rather, like it wasn’t a surprise. And why would it be? It had happened years ago. The real Nie Huaisang had just found out about it, but this one had long-since accepted that fact.

His other-self had learned about Nie Mingjue’s death, mourned, and then moved on.

Somehow.

Ignorant to the thoughts running through his younger-self's mind, the simulated Nie Huaisang concluded with his usual "I don't know anything else, sorry. There are just… too many people who could be responsible."

Not bothering to contest that point, Wei Wuxian moved to put the now-separated legs into a new Qiankun pouch, laughing, "Looks like this corpse was cut to pieces. And, not only that, the parts were scattered all over the place — one piece here, one piece there! I hope the pieces aren't too tiny. Just how much did his murderer hate him?"

As the Nie brothers, Jiang siblings, and Jin Zixuan paled at the description, Lan Wangji was forced to look away. Wei Wuxian's voice had been open and joking, genuinely amused by the situation. And yet-

'I heard, since he cultivated the dark path, his powers backfired on him and he was ripped into a fine powder by his own ghost soldiers.'

'What's there to be scared of? It's not like the Yiling Patriarch's here! His owner's already been torn to pieces.'

And even if that hadn't happened — which it surely, terrifyingly had — what about the Burial Mounds? When Wei Wuxian was thrown in, the corpses had fought to tear him apart with the viciousness of starving wolves.

And yet, Wei Wuxian had shown no reaction to his own words other than amusement. Was he really not bothered by that?

(No. No matter how strong someone was, that would be impossible.)

'Take care of him,' Lan Wangji reminded himself. 'Keep him happy. And safe. Don't let him face these things alone.'

"S-say," Nie Huaisang mumbled, adamantly refusing to make eye contact with either of his companions. "That's it, right? There… aren't any more weird pieced-together corpses here that I don't know about, right? That's it? W-we can put everything back together now?"

Although he refused to look at them, the pleading in his eyes was clear for all to see.

"You can," Lan Wangji confirmed. "We now-"

He cut off and looked back right as a dozen figures dropped from the trees.

Nie Huaisang screamed and Wen Chao shrieked as one of the figures landed directly on him (unfortunately phasing through).

Upon realizing Hanguang-jun had discovered them, the men had dropped down, getting in better positions for the approaching confrontation. Each and every one of them had covered their faces with a black mist generated by talismans, disguising their identities. In their hands were cultivation swords, instantly revealing their power.

Whimpering, Nie Huaisang took a nervous step back.

"Why are they here?" Madam Yu demanded. "Who sent them?"

"Did they know Wei Wuxian would be here?"

"Well, it's not as though the sects have been doing a very good job keeping Hanguang-jun's investigation a secret," Wen Ruohan pointed out with a smirk. "Especially not when Lan-gongzi was so willing to reveal it to others."

"To the new Chief Cultivator, you mean?" Lan Xichen asked, narrowing his eyes.

"To a person we know nothing about, and have no way of knowing the reliability of."

Both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue stood up in protest, but, knowing next to nothing about Jin Guangyao, had no response.

"Lan Zhan, go to the castle and make sure they don't tamper with any evidence," Wei Wuxian ordered. "I'll take care of them."

Without hesitation, Lan Wangji nodded with a quick, short, "Be careful."

He spun around and shot toward the door, completely trusting Wei Wuxian to watch his back. A moment later, his confidence in the Yiling Patriarch was proven reliable; ominous black smoke rose from Wei Wuxian's feet.

And screams of resentment filled the air, making some of the watchers wobble where they stood.

The unknown cultivators attacked, rushing after Lan Wangji, but were cut off as — a second after Hanguang-jun passed through the door — black spikes shot up and blocked the entrance.

As the darkness sparked and fizzled with power, Wen Chao felt his soul leave his body.

(He would never forget the way spikes identical to those ones had impaled his other self's body time and time again.)

"This flute isn't the easiest to use," a chillingly calm voice explained. "But it's more than enough to deal with you."

Wei Wuxian spun the flute once in his hand, giving a cheeky, fearless smile all the while.

Every time Lan Qiren had seen his student like that, he had known something awful was about to happen. It had appeared before Wei Wuxian's initial theory on resentful energy, and before Wei Wuxian tricked Wangji into reading porn. And yet now Lan Qiren couldn't help but smile at the sight of it.

"Kill him!"

The cultivators lunged forward, only to get blasted back by a tsunami of resentful energy.

"Aah!" Nie Huaisang shouted, getting thrown back as well.

Even without using his flute, Wei Wuxian had been able to deal with a dozen well-trained cultivators in a matter of moments. Unlike normal cultivation, the strength of a person's demonic cultivation apparently didn't decrease when the soul was brought into a new body.

(Which was especially important, Wen Qing thought, if she was right about what had happened to Wei Wuxian's core.)

"Woah," Nie Huaisang gasped out from his hiding place behind a tree. "Mo-gongzi, you really hid your power well-"

"Huaisang! Look out!" Nie Mingjue shouted.

But it was impossible for watchers to affect the simulation, so it was impossible for the simulated Huaisang to hear Nie Mingjue's warning. He was ignorant to the trio of swords that had been fired his way. When he did turn around, it was a second too late.

He leapt away, but tripped on a rock right as the swords began their decent and then-

A bright, sky-blue light slammed into the blades, knocking them off track. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian relaxed from the offensive position he had just been in, allowing the resentful energy he had gathered by Huaisang to ease.

"Xichen," Nie Mingjue gasped out, relief flooding his body.

(This was the furthest future they had seen yet. They no longer had any guarantee that the people involved would survive.)

"Er-ge. San-ge," Nie Huaisang gasped out in surprise.

"Huaisang, what happened?" the Jin asked.

"Jin Guangyao?" Jin Zixuan realized, not having expected the man to appear again so soon. It made sense, he supposed. They were Nie Huaisang's sworn brothers, and it had been over a day since Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had arrived, but it was still shocking.

"Well, this time… I really don't know anything!" Nie Huaisang cried out as Jin Guangyao stepped forward — through Jin Zixuan — to reach his sworn brother's brother. He reached down to help Nie Huaisang stand up.

Nie Mingjue relaxed slightly.

As he straightened again, Jin Guangyao laid eyes on Wei Wuxian. They widened in a mix of surprise and confusion, the recognition clear upon first glance.

'Right, Mo Xuanyu is our half brother too,' Jin Zixuan thought. 'And I… and he… Mo Xuanyu was invited into the Jin Sect. He was allowed to be part of it, even when Jin Guangyao was sect leather… at least until Mo Xuanyu started harassing people. The courtesy Jin Guangyao showed Mo Xuanyu… would I have been able to offer the same?'

There was a clang of swords in the distance, and Wei Wuxian snapped to attention at once.

"Lan Zhan," he whispered, before turning away from the Sect Leaders and running in the direction of the noise. A few of the remaining assassins picked themselves off the ground and prepared for combat, but a simple mid-run hand motion from Wei Wuxian was all it took to knock them to the ground once more.

Jin Guangyao narrowed his eyes at the scene.

'Clever enough to identify a threat, at the very least,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'He killed Wen Ruohan, didn't he? The other Clans might expect me to take the boy in just for that once this is all over. My word, how annoying.'

The watchers were pulled along with Wei Wuxian as he ran toward the sounds of fighting, darting beside and over tree branches through the dense forest. In the distance, flashes of white and blue signified the ongoing battle.

Even with just a mere glance, Wei Wuxian was able to analyze the fight: 'This guy isn't as good as Lan Zhan is, but he… seems familiar with the swordplay of the Lan Clan.'

And indeed, the unknown sword dancing through the air with Wangji's Bichen remained unsurprised by Lan Wangji's techniques, even as it continued to be pushed back. However, a moment later, Hanguang-jun abandoned the aerial battle of their swords and flashed forward, delivering a powerful strike to his opponent's chest that sent the other flying.

"Nice!" Jin Zixuan praised.

"Go Wangji-xiong!"

Wen Qing nodded in agreement.

Panting heavily, the unknown assailant covered his side, his disguised sword broken on the ground. Hoping to cut off their escape route, Wei Wuxian circled around behind them so that he and Lan Wangji kept the assassins directly between them.

"Get in formation," one of the men ordered. The group levitated their blades in the air, preparing to strike at Lan Wangji. In return, Hanguang-jun exchanged his sword for his guqin, and used a single powerful note to blast them back.

Knocked onto the ground yet again, an extremely grumpy Nie Huaisang could only mutter, "Nothing about those two makes any sense. First they defeat the Xuanwu at seventeen, and now… how is this a fair fight?!"

"We want them to win," Jiang Cheng pointed out.

"Still! You agree with me!"

Jiang Cheng did, but he certainly wasn't going to admit that.

However, as the leader forced himself to get off the ground, Wei Wuxian noticed something that forced him to do a double take. All along the man's chest, bloated splotches and bumps had appeared.

In an instant, Wen Qing was by the man's side, examining him as a scientist would a lab rat.

Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes, "Traces of… the Hundred Holes Curse?"

"Pardon?" Jiang Yanli asked, unfamiliar with lesser-known cultivation terminology.

"It's a curse whose end result is death," Wen Qing explained, analyzing closely. "Though this… rather than the effect, I think it might be the backlash? I'm not sure why that would resonate so strongly with Wei Wuxian, though."

Several people turned to each other and made questioning eye contact, but no one had an answer to give.

A howl of wind broke the watchers out of their thoughts a moment later, as their attention was instead drawn to an approaching mass of darkness.

Someone had released a cursed spirit.

As powerful as it was, it was nothing compared to Hanguang-jun. However, a moment after the guqin, 'Wangji,' banished the curse from sight, the leader of the assailants got to his feet and fled. Wei Wuxian turned to follow-

"Ah!" he gasped out, collapsing to his knees.

"Wei Ying!"

"Wei Wuxian!"

Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng were the first to appear by Wei Wuxian's side, but a congregation of other watchers followed shortly after, concern apparent on all of their faces.

Wen Ruohan wanted to sigh at the futility of it all — especially given the fact that they knew there was nothing they could do — and looked down at his own foot in annoyance.

(He had known there was no point to any of it, so why had he stepped forward as if to catch the boy when Wei Wuxian fell down?)

The two Qiankun bags resting in his sleeve glowed brightly, proving that they were the cause of the curse acting up again after so much time.

In the chaos of the situation, the surviving perpetrators raised their blades to their unconscious comrades and themselves, fearlessly committing suicide and taking their secrets to their graves.

Nie Mingjue cursed.

Hanguang-jun had moved to Wei Wuxian's side and knelt down next to where his real counterpart was. The two Lan Wangji's sent Wei Wuxian equally concerned looks, which he easily waved off with a smile. The three sect leaders moved around, confirming once and for all that their attackers truly were dead.

Unfortunately, not a single one stirred.

Several minutes later, Wei Wuxian had managed to stand up again, having passed the Qiankun pouches over to Lan Wangji. Clouds had spread across the sky, making it darker than before. In this dimness, Sect Leader Lan approached Wei Wuxian, a warm smile on his face.

"Mo-gongzi, please, take this pill. It won't remove the curse mark, but it should help dampen some of the effects," he offered, having seen the mark when Lan Wangji rolled up Wei Wuxian's pants for inspection.

"Thank you, Sect Leader Lan," Wei Wuxian said, bowing respectfully.

Meanwhile, standing by the newly-repaired Saber Hall, Nie Huaisang sighed deeply. The stress of the day had clearly gotten to him, and his exhaustion was clear for all to see.

Seeing the tension in his brother's body, Nie Mingjue felt another brief cut of guilt slice through him.

However, even without a simulated Nie Mingjue around, Nie Huaisang still had help:

"Don't worry, Huaisang," Jin Guangyao said, placing a hand on Sect Leader Nie's shoulder. "Er-ge and I will help you take care of this. That's why we came over in the first place; we heard that Hanguang-jun was taking care of something that had called your attention."

"Ah, thank you, San-ge."

"How did he know that?" Lan Qiren asked, frowning deeply.

"Hm. The watchtowers, perhaps?" Wen Ruohan suggested, wondering as to their applications. "Or perhaps the sects are simply close enough to have knowledge of each other."

"Hm," Jiang Fengmian acknowledged. "Regardless, the help is clearly appreciated."

‘Thanks… A-Yao,’ Nie Mingjue thought, smiling as he watched.

“Wangji, what do you plan to do?” Lan Xichen asked.

“To find the arm’s owner, and determine who split his soul and body,” Lan Wangji answered succinctly.

“I see,” Lan Xichen nodded once. “These men were well trained and vicious. They may be trouble if we fail to determine who they are.”

“Hanguang-jun,” Jin Guangyao stepped forward. “The mastermind behind them may be powerful. Please, allow me to send some men to help you.”

“And interrupt Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong’s date?!” Nie Huaisang screeched, looking faint at the thought.

“Thank you, Clan Leader Jin,” Lan Wangji nodded. “But I don’t need them for now.”

Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened, and he spun to face Lan Wangji, surprised by the rejection.

At that, the pro-WangXian community did internal or external dances of joy (depending on how much dignity they were trying to preserve).

“Alright,” Jin Guangyao allowed, before turning to face Wei Wuxian. “Xuanyu. I hear you’re practicing demonic cultivation. It may not be accepted by the masses, but, so long as you have a good heart, I have no objections.”

Jiang Yanli beamed at the man (her to-be brother-in-law), and Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue both felt themselves giving him several additional points for that statement. It had taken the watchers discovering what had caused Wei Wuxian to invent it for them to accept it. Although Jin Guangyao had lived in a society where demonic cultivation was much more common, they couldn’t help but respect his words.

(On the other hand, Nie Huaisang couldn’t quite shake the feeling that Jin Guangyao was expecting ‘Mo Xuanyu’ to understand a hidden meaning in the statement that was different from the words actually being spoken. He had no proof, but Meng Yao seemed to find Mo Xuanyu’s reactions to be interesting. Perhaps it garnered further investigation.)

“Follow Hanguang-jun and learn from him, alright, Xuanyu?” Jin Guangyao finished.

‘It sounds like he and Mo Xuanyu knew each other,’ Wei Wuxian observed. ‘Less talk means fewer mistakes.’

'And less second-hand embarrassment for us,' Jiang Cheng thought.

“Yes,” Wei Wuxian responded, bowing once.

“No time to waste,” Hanguang-jun added. “We should get going.”

Without even a moment of hesitation, Wei Wuxian followed after Lan Wangji, and the two of them vanished into the nearby fog. Nie Huaisang saw them off with a “see you,” despite looking for all the world like he would greatly prefer never running into them again.

Meanwhile, Jin Guangyao narrowed his eyes just slightly as he observed their retreating forms.

‘Maybe he’s nearsighted?’ Jin Zixuan wondered. ‘That’s pretty rare among cultivators, but he started late, so I guess it’s not too much of a surprise.’

The pair walked off, and Ouyang Zizhen’s narration began: “As Senior Wei and Hanguang-jun had expected, the pair of legs were the same skin tone as the arm. If they were put close together, they would react violently, vibrating without rest as though they wanted to join together. Unfortunately, due to missing the torso of the body, the bond holding them together was weak — nowhere near as strong as the bond holding Senior Wei and Hanguang-jun together across death-”

“Wait, what?”

“-And thus, the parts remained separate, unable to attach to each other. Senior Wei and Hanguang-jun had too little information about the corpse; they needed more pieces. As a result, the pair followed the arm to the southwest, not knowing what awaited them.”

Pursing his lips together, Lan Xichen thought over the way Ouyang Zizhen had described Wei Wuxian’s relationship with Wangji. There had been hints of this before, but this was the most obvious case so far; for some reason, the two of them were considered a pair, even to the juniors who didn’t know everything the watchers did.

“If that’s the case…” Lan Xichen brightened, making eye contact with his second-in-command, Madam Jin. “Perhaps, in this foretold future, everything works out between those two.”

“Agreed,” Madam Jin said at once. “It will be quite nice to see how that progresses.”

“A-Niang!” an embarrassed Jin Zixuan squeaked.

“Shush. After watching the catastrophe you made of your relationship with Jiang-guniang, I deserve to be able to watch something as sweet as this!”

As Lan Xichen, Nie Huaisang, and Jiang Yanli laughed at those words, Lan Wangji (unnoticeably) began to shrink in on himself. It would be wonderful if that was the case. No matter how shameless Hanguang-jun apparently was, Wangji could now trust him to make Wei Wuxian happy. However-

‘I haven’t met him yet,’ he recalled, his fists clenching at the thought. ‘What if, by watching this, I change my actions and mess everything up. What if this isn’t a future I’ll be able to have?’

There were many unknowns, but one thing was certain:

‘If that’s what it takes to keep Wei Ying alive, then I’ll gladly watch this to the end.’

As they went, the pair travelled through town at a leisurely pace, once again acting like they had all the time in the world. They were still making significant progress, but the overall atmosphere was less like a nighthunt, and more like a date.

If Lan Wangji wasn’t mistaken, his brother and Nie Huaisang were both pursing their lips together in an effort to avoid squealing at the perceived adorableness of the scene. He supposed he appreciated their attempt, at the very least.

“Have you heard about what happened at Xinglu Ridge?” a man at a tea shop asked his companion.

“Yeah. They say the Lanling Jin Sect and Gusu Lan Sect leaders were spotted heading toward that hill. Do you think ‘the Headshaker’ is asking for help again?”

“Thank you, Er-ge!” Nie Huaisang cried, his eyes watering from how touched he was. Nie Mingjue huffed, but, seeing as how Lan Xichen had happily accepted the thanks, he didn’t bother pointing out that he and Lan Xichen weren’t sworn brothers (yet).

‘Thank you, A-Yao,’ he mentally added.

“So many important people are gathering together. What do you think it was for?”

Wei Wuxian pursed his lips at that, and the memory of the person with the hundred-holes curse appeared in his mind again.

Wen Qing frowned again, wondering what about that was so memorable to Wei Wuxian.

“Honestly, so many important people. What, is the Yiling Patriarch back?”

Hearing that, Wei Wuxian halted in his thoughts to give a bitter laugh, wondering “How does that have anything to do with me?”

‘Even jokingly, he keeps getting brought up and blamed for things no matter how many years pass,’ Wen Ruohan observed. ‘Isolated by the cultivation world as someone both respected and feared, the former for his inventions, and the latter for everything else.’

Out of everyone here, he was probably the one who understood that the best. He wasn’t blind to the way his own lofty ancestry had contributed to his success — leading his image to be one more on the respect side than the fear side until he started attacking the Great Sects — but the similarities were still there. Come to think of it, the Jiangs had never officially adopted Wei Wuxian, had they? Wen Ruohan didn’t want to risk alienating the boy by dragging him away from those he perceived as family, but….

Something to think about, nonetheless.

"Nonsense!" the first man's companion responded. "He died being consumed by his own cursed army. There's no way he can come back from that."

Hearing that, Lan Wangji's eyes silently drifted toward Wei Wuxian, watching his reaction.

(Or worrying lack thereof.)

"Wei Ying."

Snapping out of his thoughts at the mention of his name, Wei Wuxian turned to Hanguang-jun, tilting his head in curiosity. To any outsider, it would truly seem like being reminded of his death didn't affect him at all.

"There's one thing I still don't understand," Lan Wangji began.

"Oh? Something you don't know?" Wei Wuxian asked, leaning closer with an adorable playfulness and light curiosity. "Tell me. I want to hear!"

However, a moment later, Lan Wangji elaborated, "Everyone says that you were consumed by your ghost army."

The watchers flinched back.

And Wei Wuxian faltered, his gaze losing some of its seemingly endless cheer.

Lan Wangji stepped closer, sincerely wishing he could silence his older self.

"Is that what happened?" Hanguang-jun asked.

A gust of wind brushed through the now desolate street, making a windchime ring piercingly through the silence. The cloudy sky that had been so crisp and fresh a short while ago now appeared oppressive and heavy. Pinwheels in a nearby stall spun around and around and around, continuing on endlessly.

There was a bitter half-laugh, and Wei Wuxian allowed the stunned expression on his face to melt into a calmness carrying the slightest trace of grim humor.

"I died," he said. "It doesn't matter… how it happened."

'Doesn't matter?' Wen Ruohan repeated, his own death — a betrayal — flashing before his eyes. 'How could he say that? He remembers feeling every moment of it, and yet….'

For once, the expression on Hanguang-jun's face was clear as day to everyone present.

"Wei Ying-"

"Oh, a rattle drum!" Wei Wuxian excitedly realized, running forward to the stall.

“Wha-”

“Wait, Wei Wuxian!” Wen Qing stood up. “You can’t just-”

But, unable to hear her, Wei Wuxian just began happily playing with the drum, turning it from side to side so that the beads would hit against the body.

“I don’t know why, but I’ve always loved this thing!” Wei Wuxian revealed, completely captivated by the object in his hands.

“What does it take to make him talk about these sorts of things?” Wen Qing asked, staring straight at Jiang Yanli. “I don’t want to force him to remember if he doesn’t need to, but if there’s a way we can help...”

‘Why are you asking A-Li? It’s not like she’s his mother!’ Madam Yu thought, just barely self aware enough to realize how petty that complaint was and stop herself from saying it aloud.

(After all, no one would ever make the mistake of considering her Wei Wuxian’s mother. For years, she had reveled in that. Now, she wasn’t so sure.)

“Ah, well,” a sad expression overcame Jiang Yanli’s face as her eyes turned to Wei Wuxian. “I’m afraid I don’t know an answer to that. He occasionally approaches me with topics he’d like a second opinion on, but, otherwise, he’s always been able to move on by himself. He’s never needed anyone else for that.”

‘He’s strong,’ Lan Wangji acknowledged. ‘Still… I’d like to help him.’

However, with the situation as it was, Hanguang-jun was forced to concede. A small exhale conveyed both his frustration and lack of surprise with Wei Wuxian’s answer, before his face returned to his usual unreadable blankness. Less than a second later, Wei Wuxian turned around with a laugh.

“Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan! Please buy me one!” Wei Wuxian requested, holding out the rattle drum.

“...Anything,” Lan Wangji agreed instantly. “Always.”

Watching that, Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but remember the way Wei Wuxian had always used Yunmeng Jiang’s money whenever he wanted something from Yunmeng. And, just like that, a thought sparked within him.

The Jiangs were being replaced.

By Lan Wangji.

Unconsciously, he felt his hands clench into fists at the thought.

Hanguang-jun stepped forward to approach the waiting Wei Wuxian. However, a moment later, the sky filled itself with an infinity of white — snow falling from the sky. In the unfamiliar streets around them, the watchers could hear a rattle drum being played with.

On a pile of snow in the back of an alley, two makeshift straw dolls were carefully set down.

"A-Die. A-Niang," a child's voice whispered.

Lan Wangji instantly stood.

"Wangji?" Lan Xichen asked, standing up as well and looking around for threats.

"No," Lan Wangji shook his head. "It's just… I — we-"

"And… A-Ying!" the child concluded.

When he appeared, he was instantly recognizable.

"Wei Wuxian?" Jiang Cheng asked, staring in disbelief at the dirty, ragged child sitting happily before them.

Despite his situation, the smile on his face was blinding.

'Equally happy, regardless of whether he's in rags or riches,' Jin Guangshan shook his head in disbelief.

However, a moment later, that smile seemed to fade. Not because of the frigid snow falling over his barely-covered body, but because of his barely-there memories of the family he'd once had.

Throughout the simulation, all the heirs had lost people. The Twin Jades had lost their father. Jin Zixuan, his father and himself. Jiang Cheng had lost his entire sect. Nie Huaisang, his brother. Not even Wen Chao had been unaffected, losing his brother, then concubine, then sect, then father.

They were all hoping to change their families' fates.

(But it was too late to change Wei Wuxian's.)

Then, the sounds of the rattle drum picked up, and little A-Ying glanced up in surprise. Noticing him, the child playing with the drum paused and glanced over.

It was a child Lan Wangji, in Yiling for a day.

"What?" Lan Qiren gasped out, turning to stare at his nephew. "You've already… how-"

The pair looked at each other in surprise for a few seconds, as if aware of how much they'd later change each other's fates. Then, a moment later, Wei Wuxian gave another blinding smile. Without hesitating, Lan Wangji — still Lan Zhan, back then — walked forward so that he stood directly before Wei Wuxian. He held out the drum.

Wei Wuxian stared in surprise for a moment. Then, with that same warm smile on his face, he reached out and took it.

The scene faded away, returning them to the future.

For a moment, no one spoke.

Then, Nie Huaisang gave the longest, most heartfelt cooing noise any of them had ever heard.

"Huaisang?"

"It's fate, Da-ge!" the boy responded. "Heavens, it's… it's like they're destined to be together!"

"They're not!" Jiang Cheng snapped, annoyance rising up in him at both Nie Huaisang and the way the now visibly-blushing Lan Wangji wasn't bothering to deny it.

"Hey, I'm just saying-"

"Hanguang-jun and Senior Wei continued their travels," Ouyang Zizhen interrupted. "Eventually, they arrived in Yueyang."

As much as Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang wanted to continue, the glares their mother and brother were sending their way reminded them of how important it would be to continue paying attention to the simulation.

They begrudgingly remained quiet.

Inside the city, the aforementioned pair walked side by side through a bustling crowd. Without any forewarning, Lan Wangji suddenly spoke:

"How is your curse mark now?" he asked.

With a small smile, Wei Wuxian sighed, "Jin Ling was buried too close to our dear friend-"

"Our what?"

"- and got stained with quite a bit of resentful energy. It faded a bit thanks to your brother's medicine, but it's not completely gone. The chances are we'll only be able to remove it after we find the whole corpse — or at least the head."

"What an annoying corpse this is," Nie Mingjue grumbled somewhat disbelievingly.

Although he agreed with most of what had been said, Lan Wangji couldn't help asking, "...Dear friend?"

“Yeah. We’ve only found the legs and an arm, so we can’t tell who our dear friend is at all. I figured we should give him an alternate name for now. Or do you have something else you’d like to call him?”

“No need," Hanguang-jun shook his head. Unlike Lan Qiren’s earlier disbelief, Lan Wangji’s steady silence could be interpreted as a silent approval, even if he’d never say the phrase himself.

After how long Lan Wangji had waited for Wei Wuxian to return, could that really be a surprise? He loved every bit of Wei Wuxian, and would take everything he could get.

(For the first time, the real Lan Wangji felt like he was finally starting to understand his older self.)

“How much is ‘a bit?’” Hanguang-jun finally asked.

Given what they had seen so far, Wen Qing was fairly certain that “a bit” faded was “not at all” in Wei Wuxian-speak.

As if to prove her point, Wei Wuxian responded, “A bit is a bit. How do you want me to explain it? What, should I take off my clothes and show you?”

Lan Wangji’s brows shifted as if he had suddenly become worried that Wei Wuxian was going to strip on the spot.

“Take them off after we return,” he finally replied, voice as even as ever. In response, Wei Wuxian laughed and whirled around to face his companion, a soft smile on his face.

Glancing to his side, Lan Xichen was able to witness a sight that had become almost impossibly rare in the past few years: a jealous Lan Wangji. The gaze Wangji was directing at Hanguang-jun spoke of uncertainty — no, a feeling of inadequacy — that Lan Xichen wasn’t sure the second jade had ever experienced before.

He moved closer to his brother, providing what little support he could.

However, a moment later, Wei Wuxian’s smile shifted into thoughtfulness: “Hanguang-jun, do you think the people who set our dear friend’s hand on Mo Village are the same as the people who sewed his leg onto that other corpse?”

As Lan Wangji thought over the question, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts drifted in another direction.

‘All this time, I’ve been referring to him as ‘Lan Zhan’ in my mind, even when I was pretending to be Mo Xuanyu. But, after these last few days… calling him that title in such an exaggerated way is pretty funny, isn’t it? I quite like it!’

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli laughed, delighted by her brother’s happiness. She couldn’t say she didn’t understand, however. Her recent attempts at referring to Jin Zixuan as “A-Xuan” had sent warm flutters through her stomach every time she did it.

Then, Lan Wangji looked up, having come to a decision:

“There are two groups.”

“I agree.”

“Oh?” Jin Guangshan asked, frowning in confusion along with most of the watchers.

“Going all the way to sewing the legs onto another corpse before hiding it in a wall means they didn’t want it to be discovered,” Wei Wuxian elaborated. “In that case, it wouldn’t make sense for them to toss out the hand and use it to attack Gusu Lan’s cultivators since that’ll inevitably lead to an investigation. One went to great lengths to hide everything, while the other attacked rashly, almost as if they want to be discovered. They’re probably not the same group.”

“Mn.”

“Those two are absolutely insane,” Jin Zixuan muttered.

“Maybe. But I have to admit, watching these two investigate is quite the experience,” Nie Mingjue confessed, to the great delight of Nie Huaisang (who had long since decided that this Wei Wuxian-Lan Wangji investigation deserved to be made into a book so that they could enjoy it again later).

Turning back around to face the direction he was going again, Wei Wuxian continued, “The people who hid the legs knew about the Qinghe Nie Sect’s Saber Halls, while the people who let the hand loose knew about GusuLan’s plans. I doubt either of them have simple motives; there are more and more secrets….”

“One step at a time,” Lan Wangji advised.

“How did you recognize me?”

“Think for yourself.”

“Nice try, Wei-xiong!”

Not discouraged at all by his failure to extract the answer from Lan Wangji, Wei Wuxian simply switched topic: “You know, I’ve never been to Yueyang. Back then I’d always had other people to investigate for me. I think I’ll take a break this time while you go ask around. Would you mind, Hanguang-jun?”

Shaking his head once, Lan Wangji turned around and started walking away.

“Wait, Hanguang-jun, where are you going?”

Lan Wangji glanced back, “To this area’s cultivation sect.”

‘...Obviously,’ many of the watchers thought, unsure what the reason for Wei Wuxian’s confusion was.

Without hesitation, Wei Wuxian tugged at Bichen's tassel and pulled Lan Wangji in the opposite direction, asking "Why would you go looking for them? This is their area; even if they know, they won't tell you. They either couldn't deal with it and hid it so as to not damage their reputations, or tried as hard as they could, not wanting outsiders to meddle."

"Wha — a cultivation sect wouldn't do that!" Madam Yu protested. Shocked by the accusation, Lan Qiren, Madam Jin, Nie Mingjue, and Jiang Fengmian all nodded in agreement.

After all, the Wens were the exception. And demonic cultivation was so unusual that their own less-than-stellar reactions to it were more than understandable, especially given how Jiang Yanli had apparently died. It made no sense for such incompetence to be Wei Wuxian's expectation.

And yet Lan Wangji continued to allow himself to be pulled along as Wei Wuxian continued, "My honorable Hanguang-jun, it isn't that I'm trying to shame you, but you really can't do anything out here without me, can you? If you ask like that, I'd be very surprised if you actually managed to get results."

The rattle drum Lan Wangji had bought him bounced against his hip from where it had been tucked into his belt.

At that moment, both the simulated and real Lan Wangjis' faces turned unbearably tender to Lan Xichen's trained eyes.

(And just like that, Lan Xichen promised himself that no matter what the Yiling Patriarch did before his death, he would support Wei Wuxian's relationship with his brother at all costs.)

"Mn," Hanguang-jun agreed, the barest hints of a smile on his face.

Wei Wuxian laughed, "What did you 'Mn' for? That's not how you were supposed to respond!"

Despite the words, Wei Wuxian's expression was as bright as the sun.

'It's like 'Mn' is the only thing he knows how to say. He's still so stuffy*,' Wei Wuxian thought. Despite his words, the radiant grin on his face made it clear to all that this was an observation based on affection, rather than annoyance.

'You would be happy, Changze,' Jiang Fengmian thought. 'Your son and Second Young Master Lan are just as in love as you and Cangse were.'

How long had it been since Jiang Fengmian himself felt something like that?

"How should I ask, then?"

"Go over there, of course," Wei Wuxian revealed, pointing to the side. When the watchers followed his gaze, they were able to see a street painted red with bright banners fade into view. Every single shop had opened its doors widely, with round, black jars scattered about.

"Alcohol? Now?" Madam Yu demanded.

With a laugh, Wei Wuxian explained, "The waiters here are usually young and hardworking. With so many customers a day and so many mouths to spread gossip, nothing strange that happens around here will escape their ears."

"Really?" Jin Zixuan asked, having never done an investigation himself. Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli, who had rarely (if ever) so much as gone on a nighthunt, shared his surprise.

Wen Ruohan, on the other hand, nodded in approval, pleased at Wei Wuxian's continued competence (and wondering how he could have possibly messed up so much with his own son).

"Make sense?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Mn," Lan Wangji answered, although his expression very clearly indicated a judgement of 'you just wanted to have a drink, didn't you?' Not paying any mind to Lan Wangji's silent accusation, Wei Wuxian continued to pull him to the waiters.

Almost immediately, five or six men from different shops pounced on them, excitedly offering "Would you like a taste? The He family liquor is well-known all around this area!"

"You master, have a taste of this. You don't have to pay. But, if you enjoy the liquor, then come to our shop!"

"This one doesn't smell strong, but wait until you drink it up!"

"If you can still stand after you finish this, I'll adopt your surname!" the last one concluded.

"Really? Alright then!" Wei Wuxian laughed, taking the bowl and emptying it with a grin. "Adopt my surname?"

Lan Qiren sighed, but was far too accustomed to his behavior by now to be scandalized.

Surprisingly, the waiter wasn't even remotely intimidated, sticking his chin up and explaining, "I meant I'd do it if you drank up a whole jar!"

"Is that so?" Wei Wuxian hummed in thought. "Then give me… three jars!"

"He's still going to actually investigate, right?" Nie Mingjue asked, far too used to Nie Huaisang's excuses to trust Wei Wuxian's questionable strategy.

"Wangji wouldn't let him waste too much time," Lan Qiren assured him, but, going by the look Lan Xichen sent Nie Mingjue, the first jade wasn't completely convinced on that.

As the delighted waiter rushed back inside his shop, Wei Wuxian turned to Lan Wangji and explained, "We're doing business here, aren't we? First we help their business, then we can ask them about other things. After we pay, it'll be easy to get them talking."

Nodding once, Lan Wangji took out his pouch of money.

Jiang Cheng, on the other hand, was still far from convinced.

The pair walked into the shop. As soon as the other waiters saw the way Lan Wangji was dressed, they straightened up and rushed to thoroughly wipe down one of the tables, unwilling to risk offending the young master before them.

The first waiter they had talked to quickly returned, expertly balancing three jars in his arms despite how quickly he was walking. He set them down next to Wei Wuxian and gratefully accepted the money Lan Wangji offered.

"Thank you, Young Masters!"

"Of course!" Wei Wuxian took a big gulp, then, before the waiter could leave, added, "Say, friend."

"Hm?"

"I wanted to ask, have you seen anything strange around here?"

"What do you mean by strange?"

With a deceptively careless shrug, Wei Wuxian elaborated, "You know: haunted houses, deserted cemeteries, cut apart corpses, and so on."

"Why do you sound so excited about that?!" Nie Huaisang shuddered.

Huffing fondly, Wen Qing muttered, "Well, if anyone is going to be comfortable talking about corpses…"

'It would be the Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation,' everyone concluded.

The waiter's eyes darted back and forth between Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji, assessing them deeply as he asked, "...What do you two do for a living?"

"Haven't you guessed already?"

"Of course, it's obvious. You two must be cultivators, who fly through the clouds and Heavens."

It was always amusing to hear common people's interpretations of cultivators. Jin Guangshan especially liked it when he got to hear such descriptions from his favored conquests.

"Especially the one next to you," the waiter added, allowing his eyes to drift toward the still silent Hanguang-jun. "Among common people, I've never seen such a… such a-"

“Such a pretty person,” Wei Wuxian concluded with a nod.

A bright flush formed on Lan Wangji’s ears. He had heard similar sentiments all his life (and even then, Wei Wuxian had said it like it was a fact, rather than a compliment), but-

“That’s so sweet,” Lan Xichen cooed, watching emotions only he could see flash across Hanguang-jun’s face. Not even Jin Guangshan could disagree.

‘Those two truly are the perfect pair,’ he thought, his eyes going back and forth between them.

(A shiver ran up Jin Zixuan’s spine.)

Quickly getting over his shock, the waiter laughed, “If you say it like that, the young master will be displeased.”

Seeing that Hanguang-jun had indeed not commented on the description, the waiter cleared his throat and continued, “Ah, what were we talking about just now? It was… strange things, wasn’t it? Such things have happened around here, not now, but ten years ago. If you walk in that direction, about two miles beyond the city you’ll find quite a lovely residence. I don’t know if their signboard is still there or not, but that place is the Chang Clan’s residence.”

“Chang Clan?” Nie Huaisang asked. “Oh, like Chang Ling!”

“Who’s that?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“The Chang Clan is a clan of cultivators. Ah, Chang Ling and I both dislike night hunts, so when Da-ge makes me go and Chang Ling’s parents make him go… we often stick together.”

After thinking it over for a moment, Nie Mingjue frowned and asked, “Wait, is this the kid who kept sneaking you chestnuts that time you ended up getting crumbs all over your robes?!”

“That’s the one!”

“What’s wrong with the residence?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Well, this…” the waiter frowned. “I mean, I’ve just heard about it, but…”

With those words, the world shifted into another spirit’s memory. It was the dead of night under a moonless sky. Wind rustled by, but not even animals made any sounds.

There was a crack as someone slammed against a door.

Lan Qiren startled, “What-”

An agonized wail cut through the silence, and a pressure that the watchers had begun to know as resentful energy slammed into them like a tidal wave. It was preferable to the tsunami during the Burial Mounds and Wei Wuxian's revenge, but it was nonetheless potent enough to leave them breathless.

"Why are all these powerful resentful beings appearing one after another?!" Lan Qiren complained.

Struggling slightly to breathe, Lan Xichen responded (shouting so as to be heard over the screams), "Uncle, it's been years between all these events we're seeing. The simulation just skips forward in time-"

"It's still ridiculous!" Wen Qing complained, annoyed at the danger Wei Wuxian was constantly thrown in to.

An especially loud bang silenced the watchers, returning their attention to the vision before them.

"Wh-what's going on?!" a voice shouted. It was one of the villagers, who had been drawn out by the loud noise. "What is-"

BANG

"Did you hear that?"

"There's screaming inside!"

"What happened?"

An elderly woman hobbled to the center of the crowd, watching the door shake in the dark night.

"Why are they banging on the door?" she asked. "They can't open it from the inside?"

"They're screaming so horribly… what's happening in there?!"

'They?' Nie Huaisang mentally repeated. 'No… Chang Ling?!'

A young man stepped closer to the wall and suggested, "How about we… go over the wall to see?"

"This is the Chang Clan's official residence," the old woman countered. "Their leader can fly through the sky. It's an entire clan of immortals. In the affairs of immortals… how could we possibly help?"

"But you…" Nie Huaisang trailed off, staring at the wall in horror. "No, you have to-"

Another scream made the villagers flinch back.

“They’re powerless,” Madam Yu briskly pointed out. “They can’t do anything against something like this! Keeping their heads down is the only option they have!”

(But wasn’t that exactly the mindset Wei Wuxian had proven time and time again to be wrong?)

“Then… we shouldn’t get involved in their business. It’s just… far too scary.”

“Don’t mind it anymore. Let’s hurry and go.”

‘We can’t all be Wei Wuxian,’ she refuted. ‘Holding everyone to that kind of standard would be ridiculous. Besides, they may not know what happened that night, but the people who were there are alive because they didn’t get involved. It’s fine.’

(But, even if it was fine for them to do, perhaps it was just slightly less fine for a cultivator like herself to turn the other way when disaster struck.)

Then, at long last, the pressure weighing down on them let up.

Nie Huaisang instantly took several greedy gasps of air (or whatever they were breathing in while in the simulation), and saw the other heirs doing the same. The only exception was Wen Chao, who was currently shaking and curled in a fetal position by his father’s feet, memories of his other-self’s encounter with the Yiling Patriarch consuming his mind.

“So… the sound of the doors being banged over and over again?” Wei Wuxian asked, raising an eyebrow.

“That’s right! Banging so loud it almost reached the Heavens!”

“And the cries of the people who were locked in.”

“Right, right! The doors were bolted from within, so if the people inside had wanted to get out, they could have easily just opened it. Why bang on the doors?”

Nie Huaisang didn’t know, and didn’t want to know. Right now, he was perfectly happy to just sneak inside his Da-ge and pretend none of this was happening, and that he couldn’t hear Chang Ling’s voice among the screams.

(The scene was unnervingly similar to the Yiling Patriarch hunting down Wens. No matter how hard he tried, the Nie heir couldn’t get the image of Wei Wuxian’s many, many murder methods out of his head.)

“Alright, when happened then?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“The next day, when the sun came out, the Chang Clan’s doors opened on their own.”

Paling slightly, Jiang Yanli snuck a bit closer to Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, and Wen Qing, whose presences helped calm her.

“And? What was inside?”

“Inside… inside, the entire clan was dead! You asked for strange incidents, so of course I’m telling you the strangest of things! The entire clan was wiped out! I heard they’d been frightened to death!”

Hearing that, Lan Wangji was absorbed in thought, as if remembering something.

Wei Wuxian appeared confused, but the watchers knew all too well what Hanguang-jun was connecting the description to.

(They would never be able to forget.)

But Wei Wuxian didn’t even seem to notice the connection, asking, “Are there any cultivation sects stationed in this area?”

“Yes, of course there are.”

“Then, how did they deal with the situation?”

“Deal with the situation?” the waiter slung a cleaning rag over his shoulder and sat down, leaning close as if revealing a secret. “Young Master, do you know what the name of the cultivation sect in Yueyang was? It was Chang! They’re the ones who died! Who could be left to deal with this situation? None of them had been left alive! In that house, men and women — ten-or-so young masters and dozens of servants — some sat, some lay, vomiting their bladders out. They died-”

“You’re going to die!” another voice interrupted. “Why are you slacking off to tell people old tales about people dying?!”

It was the liquor shop’s owner, arriving with a vengeance. He lifted a hand as if to snatch the young waiter and drag him away, but Wei Wuxian raised his hand before the owner could.

“Five more jars, please,” he requested.

Lan Wangji set down enough money for ten jars.

All at once, the owner’s expression switched to beaming celebration and he scampered off, ordering his worker “Look after the customers properly. Don’t go running around!”

“Ah, so you can be taught about bribery,” Nie Huaisang teased.

“It wasn’t bribery-”

“It might have been, Wangji,” Lan Xichen pointed out with a laugh. “Though, considering how dangerous the things you’re investigating have been, I can’t say that it was a waste of money.”

Grumpy but refusing to lower himself to pouting, Lan Wangji simply stood up and gracefully moved himself to Jiang Cheng’s side, rather than his brother’s. He had hesitated for a moment when deciding where to go. His snickering brother could be avoided in many corners of the room, but going near Jiang Cheng was the easiest option. If he went somewhere else, it would need to be intentional.

Lan Wangji still hated the future’s Sect Leader Jiang, but the teenage one — the one who hadn’t done anything — didn’t deserve his animosity.

He sat down next to Jiang Wanyin and turned his attention back to the simulation.

“Uh, right. After that, for a long time, anyone who passed by the Chang residence at night would hear someone banging on the doors from the inside. I’ve heard that even after the victims were buried, you could still hear them banging on their coffins,” he revealed, then leaned back and shrugged. “That’s since stopped though, so I’ve never heard the banging myself.”

“He really does have a lot of information,” Jiang Fengmian acknowledged with a smile.

Frowning, Madam Yu disagreed: “For all we know, the stories he described might have been more fantasy than reality. Can we really trust what that man is saying?”

“Would the spirits show it to us if we couldn’t?” Lan Qiren countered. “Especially considering that the simulation displayed that night itself. Everything indicates that this is, indeed, what happened.”

Madam Yu clicked her tongue in annoyance, but no one could deny Lan Qiren’s words.

The waiter sighed, “I pity their clan head Chang Ping. He just happened to be away from home at the time and survived-”

“Wait, didn’t you say the entire clan died?” Wei Wuxian interrupted.

‘Always looking for weaknesses in their stories,’ Wen Ruohan smiled, then began inching himself away from his second son, who trembled on the floor. Some part of him almost wished he’d sent Wen Chao out instead; Wen Xu would be far more convenient to have by his side.

Then again, he wasn’t sure he could accept sending Wen Chao out unsupervised into a world with Wei Wuxian, either.

(‘Heartless monster,’ Wen Qing thought, watching Wen Ruohan’s blatant disregard for Wen Chao. He had always supported her in her studies and had given her influence few others would, but that didn’t blind her to the person he was.)

(She refused to allow those she loved to get hurt by him. Now, that included Wei Wuxian, too.)

"Don't get ahead of yourself, I was just about to mention how Chang Ping died," the waiter objected. "They did all die. I said he'd escaped from the calamity, but it was only temporary. After a few years, that clan head Chang Ping still died. This time… it was even more horrifying. He was killed via 'lingchi' — the flesh on his body was sliced off piece by piece by a knife or sword, totaling in 3,600 slices."

The more the watchers heard, the more their memories of the Yiling Patriarch resurfaced. What Wei Wuxian had done was horrifying and inexcusable, but…

After what they saw happen to him, no one could say they would have reacted differently. They resolved to keep an open mind.

Perhaps thinking the same, Wei Wuxian asked, "Friend, do you know why the Chang Clan was wiped out?"

"This… Young Master, are you joking? I'm an ordinary person! How would I know anything about that? I only vaguely heard that they'd offended someone they shouldn't have offended."

Nie Mingjue cursed, "What kind of villain would that be?"

"Someone they shouldn't have offended?"

"That's right," the waiter nodded. "The grudges of people in cultivation sects really are complex. And I've heard this business was related to an infamous villain."

"An infamous one?" Wen Ruohan asked.

Wei Wuxian smirked, "Let me guess, you're gonna say you don't know who that villain was?"

The waiter laughed, "Nope. I definitely know who this one was! He seemed to be called something like 'pecticular…' ah, right. 'Patriarch.' The 'Yiling Patriarch!"

Wei Wuxian choked on his wine.

'Me again?!'

"Wha — him?"

"Did he… unknowingly-"

"How could you 'unknowingly' destroy a sect?!" Madam Jin snapped.

"But… he was dead then… wasn't he?"

“Yes,” Wen Ruohan confirmed, a disbelieving expression on his face. “To be blamed for this… he became even more infamous than I’d realized.”

Even thirteen years after his death, Wei Wuxian was more well known known than the sun.

“I… what?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Yup, that’s right!” the waiter excitedly revealed. “His surname was ‘Wei.’ His name was ‘Wei Wuqian,’ I think. People always sound hateful and scared when they mention him!”

Wei Wuxian could only gape in response.

“Wei.. Wu*qian?!*”

Nie Huaisang snorted and collapsed into giggles, loving the waiter’s enthusiastic (and completely wrong) description of the events. The memory the spirits had added proved to the watchers that there had indeed been screams from the Chang residence, but it seemed everything else the waiter knew was as accurate as Jin Guangshan’s knowledge of how many children he had.

Proving Nie Huaisang’s assumption, the blank faced, speechless Wei Wuxian thought ‘I’ve even been made responsible for this?! I’ve never been to Yueyang before, and I’ve never killed anyone using lingchi!’

As if hoping for an explanation, he turned his gaze on Lan Wangji.

“We’re leaving,” Hanguang-jun declared, having been waiting for Wei Wuxian to look over for some time now.

“Eh? Already?” Jin Guangshan asked.

“Ooooh. Someone’s a bit overprotective-”

“Huaisang, I swear, if you finish that sentence-”

Standing up after Hanguang-jun, Wei Wuxian thought ‘Lan Zhan must have something to tell me that can’t be said in public. We should leave, then. How much… oh, right. We’ve paid already.’

“Wei Wu*qian*, indeed,” Jiang Cheng scoffed, hiding the bit of annoyance within him that Lan Wangji was paying for Jiang Cheng’s head disciple.

‘Former head disciple,’ a snide voice in his head whispered.

“I’m leaving the liquor here for now!” Wei Wuxian said. “I’ll finish drinking later. Make sure it’s still here when we get back~”

Noticing Wei Wuxian’s joking tone, the waiter grinned and responded, “Of course! Our shop is honest with everyone, from the old to the young! Just leave them here. Don’t worry, we'll wait until you come back to close up."

"That must've been a weird day for him," Jin Zixuan smirked, enjoying the man's befuddled expression. Despite the waiter's enthusiasm, it was clear that he was quite confused by the hurricanes that had sat with him just a moment ago.

Jiang Yanli laughed, "That's the case for most people A-Xian interacts with. Especially given everything they asked about. The person who was responsible for the Chang Clan…."

"Though that's another interesting point," Lan Qiren speculated. "The man was completely convinced that it was a 'person' responsible for the massacre. I suppose demonic cultivation makes that possible, but wouldn't the culprit being a spirit be the most likely result?"

"Perhaps it's because he's a civilian," Jiang Fengmian suggested.

"Even then, it's strange," Madam Yu disagreed. "Even for non-cultivators, a spirit should be the obvious answer. Something like that… if it was a person, who other than Wei Wuxian could have possibly been responsible?!"

As Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji continued to walk farther away, the watchers fell into a contemplative silence.

"Oh, I see," Lan Wangji abruptly realized. "It's been thirteen years."

"Pardon?"

"It's the same as it was with Wei Ying's inventions. It's been hours for us; it's been years for them."

To the people inside the simulation, it had been thirteen years since Wei Wuxian had died. Around seventeen years since he'd invented demonic cultivation, but thirteen years since Wei Wuxian's secrets and inventions had been leaked to the greater public.

Their understanding of normal was very, very different than the watchers'.

However, right before Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji got out of hearing distance, the waiter called out to them again:

"Hey, Young Masters? Are you going to the Chang residence right now?" he bounded over, his curiosity and excitement temporarily overpowering his wariness. "Woah, that's so cool! I live here, but even I've never been there! I've only dared to sneak a few looks at it from far away. Are you two going inside? What are you going to do?"

Hoping to deflate some of the man's enthusiasm, Wei Wuxian shook his head and responded, "We're just going to take a few peeks from far away."

However, never one to be rebuffed, the overly-social waiter pranced forward and wrapped an arm around Wei Wuxian's shoulders.

Lan Wangji froze.

“Is the work that you two do hard? Do you earn a lot of money? Probably a ton, right? What a respectable job! Let me ask you something — is it difficult to get started? I…” he trailed off, then forcefully shut his mouth, looking nervously to the side. “Y-young Master… why is your friend… staring at me?”

Despite his best efforts, delighted laughter escaped from Lan Xichen at the identical expressions on the real and virtual Lan Wangji’s faces. Even to those who usually couldn’t read Lan Wangji’s face, the pair’s shared disapproval was clear.

(And, with the extra context they had access to, the reason for it was obvious as well.)

The simultaneous squeals of joy from Nie Huaisang, Madam Jin, Jiang Yanli, and Lan Xichen varied in pitch and volume, but all carried equal amounts of glee.

Right as Wei Wuxian looked over to observe Lan Wangji as well, Hanguang-jun stood up even straighter and walked outside of the liquor shop, too dignified to storm out, but too emotional to stay.

Of course, missing the context the watchers had, Wei Wuxian just shrugged and said, “Oh, him? My friend was brought up strictly. He absolutely hates it when other people are too comfortable around each other in front of him. Isn’t it strange?”

That wasn’t an unreasonable assumption, but-

The waiter awkwardly lowered his arm and replied, “Strange indeed. The way he was looking at me… you’d think I’d put my arm around his wife!”

As Lan Wangji heard deafening laughter erupt from all sides, he found himself wondering if it would be worth it to simply leave the simulation. Yes, he would miss out on the rest of it, but his Uncle could tell him later, and he’d be able to meet up with the real Wei Ying outside.

(Besides, literally anything would be worth avoiding the utter shame and embarrassment flooding him right now. Even his Uncle was laughing! Lan Qiren never laughed! But now….)

(Lan Zhan’s faith in humanity had officially dried up and evaporated into nothingness.)

Of course, given Hanguang-jun’s exceptional hearing, it was impossible for him not to have heard. Imagining the reactions Lan Wangji was trying to restrain, Wei Wuxian began laughing so hard his stomach hurt. Finally, he turned to the waiter and held out an empty container.

“I finished a jar.”

“I… I’m sorry?”

Wei Wuxian smirked and gestured at himself: “I’m still standing.”

“You’re actually going through with that?!” Jiang Cheng gaped disbelievingly. “You can’t tell him your name, you idiot!”

“Oh. Ooh! Wow… honestly, Young Master, this is the first time I’ve ever seen someone who can still stand properly after finishing a jar of that!”

“Of course he’d take his alcohol tolerance with him to his next life,” Madam Yu mumbled.

“Alright then, Young Master, what’s your surname?”

“Mo?” Jiang Yanli guessed.

“Or he could stick with Wei-”

“Or say Jiang.”

“My surname…” Wei Wuxian paused thinking for a moment, then brightened up. “Ah, my surname is ‘Lan!’”

Lan Wangji promptly tripped over a rock.

“Wangji!” Lan Xichen called out, both delighted and shocked to see his usually composed brother lose balance, even if just for an instant. He glanced back at his real brother, only to pause at what he saw.

“Alright then!” the thick-faced waiter declared. “From now on, my surname is Lan!”

“Wangji?” Lan Xichen repeated.

To his side, the second jade stood just as frozen as his name implied. Within his head, was an endless stream of alerts:

*[Warning: Wei Ying] [Warning: Wei Ying] [Warning: Wei Ying] [

By now, Lan Xichen was smiling so wide his cheeks were starting to hurt.

With each step the pair took, the number of people around them decreased, while the number of trees increased. They had exited the city and were walking in the direction the waiter had pointed them to earlier. By now, they had so completely removed themselves from the populous that their privacy was all but guaranteed.

"Back then, why did you stop me from talking to him?" Wei Wuxian asked.

It took a second too long for the watchers to realize he was referring to stopping the interrogation, rather than the hints of jealousy Hanguang-jun had shown at the end.

(Lan Wangji's ears were now redder than the brightest rose.)

"There was no need to continue asking," Lan Wangji responded. "I remember having heard of the incident at Yueyang before."

"Before you explain that to me, let me ask you something," Wei Wuxian began, glancing back at Lan Wangji with a serious expression. "Um, I wasn't the one who wiped out the Chang Clan, was I?"

"You have to ask?" Wen Qing gaped.

"Well…" Lan Xichen trailed off. "There were a lot of similarities…."

"No. It was not done by you."

"Oh."

Hearing that, Jiang Yanli let out a sigh of relief. It wasn't that she thought Wei Wuxian was responsible, but the confirmation that he wasn't was reassuring regardless.

'I see. It's like it was right before I died,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'When I was despised by everyone — worse than a sewer rat. I'd played a role in everything; I was to be blamed for everything. If one's neighbor's grandson didn't eat properly and lost five pounds, it was because he was frightened by the stories of the Yiling Patriarch.'

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji asked, stepping forward. It was wrong of the public to blame him for something he didn't do; any anger Wei Wuxian felt would be more than understandable.

But there wasn't any anger to be found. Just a steady, tired resignation.

'However, due to his demonic path and great power, some people feared him and had him set up,' Lan Sizhui had explained. 'He was thusly despised by the public, his home destroyed by his beloved shidi, and he died miserably.'

Finally, and thankfully filling the awkward silence, Lan Wangji elaborated, "Although you weren't responsible for the massacre, it was related to you."

"How so?" Wei Wuxian asked.

“In two ways. Firstly, one of the people involved was connected to your mother.”

Wei Wuxian stopped in his tracks.

Jiang Fengmian instantly straightened up, turning to stare in shock at the simulation. He turned to Lan Qiren, but the other man seemed to be just as surprised as he was.

“...My mother?” Wei Wuxian asked, his face open and expressive and vulnerable in a way that looked out of place on Wei Wuxian’s face. His eyes were wide, not in the fear that came around every time a dog was in his presence, but in hope.

Lan Wangji stepped closer to Wei Wuxian at once. Like a bucket of cold water had been poured on him, any flushed embarrassment or happiness in his expression had long since vanished. All that remained was concern for Wei Ying.

With an especially grumpy voice, Jin Ling began to explain:

“Wei Wuxian was the son of Wei Changze, a servant of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect, and Cangse Sanren, a rogue cultivator. Both Jiang Fengmian and his wife, Yu Ziyuan, were quite familiar with Wei Wuxian’s parents. Despite this, my grandfather never reminisced about his old friend in front of Wei Wuxian, and my… and Yu Ziyuan never spoke properly to Wei Wuxian at all.”

Hearing the change in address, Yu Ziyuan felt a sharp, stinging poison spread through her chest. Meanwhile, Jiang Cheng glared.

‘How could A-Ling say that?!’ he thought, fury surging through him as he remembered the look of his mother’s corpse being slapped to the ground by Wang Lingjiao. ‘Whoever wrote this script… how dare they belittle my mother like that? It-it wasn’t that bad-’

“Wei Wuxian would be lucky if she didn’t give him a few whips and send him to kneel in the ancestral hall to force him to keep his distance from Jiujiu. Because of that, other people had told Wei Wuxian most of what he knew about his parents; he really didn’t know any more than what the greater public knew.”

By now, Lan Qiren was pursing his lips together so tightly they seemed like they were going to fuse together. After thinking for a moment, he spun on his heel to face Jiang Fengmian.

“You need to talk to him.”

“I…” the man hesitated for a moment, glancing back at his wife, only for a firm determination to settle over his face. “I will.”

He tensed up, prepared for the inevitable outburst, but it never came. Yu Ziyuan simply looked away, not objecting to Jiang Fengmian’s plan, even if she didn’t offer to contribute either.

Relaxing in relief, Lan Qiren nodded and stepped back, rejoining his nephews. For once, Lan Xichan and Lan Wangji looked equally blank, becoming nearly impossible to tell apart.

(Was Lan Qiren really surprised? His nephews knew a little more about their parents than Wei Wuxian thanks to visiting their mother, but not much.)

(He mentally resolved to offer to tell them more, once they left the simulation.)

The whole world in the simulation was still, as if time had momentarily halted in it as Wei Wuxian processed the information he had been given. It lasted for an additional moment, before Lan Wangji turned completely to look at him.

"Have you heard the name 'Xiao Xingchen?'"

After pausing in thought for a moment, Wei Wuxian shook his head, "No."

Lan Wangji nodded, "He was quite well known when he left the mountain twelve years ago. Now, nobody mentions him."

"What mountain?"

"I do not know what mountain it was, but Xiao Xingchen was a pupil of Baoshan Sanren."

Hearing that, Jiang Cheng straightened up at once, alert.

"Baoshan Sanren's?"

"The immortal's?"

"Wow, that's insane," Jin Zixuan muttered, then, turning to Jiang Cheng, added, "It's a little funny, isn't it? Xiao Xingchen and Wei Wuxian never met, but they nearly did."

"Oh," Jiang Yanli realized. "You mean, when A-Xian brought A-Cheng to Baoshan Sanren?"

Her fiance nodded, and the Jiang siblings made eye contact with each other, excited by the fantastical prospect. At this point, it was entirely possible that Xiao Xingchen and Jiang Cheng had met. If so, his first meeting with Xiao Xingchen must have been more than a little awkward.

"I wonder what sort of expression he made when he realized you weren't Wei Wuxian," Nie Mingjue suggested, sparking laughter all around. He had expected his brother to join in, but Nie Huaisang instead narrowed his eyes thoughtfully. Although he wanted to share his opinions on the matter, the sudden change in expression those words had brought upon both Wen Ruohan and Wen Qing's faces raised several alarms in his head.

(Was there something they knew, that the other watchers didn't?)

Shaking himself out of his own thoughts, Wei Wuxian laughed and said, "I guess that means Xiao Xingchen is my Shishu, then."

Lan Wangji nodded.

There was a sound like the clearing of a throat, and Jin Ling began to speak again: "The two disciples who had already left Baoshan Sanren's mountain — Yanling Daoren and Cangse Sanren — did not die peacefully. Xiao Xingchen was no exception."

A cold feeling of anticipation began to spread through Nie Mingjue's body, and he unconsciously moved closer to Nie Huaisang, hovering over the boy protectively.

(Huaisang, who hated gory stories, greatly appreciated it.)

"Right, so…" Jin Ling cleared his throat again. "When Xiao Xingchen left the mountain, he was only seventeen. Hanguang-jun had never met him in person, but he had heard about Xiao Xingchen's talent from others. At that time, the Sunshot Campaign had ended only a few years ago, and the Siege on Yiling's Burial Mounds had only just ended. All the prominent sects were recruiting cultivators from all around to be part of them. Xiao Xingchen left the mountain in the hopes of saving the world! With his excellent talent and capable teacher, during his first night hunt he entered the mountain alone and claimed first place — making him famous overnight."

"Ah," Ouyang Zizhen gave a dreamy sigh. "A-Qing's Daozhang was so cool!"

"Shush! If I'm not allowed to interrupt, you aren't either!" Jin Ling snapped.

Snickers broke out across the watchers, but they were altogether muted. No matter how promising the start of Xiao Xingchen's story was, the conclusion had already been foretold to be a tragedy.

"Anyways," Jin Ling grumpily continued. "The sects, seeing such a bright, gifted, young cultivator, all invited him to join them. However, Xiao Xingchen turned down all their offers, saying that he didn't want to depend on any sects, and instead wanted to build a new sect with a close friend — one that didn't value bloodline."

As he heard that, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but allow his eyes to drift down to his son, still curled up on the floor. Although the shaking had (mercifully) stopped, the boy certainly wasn't anyone's idea of dependable.

And yet, it had been his ancestor who had initiated the change in values from the sect to the clan. Of everyone, Wen Ruohan was the last person who should be advocating for a change to the system. And besides, he had Wen Xu; regardless of Wen Chao's utter failure, Wen Ruohan still had a son to pass on everything to.

(And yet, how many times had he thought that the situation in the Jiang Sect would be much simpler if Wei Wuxian had simply been made the heir?)

(And besides, it wasn't like Wen Ruohan wasn't involved in Wen Chao's upbringing. If he was dissatisfied, he had no one to blame but himself.)

"Xiao Xingchen had a soft personality but a solid heart. He was gentle on the outside, but determined on the inside. Whenever someone had a difficult matter at hand, the first thing they did was ask him for help. As a person of moral integrity, he never refused either, which was why he was always spoken of with approval.

"At least, until the destruction of the Yueyang Clan."

A grim air settled over the watchers, but that air seemed to be matched by the future's juniors as well. For a moment, they were surprised that no one was making fun of Jin Ling's overly-dramatic phrasing.

Then, Lan Wangji glanced over at his other self, who was still walking toward the former sect, and wondered if the juniors were a bit more personally involved in whatever incident was being described than they had been in the Sunshot Campaign. The tales of Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji defeating the Xuanwu had been all-but myths to the kids.

This, it appeared, was a story those juniors knew intimately.

"One day, the Yueyang Clan leader went out night hunting with a few family members for about half a month," Lan Sizhui explained, picking up where Jin Ling had left off. "In the middle of the night, without any warning, they received some bad news and immediately hurried back. Someone had purposefully destroyed their protective array and had let in a group of powerful evil spirits. However, other than that, they knew nothing.

"Although an incident affecting only a minor clan wouldn't usually gain much focus, the circumstances at this time were different. The siege of the Burial Mounds had only just ended, and, upon hearing this news, the entire cultivation world began bubbling with rumors, some even suggesting that it was the revenge of the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian!"

"How stupid could they possibly be to blame him for that?!" Jin ZIxuan demanded. "We'd at least seen him doing similar things. What is any of this based off?"

Jiang Cheng nodded, "Fools, the lot of them."

"Regardless, there hadn't been any evidence, so it had been impossible to find the real killer."

The further reassurance that it hadn't been Wei Wuxian comforted Jiang Yanli greatly.

"In such a situation, Xiao Xingchen couldn't sit by and do nothing. He volunteered to be responsible for the matter and find the truth for Chang Ping. A month later, the murderer was finally discovered. His name was Xue Yang."

"...Does anyone know who that is?" Jiang Fengmian asked. He was met with 'no's from all around.

"Xue Yang was even younger than Xiao Xingchen, nothing more than a boy. Despite that, his cruelty was unparalleled. Ever since he was fifteen, he had been a delinquent in the Kuizhou region, known far and while for his radiant smile, inhumane means, and merciless personality. Everyone's expressions would change when he was brought up in conversation. When he was a child living in the streets, it was said he developed a hatred that lasted for years towards Chang Ping's father."

"His father?!" Ouyang Zizhen repeated. "I thought it was a grudge against Chang Ping, himself! That's even less justif-"

"Zizhen, please," Lan Sizhui begged.

"Living in the streets?" Jiang Yanli asked, eyes wide.

Once again, another connection between Wei Wuxian and 'Xue Yang.' They dearly hoped there wouldn't be any more.

"As I was saying," Sizhui continued. "Xue Yang committed the crime out of vengeance, and for… some other reasons."

"...Did you censor that?" Lan Jingyi whispered.

"No. It just says, 'for some other reasons.'"

"Pardon?" Jin Guangshan asked.

"Why are the spirits being so vague?!" Jin Ling whisper shouted. "Aren't we trying to tell the past Sect Leaders what's going on?"

"Maybe it makes it more dramatic? For a later reveal!"

"Doesn't matter," Sizhui forcefully cleared his throat. "After Xiao Xingchen discovered the truth, he went across three provinces to find Xue Yang, who was still happily picking fights with others. Taking advantage of the discussion conference happening at Koi Tower, Xiao Xingchen brought him over and demanded severe punishment. With his straightforward list of evidence, most sects didn't have any objections. The only exception was the Lanling Jin Sect."

A sinking feeling spread through Jin Zixuan's chest and he subconsciously found himself inching closer to Jiang Yanli for comfort.

"Objecting then would put him against the whole world," Wei Wuxian pointed out, having just been informed of the situation by Lan Wangji. "Could it be that Xue Yang was a favorite of Jin Guangshan?"

"A guest disciple," Lan Wangji answered.

A dozen gazes swerved his way, and Jin Guangshan could only laugh and say, "How mysterious. I suppose none of us remain the same in the future, do we?"

After the revelations of how different Hanguang-jun was, the Nie Secrets, and Jiang Wanyin's actions, no one could disagree.

“He was a foreign disciple?” Wei Wuxian confirmed. “Back then, the LanlingJin Sect was already one of the four great sects, wasn’t it? Why would they have invited a delinquent to be a guest disciple?”

After hesitating a moment, Lan Wangji turned his head to stare directly into Wei Wuxian’s eyes.

“...Because of the Stygian Tiger Seal.”

The watchers flinched.

Wen Ruohan had already become tense at the casual mention of four great sects, so not even he could stop himself from reacting when that name was uttered. None of the watchers had forgotten their glimpse into the Sunshot Campaign. Wei Wuxian forging the seal from a relic he had found — a sword that had soaked up thousands of years of resentment — had left quite the impression. Even putting aside the contextual importance of the event, the pressure that resentment had generated was not something any of them would be able to forget.

And if this was truly about Wei Wuxian’s strongest weapon….

‘The Stygian Tiger Seal?’ Wei Wuxian thought, his mouth twitching up into a grim, bitter smile. ‘I only had to use it once to realize it did more harm than good. It was considerably more powerful than I’d imagined. I only wanted to use it to help me in battle, but its powers ended up exceeding my own. And it doesn’t have any loyalty either.’

The more Wei Wuxian spoke, the more tense Jin Zixuan became.

Half of his mind screamed at him to stand by his father’s side and to not allow the other great sects to hone in on a possible weakness. The other half was trying to convince him to stand with them — against his father.

The confliction spun around in his body like a tornado, ultimately keeping him stuck in place.

‘It’s not like I’d never thought about destroying it, it was just too difficult to destroy. Besides, back then, I’d already vaguely understood that I’d be hated by everyone sooner or later.’

“Hated by everyone?” Nie Mingjue repeated. “What did he do?”

What could Wei Wuxian have possibly done to make all the great sects distrust him so much?

‘So long as I had something as appalling as the Stygian Tiger Seal, the other sects wouldn’t dare act rashly. I separated it into two halves, making it so that they could only be used when put together. After I used it for the second time, I was able to destroy the first half, but the second half….’

All at once, the image of a battle appeared before them. Thousands of cultivators from dozens of sects swarming up a giant hill — the siege on the Burial Mounds.

The more Wen Ruohan saw, the harder it was for him to believe that Wei Wuxian could have done any of the things he'd been accused of. The boy appeared entirely too aware of the political situation and the danger his powers posed to make a mistake like that, and too righteous to do so intentionally.

(What on earth had the world put him through?)

The pair waited in silence for a moment longer, then continued walking. Due to the speed they were travelling at, it would take them a not-insignificant amount of time to reach their destination. Perhaps because of that, Lan Jingyi's voice returned to give the watchers the rest of the lesson.

"In regards to the seal, Senior Wei was confident that even if the sects got hold of it, made a temple for it, and offered it incense every day, the remaining half of the Tiger Seal was just a piece of scrap iron. However, Hanguang-jun disagreed; it appeared that Xue Yang could rebuild the other half of the seal! Although he was young, he was clever, bizarre, eccentric, and a horrible, horrible person-"

"Jingyi, stick to the script."

'Thank the heavens Lan Sizhui is there,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'I have no doubt we'd never get anywhere, otherwise.'

"A-anyways, the LanlingJin Sect realized they could use the remaining half of the seal to piece together the first half. Even though the recreated version wasn't as powerful and couldn't be used for as long, it was still capable of terrible catastrophes."

"And the Jin Sect wanted it?" Lan Qiren narrowed his eyes.

Recognizing the tension, Jin Guangshan gave a friendly laugh and said, "Lan-xiong, you must understand, the future is a different culture. We've seen time and time again how normalized Wei Wuxian's creations are. If someone else managed to recreate the seal, wouldn't it be better for our sects to have something that can go against it?"

"...I suppose, but… to support this… 'Xue Yang?'"

"Sometimes, certain sacrifices must be made for the safety of us all," Wen Ruohan said. The Jiangs, Lans, and Nie nearly flinched back in disgust, but Wen Ruohan remained unphased. Regardless of whether he actually believed what he was saying, the words would serve their purpose. Now, if things went south for Jin Guangshan, the man would ally with Wen Ruohan — fixing the utter loss of alliances that had occurred when the Sunshot Campaign was revealed.

Besides, unlike the rest of them, Wen Ruohan had never claimed to be a good person.

"I see," Wei Wuxian said. "The LanlingJin Sect had to protect Xue Yang so that he could restore the Tiger Seal for them. Then… maybe what Xue Yang did to the Chang Clan wasn't just a grudge… it could have also been to test the power of the seal."

The complete and utter lack of surprise Wei Wuxian showed in regards to the detestable actions taken by the LanlingJin Sect left Jin Zixuan frozen in his spot. This whole time, it had been proven time and time again that Wei Wuxian would not attack people who were innocent. That was part of what had convinced Jin Zixuan that Wei Wuxian hadn't killed him. Now, a different question was starting to form in his mind.

'What if I did deserve it?'

He knew himself — he was sure he wouldn't do anything that would justify his death — but after seeing how different Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji's future selves were….

Seeing his confliction, Jiang Yanli moved even closer to him than she already had been, offering some support. It helped more than even she could have expected, allowing Jin Zixuan to relax at once.

(Right, regardless of what he did, there was no way Jiang Yanli could do anything that would make her deserve death in Wei Wuxian's eyes. He was being ridiculous.)

(Right?)

Wei Wuxian sighed.

'No wonder all the rumors are connected to me!' he thought. 'I can already imagine those cultivators clenching their teeth and going 'That Wei Wuxian! If he hadn't made this, our world wouldn't have encountered so many disasters!'"

'And what about what you went through?' Lan Wangji thought. 'Who is responsible for that?'

Lan Wangji continued to explain, but, hoping to save time, the spirits decided to return to a voiceover again. This time, it was once again Lan Sizhui who spoke.

"Although the LanlingJin Sect was determined to protect Xue Yang, Xiao Xingchen didn't waver either. As the stalemate continued, they finally startled Nie Mingjue, Chifeng-zun. Having not intended to participate in the Discussion Conference, he was forced to hurry over from far away.

"Despite Nie Mingjue being a junior to Jin Guangshan, he conducted himself in a strict manner and refused to tolerate Xue Yang no matter what. After an angry lecture, Jin Guangshan was left with no words and a great deal of embarrassment. Nie Mingjue, the irritable person he was-"

Said man flinched, receiving a deadly glare from his brother in regards to the truth behind that 'irritability.'

"-unsheathed his saber on the spot, intending to kill Xue Yang. Even when Lianfeng-zun, his sword brother Jin Guangyao, attempted to ease the situation, he just ordered him to leave. After a harsh scolding, Jin Guangyao just hid behind Lan Xichen, not daring to say anything else."

“Da-ge, have some compassion,” Lan Xichen whispered, his smile showing he was far too amused by the situation. “I’m sure A-Yao wasn’t trying to ally with Xue Yang. It’s just that he’d have to support his father, right?”

“...Right,” Nie Mingjue begrudgingly mumbled, inching away from his younger brother. Somehow, even after fifteen years of raising Nie Huaisang, it had never occurred to Nie Mingjue that his little brother’s glare could be so terrifying.

(Though, after watching what had happened to the Chang Clan, it wasn’t a surprise that both of them were a bit on edge.)

“Ever since Xue Yang had been brought to Koi Tower, he hadn’t shown the slightest trace of fear. Even with Nie Mingjue’s saber pressing against his neck, he continued to grin. Right before he was taken away, he turned to Xiao Xingcheng and told him, ‘Daozhang, you won’t forget me, will you? Well, let’s just wait and see~’”

The heirs all shuddered at those words, finding Lan Sizhui’s imitation of the voice to be even more horrifying with how juxtaposed it was against his usual mannerisms. They weren’t the only ones who felt that way.

“Sizhui, please never speak like that again,” Jingyi requested.

There was a sound like frantic nodding from Ouyang Zizhen and Jin Ling.

“Eh? I…” he cleared his throat. “I apologize.”

‘Good, good,’ Lan Qiren thought, nodding in (somewhat smug) approval. ‘A perfect Lan for the next generation. It’s a good thing he’ll still be born. I can’t wait to teach him.’

“What?!” Nie Mingjue demanded, standing up. “You honorless-”

“Now, now,” Jin Guangshan placated, far more relaxed than before now that he knew Wen Ruohan was on his side. “I believe we’ve seen time and time again that the circumstances regarding the future are much more complicated than they appear. No need to point fingers when there’s so much we don’t know.”

Nie Mingjue snarled, wanting to protest, but unable to do so after the way they had all condemned Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation without understanding any of it.

“Hearing about Lanling’s decision, Nie Mingjue was enraged and pressured them again. The LanlingJin Sect rambled about, refusing to give him Xue Yang no matter how hard he tried. All the other sects watched from the sidelines, but, shortly afterward, Nie Mingjue passed away from qi deviation. He had cultivated faster than anyone else in the Nie Sect, so he had died sooner than any of them."

Nie Huaisang was glaring at him again, and Nie Mingjue couldn't say anything in response. Yes, he was sorry for leaving Huaisang alone, but….

He had known the Wen were going to start a war sooner, rather than later. The power he could gain from the Nie Sect's style of cultivation — the power he needed to protect Huaisang — was more than worth that to him. And it all worked out; that power allowed him to gain two sworn brothers, who had continued to look after Huaisang after his death.

Unbeknown to Nie Mingjue, however, Nie Huaisang's mind was somewhere else.

'Da-ge died while trying to pressure the LanlingJin Sect?' he thought, frowning deeply. 'That's… something to keep in mind, I suppose.'

"Now that the person who was the most difficult to deal with was gone, the LanlingJin Sect became more and more audacious. Jin Guangshan tried as hard as he could to get Xue Yang out of the dungeons so that more work could be done on the Stygian Tiger Seal. However, this wasn't exactly something to be proud of. It was impossible for him to free the murderer of an entire clan without a valid reason. Therefore, they turned their attention on Chang Ping."

'The one most difficult to deal with was gone?' Jiang Cheng repeated, frowning slightly. According to Lan Sizhui's narration, Nie Mingjue had been the only one to oppose the Jins. It was to the point where, after he was gone, Jin Guangshan could almost act however he pleased in regards to Xue Yang.

But what about-

'It doesn't mean anything,' Sect Leader Jiang had decided. 'I should first find an excuse to take him back… I've done things like this plenty of times already.'

'Young Master Mo, his Lordship is doing this for your sake,' Sizhui explained. 'Otherwise, Sect Leader Jiang wouldn't have let you go.'

'It's not the first time my Uncle's done something like this. He never lets any of them go, even when he's caught the wrong ones.'

Xue Yang took place after Wei Wuxian's death, and yet Jiang 'never lets any demonic cultivators go' Wanyin didn't say anything. On some level, of course he didn't. If the Jin Sect was defending Xue Yang, then, for all Jiang Cheng knew, standing up against them could bring about the Massacre of Lotus Pier all over again. Jiang Cheng more than understood his other self.

The adult Jiang Cheng was keeping the Jiang Sect safe, rather than playing hero for no reason.

But-

‘You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!’ she had shouted, and, despite it not being true, the simulated Jiang Cheng had accepted that explanation. He hadn’t corrected anyone’s assumptions or made the truth clear. Instead, he had choked Wei Wuxian himself.

Shifting awkwardly in his seat, Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but wonder, ‘At what point does ‘doing what’s right’ become ‘playing the hero?’’

He didn’t know.

However, while Jiang Cheng’s attention was ensured by his own thoughts, the other watchers had no trouble paying attention to the simulation. With fists clenched in anger or hands twiddling in anticipation, they allowed the simulation to explain.

“Using coercion and harassment, the LanlingJin Clan pressured Chang Ping into changing his story, invalidating all of his past speeches. He announced that the wiping out of the Chang Clan had nothing to do with Xue Yang.”

Lan Xichen clenched his fists, wishing he could join Nie Mingjue in cursing.

The simulation shone and then dimmed, revealing Xiao Xingchen speaking with Chang Ping. The former Chang clan leader could only shake his head, all fight leaving his body.

“What can I do aside from this?” he asked. “If I don’t, what’s left of my clan won’t be safe for long. I’m really grateful Daozhang, but… please don’t help me anymore. Now, any assistance will just be harassment. I don’t want the Yueyang Chang Sect to end just yet.”

Xiao Xingchen’s expression crumbled.

“And thus,” Ouyang Zizhen paused, sounding far more hopeless than they’d ever heard before. “...And thus, the tiger had been set free, allowed to roam the mountain once more.”

The simulation shifted, bringing them back to Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji.

The simulation had assured them several times. Not all demonic cultivators were evil; many of Wei Wuxian’s inventions were being used to save lives. It was only appropriate then, that it also showed the times where that was not the case.

Lan Wangji took a deep breath.

And Wei Wuxian stayed silent.

'If I'd been in Chang Ping’s position, I wouldn’t have let the matter go,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'No matter how powerful the LanlingJin Sect was, or how much glory the road ahead offered me, I'd have gone into the dungeons myself and cut Xue Yang up until he was nothing more than a puddle, and then summoned his soul back to do it again, until there was nothing left of him.'

Knowing what they knew about Wei Wuxian, no one could deny that.

'Stupid boy,' Madam Yu thought. 'It's exactly because you're like this that you get into so much trouble. Have you somehow forgotten the fact that you've died?!'

'But... not everyone's like me — preferring to perish together with their enemies. Because of his decision, some of the Chang Clan's people were still alive. Chang Ping was also young, single, and childless, having only just taken the first steps into the world of cultivation. He had to think carefully. It makes sense, I suppose.'

Jiang Cheng nodded, feeling a phantom pressure of responsibility weighing on him as well.

They could hear someone take a deep breath. A moment later, Lan Jingyi was the one who continued.

"After Xue Yang was released, he quickly went to take revenge. However, the revenge wasn't on Xiao Xingchen himself. Xiao Xingchen had left the mountain alone and had no family. His only friend was a cultivator he met afterward, named Song Lan. He was a righteous, determined person who also wanted to build a sect based on common ideals rather than bloodlines. They were the closest and most like-minded of friends, and they were described as such. Xiao Xingchen was the bright moon and gentle breeze; Song Zichen was the distant snow and cold frost."

"...Do we really need to hear about all this?" Wen Chao muttered, quickly growing bored. Although he was grateful for a distraction from his own memories of the Yiling Patriarch, this lecture was far longer than he had expected it to be.

Unfortunately, given the glares being directed his way, he was the only one who thought that.

After hesitating for a moment longer, Ouyang Zizhen forced himself to continue, "Xue Yang repeated his past strategy. He wiped out BaiXue Temple, Song Lan's home, and used poison to blind his eyes."

A gasp escaped Jiang Yanli's mouth, and she paled considerably.

(This Xue Yang was using the techniques Wei Wuxian had created. It would be wrong to say it was Wei Wuxian's fault, but it would also be wrong to say he hadn't been involved at all.)

"This time, he was careful enough to not leave behind any evidence. With that, Jin Guangshan's protection, and Chifeng-zun's death, what could anyone do to him?"

The narration faded once again, allowing the watchers to focus instead on Wei Wuxian's expression. He was watching Lan Wangji closely, a slight frown on his face.

'Really?' he thought. 'Although I can't read any emotions from looking at Lan Zhan, that… doesn't seem right. He absolutely can't stand injustice, maybe even more than Nie Huaisang's brother.'

Despite the grim topic, Lan Wangji felt his heart skip a beat at the praise.

‘Back then, the LanlingJin Sect was acting rather dishonestly, and Lan Zhan never hid his opinion of them. Even now, he refuses to go to their sect’s discussion conferences. If two cruel massacres had happened, the news would have spread over the entire cultivation world. Lan Zhan definitely wouldn’t have turned a blind eye to them. Why didn’t he go to hunt down Xue Yang and-’

Wei Wuxian’s thought’s cut off at once, as his memories pulled up the glimpse he had gotten at the cold spring’s pond. Large, violent scars intersecting and criss-crossing on Lan Wangji’s back — the result of a discipline whip.

Lan Qiren instantly paled. He didn’t know anything about how that had happened or why Lan Wangji had been given those scars. The Lan Sect would never do that to their second jade for no reason, but to do something so severe — so permanent-

With every mystery the future answered, it seemed like three more popped up in its place.

However, and although he cared a strange deal about the scars, not even Wei Wuxian was improper enough to blatantly ask about them. Instead, he returned the topic to the lesson.

“So, what happened to Xiao Xingchen after that?”

Once again, one of the future’s juniors picked up the story.

With clearly faked cheer, Lan Jingyi continued, “When Xiao Xingchen had left Baoshan Sanren’s mountain, he had sworn to never go back. He was a man of his word, but, as Song Lan was both blind and injured, he broke his vow and carried Song Lan to Baoshan Sanren’s residence and begged her to save his friend.”

‘Is this really where Baoshan Sanren is?’ Jiang Cheng had asked.

Wei Wuxian had just laughed reassuringly and responded, ‘It’s definitely where she is. Why do you keep doubting me?’

“I guess Wei Wuxian really was telling the truth,” Jiang Cheng muttered. Hearing that, Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan glanced at each other, but neither commented on the matter.

(Nie Huaisang, who had seen their reaction, frowned thoughtfully.)

“For the sake of her former pupil, Baoshan Sanren agreed to save Song Lan. Thus, Xiao Xingchen left the mountain once more, and was never seen again.”

‘And the same thing almost happened to Wei Ying,’ Lan Wangji thought, grimly. ‘If he hadn’t invented demonic cultivation, he would have been eaten alive by the Burial Mounds, and my other-self would have never learned what happened to him.’

Terror gripped at his heart, making him shake in his seat.

“A year later, Song Lan also left the mountain. To everyone’s surprise, his eyes, which had been completely blind, saw light again. However, it wasn’t that Baoshan Sanren’s medical skills had created a miracle-"

"Hm?"

"Xiao Xingchen had…. Knowing that Song Lan was only involved because of him, Xiao Xingchen had dug out his own eyes, and given them to Song Lan."

The more she heard, the paler Jiang Yanli became.

"Thank god A-Xian didn't have to do that," she whispered. Pursing his lips grimly, Jiang Fengmian nodded.

"He might've not survived the Burial Mounds then."

There were nods all around. The only exceptions were Wen Qing, Wen Ruohan, and Nie Huaisang, who had turned to look at the former two, and had abruptly felt something click into place.

He flinched back like he'd been slapped.

(It had never made sense to him, that Wei Wuxian had suddenly remembered where Baoshan Sanren's mountain was. A little too convenient, and a little too perfect to make sense. It had also not entirely made sense to him that Wei Wuxian — the prodigy of the Jiang Sect — would completely abandon Suibian. But, if his theory was true….)

(Suddenly, Wen Ruohan's earlier comments made a lot more sense.)

Nie Mingjue glanced over and frowned, finding the absolute horror on his brother's face to be a bit of an overreaction, considering they didn't personally know Xiao Xingchen or Song Zichen.

"Uh, anyways," Lan Jingyi sniffed, genuinely worked up by the things he was saying. "S-song Lan initially wanted revenge on Xue Yang. However, by this time, Jin Guangshan had passed away and Jin Guangyao, the new Sect Leader Jin, wanted to show that things would be different. The first thing he did after gaining power was 'execute' Xue Yang."

Hearing that, twin smiles formed on Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen's faces. The former's was closer to a vindictive smirk, and the latter's more of a relieved cheer, but both contained a certain pride for the person they would one day call brother.

Jin Zixuan, on the other hand, deflated. Looking back on his past jealousy towards his half brother, he couldn't help but feel ashamed. Of course Jin Guangyao was going to immediately correct Jin Guangshan's errors. Jin Zixuan loved his father, but….

He most certainly hadn't agreed with what Jin Guangshan had said about Wei Wuxian.

Sounding vaguely sarcastic, Lan Jingyi continued, "In addition to never mentioning the Stygian Tiger Seal again, Jin Guangyao also spent time and effort restoring the sect's reputation, suppressing unsavory rumors. As a result, the-I — are we really saying it like this?!"

"What?" Lan Qiren asked, wondering what Lan Jingyi was so upset about.

"The spirits gave us very specific instructions," Lan Sizhui whispered. "Just say what it says here."

"But it's… it's… I thought we were trying to help the people in the past!"

The Sect Leaders frowned, feeling their earlier jovial attitudes immediately give way to concern.

"I'm sure they know what they're doing," Ouyang Zizhen declared, sounding like he was smiling as he spoke. "Besides, worst come to worst, we'll just explain at the very end!"

There was another pause that increased the watchers' confusion by a power of ten.

"Fine, whatever," Lan Jingyi sighed. "But I'm skipping over the rest on the Jin Sect! So, back to Song Zichen, he went searching for his best friend! At first, there were still rumors about all the places he was travelling to. However, shortly after, those also disappeared. He had vanished just as Xiao Xingchen had. The Yueyang Chang Clan was small and unimportant to begin with, so the public's interest in the topic gradually faded away."

Lan Xichen frowned, pity for the pair of friends consuming his mind. It was truly unfortunate; he was just glad Jin Guangyao had been able to correct the travesty which had occurred.

As the story reached its conclusion, Wei Wuxian sighed softly.

'Meeting an end like that due to uncontrollable circumstances… if Xiao Xingchen had been born a few years earlier, or if I'd died a few years later, things wouldn't have had to turn out this way. If I'd still been alive, how could I have not gotten involved in such a matter?' he thought, then, immediately afterwards, gave a bitter laugh. 'I would've done something? What could I have done? If I was alive when the Yueyang Chang's case happened, there wouldn't have even needed to be an investigation before everyone decided that I'd done it. If Xiao Xingchen bumped into me on the streets, it's likely that he'd have chased me away with his horsetail whisk, rather than talked!'

Lan Wangji flinched at the bitter words and mocking laugh. He wanted to console Wei Wuxian, or, at least for himself, find an argument that would write off the possibility Wei Wuxian had described. After all, the Lan Clan forbade gossip, and thoughtless accusations like that were the antithesis of the Lan Sect's core values. They wouldn't have accused him without an investigation.

And yet, he couldn't reject it. Wei Wuxian had been dead then, and the waiter they had talked to still attributed the massacre to him. If Wei Wuxian had still been alive at that time, could Lan Wangji really say he wouldn't have been blamed?

(But the leaders of the Great Sects wouldn't accuse him without proof. Wangji's brother, and Nie Mingjue, Jiang Wanyin, and Wangji himself wouldn't allow Wei Wuxian to be unjustly punished for something he hadn't done.)

By now, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had walked past the Chang Clan's former residence and into a nearby cemetery. Wei Wuxian observed the somber surroundings for a moment, uncharacteristically muted in the face of the tragedy.

"How did Chang Ping die afterwards?" he eventually asked. "Who killed the remaining members of his clan?"

Lan Wangji breathed out, "He-"

BANG

Nie Huaisang jumped.

The bangs continued to shake the ground as though someone was slamming on a door. They were forceful, frequent, and endless, yet muffled, as though separated from the rest of the world.

All warmth instantly left Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji's expressions.

Like that, Wen Chao could easily see how the soul inside Mo Xuanyu's body was the same as the one that had once been the Yiling Patriarch. Shivering, he wrapped his arms around his legs, curling up into a frantically wide-eyed ball.

'This is… the people inside are slamming on their own coffins, just like they had when they'd slammed on the doors, unable to be let out. I thought it had stopped ten years ago!'

Without saying a word to each other, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji both softened their breathing, moving forward without a sound.

Despite the tense situation, Jin Zixuan couldn't help but wonder how Lan Wangji was able to move so stealthily while being dressed in pure, blinding white. It was absolutely unfair; his golden Lanling Jin robes made him visible from a mile away. What was Hanguang-jun doing differently?

However, Jin Zixuan received no answer to his question. Instead, he simply watched as Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian moved against pillars of the pailou, the stone's grey sheen allowing both the white Lan Wangji and the black Wei Wuxian to hide. From there, they saw that, in the center of the cemetery, there was a large hole amid the tombstones.

Somewhat surprised, Wen Ruohan, Lan Qiren, Nie Mingjue, and Lan Xichen stepped closer, giving the hole a thorough investigation.

(Nie Huaisang just stepped farther back.)

It was rather large, and piles of dirt surrounded it on all sides. There were faint noises from within the hole. Someone was digging out a grave.

Lan Qiren's eyes widened, recognizing the man's attire as identical to what the cultivators who ambushed them at Qinghe's Saber Hall were wearing.

"The same group?" he suggested.

Frowning grimly, Jiang Fengmian nodded in agreement.

"One hour later," Lan Sizhui explained.

At that moment, two people hobbled up from the graze, one carrying the other. It took Wei Wuxian less than an instant to realize that the pitch black clothing of the one on the bottom matched his earlier attackers'. The one being carried, on the other hand, seemed lifeless.

'That's only natural. After all, given where they came from, the one being carried is probably a corpse.'

Nie Mingjue sighed, pitying the poor fool whose body had been chopped up and hidden in so many different places.

Right as he thought that, the gravedigger spun around and spotted Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji. Once again, there was the mass of thick, black mist over the man's face, disguising his identity. Lan Wangji had already unsheathed Bichen and darted forward, beginning the fight.

In the half-second he had to react, the man swiftly made a hand seal and summoned his sword glare. He was extremely talented, but was still nothing in comparison to Hanguang-jun. Just like before, the man was quickly pushed back.

As he watched from the side, a memory resurfaced in Wei Wuxian's head. The traces of the Hundred Holes Curse he had spotted on the man's chest.

Wen Qing frowned again, stepping close. Why was Wei Wuxian focusing on that so much? Had a new discovery been made about the curse that she didn't know about?

Now that the fight was one on one, their earlier realization was made even more apparent: Lan Wangji's opponent was clearly very, very familiar with his sect's sword style.

Noticing that, a layer of frost spread across Lan Wangji's face.

And an ocean of nervousness enveloped Lan Xichen's.

The unknown man was quickly pushed back as Bichen pressed deeper and deeper. Soon, the man failed to entirely block a strike and received a cut on his arm. Shortly after, he dodged and managed to escape with only a nick on his leg. A hasty defense allowed him to keep both his eyes, but he was still left with a scratch on his face.

If he didn't escape soon, he would undoubtedly be captured. With a curse, the man pulled out a talisman written out on thick, tan paper.

It was a teleportation talisman.

"Damn it!" Nie Mingjue shouted.

Seeing the same, Wei Wuxian clapped twice and slammed his hands on the ground.

The watchers jerked and straightened up, gasping for air as resentful energy zapped through their bodies.

And the corpses felt the same. From the earth, four arms shot out of the ground and snatched onto the man's ankles, grabbing him tight. In response, the grave digger instantly poured spiritual energy into his legs, blasting the corpses away.

Wei Wuxian then pulled out his bamboo flute. A shrill, piercing melody ripped through the curtain of darkness that had fallen.

A shudder ran up Nie Huaisang's spine.

And, a moment later, two human heads popped out of the dirt. They, along with their bodies, then twisted around and climbed up the man's body like snakes.

This time, Nie Huaisang was far from the only one who shuddered.

The gravedigger snorted in disdain and sent out another burst of spiritual power, blasting all the corpses away from him.

Including the one he'd been carrying.

"Clever, clever," Wen Ruohan muttered, finally understanding why Wei Wuxian had used so little power during this battle. Luring the other man into a false sense of security had made the subsequent manipulation easy to pull off.

Lan Wangji caught the sent off corpse with one hand, as Wei Wuxian was too busy laughing to be any help. Knowing that he couldn't win against Lan Wangji (especially with another person there as well), the unknown man cursed and hurled the teleportation talisman against the ground.

There was a crack and blue flames surged toward the sky. The man stepped into them, and vanished.

Two, simultaneous groans left Jiang Cheng's and Jin Zixuan's throats as they watched the man get away.

“He had a teleportation talisman,” Wen Qing pointed out. “There wouldn’t have been any point in trying to catch him; getting the body was more than enough.”

“Still!” Jin Zixuan complained.

However, completely juxtaposed against his shidi’s annoyance, Wei Wuxian just smirked and said, “Let’s see who he dug out, shall we?”

He glanced over, and his eyes widened slightly in surprise. The head of the corpse had already been split open, but, rather than brains or blood leaking out, there were wads of blackened cotten.

“Nope. No,” Nie Huaisang said, swiftly backing up to hide inside his brother’s illusionary-body. “No, no. Not seeing that.”

Wei Wuxian easily jerked the corpse’s head off.

“What’s this supposed to mean?” he asked. “A corpse made of cotton and rags is hidden in the Chang Clan’s cemetery?”

Wen Ruohan supposed that explained why Wei Wuxian hadn’t been able to control this corpse in the battle against the unknown figure.

“Not all of it is fake,” Lan Wangji corrected, having felt the weight of the body earlier. Wei Wuxian felt along the corpse, and discovered that the chest and abdomen were both real, with the other (fake) body parts having been added to disguise it. It was pretty clearly the torso of their “dear friend.”

“Looks like whoever hid the corpse has noticed we’re investigating the issue and came to move the corpse to somewhere we won’t be able to get to,” Wei Wuxian speculated, then, glancing at Lan Wangji, frowned. “Why was the mist-gravedigger so familiar with the Lan Sect’s style?”

In other words, ‘is it someone you know?’

The still-frigid expression on Lan Wangji’s face clearly showed that he was thinking the same.

There were only so many people in the Lan Clan who could even hope of competing against Lan Wangji. As Lan Xichen watched the simulated version of his brother think, he felt pride and pity warring inside him.

Wangji needed to suspect his own family.

“His cultivation must be quite high to use a teleportation talisman,” Wei Wuxian pointed out. “And he disguised both his face and sword. The face is understandable, but to have a recognizable sword…. Hanguang-jun, based off your fight just now and the one at the Saber Hall, do you think the leader was someone you know really well?”

Could it have been Lan Qiren or Lan Xichen?

“Why ask him?” Jin Guangshan asked, glancing over at the frozen teenaged version of Lan Wangji. “He can’t honestly expect you to sell out your own family, can he? He’s smarter than that.”

(Jin Zixuan flinched.)

“...No,” Hanguang-jun decided. Wei Wuxian nodded once.

Jin Guangshan did a double take, shocked by Wei Wuxian’s lack of protest. Lan Qiren pressed forward.

“Wei Wuxian trusts Wangji. If Xichen or I had truly been responsible, Wangji would have said so. Hanguang-jun’s honor is worth more than that, don’t you agree?”

“Ah, of course. I meant no offense,” Jin Guangshan smiled.

Without another word, Lan Wangji put the torso into another double layered Qiankun pouch. It rested heavily in his hand as he set it away in his sleeve.

The pair then began walking back to town, a bounce in Wei Wuxian’s step. There was a flash forward, and Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had already returned to the center of town. Without hesitation, they journeyed back to the liquor shop. It was one of the only shops with the lights still on, and the waiter they had seen earlier was still outside.

“You’re back!” he realized. “Look, I kept my word, didn’t I? Did you two see anything?”

“Not much!” Wei Wuxian laughed, walking back to his earlier table with Lan Wangji. The ten liquor jars were still there, waiting to be taken. Wei Wuxian licked his lips.

As soon as the waiter had turned around again (giving Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji a bit more privacy), Wei Wuxian recalled where their conversation had left off.

“Oh, right! Since we were interrupted by the grave digger, I still don’t know how Chang Ping died,” Wei Wuxian realized.

With simple, direct words, Lan Wangji explained, “Quite a few years after Xiao Xingcheng and Song Zichen disappeared, the remaining Chang Clan members died overnight from lingchi. Chang Ping’s eyes were gouged out.”

Nie Huaisang was supremely grateful that the simulation hadn’t felt a need to show them that.

“No one could deduce who the murderer was. Everyone who had been involved in the initial incident had already died or disappeared. However, one thing was determined: the sword used in the incident was Xiao Xingchen’s sword, Shuanghua.”

“Eh?”

“Revenge?” Madam Jin asked. “For changing his story?”

No one knew.

Wei Wuxian paused half way to taking a sip and asked, “He was killed with Xiao Xingchen’s sword? Then was he the one who did it?”

“Xiao Xingchen had disappeared. There was no conclusive evidence.”

Lan Qiren nodded once at his nephew, pleased by the Wangji’s need for thorough proof. Lan Wangji, on the other hand, couldn’t help but remember Wei Wuxian’s earlier comments regarding the blame against himself.

‘What happened to him?’

After thinking for a moment longer, Wei Wuxian asked, “If he couldn’t be found alive, then was there an attempted soul summoning?”

“Yes. Nothing could be found.”

Wei Wuxian had also died; nothing could be found of his soul either. Jiang Yanli sincerely hoped that whatever had ended up happening to her shidi wasn’t as bad as whatever Xiao Xingchen had gone through.

(Unfortunately, that didn’t seem very likely.)

As the world’s expert on souls, Wei Wuxian thought for a moment before commenting, “Something like soul-summoning… you shouldn’t rely on it too much. The time, place, and person involved are all factors to consider, so it’ll obviously fail sometimes. I’m guessing a lot of people think Chang Ping’s death was Xiao Xingchen’s revenge. Hanguang-jun, what about you? What do you think?”

Lan Wangji shook his head, “One should not comment without understanding the whole picture.”

Most of the watchers flinched at that, feeling thoroughly scolded.

Grinning at that answer, Wei Wuxian took another gulp of liquor right as Lan Wangji asked, “What about you? What do you think?”

“Lingchi is a type of torture. It’s meaning involves ‘punishment,’ anyways. Digging out the eyes makes it quite hard to not associate with Xiao Xingchen, but…” Wei Wuxian paused, debating with himself on how to phrase this. “I think… I feel that Xiao Xingchen hadn’t expected Chang Ping’s gratitude in the first place. I…”

In that pause, the waiter brought over two containers of peanuts, cutting off Wei Wuxian’s train of thought.

Wen Qing and Lan Wangji both frowned. What had Wei Wuxian been about to say? Something he thought about Xiao Xingcheng? Something he wondered about Xue Yang?

(Or maybe, just maybe, something he'd done without an expectation of gratitude. And something that had gone just as horribly for him.)

Wei Wuxian glanced up, then smiled, "Hanguang-jun, why are you looking at me like that? I'm not saying anything. Just like you, I don't know the whole picture, so there's nothing I can say. You're right. Before knowing all the twists and turns and causes and effects, you shouldn't presume anything about anything. I'd only ordered five jars, but you bought five more for me right after. It's impossible for me to drink all of these. How about you drink with me? We're not in the Cloud Recesses, right?"

"Still no," Lan Wangji answered, trying to hide the slight regret he felt about that. Then again, it wasn't as though Wei Wuxian would expect any other answer-

"Alright," Lan Wangji responded.

"...What?"

"I will drink."

"...What?!"

The world faded to black.

"You're going to drink?!" Jiang Cheng asked, gaping openly. Every head had turned toward Lan Wangji, but none were more stunned by the simulation than the boy himself. It was one thing for Hanguang-jun to be more tolerant of Wei Wuxian's actions — that could be excused as part of growing up — but drinking?

Yes, Lan Wangji had (in the privacy of his mind) wished he had been part of the numerous drinking parties and events Wei Wuxian had taken part in. That didn't mean he would actually do it.

Once again, the second jade found himself becoming certain that Hanguang-jun was not an older Lan Wangji, but was, instead, a demon who had come to the mortal realm to seduce Wei Wuxian.

Unfortunately for Lan Wangji, he seemed to be the only one who felt that way. To his left, Lan Qiren simply gave a long, hopeless sigh, quickly accepting the new reality of the devient his darling nephew had turned into.

"In all fairness, it isn't against the rules," Lan Xichen tried. "Wangji is allowed to drink, so long as he isn't in the Cloud Recesses. It just isn't his usual behavior."

"Understatement of the century," Nie Huaisang muttered, grinning at Lan Wangji.

"Regardless, it is fine," Lan Qiren said, looking as though the admission took years off his life. "Hanguang-jun is an… adult. He can use his own judgement. It is fine."

It very suddenly occurred to Lan Wangji that his uncle had given up on his future self, resigned to leaving Hanguang-jun to the wolves. He had been abandoned, and Lan Qiren would not doubt any story regarding the extents Hanguang-jun would go to. Now-

“Hi! I’m back!” Wei Wuxian declared.

“A-Xian?”

“Wei Wuxian?”

‘Wei Ying?’ Lan Wangji thought.

“Yup. Just checking in. I spoke with Mo Xuanyu for a bit. Figured out a few things.”

“Really?” Wen Ruohan asked, raising an eyebrow and leaning forward in curiosity.

“Mmhm. So,” he paused. “Time travel, huh?”

The watchers froze.

“You…” Madam Yu stuttered, then cleared her throat and forced herself to speak. “Are you serious, Wei Wuxian?”

“Should I not be?”

“You believe it?” Madam Jin asked.

“It would certainly explain a few things,” he laughed. “And besides, Mo Xuanyu brought along the future version of Jiang Cheng. With that and the reactions you’ve been having, it started seeming more and more likely.”

"...'Mo Xuanyu' brought me along?"

"Right."

That was an odd way to describe it. The name Wei Wuxian was continuing to use was ‘Mo Xuanyu,’ not ‘my future self’ or even ‘Wei Wuxian.’ Was he just testing them? Did he genuinely not know? Why hadn’t the future Wei Wuxian told him?

Then again, it was hard enough to make someone believe in the concept of time travel. Adding in ‘you became the Yiling Patriarch and were hated by the world and died a horrible death’ probably wouldn’t have gone over well.

“...What did they tell you?” Wen Ruohan asked. “Were you given instructions on what steps to take next?”

"Well, for one, I went and found the little version of him in our world!"

"Really?"

“Yup. And I was re-given instructions to take you all out of the simulation.”

“What?”

“I-”

"Wait-"

“There’s no need for that,” Wen Ruohan objected. “As you’ve already confirmed, staying in does not pose a danger to us.”

“But you don’t have much to gain from it either, do you, Your Excellency?” Wei Wuxian asked. “After all, you’ve already finished learning about the Sunshot Campaign. What else does the Wen Sect want to know? Your exit is right there; why don’t you just step out?”

‘So Wei Wuxian’s told his younger self about some of it,’ Wen Qing thought, her eyes falling to the array sealed onto the floor. ‘That makes it even more difficult to predict what will happen when we leave.’

Before, they had been sure that any one of them leaving would ensure that one side started a war. Now, even if one of them left, Wei Wuxian’s increased knowledge on the situation would prevent anyone from making hasty moves — especially given that it was Wei Wuxian who had found out.

Wei Wuxian couldn’t force the Wen out without Wen Xu’s permission, but the other sects no longer had a reason to prevent the Wen from leaving.

“I suppose you have a point,” Wen Ruohan acknowledged. “However, even without the Wen Clan’s direct involvement in these events, I can’t say the information is useless.”

“Is it more useful than serving as sect leader?” Wei Wuxian countered. “Unlike the other sects, you’ve left your son in charge. The question of who controls the Wen Sect after you leave-”

“Will not be an issue. A-Xu knows his place,” Wen Ruohan smirked. Going by Wei Wuxian’s subsequent silence, he hadn’t expected Wen Ruohan to be so shameless in regards to his son’s lack of individual goals.

The other watchers, who had gradually grown used to his mindset, had no such hesitation.

“So, you don’t want to leave?” Nie Mingjue asked, then, glancing at Lan Xichen, continued, “Maybe one of us should, then.”

“So I’ll be pressured into going?” Wen Ruohan asked. “I think you might be underestimating how useful this information is. A-Xu can take care of whatever you do outside. My priority will be finishing this.”

“Why?” Wei Wuxian asked. “I was told you were following along with an investigation that’ll happen over twenty years from now. How does that take precedence over now? I… Uncle Jiang, the… it would be much easier if you all were back.”

Jiang Fengmian hesitated, a war transpiring in his brain in seconds. He knew, logically, that it wasn't fair to leave Wei Wuxian to run the Jiang Sect. Wei Wuxian had never been trained for nor wanted such a role, and, due to the nature of his succession, had no system of support in place. In all honesty, him leaving probably would be the right choice. It might force Wen Ruohan to leave, would help take the burden from Wei Wuxian, and would sacrifice next to nothing, as the rest of his family could stay.

But.

Jiang Fengmian didn't know what had caused his children to end up the way they did, and learning that was a goal that currently eclipsed all others. Wei Wuxian wouldn't kill Jiang Yanli for no reason. Jiang Cheng wouldn't hate Wei Wuxian unless something had happened. It was unfair to Wei Wuxian, but Jiang Fengmian needed to know.

'Picking them over A-Xian again?'

They were his children. The simulation had made it very clear that he had failed Jiang Cheng in his hesitance to speak up. That Jiang Yanli had turned herself into her brother's and shidi's mother because Jiang Fengmian and Yu Ziyuan hadn't been there. What he was doing now — prioritizing them — was exactly what he was supposed to do.

(So why did he feel so guilty?)

Although they weren't experiencing guilt, his reluctance to leave was matched by all of the watchers.

"I apologize, Wei Wuxian, but leaving now simply isn't an option," Jin Guangshan explained.

"What about the investigation is so interesting? So long as just one person stays, we'll be able to counter whatever caused the incident. You don't all need to be here."

"We do," Lan Qiren disagreed. "Not only are we still lacking some information about the near future, but the people involved in the investigation need our full attention."

After thinking for a moment, Wei Wuxian continued "Mo Xuanyu said the investigation was being done by Lan-er-gongzi and himself. Why would anyone other than the Lan Clan need to stay for that?"

Lan Wangji flinched. It made sense — they had never met, after all — but that cold, uncaring, empty 'Lan-er-gongzi' couldn't have been further from what it should have been.

'Lan Zhan,' he thought. 'Call me Lan Zhan. That's not — I'm not-'

"Mo Xuanyu's actions matter to us all. None of us will leave until we've learned everything we can about him," Wen Ruohan answered, and was somewhat surprised to find out that what he'd just said was unquestionably true. Normally, after seeing Wei Wuxian's unfaltering loyalty to the Jiang Sect, Wen Ruohan would have lost interest. A threat would need to be dealt with, of course, but he was something Wen Ruohan could deal with immediately. Logically speaking, there was no need for the Wen to continue watching.

But that was only if he was willing to kill Wei Wuxian.

(Wen Ruohan wouldn't risk destroying the boy, as so many others had done.)

It was ridiculous to change the plans he'd spent decades trying to complete for one person, but-

Who, other than himself and Wei Wuxian, could leave an impact on the world that persisted for decades after their respective deaths? Who, other than the two of them, knew what it was like to be the unquestioned strongest? Who, other than them, had been made into the enemies of the entire cultivation world? Was an empty war (that he had lost, the first time around) really worth giving that up?

If there wasn't a need to kill Wei Wuxian, then Wen Ruohan had no reason to try to.

"...Okay then."

"Okay, what?" Madam Yu asked.

"Now that you've already seen basically all of the Sunshot Campaign, Mo Xuanyu isn't in anywhere near as much of a rush to get you out. Diminishing marginal losses, and all that; he isn't giving up much by letting you stay a little longer. Right now, he's mostly just trying to set up a working relationship with those of us in the past. He asked me to talk to you, but also said it was fine if I couldn't immediately convince you to leave."

Because that would leave Wei Wuxian more time to deal with the outside world before they got out. If he felt they weren't about to learn anything that would make things hugely worse, then he might as well take advantage of the time he could spend without having them interfere.

"I'll be going then," Wei Wuxian offered. "Want me to do anything for now?"

'Be safe,' Lan Wangji thought.

'Take care of yourself,' Jiang Yanli agreed.

'Don't let the unworthy use you any longer,' Wen Ruohan mentally added.

"No, I don't think so," was all Jiang Fengmian said.

"Great. Bye bye, then!"

There was a click, and he was gone.

Chapter End Notes

You know, I wasn't planning on including MDZS Q ep 23, but then I rewatched it and squealed the whole way through, so now it's here. Unfortunately, that episode took place when Wei Wuxian was still pretending to be MXY (which we're already past), so I had to change a few things for it to make sense. Sorry! The same thing happened with the donghua, where I was manipulating the scenes to make sense when I hadn't included some build up. And a bit of the audio drama too. That's actually what the chapter title means — that I "stitched" together this chapter just like NMJ's legs were stitched to that corpse. 🤣

As he sat down in the in-between realm's vast plane of white, Lan Wangji found himself turning his thoughts inwards. In the past few segments of the simulation, he had found himself losing his prized composure time and time again — almost always in response to something Wei Wuxian had done. The fifteen year old version of his simulated self had reacted much the same, but the older version had not. Every time Wei Wuxian had acted out, Hanguang-jun had taken it in stride (in gratitude over the fact that Wei Wuxian was alive at all).

That composure was admirable.

(Such a lack of shame was humiliating.)

Hanguang-jun's reputation was impeccable.

(There were scars of a discipline whip carved into his back.)

And yet, despite all the conflict Lan Wangji was experiencing, there was one thing he knew to be true: if things continued like this, Hanguang-jun would be able to make Wei Wuxian happy.

(Unlike their twenty year old counterparts, who apparently argued so often that, upon resurrection, Wei Wuxian had been sure that Hanguang-jun was going to try to imprison him.)

Ever since Wei Wuxian had been brought back to life, the simulated Lan Wangji had shown no aversion to his demonic cultivation; the entire time, it had only been understanding and acceptance. Although the changed culture in that world was most likely a factor at play, the actions of the adult Jiang Wanyin showed that such tolerance was far from the norm. The simulated Lan Wangji was making an active effort to actually understand Wei Wuxian. In that context, was his decision to join Wei Wuxian in drinking really a surprise?

‘Especially considering how, in that world, Wei Ying has already died once,’ Lan Wangji mentally added, giving an unheard sigh in the noisy room. After the real Wei Wuxian had contacted them, various conversations had started up, but Lan Wangji had abstained from taking part in any. His emotions had been a chaotic mess at the time, and he had far too much on his mind. Now, after allowing himself to calm down, Lan Wangji could think more clearly.

The recent segments had taken nearly all logic out of the second jade’s reactions, leaving him blushing and gaping speechlessly at his other-self’s actions. Now, he finally had a moment to prepare himself for what was to come.

And yet he still had no idea how he should react.

“Wangji,” he heard from his left. “I would like to speak with you for a moment.”

“Of course, Uncle,” Lan Wangji responded, standing up gracefully and journeying closer to where his uncle was. Thanks to the low volumes both of them had spoken at, no one paid any mind to them (as even Xichen was busy with whatever he was discussing with Madam Jin, Nie Huaisang, Jiang Yanli, and Nie Mingjue).

As Lan Qiren watched his nephew approach, he noticed the perfectly-blank expression on the boy’s face. Clearly, Lan Wangji fully expected to be scolded for his other-self’s actions. They had agreed not to pushish for events that had yet to happen, but Hanguang-jun’s decision to drink was outrageous enough (in Lan Wangji’s mind) to warrant such a reaction.

Lan Qiren just shook his head.

“Wangji, I have no objections to your older-self’s behavior thus far.”

“Why not?”

“I…” Lan Qiren hesitated, remembering the ridiculous scene Wei Wuxian had made as he was dragged back to the Cloud Recesses (because, for some reason, Hanguang-jun wasn’t willing to simply explain that he loved Wei Wuxian and didn’t want to hurt him). “...I have no objections worth mentioning at the current time.”

After thinking it over for a moment, Lan Wangji nodded in acknowledgement.

“In fact, I would like to ask that of you,” Lan Qiren countered, and, upon seeing his nephew’s confusion, elaborated, “What do you think of Hanguang-jun’s behavior?”

There was a beat of silence as the second jade thought, wondering how to properly articulate his feelings. Then, he straightened up:

“Hanguang-jun’s actions have remained righteous. I… cannot see myself acting the same, but I trust him to not indulge in evil. I would need a greater understanding of what happened before Wei Ying’s death to say any more.”

Lan Qiren nodded, then glanced away. Although neither of them would admit to it, they could both feel the beast towering over every word in their conversation.

(Even without ever being present, Lan Qiren's brother weighed heavily on his and his nephew's minds.)

"Wangji," Lan Qiren began again. "What everyone here is about to watch is a private moment between you and Wei Wuxian. I apologize for the fact that this will be revealed for everyone to see."

"...Perhaps the concealment zone will take over during this segment."

"Even then, Wen-gongzi and Sect Leader Jin would remain, would they not?"

A trace of displeasure appeared in Lan Wangji's expression, but he made no comment on the matter. In some ways, being with just them was even worse than staying with everyone, as the concealment zone took away Lan Wangji's support as well. However, knowing that complaining would be futile, Lan Wangji kept silent.

Seeing that, Lan Qiren frowned deeply and said, "No matter what your older self does during this next segment, stand proud."

"Uncle?"

"We both have faith in Hanguang-jun's righteousness. So long as that remains the case, don't allow yourself to falter. Wei Wuxian is unruly and disorderly and ridiculous, but… he is also kind and brave and loyal and righteous. You do not need to feel ashamed for loving another person."

"But-" Lan Wangji began, then cut himself off, looking down.

"When we leave the simulation," Lan Qiren swallowed, "I will support whatever choice you make in regards to him. If you feel too uncomfortable around a version that does not know you, then you do not have to meet. However, if you wish for something else… I have no objections."

It was somewhat ironic that watching a simulated Lan Qiren who would sooner commit suicide than speak those words was what convinced Lan Qiren to say them. Then again, everyone seemed to be learning about themselves through watching, so at least he wasn't alone in that regard.

Then, before Lan Wangji could answer, the white void around them faded to black. When light returned, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were sitting across from each other, two empty cups and a jar of emperor's smile between them. In the candle-lit dusk, Wei Wuxian's surprised face was visible.

"I will drink," Hanguang-jun repeated.

Lan Xichen watched closely, certain that his real brother would never consent to drinking after whatever they were going to be shown, making this his only opportunity to see it.

Smiling in amusement, Wei Wuxian clicked his tongue: "Hanguang-jun, you really have changed. When we were younger, you would get so mad if I drank even a tiny jar in front of you! You even threw me off a wall and hit me. And yet now you're hiding jars of emperor's smile in your room and secretly drinking!"

Forcing himself to resist the urge to sigh, Lan Qiren looked up at the ceiling and wondered how his other-self could have possibly allowed this to happen. Although he had now given in, he had no doubt his other self would have opposed such a corruption at all costs.

Fixing his collar, Lan Wangji responded, "I did not touch those jars of Emperor's Smile."

"What?" Jin Zixuan did a double take.

"Why did you hide them if you didn't want to drink them? What, were you saving them for me?"

"Oh. Oh," Jin Zixuan's eyes widened in understanding, and the first words exchanged between Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji flashed before his mind. "Wow, that's… really sad, actually."

Although Lan Wangji's face remained impassive, he felt his breath stutter at those words.

(The first thing the simulation had told them was that Wei Wuxian had died. Slowly, they were starting to understand what that had meant to them in this future that would never happen.)

Seeing that Lan Wangji wasn't about to answer his teasing, Wei Wuxian deflated and caved in: "Alright, fine. You didn't touch them. I believe you, okay? Let's talk about something else. Come on, now. I want to see how many cups it will take to make an abstinent member of the Gusu Lan Sect drunk!"

He enthusiastically poured a bowl for Lan Wangji, who picked it up and — without hesitation — drowned it in a single gulp.

Under a perfectly blank face, Lan Wangji's heart began beating at the speed of light.

Wei Wuxian leaned closer, impatiently awaiting a flush-faced Hanguang-jun.

The watchers did the same.

Seconds passed, and nothing changed.

"...Are you a strong drinker?" Jiang Fengmian suggested, but, having never had alcohol before, Lan Wangji could only close his eyes apprehensively in response. As far as anyone could tell, nothing had happened.

Wei Wuxian pouted in disappointment, and began reaching over to refill Lan Wangji's cup. However, right as he started doing that, Lan Wangji frowned and lightly rubbed between his brows. With one hand supporting his forehead, he closed his eyes.

'Did he…' Wei Wuxian blinked several times. 'Did he fall asleep?'

“What?” Nie Mingjue gaped. “I — you-”

“Who on earth responds to alcohol like that?!” Nie Huaisang demanded, pointing at Hanguang-jun as though the illusion were of a strange, alien beast, rather than a human.

“That is not what I was expecting,” Jiang Yanli laughed with Lan Xichen (who found the obvious relief on the real Lan Wangji’s face to be quite amusing).

Although he was still sitting up, he had slouched slightly and was leaning his head against his propped-up arm. Slow, even breaths proved that he had genuinely fallen asleep.

Jin Guangshan glanced down at the now-empty cup by Hanguang-jun’s side and unconsciously began to smirk.

“Hanguang-jun?” Wei Wuxian asked, leaning forward to wave a hand in front of his face. “Hanguang-jun?”

No response. Eyes wide in disbelief, Wei Wuxian slowly lowered his hand.

“Maybe it’s all for the best that you didn’t drink with us in the Cloud Recesses,” Jiang Cheng muttered, receiving a glare from the real Lan Wangji in response.

Wei Wuxian stared for a moment longer, observing Lan Wangji’s perfect features with shock. As the seconds bore on, he finally couldn’t deny it anymore.

‘He’s actually asleep!’ Wei Wuxian realized with a laugh. ‘I can’t believe it!’

Stars seemed to shine in his eyes as his whole face lit up into a rosy flush, his excitement growing. Unable to withstand the adorableness of what was before him, he covered his mouth in an effort to keep himself from squealing in excitement.

‘Most people get drunk before they fall asleep! How could Lan Zhan skip right over that part? But ‘drunkenness’ was exactly the step I wanted to see! I can’t believe he’s so bad with alcohol!’

Lan Wangji was indescribably grateful that he was “so bad” with alcohol. Every other watcher was at least somewhat disappointed by the result, so he alone was left to feel thankful that nothing had happened.

‘Maybe this won’t be as bad as Uncle and I feared.’

Still smiling in delight at what had happened, Wei Wuxian slipped one of the unconscious Lan Wangji’s arms over his shoulder and wrapped his own arm around Hanguang-jun’s waist, pulling him up. The gesture was completely platonic and even necessary, considering the situation. It was certainly far better than Lan Wangji’s earlier bridal carry.

And yet the expressions Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, Lan Xichen, and Jiang Yanli were sending Lan Wangji’s way clearly implied a different interpretation of the event before them. An interpretation the second jade was starting to realize Lan Qiren had no real objections to. Lan Wangji's ears flushed bright red.

(Jiang Cheng, on the other hand, just sighed, disappointed but not surprised by this end result.)

"Could we get two rooms, please?" Wei Wuxian asked, shamelessly reaching over to pull out Lan Wangji's money pouch again. After paying, he went to one of the rooms and laid Lan Wangji down on the bed, took off his boots, and tucked him in.

If anyone thought the series of actions had made the pair look like a married couple, they were smart enough to not mention it out loud. Lan Wangji was in the middle of a transitional phase, and dealing such a heavy blow to his mind would surely cause irreparable damage.

After ensuring that Lan Wangji was still genuinely asleep, Wei Wuxian blew out the candles and slipped into the night. Rather than going to his own room, he left the building and walked around until he reached a desolate grotto.

'I finally have time to come out here alone,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'I wonder how Wen Ning is doing.'

"I…" Lan Qiren frowned. "Was getting Wangji drunk a ploy?"

Wen Ruohan shook his head, "Unlikely; he was just as surprised as we were. He's just highly adaptable to any situation."

Wei Wuxian scanned around one more time, ensuring that no one was close enough to see him. Luckily, given the late hour, the streets were completely desolate. Resentful energy in the surrounding area jerked to a halt, then gathered towards Wei Wuxian like sharks around blood-filled water.

Wei Wuxian raised his flute to his lips, and Lan Wangji's song began to play.

"So, here's what I don't understand," Nie Mingjue turned to Lan Xichen. "I could accept not realizing that Wangji's money pouch was MianMian's, but how could he not remember that while remembering the song. He was basically hallucinating back then, wasn't he?!"

"And he didn't remember A-Ning," Wen Qing pointed out.

"Don't bother trying to find an explanation," Jiang Cheng objected. "Wei Wuxian's memory just makes no sense."

Before too long, the eerie sounds of rattling chains could be heard in the night. Out of the shadows, Wen Ning's corpse stepped out, its head lowered in death.

Wen Qing was up in an instant. She walked close and simply looked at him. Her brother stood before her. His pupil-less eyes were a glaring, hideous white; his dirt-filled, tangled hair was littered with branches; his pale, bloodless skin, the color of the moon; the obvious stiffness in a body without a beating heart.

Tears filled her eyes, but she forced them down with a shaky breath.

“Wen-guniang,” she heard from her right, and saw Jiang Yanli step close. Wen Qing could only shake her head, unable to face the sympathetic looks directed at her by all the present older siblings.

Wen Ning wore all black, making it nearly impossible to see him. For a full inspection, Wei Wuxian set his hands behind his back and began to circle around, observing closely.

Wen Ning shifted as if to follow after Wei Wuxian-

“Stand properly,” the Yiling Patriarch commanded.

And Wen Qing’s brother didn’t mind at all because he was a corpse. His soul was gone — he was dead — and even though she’d heard from him just a few hours ago, her doubts resurfaced once more.

(What if, while she was in here, something happened to the real version of her brother outside. What if, in trying to prevent his death, it happened even earlier?)

But then-

“Say… we still don’t know how Wen Ning died, right?” Nie Huaisang asked. “If he died in the Sunshot Campaign, I feel like Wei Wuxian’s ‘Ghost General’ would have been mentioned before-”

“Don’t call him that!” Wen Qing snapped, making Nie Huaisang instantly back off. Nie Mingjue bristled at the harsh tone, only to recall the look that had been on Nie Huaisang’s face when he found out about Nie Mingjue’s own prophesied death. He glanced at Wen Qing again, and quickly found his hate being replaced by something else:

Sympathy. Pity. Understanding.

And a horrifying realization that Nie Huaisang was right; they didn’t know how Wen Ning had died. In having returned to the future, it felt like they’d seen everything there was to know about the past.

Clearly, that was far from true.

“Hand,” Wei Wuxian commanded, and Wen Ning extended his right arm.

‘I can see why Wen Ning was referred to as the Yiling Patriarch’s dog,’ Wen Ruohan supposed. ‘I’m a little surprised Wei Wuxian would do that to Wen Ning, though.’

What had happened in the past to prompt it?

As Wen Ruohan thought to himself, Wei Wuxian began inspecting the iron cuffs around Wen Ning’s wrists. They were extremely thick, allowing them to remain strong despite their obvious age. Even at just a glance, it wouldn’t be shocking to assume they’d been there for the full 13 years Wei Wuxian had been dead.

‘It’s not ordinary iron, either,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Wen Ning is capable of twisting iron into sludge. He wouldn’t have these chains dangling if it was ordinary metal. They were probably created specifically to restrain Wen Ning.’

Jin Guangshan raised an impressed eyebrow at the description of Wen Ning’s abilities, and looked upon Wen Ning in a new light. He wondered if he could convince Wen Ruohan to let him borrow the boy for a bit. Maybe Wei Wuxian could turn him into the Ghost General again, once they got out.

(Wen Ning had already betrayed the Wen Sect, after all. There was no future for him there.)

Wei Wuxian ran a hand along the chains and Wen Ning’s own hand, feeling the coarseness of the uncared-for skin. He then faltered, gripping Wen Ning’s hand tightly.

“What have they done to you all these years?”

Wen Qing’s breath faltered.

“Though, I guess I don’t have a right to criticize them,” he muttered, shaking his head.

‘Wei… Wei-gongzi… I’m here to help you,’ Wen Ning declared, his eyes earnest and kind despite the tight grip Wei Wuxian had on his throat. ‘Don’t worry Master Wei! I won’t harm you.’

‘How dare you hide people?!’ Wen Qing had asked, but then had helped hide Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng regardless.

“You shouldn’t have gotten involved in all this,” Wei Wuxian spoke aloud. “You shouldn’t have had… to suffer like this. And yet I turned you into a killing machine.”

Wen Qing pursed her lips. Even without knowing how her brother had died, one thing was clear: Wei Wuxian would never maliciously attack him. A possibility that had seemed so obvious throughout the first few segments was laughable now; Wei Wuxian was not the person who killed her brother.

So then, who was?

As though Wen Ning could understand him, Wei Wuxian continued speaking out loud: “The sects agreed to force me to hand you and the Stygian Tiger Seal over to them. I tried to destroy the amulet before I died, and you… it was said you’d been turned to ashes by the LanlingJin Sect.”

“I see. So Xue Yang wasn’t the first time then,” Nie Mingjue growled, the only one audacious enough to say that to Jin Guangshan’s face. “And I suppose you also don’t have an explanation for this one?”

Before Jin Guangshan could say a word, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts continued, ‘Of course. They were trying as hard as they could to restore a damaged piece of the Stygian Tiger Seal. Why wouldn’t they salvate at the thought of having the Ghost General as well? ’

“Don’t talk about him like that,” Wen Qing whispered, shaking in both fear and unbridled fury at the mere thought of people wanting to have ownership over her brother. Dead or not, Wen Ning was Wen Ning; she would never let them have him.

‘With things as they were, how could the sects let Wen Ning be turned to ashes? Wei Wuxian thought, giving a bitter laugh.

Nie Mingjue’s glare began to sear two holes through Jin Guangshan’s head, so he thought quickly and said, “Given Wei Wuxian’s description of the corpse-”

“Of my brother?”

“Ah, yes. Of-of Wen Qionglin. Given Wen Qionglin’s power, it seems likely to me that he was fairly difficult to destroy. Don’t you think it’s better for the world at large to believe such a weapo — such a man was gone? If they thought he was still around, certain people would tear the world apart trying to find him. And it’s only due to Wei Wuxian’s return that he was found at all.”

Nie Mingjue scoffed, but a look from Lan Xichen reminded him to back off.

(They still knew almost nothing about what happened at the end of Wei Wuxian’s life. They should reserve judgement for now.)

Wei Wuxian’s eyes narrowed, “I want to see who was responsible for these past ten years.”

He raised two fingers and set them against Wen Ning’s forehead, gathering a whirlpool of resentful energy around that point. The energy sparked and grew hungrily, then surged forward over Wei Wuxian’s arm and into his head.

His eyes snapped open.

Instantly, the world changed. The watchers were all in a first-person point of view, staring at a crowd of Nie, Jin, Lan, and Jiang cultivators, who glared with disdain. They felt themselves growl.

“The Ghost General is going crazy!” someone shouted.

The simulated Nie Mingjue raised his saber and leapt forward-

“A-Ning!”

They were in a cave. Chains held tightly to their ankles, wrists, and torsos. Three figures walked forward from the distance.

“Any progress?” the leader asked.

“Everything’s going well.”

“Jin Guangshan!” Madam Jin hissed, furious that she wasn’t as shocked as she should have been. “You-”

“Lan?” Lan Xichen breathed out, having recognized the clothing on one of the other men.

The memory vanished and returned them to the future. Wind blew wildly in all directions, sending Wei Wuxian’s hair flying back and giving the watchers a perfect view of the uncontested rage on Wei Wuxian’s face.

Wen Qing gave a mocking laugh.

It was a little ironic, she supposed, that Wei Wuxian (the man reviled for the disrespect he showed the dead) was the person showing the most courtesy to her brother. Between the leaders of the Great Sects and Wei Wuxian, she knew who she trusted the most with her brother’s body.

After all, the reason the other sects hadn’t raised similar armies was a lack of ability, rather than a moral disagreement.

A growl cut off the rest of Wen Qing’s thoughts as Wei Wuxian’s control over Wen Ning faltered. The Ghost General groaned and began to move, clutching at his head as though trying to endure tremendous pain.

Frowning, Wei Wuxian ran to Wen Ning and grabbed onto his head, running his fingers through Wen Qionglin’s hair. He searched and searched, until he finally managed to find what he was looking for.

Two black lines were pulled out of Wen Ning’s hair.

At first, the watchers thought the lines were branches that had been tangled into the corpse’s hair. However, upon a closer look, it was obvious that was not the case.

Long, thin, black nails had been hammered into acupuncture points on Wen Ning’s head.

Wen Qing froze.

(She was the leading expert on acupuncture in the world. And someone had used her chosen trade to hurt her brother.)

(She swore she would find whoever was responsible and make them pay for this.)

Clutching the nails tightly in his hand, Wei Wuxian glared and hissed, “The LanlingJin Clan and the GusuLan Clan.”

The words were said like a curse, but even Lan Qiren couldn’t bring himself to blame Wei Wuxian for it. Someone from the Lan Sect had done the unthinkable-

Wen Ning grunted again, trying to break free of something, and Wei Wuxian reacted instantly. He clapped his hands together, and a crimson array made of resentful energy spread out above Wen Ning. The Ghost General grunted again, resistance clear in its body language.

A drop of sweat slid down Wei Wuxian's face as he narrowed his eyes in concentration.

'Those skullpiercers sealed his mind. Whoever made them sure is something.'

Wen Ning growled again, straining against his own body to the sound of cracking bones.

'I'd never heard of anyone who could do something like this.*'

He clapped again. The array became blinding-

Black pupils swirled into existence in Wen Ning's eyes.

"Eh?" Wen Qing asked. As soon as his eyes had changed, Wen Ning's body had completely stopped its struggle.

The Ghost General collapsed onto its knees, arms hanging limply by its side. Then, slowly, those dead eyes widened, softening into something resembling their former state.

Breathing heavily, Wei Wuxian leaned against a tree and greeted the corpse: "Long time no see, Wen Ning."

"Huh? I… why does he keep talking to… is he actually-"

The corpse looked up, its eyes somehow focusing on where Wei Wuxian was. Sweat dripped down Wei Wuxian's face, but his smile was indescribably warm and comforting, visible even in the darkness of night.

"It's you… Master," the corpse said.

The corpse. Said.

The corpse.

"...A-" Wen Qing took a shaky step forward. "A-Ning?"

Two far-too aware eyes looked up at the panting Wei Wuxian. Eyes that could focus in on something, and a face that showed emotion. Corpses weren't meant to have emotion.

'Wen Ning was the most powerful corpse I created before I died,' Wei Wuxian had explained to them in the second segment. 'Aside from how he doesn't fear injuries, heat, cold, poison, or anything else humans fear, he could also think on his own. He was truly one of a kind. And yet the Wen Ning right now clearly lacks his own free will!'

"So… when he said free will-"

"He actually meant it," Lan Xichen concluded. More than one jaw was gaping open in disbelief.

“Wait, wait-” Jiang Cheng shook his head. “But Wen Ning was dead. That’s a corpse!”

Wen Qing flinched but didn’t disagree.

“He was gone. So if his soul is still there — if he’s alive….”

Then Wei Wuxian had brought the dead back to life. Mo Xuanyu had been willing to sacrifice his own soul to accomplish the same, but Wei Wuxian could raise the dead with a snap of his fingers.

So then-

“What the…” Madam Yu shook her head, unable to believe what was before her. “That — he’s-”

“The Yiling Patriarch,” Wen Ruohan concluded, feeling his lips twitch up into a smirk. “A man who creates miracles.”

‘Those skullpiercers were tricky,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘It’ll take quite some time for Wen Ning to heal completely. Even now, he’s probably having a lot of trouble thinking. I should make this fast.’

Right as he was about to step forward, Wen Ning suddenly kneeled down so that he was kowtowing before Wei Wuxian like a servant before a king. Wei Wuxian huffed and tried stopping him, but was too physically drained to move from the tree. Then, continuing to defy all laws of physics, the corpse spoke again.

“I’m sorry, Master.”

The first thing Wen Ning wanted to tell Wei Wuxian after regaining consciousness was an apology.

(What had happened at the end of Wei Wuxian’s life?)

But Wei Wuxian just huffed a laugh.

“Do you have to talk to me like this?” he asked with a smile, suddenly swaying on his feet.

“Gongzi!” Wen Ning exclaimed, rushing forward to brace the exhausted Wei Wuxian.

Smiling kindly, Wei Wuxian continued, “We’ve finally reunited. You should be happy.”

He reached into his robes and pulled out the two black nails which had been embedded into Wen Ning’s skull.

Wen Qing nearly growled at the sight of them.

“I have something to ask you. Do these look familiar to you?”

Wen Ning shook his head.

The movement was stiff and awkward, but it was movement nonetheless. Beyond even that, it was communication. The Lan Sect was famous in-part for its knowledge of inquiry, which allowed it some measure of communication with the dead.

This went far beyond that.

"I can't remember anything that happened after I got caught," he explained, his voice hoarse and raspy (from both disuse and rigor mortis), but still so uniquely kind and soft that it was unquestionably Wen Ning. "I only remember Jin Guangshan and two other people."

"I saw them," Wei Wuxian confirmed. "Jin Guangshan was bent on becoming the leader of all clans. Maybe he studied you in the hopes of creating an army of high-level fierce corpses to the shock and awe of the other clans."

"What?"

"I wouldn't do something like that," Jin Guangshan denied. "Considering the presence of other clans, I'm sure it was a collaborative effort among the higher-ups of the sects to ensure our collective safety."

"Was it?" Jin Zixuan couldn't resist asking. In that moment, Jin Guangshan's polite mask vanished and he turned to his son with an outraged expression. Horrified, Jin Zixuan flinched back, an horrified understanding of the absolute betrayal he had just committed overtaking his mind.

"I-I mean-"

"Though, what confuses me is the presence of the GusuLan Sect. I can't figure it out…" Wei Wuxian hummed thoughtfully. "How did you escape your imprisonment?"

Startled by the sudden topic change, Wen Ning hesitated for a moment before responding, "I… don't know. I just heard your voice vaguely, and then broke the chain and got out."

'Still sleeping?' Wei Wuxian asked, his eyes flashing red.

With their newly increased sensitivity to resentful energy, the watchers could now feel the unquestionable power behind that line. A power so great that Wen Ning had heard it even hundreds of kilometers away.

'How was he able to train such loyalty into the Ghost General?' Jin Guangshan wondered. 'I must have failed to gain his loyalty if he was just being kept in the dungeons. And yet without even knowing Wen Ning still existed Wei Wuxian was able to wake him up — and the skullpiercers were still there too!'

Truly, his other-self had made a mistake allowing such a brilliant mind to die (taking many of the boy's existing inventions with him too). He would be sure to not repeat that error.

“I see,” Wei Wuxian nodded. “Then-”

He cut off, hissing as the curse mark on his leg flared yet again.

Jin Zixuan had the stupidest son in the world, and he would never be able to repay Wei Wuxian for this. It didn’t matter that Wen Ning and Wei Wuxian both felt there was something to apologize for; he was certain in their intentions.

(Which made his curiosity that much stronger.)

“Don’t worry,” Wei Wuxian whispered, panting from where he kneeled. “I’ll be fine soon. This body is just too weak. I miss my old body. Do you want to know… what’s happened over the past few years?”

“I’ve… heard a few things,” Wen Ning responded. “All the people who were in the Burial Mounds are gone now. Sect Leader Jiang had his disciples kill you.”

Jiang Cheng flinched back, wincing as if something had stabbed him in the chest and then twisted the blade when he tried to get up.

“Ah, I need to clarify that,” Wei Wuxian shook his head. “Jiang Cheng didn’t kill me.”

"But-"

Wei Wuxian shook his head.

At those words, all four Jiangs breathed out simultaneous sighs of relief. It didn’t change everything — it was still a fact that Jiang Cheng had spent 13 years hunting down and torturing people who reminded him of Wei Wuxian — but at least there was that. Wei Wuxian’s death had been….

Had been something.

Contrarily, Lan Wangji and Nie Huaisang both frowned. By now, they could be relatively sure that Wei Wuxian hadn’t been personally killed by Jiang Cheng. That didn’t mean that the adult Sect Leader Jiang wasn’t involved.

(He had led the siege, after all.)

“Sorry, master,” Wen Ning said again.

“You just followed my orders,” Wei Wuxian countered. “None of this is your fault.”

“Orders?” Lan Qiren repeated. He glanced to the left and right, but everyone was just as confused as him.

“It was just… my destiny, to die like that.”

Lan Wangji shook his head, quickly walking to stand next to Wei Wuxian. Wei Wuxian wasn’t suicidal; he had proven time and time again that he knew exactly what he was doing when he faced strong adversaries. However, it was also true that he hadn't shown any strong aversion to death.

He had been just as chipper as always from the second he came back to life.

His resilience was astonishing. And somewhat worrying.

(He shouldn't have to handle everything by himself. But he had no one he could turn to for help, so he did.)

"I… also heard that you managed to seal the Stygian Tiger Seal," Wen Ning pointed out.

Wei Wuxian laughed, "Maybe I was too confident. You know me. I'm always overconfident."

There was a beat of silence between them, and Wen Ning began to sway on his feet. It was clear that the lingering effects of the skullpiercers were quite strong. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian frowned.

"We should do something about those chains of yours."

"Hm?" Wen Ning asked, blinking as though he was having trouble focusing.

Wen Qing clenched her hands tightly.

And Wei Wuxian frowned as well, worry for Wen Ning overcoming him.

'Maybe I could use Bichen,' he thought. 'It's the best option I have. Though it feels wrong to use the second jade's spiritual sword in such a way.'

Someone coughed.

"Hypocrite."

Cough, cough.

"...Is that one word really all we have to say?" Zizhen whispered.

"Don't look at me. I'm just relaying the commands of the spirits," Lan Jingyi protested.

Everyone frowned at the odd addition, wondering what was wrong with what Wei Wuxian had said. Was it because he'd used Bichen to clear away the dirt in Qinghe Nie's saber hall?

Mysterious.

Wei Wuxian looked down at Wen Ning again, and decided that he really couldn't allow Wen Ning to carry around such burdensome things — especially while his mind wasn't at 100%. It had taken him so long to meet up with Wen Ning to begin with; if he didn't act now, who knew how much longer it would take.

‘Okay, I’ll go back to the inn first. If Lan Zhan is awake, I won’t do anything. But, if he’s still asleep, then I’ll quietly borrow Bichen for a while.’

Nodding to himself, he turned around.

And found Lan Wangji staring back at him.

Nie Huaisang screamed.

“How long have you been there?!” Jiang Cheng demanded.

“Your future self is quite good at hiding his presence, Wangji,” Lan Xichen acknowledged, his heart beating quickly from the adrenaline rush he’d just gained.

In that time, a million thoughts flashed through Wei Wuxian’s mind at once:

‘Ah! How long has Lan Zhan been standing here? What if he was never drunk, and just followed me all the way out here from the beginning? That’s too awkward even for me. I didn’t mention Wen Ning earlier, but then snuck out to meet up with him as soon as Lan Zhan fell asleep — but it’s not my fault! Every day I’m stuck with him and have no alone time! And I couldn’t meet with Wen Ning while he was here! No matter how nice Lan Zhan is to me, even I don’t have the audacity to summon Wen Ning in front of him. Wen Ning is responsible for the deaths of some members of Gusu Lan. I’m shameless, but not that shameless!’

The Lans sucked in startled gasps at those words, but, remembering the Lan uniform on the man standing with Jin Guangshan, quickly deflated. Their sect rules told them to not make assumptions; they swore to learn what had actually happened before judging.

“H-hanguang-jun, hear me out,” Wei Wuxian began, only to falter when Lan Wangji stormed forward, straight past Wei Wuxian, and slammed his hand into Wen Ning’s chest.

The smack of the hit rang out in the plaza.

“...What?” several people turned to look at Lan Wangji, but he could only turn to Lan Qiren.

“Uncle, I… what is happening?” he asked, praying desperately that this was an adult thing, rather than a Hanguang-jun thing. Those hopes were dashed a moment later, when Lan Wangji saw his uncle’s unchanging bewildered expression.

It was another Hanguang-jun thing, it appeared.

To the great relief of everyone present, Wen Ning had refined enough of his consciousness to not want to fight Lan Wangji, merely lowering his head in response.

Normally, Wen Qing would be furious at anyone who was bullying her brother.

But now, knowing that this was Hanguang-jun, she was just confused.

As if he didn't feel like his rage had been properly expressed, Lan Wangji then began pushing Wen Ning until he was at least thirty feet away from the thoroughly-confused Wei Wuxian.

Although his face was its usual blankness, annoyance could be heard in his voice as he spoke:

"Go away," Lan Wangji ordered.

"I… what?" Lan Xichen asked, too stunned to mind the lack of grace he was currently exhibiting. Not that there was anyone to judge him; even Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan could only stare in wide-eyed befuddlement.

"Maybe… Wei Wuxian's asleep? And dreaming this?" Nie Huaisang suggested, giving a forced laugh. "How romantic that Hanguang-jun appears even in his dreams."

Perhaps feeling the same, Wei Wuxian furrowed his brows and thought, 'Something feels off. This is far too… childish.'

No one could deny that.

Finally, apparently satisfied with how far he'd pushed Wen Ning away, Lan Wangji spun around on his heel and walked back to Wei Wuxian. The latter scrutinized him carefully.

'He looks normal,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'His face isn't flushed or anything, and his expression is just as serious as ever. In fact, Lan Zhan looks even more serious, proper, and flawless than usual-'

And now the real Lan Wangji was faced with a terrifying debate: was it more embarrassing to focus on his idiotic other-self, or the use of the adjective 'flawless' in Wei Wuxian's description of him?

He decided both were equally bad, and resolved to shut down his mind until the scene was over, instead.

As Lan Wangji walked forward, there wasn't any wobbling or unsteadiness in his stance. He was still the calm, righteous, impervious cultivator Hanguang-jun.

Then, Wei Wuxian glanced down.

'Are his boots… on the wrong feet?'

The watchers glanced down as well.

They were.

"Jiang-xiong, pinch me," Nie Huaisang ordered. "I think I'm dreaming."

"We're in the simulation. I can't pinch you. We basically are dreaming!"

“That would explain this,” Lan Qiren admitted.

Lan Wangji swore he would never try alcohol, regardless of how tempting Wei Wuxian looked while he was offering.

An awkward but nonetheless determined expression on his face, Wei Wuxian held up two fingers and asked, “Hanguang-jun, how many fingers am I holding up?”

In response, Lan Wangji carelessly dropped Bichen to the ground and stepped closer-

“Wangji?”

-And solemnly wrapped his hands around the two fingers, gripping them tightly.

There was a snort. Then two giggles.

Then, the juniors, Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, Jiang Yanli, and Wen Qing all erupted into laughter. Some, such as Jiang Yanli, Wen Qing, and Lan Xichen, tried to hide their laughter behind coughs, or at the very least keep it down. The rest of the audience had no such courtesy.

All around Lan Wangji, the hysteria of the traitors he had temporarily been foolish enough to believe were his friends rang in his ears. Among them, the amusement of his brother and the resignation of his uncle speared into him the hardest, leaving him pinned where he stood and unable to move.

His earlier conversation with his uncle regarding their mutual decision to accept Hanguang-jun’s actions now seemed like the ignorant babblings of two children who didn’t understand how horrible the real world could be.

Wei Wuxian could only blink at the perfectly calm face of the person holding onto his fingers, the awkward silence stretching out.

‘This… definitely isn’t the normal Lan Zhan,’ he finally accepted.

As much as Wen Qing wanted to let out a sarcastic ‘No, really?’ she had to admit that he had a point; looking at Hanguang-jun’s expression, even she would never have guessed that. But the fact remained that….

“Hanguang-jun, are you drunk?”

“No,” was the decisive answer.

With an amused expression on his face, Wei Wuxian took back his hand and reached down to pick up Bichen from where it had been dropped to the ground. Lan Wangji’s hand remained in its previous position.

Meanwhile, the real Lan Wangji began working to master the art of filtering out everything around him.

Not bothering to hand Bichen to Lan Wangji again, Wei Wuxian began pulling the second jade back to the inn, thinking 'I've had countless drinking buddies and seen thousands of drunk antics, but it's the first time I've ever seen someone like Lan Zhan, who keeps a straight face and doesn't make a fuss, all while doing ridiculous acts.'

"Isn't that nice, Wangji-xiong? He thinks you're unique!"

He was resolutely ignored in response.

"Alright, let's go back," Wei Wuxian said, dragging Lan Wangji along and followed by Wen Ning shortly after. They hadn't made it more than two steps before Lan Wangji spun around and wacked Wen Ning. On the head, this time.

The Ghost General was sent stumbling back.

Without hesitating for even a moment, Lan Wangji bowed lowly in apology to Wen Qing.

"...We agreed to not punish for events that have not happened yet," she said, then, in an unusual act of pettiness, added, "Besides, I doubt this is the only thing you'll end up regretting tonight."

The genuinely-visible horror that immediately blossomed across Lan Wangji's face was just the right amount of punishment for Wen Qing to forgive his future-self's crimes.

"What are you hitting him for?" Wei Wuxian laughed.

"Go away!" Lan Wangji shouted in a threatening tone he would never have used if he was sober.

"Oh, I see," Nie Huaisang grinned. "Jealousy, is it? That's so cute!"

Lan Wangji didn't dignify the words with a response.

"This is going to confuse Wei Wuxian so much," Madam Jin sighed.

"Okay, okay, whatever you say," Wei Wuxian accepted, knowing how futile it was to try and reason with someone who was drunk. "If that's what you want, I'll make him go away."

He grabbed his flute again and brought it to his lips, only for Lan Wangji to snatch it from him and growl, "Do not play for him!"

"Why are you being so pushy?" Wei Wuxian laughed.

"Do not play for him!"

Even Wen Ruohan could admit the interaction was adorable. Upon seeing his father's expression, Wen Chao quickly switched his sneer into a neutral face. Now that Wen Chao knew what the Yiling Patriarch was capable of, he knew sticking close to his father was even more important than before.

If Wen Chao's father valued the relationship between those two freaks, Wen Chao wouldn't say a word against them.

'Oh, I get it!' Wei Wuxian's eyes widened in understanding.

"Do you?" Jiang Cheng asked, skeptically.

'Lan Zhan has always been opposed to demonic cultivation. I bet he doesn't like me using my flute to control Wen Ning. I see, I see. Gotta pet him in the direction his fur goes.'

Remembering the intolerance for demonic cultivation the simulated Lan Wangji had shown upon the Yiling Patriarch's return, Lan Xichen sighed. He couldn't blame Wei Wuxian for the boy's interpretation of events, but it was a little frustrating nonetheless.

"Alright then, I'll only play for you, okay?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Mn," Lan Wangji agreed. Despite that, he continued to play with the flute in his hands, refusing to give it back. Several seconds passed, and Wei Wuxian's expectant expression soon shifted into an indulgent understanding.

"I see," he laughed, then raised two fingers to his mouth and gave a sharp whistle.

'Keep on hiding,' the sound ordered. 'Make sure nobody finds you, especially while you're still not thinking at 100%.'

Most of the watchers had to grit their teeth to resist the command, but Wen Chao had been unprepared and quickly gave in. He ran off away from the center of the room, only to cross the dimension's boundary line and end up on the opposite side, next to where Lan Wangji was.

Wen Chao froze as soon as he realized who he was next to, vividly recalling the second jade's fury as Wei Wuxian was thrown into the Burial Mounds. He quickly backed up to his original position with the rest of the Wens, nearly tripping over his own feet in the processes.

(Wen Ruohan sighed.)

Meanwhile, looking as though he'd much rather continue following after his master, Wen Ning began dejectedly walking away, his head hanging low. The chains clinked on the ground behind him as he dragged them along.

There was a transition, and Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had returned to the latter's inn room, Bichen still slung over Wei Wuxian's back. They had both sat down on the bed, though the formality of Lan Wangji's posture was clearly juxtaposed against the casual lean of Wei Wuxian's.

(Especially ironic given which of them was drunk.)

“Lan Zhan,” the Yiling Patriarch began. “Why don’t you blush even when you’re drunk? That makes no sense. Looking at you right now, no one would be able to tell-”

Before he could finish, his wrist was snatched by Hanguang-jun’s hand and his body was pulled into Lan Wangji’s arms.

“Ah!” he exclaimed as his face was squashed against Lan Wangji’s ample chest.

“Heavens above!” Nie Huaisang sat straight up. “Wangji-xiong, you-”

“What?!” Jiang Cheng shriked.

“The heartbeats,” Lan Wangji explained.

“What?” Jiang Cheng repeated, this time in synch with Wei Wuxian.

“The face doesn’t show anything. Listen to the heartbeats.”

Jaws snapped open, unable to resist gaping before what they were seeing.

“That’s-”

“Oh, my-”

Thump. Thump.

“That…. He-”

“Hanguang-jun is-”

“So romantic!” Nie Huaisang squealed. “Wangji-xiong, you should get drunk more often! Anyone would be falling at your feet after just a few minutes with this version of you!”

“No. Need.”

“Aw,” Nie Huaisang whined.

Though that did raise a question: Hanguang-jun clearly knew he loved Wei Wuxian, so why hadn’t he ever tried flirting until he was drunk? Why was the rational version of the second jade suppressing this side of himself? Was he just scared of rejection? Him? Hanguang-jun?

Strange.

As the fast-paced thumps of Lan Wangji’s heart continued, Wei Wuxian finally understood: “I won’t be able to tell from your face, so I should listen to your heartbeats to help me understand?”

“Mn.”

Wei Wuxian bent over in laughter.

“Uncle, Xiongzhang,” Lan Wangji gasped out, turning to the older men for guidance. Luckily, they were already standing in the same place as Lan Xichen had moved closer to Lan Qiren out of a fear that his uncle would start coughing up blood.

However, to the great surprise of both of them, Lan Qiren simply looked resigned.

“Wangji, I… I do not take back what I said,” Lan Qiren forced himself to admit. “This was meant to be a private moment between the two of you. How you acted… you do not need to feel ashamed.”

Lan Xichen nodded as well, giving an encouraging smile: “I know this is a hard transition of acceptance for you to make, Wangji. You don’t need to rush yourself, but you don’t need to regret it either.”

Those words would be far more comforting if it weren’t for the fact that Lan Wangji could still hear Wei Wuxian’s and the watchers’ laughter surrounding him on all sides.

When Wei Wuxian managed to look up again, he found Lan Wangji staring unblinkingly at him. A light flush dusted Wei Wuxian’s cheeks, and an elated grin spread across his face.

‘Lan Zhan really is drunk. And he’s drunk in such a fun way! Wouldn’t it be a waste if I don’t tease him?’

Lan Wangji paled, looking between the simulated Wei Wuxian and the surrounding watchers at a frighteningly fast speed. So many emotions were warring within him that he couldn’t even begin to describe how he was feeling.

Then, the simulated Wei Wuxian sat on Hanguang-jun’s lap, practically laying across his chest and using one finger to lift his chin.

And Lan Wangji felt his brain promptly shut off.

“What are you looking at me for?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Am I pretty?”

“Mn.”

“The prettiest,” Jiang Yanli laughed, making eye contact with Jin Zixuan and promptly breaking into giggles with him.

“Then, Hanguang-jun, are you going to do whatever I tell you to do?”

“Mn.”

“Wait-”

“Answer whatever question I ask?”

“Mn.”

Jiang Cheng quickly backed up. It was one thing for Wei Wuxian to be annoyingly close and touchy; he was like that all the time with his shidis in Yunmeng, so that wasn't especially noteworthy. However, this — that obnoxiously flirty tone — made it undeniable that this was not what it was supposed to be.

The simulated Hanguang-jun was clearly drunk, so he couldn't be entirely blamed for his actions; Wei Wuxian, however, could probably drink an ocean of alcohol without getting drunk, and had no such excuse.

"What are you doing, Wei Wuxian?" Jiang Cheng hissed, looking around at the way every watcher was observing the simulation terrifyingly closely. "I swear, if you don't stop right now-"

"Alright then!" Wei Wuxian lit up, having finally found a question to ask. "Have you ever secretly tasted the emperor's smile that's in your room?"

"No."

Considering that Lan Wangji was drunk right now, the watchers who had somehow (foolishly) doubted Hanguang-jun's integrity could be put at ease.

(With the exception of the few who noticed the dozens of loopholes that question contained.)

"Got it. Do you like rabbits?"

"Yes."

"Only because you got them for him," Wen Qing pointed out, smiling with a fond exasperation. Lan Xichen, Jiang Yanli, and Nie Mingjue's expressions all matched hers to a T.

"Hmm… Oh, have you violated any rules before?"

"Yes."

Lan Qiren really wished he could be surprised.

'He really does answer any question I ask!' Wei Wuxian beamed. 'Alright then, let's cut to the chase.'

He cleared his throat.

"Have you ever liked anyone?"

"Yes."

"How about Jiang Cheng?"

A frown, "Hmph."

Wei Wuxian grinned.

The two glanced at each other awkwardly, neither really knowing what to say.

(If Sect Leader Jiang had actually been hunting down demonic cultivators, then Lan Wangji's dislike of him wasn't necessarily unwarranted.)

"Okay, then. What about Wen Ning."

The frown gave way for indifference as the drunk Hanguang-jun gave a simple, "Huh."

Wei Wuxian smiled even wider and pointed at himself, asking, "And how about this one?"

"Mine."

A dozen mouths opened up to gape in sync with Wei Wuxian, while the rest were filled with delighted squeals and amused chuckles. Contrary to everyone's expectations, once the initial shock wore off, Lan Qiren once again just sighed.

Lan Wangji felt despair consume him. His life — both inside and outside the simulation — was officially over.

'Oh, I see,' Wei Wuxian thought, glancing over at the sword swung over his back. 'When I pointed at myself, Lan Zhan probably thought that I meant Bichen.'

"He thought-"

"What-"

"No,you idiot!" Lan Xichen sighed, flinching back a moment later and amending, "I apologize. I didn't mean-"

He cut off, staring in disbelief as Wei Wuxian stood up and walked to the left and right with Bichen, seemingly confirming his theory.

"It's… fine," Jiang Yanli accepted, laughing lightly. "Even I have to admit that was a little much, even considering the situation. I apologize for the trouble, Lan-er-gongzi."

"No need," Lan Wangji responded, his ears cooling from their earlier embarrassment to a much more subdued shade. "My other self played a significant part in this as well."

'Get lost!'

'Don't you see how much he hates you?' Jiang Cheng demanded.

'Wei Ying, you really are… the kind of person I hate the most.'

'It is bad for your body and mind…. Some things are beyond your control!'

'Everything is within my control!' Wei Wuxian had shouted back.

Everyone could acknowledge that, before Wei Wuxian's death, the second jade had certainly seemed to dislike him. The only reason Wei Wuxian might have thought differently was the affectionate actions the current Hanguang-jun directed his way.

(His indescribably humiliating, shameless, and audacious actions?)

(They had worked, hadn't they?)

Smiling brightly, Wei Wuxian held out Bichen and asked, "Do you want it?"

"I want it," Lan Wangji instantly replied, snatching Wei Wuxian's wrist and tugging it close. "I want it."

"I don't think you're talking about the same thing," Nie Mingjue muttered.

Jiang Cheng scoffed and looked away.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian seemed to sway on his feet, as if the earnestness of the words (and the person they were from) were enough to take away all his strength.

'Lan Zhan. Oh Heavens, this is too much!' Wei Wuxian thought, raising a hand to cover his gasping mouth as an overjoyed blush spread across his cheeks. 'If he was this sincere towards a girl, then what a man he'd be!'

As Lan Wangji's ears turned darker than autumn leaves, Wen Ruohan sighed. Despite Wei Wuxian's obvious interest in the possibility of such a relationship, it was clear that his understanding of his own feelings was slim to none.

A pity, especially considering the hesitance sober-Lan Wangji had in regards to confessing.

However, even Wei Wuxian could realize there was something unique about the emotions he was experiencing. Recovering from the blow Lan Wangji had dealt him, he took a deep breath and spoke:

"How did you recognize me?" he asked. "Why did you help me?"

"Because he loves you!" Nie Huaisang whisper-shouted.

Lan Wangji opened his mouth to respond, and Wei Wuxian shifted closer in anticipation. However, a moment later, Lan Wangji's expression shifted, and Wei Wuxian gasped as he was abruptly shoved on the bed. Lan Wangji's fingers intertwined with his, keeping Wei Wuxian pinned against the mat.

"I see; a practical demonstration rather than a verbal response-"

"Huaisang! Stop terrorizing Wangji!" Nie Mingjue shouted, glancing in concern towards Wangji's rapidly reddening face.

The candles were snuffed out, and Bichen was thrown onto the ground once again.

Concerned, Wei Wuxian sat up in the darkness: "Lan Zhan?"

A familiar pressure point on his back was tapped once, and he was paralyzed just like he had been during 'Mo Xuanyu's' first night in the Cloud Recesses. Without explaining, Lan Wangji pulled open the blankets, tucking Wei Wuxian and himself in for the night.

"It's nine. Rest."

'So it's the scary bedtime routine of Gusu Lan at work,' Wei Wuxian realized.

"You can't honestly expect him to go to sleep at nine, can you?" Jiang Cheng asked. Knowing it was rhetorical, Lan Wangji didn't bother to respond. Jin Zixuan, however, couldn't help but chime in:

"To be fair, it's not like it's never been useful. It helped them keep track of the days in the Xuanwu cave."

"Don't remind me," Jiang Cheng requested, sighing heavily. If there was one thing to be grateful of in this further-future, it was that the overall atmosphere of every event had become far lighter. The Xuanwu cave-onward had been more than a little stressful for the watchers.

This was much more enjoyable.

"Can't we just rest and chat at the same time?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"No."

The Yiling Patriarch sighed, 'Oh, well. I'll have another chance to get Lan Zhan drunk again later. The answers will probably be revealed soon enough.'

He struggled once again against the paralysis, and frowned in annoyance.

"Lan Zhan, remove it. I got us two rooms. We don't need to cram ourselves into the same bed."

After a pause, Hanguang-jun's hand reached over and, after fumbling around in the blanket for a while, started to untie Wei Wuxian's silk belt.

Jiang Cheng screeched.

"Okay! Yes! I'm lying! I'm sleeping!" Wei Wuxian immediately cried out. "Enough! Alright! I didn't mean to remove that! I finally understand why alcohol is banned in your sect-"

Without even looking, Lan Wangji raised his hand to cover Wei Wuxian's mouth, silencing him. To top it all off, Hanguang-jun even quietly shushed him, making his opinion on the matter clear.

Noticing his brother's distress, Lan Xichen smiled warmly and suggested, "Perhaps, when you try alcohol in our world, you should have it with me so that I can help you if something starts to happen."

"I will never drink."

"Don't be like that, Wangji. As Uncle and I told you, this is private; you don't need to feel ashamed for what your other-self chooses to do with Wei Wuxian."

"I. Will. Never. Drink."

"But-"

"Thank you for the offer, Xiongzhang," Lan Wangji finished, forcefully ending the conversation in the most polite way possible.

Mouth still covered by Lan Wangji's hand, Wei Wuxian glanced to the side and thought, 'Ever since I've come back to life, every time I want to tease Lan Zhan like before, I end up digging my own grave instead. That can't be right! Where did I go wrong?'

"Poor A-Xian," Jiang Yanli laughed, delighted by what had been shown. She made eye contact with her fiance, sharing yet another smile with him.

(They knew full well that what they were doing was a grievous inversion of privacy, but the Concealment Zone hadn't recognized the scenes as part of what needed to be avoided, and no one was willing to risk something important by activating it again. They forcefully pushed their discomfort aside, trying to focus on the positives of what had been shown instead.)

"The next morning," Lan Sizhui declared.

The earliest rays of sunlight were just barely beginning to shine through the windows, painting the room a golden hue. Wei Wuxian frowned, grumbling in discomfort, and shifted in his spot.

'When two people are in the same bed it gets way too hot,' he thought, pulling off his outer robe.

"This isn't going to end well," Madam Jin sighed, trying to hide a smile that was rapidly forming on her face. Noticing that amusement, Jin Zixuan sent a sympathetic look Lan Wangji's way.

The robe was carelessly tossed on the ground, but Wei Wuxian remained under the covers of the bed. The only reason he was awake earlier than Lan Wangji was because he hadn't been able to sleep at all, so his decisions didn't necessarily contain his usual levels of foresight. After a moment, he glanced over at the still peacefully-resting Lan Wangji and frowned.

'Doesn't Lan Zhan feel uncomfortable sleeping with so many layers? No, he's drunk; there's no way he was thinking clearly. Alright, I'll be a good person,' he thought, sitting up enough to peel off Hanguang-jun's robes.

"Wha — Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji protested, scandalized.

"What's the problem? He's 'yours,' isn't he? Or did I hear that wrong?" Nie Huaisang teased.

Jin Zixuan and Lan Xichen simultaneously snorted, and Jiang Cheng gave an annoyed grumble.

"Do not laugh for no reason," Lan Wangji scolded, having nothing else he could say after his other-self's actions from the previous night. That warning only made Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, and Lan Xichen laugh even harder than before.

'Oh,' Wei Wuxian suddenly thought, pulling the watchers out of their conversations. Glancing over, they saw what had caught Wei Wuxian's attention.

The Wen Sect's seal which had been branded into Lan Wangji's chest, exactly where Wei Wuxian's had been once upon a time.

All at once, the good humor in the watcher's expressions disappeared (with the exception of Wen Chao's, who, after careful consideration, decided his father might get annoyed if he laughed out loud, and resolved to remain silent).

"That's… exactly where A-Xian had his," Jiang Fengmian pointed out, stepping closer.

And, unlike the alcohol, this reminder of Wei Wuxian was not a product of warm nostalgia. They didn't know for sure why it was there, but the watchers were certain that this was a symbol of heart-stopping grief.

An image flashed into Wei Wuxian's mind of the discipline whip scars he had seen carved into Lan Wangji's back. He shook his head at himself.

'I shouldn't go any further,' he thought, moving to pull back from Lan Wangij.

Then, Hanguang-jun's sober eyes snapped open, and Wei Wuxian froze.

The watchers paused and, in a quarter second, analyzed the scene before them at a frightening speed. They knew the buildup to the current situation hadn't been romantic (hearing Wei Wuxian's thoughts allowed them to be certain that Wei Wuxian had truly just been concerned about the temperature). And yet, looking at it now….

The shirtless Wei Wuxian stared down at Lan Wangji, surprise evident in his expression. His glossy black locks framed his face and spilled over his shoulders toward the bed, allowing them to surround Lan Wangji's face as well. Although he had begun to pull back, Wei Wuxian's hand was still on Hanguang-jun's chest, right on the edges of his robe.

And Wei Wuxian was. Still. Shirtless.

Jiang Cheng sucked in a breath, "Oh, no-"

"Oh, yes!" Nie Huaisang squealed.

Lan Wangji shot up, practically tumbling off the bed in his haste and promptly crashing onto the floor.

The laughter Lan Wangji heard echoing around him would scar him until the end of time.

"You…" Lan Wangji gasped.

"Hm?"

Although he was still smiling widely, Lan Xichen's laughter began to taper off at what he saw.

"Last night…" he looked down. "I…"

Realizing what Lan Wangji was worried about, Wei Wuxian smirked, winking at Lan Wangji and resting his chin on one hand as he said, "You were so bold last night, Hanguang-jun."

Lan Wangji was completely silent.

"Do you… really remember nothing about last night, Hanguang-jun?"

It seemed he truly didn't. Even with just this, Lan Wangji's face had become as pale as snow.

And it was horror on his face there. Laughter continued throughout the watchers, and even the real Lan Wangji seemed to not recognize the emotion on his other-self's face. But Lan Xichen could see it clear as day.

That was fear.

And Lan Xichen had no idea why it was there.

'Well, I guess it's a good thing he doesn't remember,' the ignorant Wei Wuxian supposed. 'If he asked me about sneaking out to meet Wen Ning last night, neither lying nor saying the truth would make my situation better.'

Wen Qing frowned, torn between gratitude that her brother was a thinking, feeling human soul again, and anger at how he still needed to hide like a rat from the world at large. Doing that to a corpse was one thing, but her sweet, stupidly kind brother needing to cower in fear made her blood boil.

"I…" Lan Wangji hesitated once again, a haunted look in his eyes. "Wei Ying-"

He cut off as Wei Wuxian began to laugh.

"What a man! Hanguang-jun, I was just kidding," he took off the blanket, showing that his pants and boots were still on. "I just took off our clothes. Your chastity is still intact; you haven't been tainted. Don't worry so much!"

Despite that reassurance, Lan Wangji was still frozen.

Something shattered behind them.

"Why do you always ruin their moments together?!" Nie Huaisang complained, glaring at the restless Qiankun pouches.

'Oops. With the drinking and everything, we completely forgot to duet Rest for them last night,' Wei Wuxian realized. He looked back at Lan Wangji, and found the shocked man still sitting still.

Jin Zixuan, seeing the distress his fellow romantic disaster was experiencing, sent Lan Wangji a sympathetic gaze.

By this point, the ropes on the pouch had come loose, and half the arm had already crawled out of the tiny opening. Reaching forward, Wei Wuxian began searching around through Lan Wangji's semi-open clothes, knowing the other man was too frozen to react. A few seconds later, he had retrieved his flute.

"Hanguang-jun, don't be scared, alright? I'm not going to do anything to you," Wei Wuxian explained. "It's just that you took away my flute last night, and I need it back."

The number of pitying gazes being sent Lan Wangji's way nearly tripled in quantity.

Although Lan Wangji quite clearly wanted to ask questions about the previous night, he would never do so while he had a job to complete. As such, he instead pulled out his guqin, and walked towards the three pouches.

They played Rest.

And played it again.

And again.

And finally, after the third time, managed to get the agitation to cease.

"That corpse is… quite powerful," Jiang Fengmian admitted, rubbing his eyes tiredly. To his right, his daughter had nearly completely zoned out, the lull caused by the calming notes of rest affecting her greatly.

Madam Yu clicked her tongue and rapidly shook her head, trying to wake herself up from the half-asleep drowsiness the musical cultivation had left her in.

After waiting a moment to ensure the corpse was truly settled, Wei Wuxian walked over to gather the body parts, only to suddenly comment, "Our dear friend really hasn't been missing any of his workouts."

The sash on the torso had been opened just enough to reveal a heavily muscled chest.

"Why are you focusing on that right now?!" Jiang Cheng complained.

Grinning, Wei Wuxian reached over and smacked the chest a few times, exclaiming, "Hanguang-jun, look at him! If I hit him while he were alive, the impact would have bounced back and hurt me! Just how on earth did he train?"

Lan Wangji's brow twitched as Wei Wuxian smacked a hand against the body once again.

Nie Mingjue felt a strange shiver run up his spine as he watched, perhaps as a result of the annoyed glare the real Lan Wangji was trying (and failing) to keep down.

Finally, having overcome some of his shock, Lan Wangji stepped forward to put the Qiankun pouches away, being sure to tie each of them multiple times. The thick, heavy knots were quite an overreaction.

'It's jealousy,' Nie Huaisang mouthed at a grinning Lan Xichen.

Then, hesitantly, Lan Wangji glanced back at Wei Wuxian.

"Hanguang-jun, why are you looking at me like that? Are you still worried? Trust me, I really didn't do anything to you last night. Of course, you didn't do anything to me either."

After hearing that, Lan Wangji thought for a few moments before looking up and, in a low voice, asking, "Last night, other than taking your flute, I…."

"What else did you do?" Wei Wuxian assumed. "Nothing much really. You just said a lot of things."

"...What sort of things?"

"Oh, no."

"Nothing too important. Oh, though you did say you like…"

Hanguang-jun froze.

"Wei Ying, please!"

A smirk, "You said you like rabbits!"

"Why do you feel a need to lead him on like this?" Jiang Cheng scowled, doing everything in his power to resist the urge to facepalm.

(He failed.)

Noticing that Hanguang-jun had looked away at his words, Wei Wuxian cheerily added, "It's okay! Rabbits are so cute — who doesn't like rabbits? I also like them. For eating that is!"

Madam Yu and Jiang Cheng gave simultaneous tired groans as the simulated Wei Wuxian erupted into laughter.

~~There may or may not have been a tiny smile on Lan Wangji's face that formed at the sound of Wei Wuxian's joy.~~

"Here, Hanguang-jun. You drank so much last night… er, you got so drunk last night. You're probably not feeling too good now. You can wash your face, have some water, and rest for a while before we set off again."

"Oh, right. There's still the investigation," Jin Guangshan blinked.

"This time it's pointing us Southwest. I'll go down and buy some breakfast while you're doing all that."

"Wait."

Wei Wuxian glanced back.

"Do you have any money?"

"What?"

Lan Wangji stared at him calmly, repeating, "Do you have any money?"

Wei Wuxian grinned, "Of course! You think I don't know where you keep your money? I'll grab some breakfast for you too, alright? Hanguang-jun, you can take it slow. We're not in a hurry."

Jiang Cheng sighed.

"I apologize for him. He's too used to using our money however he wants. Now, even though he's not a Lan-"

"Oh, don't worry about that, Jiang-xiong!" Nie Huaisang laughed. "Even beyond the bond of a sect, one husband's money completely belongs to the other, right?"

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue shouted as Lan Wangji's ears turned a bright, flaming scarlet and Lan Xichen, Jiang Yanli, and Wen Qing nearly doubled over in laughter.

Jiang Cheng just scowled deeper.

(Wei Wuxian was a member of the Jiang Sect. Now, everyone seemed to be working together to take him away from them.)

Wei Wuxian danced downstairs and exited the inn, picking up various snacks as he went sightseeing. He then sat down on some stairs, bathing in the sunlight as he ate.

After waiting for a while, he saw a group of thirteen to fourteen year old children run across the street.

Jin Guangshan backed away with a disgusted expression on his face, especially wary of the grabby hands of commoner children without his usual entourage (even if he consciously knew that they wouldn't be able to touch him).

The child in the lead sprinted forward like he was flying, holding onto the long string of a kite with one hand. Behind him, the rest of the children ran carrying toy bows and arrows, shouting as they chased down the kite.

Laughing, Jiang Yanli turned to her fiance and asked, "They're only a little younger than A-Ling. Do you think he's done something like this too?"

"No need. He can actually use a bow," Jin Zixuan pointed out, trying desperately to not think about the bullying he had seen his son dream about going through while Wei Wuxian tried to heal the curse mark. He deeply, truly hoped Jin Ling's imagined lack of friends wasn't an accurate representation of the situation.

(And yet, time and time again, Jin Ling had been put in danger because he went on nighthunts alone.)

Several shots were fired, but the flimsy faux bows were unable to shoot fast enough to pierce the rapidly twirling target. As Wei Wuxian watched the kite shooting, he couldn't help but reminisce about his own experiences.

'Back in Lotus Pier, I almost always won first place when we were doing this. Jiang Cheng, on the other hand, was always second. His always flew too far to shoot, or not as far as mine.'

Jiang Cheng flushed, remembering the few times Wei Wuxian had 'let' him win while Madam Yu had confined him to Lotus Pier.

(Right before it went up in flames.)

He frowned at the memory, but took a deep breath and forced himself to keep watching.

'Our kites were almost twice the size of other people's kites,' his thoughts continued, and the memory formed. 'It was in the shape of a flying beast. With bright, exaggerated colors, a large, gaping mouth, and sharp tails that flapped in the wind… from a distance, it was bright and lively and a little bit silly. Jiang Cheng and I both loved them. Whenever we took them out to compete, we were so proud…. Uncle Jiang had assembled the framework for us, and Shijie was the one who painted it.'

Knowing that Wei Wuxian still referred to her as 'Shijie' despite not being part of the Jiang Sect anymore filled Jiang Yanli with warmth. On the other hand, Madam Jin and Madam Yu both frowned.

For years and years and years, Madam Yu had accused Jiang Fengmian of betraying her and siring Wei Wuxian. Those claims were never serious (if someone had actually believed them, Jiang Cheng's position as heir would be much more tenuous; Madam Yu would never do that to her son), but they had still been spoken. Over and over again, she had claimed that Jiang Fengmian — the man who personally put together a kite for her son — was neglectful and unloving.

Well, he had made a kite for Wei Wuxian too-

What did that change? He had put in the same amount of work for Jiang Cheng.

Jiang Cheng had believed her claims without opposition. There must be some merit to them-

Or he had just started to believe her because she had the loudest mouth.

'Jiang Fengmian! Do you really think that anything will change just because you've raised your voice?' Madam Yu had screamed.

Slowly, Madam Yu's eyes drifted to her former friend, the fierce scowl on her face quite clearly conveying her message:

'I didn't know about the kite. How am I supposed to take something I'm not aware of into account?'

The steady, unfaltering look Madam Jin sent back more than answered that.

'The only reason you don't know is because you were never there. If you weren't meeting with me, you were on nighthunts. If you weren't doing that, then you were terrorizing everyone at Lotus Pier and making them miserable. You never saw them happy, so you never thought it might be you that caused the change.'

A raised eyebrow: 'And you think you're any better? I at least allowed the boy to stay; your son has never even seen his half siblings!'

In response, a tired huff: 'Yes. I know that now. We're both wrong, and we both need to change.'

As the two Madams had their silent conversation with each other, Wei Wuxian's attention was occupied by a far more important matter: determining what the children's kite was supposed to be a picture of.

'...If it's not a stone, then maybe it's a pancake?' he thought, furrowing his brows in concentration. 'Or a beast I don't know about?'

Suddenly, a gust of wind blew the kite over, sending it crashing onto the ground.

"Oh, no! The sun fell!" one child cried out.

Wen Ruohan immediately tensed, realizing what was going on. In the face of such blatant disrespect toward his sect from the powerless, he would normally take a stand. Unfortunately, this was a simulation, and there was nothing he could do.

(And besides, he started a war, and then lost. It may have been from betrayal, but he knew he only had himself to blame.)

'I see,' Wei Wuxian thought, realizing the same thing Wen Ruohan had. 'They're playing an imitation of the Sunshot Campaign.'

"They were in the area of Yueyang," Lan Sizhui narrated. "When the QishanWen Sect was at the peak of its prosperity, it abused its powers everywhere. Since Yueyang wasn't far from Qishan, its people suffered greatly."

Glares were being sent Wen Ruohan's way from all sides, but, as a person who had always preferred giving his disciples the power to make their own choices on how to handle matters, he was indifferent.

His son, on the other hand, wilted into a puddle at Nie Mingjue's fury.

Lan Sizhui had paused for a moment, as if needing to think over the lines he'd just said. Then, with a voice that sounded even more solemn than before, he cleared his throat and continued:

"Its people had suffered greatly, having been troubled by their unleashed beasts or bullied by their arrogant cultivators. After the Sunshot Campaign, the Wen Sect was… it was annihilated by the combined force of the other sects. The hundreds of years old foundation came crumbling down. In the areas around Qishan, many places enjoyed activities which celebrated the Wen Sect's destruction to the point where they had turned into traditions. This game was one of them."

Happy wasn't nearly enough to describe the sheer, ravenous glee that formed on Nie Mingjue's face at those words. He had more than gotten his revenge; in that world, Wen Ruohan would never hurt anyone again.

But, as he glanced to the side and saw Wen Qing frowning deeply, he couldn't help but wonder what happened between 'Wen Ruohan's death' and 'the Wen Sect's annihilation.'

The children stopped the chase and gathered around the fallen flag, wondering "What should we do? We didn't even shoot down the sun, it fell off by itself. Now who's the leader?"

"Me, of course!" one child raised his hand. "I'm Jin Guangyao! I killed the Wen Sect's biggest villain!"

Wen Ruohan clicked his tongue at the reminder, while Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang cooed. Having been reminded of the accomplishment of their to-be sworn brother, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen made eye contact, smiling warmly.

Wei Wuxian matched their smiles as he watched the kids argue with one another. Then, the world froze. The memory was being put on pause by the spirits to give Jin Ling time to narrate appropriately:

"In these types of games, the head of all cultivators, Lianfang-zun, who was currently the most successful of all, was of course a popular character. Although his family background was a bit disgraceful-"

"That's not the only disgraceful thing about-"

"Jingyi, shut up!" Jin Ling fired back.

As the juniors began arguing, Madam Jin heard a soft "A-Niang?" from behind.

She glanced back, and saw her son looking up at her hesitantly. Seeing his wide, open, hopeful eyes, she couldn't help but look away.

"A-Niang, later…."

"I know," she responded, not elaborating.

(Yes, she had acknowledged that there was something wrong with the way she had been acting. Now, she had to figure out what to do about it.)

"-And besides, it's not disgraceful," Lan Sizhui commented. "This is just about the general public's opinion of him. Like Senior Wei said, his mother has nothing to be ashamed of."

"Okay, but what about his fath-"

"Anyways," Ouyang Zizhen said, and there was a sound followed by a 'hey!' like he had snatched the script out of Jin Ling's hands. "Anyways, um. Although his family background was a bit disgraceful, the fact that he'd later climbed to such a high rank was exactly why people respected him."

'Of course,' Nie Mingjue smirked. 'If he's my sworn brother, he has to be the most capable there is.'

"During the Sunshot Campaign, Jin Guangyao spent years secretly working undercover in the Wen Sect, deceiving them and uncovering a tremendous amount of information."

'Years,' Wen Ruohan mentally repeated. 'No wonder I grew to trust him.'

"After the Sunshot Campaign, Jin Guangyao used flattery, wit, and countless other methods to rise to the rank of Chief Cultivator, fully deserving of the title. Such a life could be considered a legend!"

It sounded like Lan Jingyi was gagging in the background.

‘If I’d been playing, I’d definitely want to be him too,’ Wei Wuxian thought, time resuming. ‘Choosing this boy to be the leader would indeed be reasonable.’

“Ah, Er-ge, doesn’t this work out great?” Nie Huaisang grinned. “Your to-be brother in law already likes your to-be sworn brother!”

“Oh, wonderful,” Jiang Yanli clapped her hands together. “When that happens, I’ll really be related to A-Xian through A-Xuan!”

Because Wei Wuxian’s husband’s brother’s sworn brother’s actual brother would be her husband.

“We’re closer than that!” Jiang Cheng protested. “He’s our martial brother! You don’t both have to marry to be related.”

“But it would all work out so perfectly then,” Jiang Fengmian pointed out to his son, and Lan Qiren gave a heavy sigh in the background.

However, by now, the other children had raised their objections to the first’s suggestion.

“But I’m Nie Mingjue! I won the most battles and captured the most people. I should be the leader!”

The boy who had taken the role of ‘Jin Guangyao’ responded, “But I’m the Chief Cultivator.”

‘Nie Mingjue’ threateningly raised his fist, “So what if you’re the Chief Cultivator? You’re still my youngest brother. You’ll have to run away whenever you see me anyways.”

Nie Huaisang collapsed into laughter at (what he felt was) a flawless impersonation of Nie Mingjue.

‘Jin Guangyao’ decided to stick to his character, flinching and quickly running away.

“You short-lived idiot,” someone else grumbled.

“‘Jin Zixuan!’ You died earlier than I did! You’re even more short-lived!” ‘Nie Mingjue’ responded, feeling defensive of the character he’d chosen to be.

The two made eye contact with each other, finding their earlier humor made awkward by the reminders of their deaths.

Huffing, ‘Jin Zixuan’ replied “So what if I’m short lived? I still ranked third.”

“Even if you’d ranked third, it’s only for your face!”

Jin Zixuan flinched (remembering his less-than-chivalrous treatment of Jiang Yanli during the ‘soup-incident’) and shrank in on himself slightly. When Jiang Yanli glanced over in concern at his reaction, he flushed and looked away.

‘Sorry,’ he mouthed to her.

She tilted her head in confusion.

One child seemed to be tired of all the running and fighting, so he sighed and sat down on the stairs: “Okay, okay. Let’s stop fighting. I’m the Yiling Patriarch, so I’m the strongest. If you guys insist so much, I can be the leader.”

Wei Wuxian was speechless.

By the boy’s waist, there was indeed a wooden stick meant to be Chenqing. This was the Yiling Patriarch.

“Shameless,” Lan Qiren muttered, looking between the boy and man sitting next to each other. “He certainly plays his part well.”

‘A tiny Wei Ying,’ Lan Wangji realized looking back and forth between the real and pretend one and wishing he could stop the idea of children from entering his mind.

‘Wangji, calm down!’ Lan Xichen mentally responded, seeing what his brother was feeling. ‘You’re only fifteen! Adopting children can come later!’

“No, no!” someone objected. “I’m Sandu Shengshou. I’m the most powerful.”

Jiang Cheng startled.

“Jiang Cheng, how is it possible for you to be better than me? Is there even one time you didn’t lose to me? How dare you say you’re more powerful? Aren’t you embarrassed?”

Madam Yu and Jiang Cheng both rolled their eyes.

“That’s definitely Wei Wuxian,” Nie Mingjue muttered.

“Hmph. Why can’t I be better than you? Don’t you remember how you died?”

All the light left Wei Wuxian’s face at once.

There was a beat of silence. The children continued arguing, but the watchers’ attention was occupied by Wei Wuxian’s expression.

“It was as if he had been pricked by a poisonous needle. A sharp, faint pain came from all around his body,” Lan Jingyi explained, sounding quite confused.

The watchers wished they shared his confusion.

‘The Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian is dead!’

‘Really? Who killed him?’

‘Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, the leader of the Jiang Clan.’

“He’s not denying it,” Wen Ruohan pointed out.

“And who would there be to deny it to?” Madam Yu hissed. “He knows what really happened. Being reminded of that doesn’t mean he has to think about it! Besides, he already told Wen Qiongling that wasn’t what happened!”

“Then what do you think happened?”

The boy playing the Yiling Patriarch was suddenly shoved to the ground, the "Stygian Tiger Seal" cracking on impact.

"Hey! Why did you guys push me?" he sat up and pointed accusingly. "It was all of you against just me! That's not fair!"

Frowning, Jiang Fengmian commented, “They said his ghost army backfired on him. I don’t see why that wouldn’t be the case, even if…”

Even if Jiang Cheng led a siege against him. A siege that the four remaining great sects had all participated in.

‘Everyone said you were consumed by your ghost army,’ Hanguang-jun had said. ‘Is that what happened?’

‘I died,’ Wei Wuxian responded. ‘It doesn’t matter… how it happened.’

But then-

From his spot beside Wei Wuxian, the ‘Yiling Patriarch’ clapped his hands twice, gathering the attention of the whole group. He stood up and grinned.

“Look at me! Chenqing on my left, the Stygian Tiger Seal on my right, and the Ghost General! I’m invincible!” he cackled, ignoring the fact that the "seal" was now broken. “Where’s Wen Ning? Come out!”

A child from the back of the crowd raised a hand and feebly replied, “I’m here… uh… I’m just saying, when the Sunshot Campaign happened, I wasn’t dead yet.”

“Doesn’t matter!” another person responded.

“...Does anyone else think these children’s impersonations are unnervingly accurate?” Nie Huaisang asked.

Lan Xichen, Lan Qiren, Nie Mingjue, Wen Qing, Wen Ruohan, the Jiang parents, Madam Jin, and Jin Zixuan all raised their hands.

“Cultivators, may I ask you a question?” Wei Wuxian spoke up. The preteens froze and turned to face him, not used to an adult interfering with their game in such a relaxed manner.

The 'Yiling Patriarch' looked at him with both wonder and caution as he asked, "What is it?"

Wei Wuxian did a visual sweep over the crowd of children and asked, "Why isn't there anyone from the GusuLan Sect?"

Jiang Yanli giggled knowingly at the question, and Wen Qing gave a fond smile.

"There is."

"Where?"

Frowning, the 'Yiling Patriarch' pointed at a child who hadn't said anything the entire time: "That's him."

The child had delicate features — the seedling of a charming, handsome man. A white rope was wrapped around his forehead, replacing a forehead ribbon.

"Who is he?" Wei Wuxian asked.

The 'Yiling Patriarch' scowled in disdain: "Lan Wangji."

'...Fine. The children understand the essence. Someone like Lan Wangji should indeed shut his mouth and stay silent,' Wei Wuxian thought. Then, out of the blue, Wei Wuxian's lips curled upward again.

"The poisonous needle had been pulled out and tossed in a far away corner. All the pain he was feeling was instantly wiped away," Lan Sizhui explained.

As Lan Wangji blushed, Jiang Cheng couldn't help but flinch. Once again and even without actually being there, his future self had brought Wei Wuxian misery, while Lan Wangji's….

"How strange," Wei Wuxian muttered. "Why can someone as stuffy as him always make me so happy?"

Warmth rapidly spread across Lan Wangji's chest, and he felt his heart rate quadruple in an instant. He glanced back at his uncle, and found nothing but approval in the man's gaze.

After another moment of hesitation in which he looked back and forth between Wei Wuxian and his uncle, Lan Wangji relaxed, a genuine smile spread across his lips.

The watchers were brought inside to where Hanguang-jun was descending the stairs (finally having composed himself enough after the panic Wei Wuxian had instilled in him earlier). As he stepped outside, he was greeted by the sight of Wei Wuxian and a gaggle of children eating steamed meat buns together.

Taking another bite, Wei Wuxian looked at the two children standing back to back before him and instructed, "Now, in front of you, there are thousands of the Wen Sect's cultivators! All of them are heavily armed and surround you so closely that even a single drop of water wouldn't be able to get past. Your eyes should be sharper — yes, that's it!"

Lan Qiren had always been an educator first and foremost, but he had also all but raised his nephews single handedly. He had seen countless parents throughout his life, and could now more than understand what Jiang Yanli had meant when she said Wei Wuxian's role as head disciple had made him good with kids.

Which, horrifyingly, meant that Lan Qiren had officially run out of reasons to prevent his nephew from trying to court Wei Wuxian. A certain levity rose up within him at that realization, but it was accompanied by a sense of dread.

It would be quite a mess when they left the simulation.

Meanwhile, unaware that he was being watched (by either Lan Wangji or the watchers), Wei Wuxian continued, "Okay, Lan Wangji, pay attention here! You aren't how you usually would be. You're covered in blood! There's a lot of killing intent! You look really scary! Wei Wuxian, move closer to him. Do you know how to spin the flute? Let me see you try; use only one hand. Be cooler! Do you know how to look cool? Come, let me show you."

'Wei Wuxian' handed the stick that had been dubbed Chenqing over, and the real Wei Wuxian expertly spun it with one hand (to the gasps, awe, and applause of the children).

"Can you imagine how they'd react if they found out they were being directed by the real Yiling Patriarch?" Jin Zixuan excitedly asked, making Jiang Cheng give a reluctant smile and causing Nie Huaisang to snicker at the possibilities.

"Okay, now you try," Wei Wuxian directed, handing the stick back. At that moment, Hanguang-jun stepped close, finally alerting Wei Wuxian to his presence. Seeing that he was down, Wei Wuxian dusted off his trousers and said a quick goodbye to the children, laughing as he returned to Lan Wangji.

"Sorry Hanguang-jun. I gave them all the breakfast I'd bought for you," Wei Wuxian explained.

"I can't believe you gave him your money," Jiang Cheng sighed, finding Lan Wangji's acceptance of the situation unbelievable.

"Really? I think it's rather nice," Wen Qing countered. "After all, it means Wei Wuxian currently has access to a surplus of food."

Understanding instantly, the watchers felt their good moods get washed away by the tide of those words.

As if agreeing with Wen Qing, Wei Wuxian continued, "Say, don't you wish we had this during the war?"

"Had what?"

“Food this good! And plenty of it! Shijie did her best to help me, but you know there wasn’t much that could be done.”

Jiang Yanli blushed a rosy pink as Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, Wen Qing, Nie Mingjue, and Lan Xichen gave her a round of applause for her effort.

“It’s a good thing they went all out for the post-victory banquet. I was wasting away before then,” Wei Wuxian cried out. “Though I guess you Lans didn’t get the full experience since Lan Qiren insisted on vegetarian food for all of you.”

As Wei Wuxian shivered in visible disgust, Lan Wangji allowed his lips to relax into a genuine smile.

The world shifted once again, bringing them to a crowded military camp filled with cheers. Just outside the walls of the Nightless City, cultivators and servants alike were raising toasts and bringing out the wine Qishan had kept in its storages. Blood drenched the cultivator’s clothes, but even the injured had bright smiles on their faces, warmed by the setting sun.

“Directly after the war?” Wen Ruohan assumed, eyeing the cheap tents and injured crowd with a terrifyingly blank expression. He turned to the Nightless City he could see just a few li away, and wondered if his corpse was still laying there.

(Or if his ashes had already been scattered.)

Although the lower-ranking soldiers were free to move around as they pleased, the ones truly being celebrated were all gathered together in the largest tent, sitting at tables far too expensive for the non-building they were currently inside. Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, and Jiang Cheng all sat with their highest ranking disciples and clan members, creating pockets of each sect’s colors in the area. At the head of the seats was Jin Guangshan, his robes as pristine and golden as always — the only ones without any obvious stains.

Nie Mingjue scowled. Since the various revelations regarding Xue Yang, he had found his patience for the Jin Sect rapidly decreasing.

At that moment, Jin Guangshan stood, raising a cup in toast: “For the past few years, our sects have all worked tirelessly to defeat the tyranny known as the Wen. Today, our victory has at last been won!”

There were cheers from all around as the various disciples celebrated. The Sect Leaders (expected to maintain their composure) did little more than smile, but their joy was equally clear.

“In celebration of this momentous occasion, the Jin Sect has prepared a feast for all!” Jin Guangshan revealed.

“Thank you, Sect Leader Jin!”

“Thank you!”

“Thank you!”

Jin Guangshan nodded at the people who had spoken to them, accepting their thanks with grace. Meanwhile, young women wearing the uniforms of the Jin Sect’s servants filed in, leaving a plate at every person’s table. Their eyes shone with awe as they approached Nie Mingjue; their respect was unparalleled around the twin jades; going to the Jins had blush forming on many of their faces; Jiang Cheng was given his food enthusiastically.

If the servant hesitated for a moment before approaching Wei Wuxian with his food, no one was willing to comment on it.

“Oh, wonderful,” Jiang Yanli lit up, seeing what had been on the plates. “A-Xian loves pheasant!”

Which made it perfectly appropriate that the Jiang Sect had been given an expertly prepared plate of heavily seasoned pheasant (wonderfully showcasing the care Jin Guangshan had put into customizing the dishes for each sect).

Watching steam rise from the juicy meat, some of the watchers were forced to swallow. The simulation ensured they couldn’t get hungry, but it had been quite some time since they had last eaten anything.

Wine was passed around as well, and, before too long, the hall was filled with the sounds of excitement and laughter. The war had just ended; everyone was ready for the celebration.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian was easily draining his wine glass like it was water, showing a great appreciation for the sweet taste. To his left, Jiang Cheng was trying desperately to remain as composed and elegant as his father had been before him (but even he couldn’t help but react with joy when he took a bite of the food).

Upon a closer inspection of the meal, Jiang Yanli was overwhelmed by a certainty that she had been consulted about the best spice combination to use when preparing dishes for Yunmeng. In fact, given the way Jiang Cheng spun around to look back at her other self with awed gratitude, she was sure that was true.

Finally, Wei Wuxian took a bite. He chewed once, then twice, then brought a hand to his mouth, a troubled expression on his face.

“Aw, is the food too nostalgic?” Nie Huaisang suggested.

“You think he’s getting emotional about Lotus Pier?” Wen Qing asked, observing the tremble in his hands.

Looking at Wei Wuxian’s now-wide eyes, Lan Xichen added, “That does seem to be-”

Wei Wuxian stood up, jostling the table before him in his haste. A cup tipped over and shattered against the ground.

“Wei Ying?” the real Lan Wangji asked, standing up as well.

“Ah, Wei-gongzi,” Jin Guangshan cleared his throat, looking awkwardly around the now-silent room. “Is something wrong? Was the food not to your liking, or was it the drink?”

Without bothering to respond, Wei Wuxian spun on his heel and stormed out of the tent.

Everyone else was left speechless.

“That… he didn’t even dismiss himself,” one cultivator muttered to his friend. She nodded in equal annoyance, and turned to glare at the place Wei Wuxian had just departed from. The original speaker, however, turned to stare at the gaping Jiang Cheng, who was quickly becoming aware of the number of eyes on him.

“Stupid Wei Wuxian,” Jiang Cheng muttered, wishing he could hide himself under a rock. Sighing in agreement, Madam Yu silently cursed Wei Wuxian’s foolishness.

“What do you think he’s trying to say by leaving in the middle of the banquet?” someone else asked.

Eyes glanced back and forth between where Wei Wuxian had left from and where the sect leaders sat. Although the Lan Sect’s rules against gossip kept that particular group from saying anything, it was clear that they were in agreement with everyone else’s outrage.

“What? Is he too good to eat with us?”

“Does he think he won the war by himself?”

“Well, him and his corpses.”

Lan Wangji frowned deeply.

(Was Jiang Wanyin not going to say anything to defend his head disciple?)

“Corpses and ghosts and beasts.”

“Yes, yes, his monsters. Doesn’t need humans if he has them, huh?”

“How arrogant-”

The scene changed — sky darkening at once — and gagging replaced the gossip.

The watchers flinched back, startled by the sudden change in scenery. They were outside the tent, and far away from the crowds they could hear in the distance. The pitch black sky above them showed the that sun had already set, which made the only sound they could hear appear that much louder.

Someone was gagging and hacking and coughing below them, unable to throw up despite his attempts. A lump in the shadows shifted — nearly impossible to make out from behind their pitch black hair and clothes.

They heaved again, barely able to sit upright as they desperately tried to expel the contents of their completely empty stomach.

"...Wei… Ying?" Lan Wangji asked, recognizing the figure at last.

Wei Wuxian curled over again, coughing acid and bile onto the dry grass.

The darkness spread out, overwhelming their vision and taking over the entire simulation. When it cleared, it was instantly obvious that they were in another memory.

After all, to someone who could sense resentful energy, it was impossible to not recognize the Burial Mounds.

Jiang Yanli gasped, feeling as though her lungs were being crushed by the tremendous pressure weighing down on her. She had no time to worry about that, however; she knew she was fine.

The simulated Wei Wuxian, struggling to move forward, wasn't so lucky.

Crows cawed mockingly overhead, and Wei Wuxian crawled across the dry ground. He breathed in heavily, obviously exhausted by the few simple movements he could do.

Wen Qing kneeled down beside him at once, and, as she inspected him, quickly became pale. As the other watchers saw the change in her skin tone, they felt their own dread rise as well.

Demonic cultivation allowed Wei Wuxian to deal with corpses fairly easily, but it in no way helped with what was now a far more pressing problem: food. His cheekbones were sharp enough to cut glass, and he had lost so much blood from the few corpses who had gotten close enough to bite him that his skin was practically translucent, now. His veins were far too easy to see. Wei Wuxian had always been thin and muscular before being thrown in.

(Not much fat to sustain him in a situation like this.)

When Lan Wangji had seen the child Wei Wuxian starving in the streets, he thought nothing could be worse than that. However, as the simulation loved to remind him, when it came to Wei Wuian, Wangji's predictions had a tendency to be wrong.

Wei Wuxian stopped, unable to move anymore, and brought a hand to his forehead. If he wasn't already lying on the ground, he would have surely fallen over. Nausea and dizziness rose up within him from the lack of food and water, and the world around him blurred.

The simulation blurred as well, making Wen Chao feel dizzy just from looking at it.

Wei Wuxian clutched his own stomach next, breathing out shakily. He could feel it eating him from the inside out, his stomach acid burning through his flesh for lack of anything better to do. It rose up within him, crawling its way to the top-

He gagged, bile spilling out of his mouth onto the dirt below.

Then, he looked to the side, and found something on the ground next to him. It was a dead crow.

Food.

"Wait, A-Xian that-"

The reasoning behind Jiang Yanli's objection was obvious. What was before them was barely identifiable as a crow. There was more rot than bird now. Feathers were scattered — bones stuck out — there was a growth of fungus and moss crawling up the side. Bugs and maggots had nearly eaten it clean, and some were still squirming around in its head.

But they were food too.

Wei Wuxian snatched the bird and brought it to his-

He doubled over again, and the watchers realized they had been brought back to the post Sunshot Campaign celebration. Wei Wuxian coughed against the ground, unable to throw up when he hadn't eaten in over a day.

His throat burned with the action like a thousand knives were spearing at him from the inside.

"Oh. The pheasant," Wen Qing realized. "No wonder he couldn't eat."

"But-but A-Xian loves pheasant," Jiang Yanli protested. "He-that's… I-"

Even she had no idea what she was trying to say. All she could do was attempt to voice the absolute feeling of 'that's impossible' that was rising up inside her.

Jin Zixuan stepped close, setting his hand next to hers and wishing he could embrace her this time.

Then, to the watcher's growing dread, the memories began again.

Wei Wuxian was standing now, having eaten just enough to regain that energy. The few roots or weeds he had managed to have were just barely enough to keep him alive from one bird to the next. Normally, it would be child's play for him to shoot a bird down with a well-thrown rock.

Now, he could barely keep himself upright as he stumbled forward.

At first it looked like Wei Wuxian was trudging through a damp swamp colored red with resentment. However, a moment later, the watchers remembered that the Burial Mounds was a wasteland with barely any water.

What Wei Wuxian was trudging through was a soup made of bodies and blood.

These were some of the newer ones. They had not yet decomposed into skeletons, instead becoming a sludge of rotten flesh and guts and liquids. Thousands of bodies were piled on top of each other at the bottom of the Burial Mounds, making a perfect feeding ground for vultures and fungus.

Just a short while ago, Jin Zixuan had wished the simulation included smell so that he could fully experience the pheasant the sect's had been served. Now, words could not describe how grateful he was that that was not the case.

"Senior Wei knew, based off the stars, what direction Yunmeng was in," Lan Sizhui explained. "He was fully aware of where he had to go, and how far it was to get there. Without Suibian, it would take a significant amount of time. He had understood that. Or, at least, he thought he had."

"Ominous," Jingyi commented.

A few bitter smiles appeared, but the return to the worst time in Wei Wuxian's life sucked out any joy they might have had.

From the sludge, a half decomposed arm rose up, eager for human flesh.

"Down," Wei Wuxian ordered.

The command reverberated through the watchers just as much as it did through the corpse, and several people fell to their knees. It was clear, by now, that Wei Wuxian had gained mastery over the initially deadly Burial Mounds.

"How long has it been?" Lan Xichen asked.

Looking at the gaunt, bloodless, impossibly-thin limbs on Wei Wuxian's once-muscular body, Nie Huaisang decided he didn't want to know. Corpses were no longer a problem for him, but…

Food most definitely was.

Wei Wuxian walked forward again, ignoring the blood that had soaked through his robes and the rotted flesh that clung to his skin. Then, suddenly, he stumbled.

"Wei Ying?"

Nothing had grabbed onto him — his command over the dead was now uncontested — and nothing had gotten in his way. His body was now just too weak for him to control. He gasped and straightened up, making sure to keep his mouth and nose out of the rot that surrounded him. An intestine and a half-destroyed finger were nearly close enough for him to taste.

Corpses covered every centimeter of land in this section of the mounds, making it impossible to find a weed or root or bamboo shoot to stave off his hunger. Weakly, he trudged over to a nearby rock and crawled on top of it, just barely high enough to escape the sludge.

'A-Chao is the one who threw him in there,' Wen Ruohan recalled. 'After attacking Lotus Pier on my orders.'

His war was the reason Wei Wuxian was struggling like this. He was the reason that brilliant mind was crawling through guts and flesh and starving on a rock.

He looked down, unsure of what to do with that information.

And Wei Wuxian remained still, panting heavily on the rock as the world spun around him. There was only so long someone — even a cultivator — could go without food and sleep. His eyes fluttered closed, then snapped open.

For all he knew, if he closed his eyes now, it might be for the last time.

Wen Qing cursed. The gauntness of Wei Wuxian's body was all the more obvious now that he was laying still. If she had thought he looked bad upon his return to civilization, it was nothing in comparison to now.

'Some of those corpses have more flesh on them than you do!' Wen Qing mentally shouted.

Wei Wuxian curled up into a ball, feeling his stomach clawing at him from within. His mouth watered and thoughts of warm, thick soup filled his mind. He could smell the spice and could see the steam and could taste the way the rich, filling broth would spread across his tongue-

His stomach growled dangerously, and Wei Wuxian's eyes nearly fluttered closed yet again.

'It's fine,' Lan Wangji reminded himself. 'The real version of Wei Ying is outside the simulation with all the food he could ever need. And even then, the simulated version gets out. But-'

"If he doesn't move soon…" Wen Ruohan trailed off, glancing over at Wen Qing expectantly. She pursed her lips, then looked back at Wei Wuxian with a firm expression.

"Unless he does something soon, his death wouldn't be a surprise."

Lan Wangji felt his heart freeze.

"I wouldn't worry too much though," Wen Qing continued, sounding as though she was speaking to herself more than them. "Wei Wuxian might seem exhausted now, but we know he gets out of the Burial Mounds. Besides, he… already has experience with starvation; he knows what to look out for in terms of his body."

(And how wrong was the world for that to be even remotely comforting?)

Wei Wuxian's mouth watered even more as the salty spice of soup consumed his mind, and his stomach gave another whine of protest. Even the revolting smell surrounding him wasn't enough to curb his hunger.

He swallowed again.

The sun traveled forward, and hours passed as Wei Wuxian laid on that rock, unable to move. His torn-up robes had shifted slightly during that time, falling off just enough to reveal the set of ribs nearly bursting through the skin blanketing them. It truly seemed like any second now Wei Wuxian would wither away.

Jiang Fengmian sat down, burying his face in his hands. He had spent years searching for Wei Wuxian, hoping to stop him from having to experience too much starvation. He had succeeded, even if it had taken longer than it should have.

And, less than a week after his death, Wei Wuxian had gone right back to experiencing the same things.

'Useless,' he thought. 'I stopped whatever happened to him while he was in front of me, but as soon as I looked away, they just started up again. First with San-niang's punishments, and now….'

(And that was without taking into account everything that was happening while they stayed in the simulation.)

The sun was starting to set, and Wei Wuxian was still lying on the rock, clutching his stomach.

"He's… okay, right?" Nie Huaisang asked, turning to Wen Qing. After hesitating for a moment, she shook her head:

"Wei Wuxian has experience with starvation. I highly doubt he would be stuck like this if it wasn't serious," she pointed out, remembering his tolerance for pain with increasing annoyance. "It's entirely possible this will leave him with lasting damage even after he gets out. In some ways… I'm almost grateful he managed to get a new body."

Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, frowning deeply at the sight before him.

'Hungry,' Wei Wuxian thought, swallowing again.

The world was still spinning, and Wei Wuxian's stomach cried out to him again, sending insistent pain signals to his brain like an annoyed, over-privileged client.

"Yes, yes," he muttered through chapped lips, patting his belly. "I know."

“This is not something to laugh about!” Wen Qing shouted at him.

Wei Wuxian winced, gripping his stomach even tighter as pain signals began to cut through him like he was being stabbed from within. He panted heavily, swallowing again as thoughts of food rose up once more.

Then, he looked down, and saw the swamp of meat below him.

“No,” Lan Qiren whispered, eyes widening in horror. “No, no-”

Wen Ruohan’s mouth dropped open in shock.

Slowly, Wei Wuxian’s hand began to fall toward the ocean of flesh surrounding the mini-island he laid on. He scooped some up, observing the rot like it was a delicacy prepared by a master chef.

Like the revolting soup around him had been a specialty prepared by his shijie.

Wei Wuxian crashed to the ground. It was the older him — the one who had already escaped the Burial Mounds — and who had stormed out of the post war party to try to throw up in the woods.

“Did he… did he actually….”

“Do you blame him?” Lan Wangji asked. Not a single person responded, too caught up in their shock to even try putting together a coherent sentence.

Back inside the tent, anger at Wei Wuxian was reaching its peak.

“He always left at meals during the war too,” someone pointed out. “What do you think could possibly be occupying his time so much? What, is he just not human enough to need food anymore?”

“Maybe he wants to spend time with some of those female corpses of his,” someone whispered.

“Excuse me?!” Nie Mingjue stood up, aghast, and was shocked to find that his other-self hadn’t reacted at all. This sort of sentiment had been building for a while, and his other-self had done nothing to stop it.

(Might even believe it, himself.)

“You know, I heard that Wei Wuxian stays with them every night.”

“Really? How fresh do you think the corpses have to be for him to take them? Or do you think he prefers them rotted? It sure would explain a bunch.”

Sect Leader Jiang Cheng shook in his seat at the baseless gossip occurring on the edges of the room, but tried to stay focused on the conversation he was having with Jin Guangshan. He wasn't joining in…

But he wasn't stopping it, either.

"Does he think himself above the sect leaders?" someone asked.

Jiang Cheng clenched his cup nearly hard enough to shatter it.

"I…" Jiang Cheng shook his head, looking at his other-self in disbelief. "No… you can't believe that. That isn't what's happening at all! You saw how different he was after the Burial Mounds, didn't you? He's not-"

"A-Cheng, don't blame yourself too much," Jiang Yanli whispered. "A-Xian didn't explain when he left, and you can't leave in the middle of the banquet. Your other self doesn't even know A-Xian was in the… in the Burial Mounds. He might think A-Xian is going somewhere to have fun."

"But that's not what's happening at all!" Lan Xichen frowned, clenched his fists. "Everyone here couldn't be more wrong-"

"You think he enjoys taking dead women that much? Even more than having live ones?"

"Why not?"

"Hm. I wonder what those corpses taste like."

Everyone flinched.

(Their other selves were just going along with this. They weren't partaking in the gossip — they had more important things to talk about — but they were allowing it to continue nonetheless.)

(And it truly couldn't be more wrong.)

"Apparently, that's what he was doing every night during the war."

"Oh, yes. I remember. He was never with us, was he?"

"Say, do you think doing that with the dead is what gave him his power?"

Laughter sparked up from all around, the loudest of which was from Jin Zixun.

Jin Zixuan stared at his cousin, shock written clearly across his face.

"It's possible."

"Likely, even."

"Did you see how he didn't bow to even his own sect leader on the way out?" someone else whispered, and Jiang Cheng clenched his fist until the nails drew blood. "How good do you think the corpses have to be to distract him like that?"

Both Lan Wangji and the simulated Hanguang-jun began to grit their teeth together.

“Well, I wouldn’t expect him to have that kind of respect for anyone,” a member of a smaller clan whispered, then, lowering his voice even further, added, “I have a friend who’s a servant in the Jin Sect. From what I heard, Wei Wuxian’s the reason the Massacre of Lotus Pier happened.”

All the blood left Yu Ziyuan’s face at once.

She cleared her throat, quickly making her skin return to its normal hue, but the stunned expression on her face remained. It wasn’t like she hadn’t known what sort of power her words could have.

But to see it like this....

(Wei Wuxian had done nothing to deserve this fate. If his death was caused in part by this, then she might as well have been his murderer.)

(If the version of her from before the Great Sleep had heard that, she would have been overjoyed. Now, that very thought sickened her.)

“Can you believe his audacity?”

“His shamelessness?”

A girl nodded in agreement and asked, “Why aren’t the Sect Leaders doing anything?”

“I’ve heard that even Sect Leader Jiang can’t rein him in.”

“I’ll believe that,” someone laughed. “I mean, he just stormed off.”

“Not even a word to the rest of us-”

Hanguang-jun abruptly stood, unable to listen anymore. He turned, bowing deeply to each sect leader, and walked out without another word.

This time, not even Nie Huaisang could find any humor in Lan Wangji’s protectiveness of Wei Wuxian.

“Hanguang-jun is leaving?”

“Well, he’s never enjoyed inner-sect conferences and such.”

“And the Lan Sect does forbid gossip. I suppose he saw it fit to simply remove himself from the situation. Where do you think he’s going?”

“Ah, he must be going to help with the clean up.”

“I see, how honorable.”

“Truly, a ‘Light-bearing lord.’”

“Indeed. I suppose that’s to be expected of Hanguang-jun.”

The simulated Lan Wangji left the tent, not bothering to acknowledge the comments.

“Are you kidding me?” Jiang Cheng asked. “They literally did the exact same thing! Why is it only the Jiang Sect that’s being attacked for it?!”

Glaring with a force that rivaled a thousand suns, Lan Wangji nodded in agreement.

The watchers were then brought along with Lan Wangji as he walked though the paths leading away from the Nightless City (and the celebrations going on inside). After about two minutes of travel, he finally found what he was looking for.

Wei Wuxian had made it from the spot in the woods he’d been curled up in to a liquor storage run by the Jin Sect. If he noticed Lan Wangji’s approach, he didn’t show it, instead continuing to gulp down a jar of wine as fast as he could.

And, as Wen Ruohan looked back at the celebrations occurring in ~~his home~~ the distance, he couldn’t help but remember the agony that had been written all over Wei Wuxian’s face while he was in the Burial Mounds.

Agony that had been there, in part, because of him.

(Yes, there was a high chance Wen Ruohan would be able to succeed in the war if he tried again with this new information. He’d be able to spread the Wen Sect’s influence as far as he pleased, and ensure the idiotic leaders of the other sects didn’t continue to mess everything up.)

(But was any of that worth putting the Yiling Patriarch through what was happening to him now?)

He frowned deeply, watching Wei Wuxian drown himself in alcohol with unwavering eyes.

Finally, realizing that Hanguang-jun wasn’t just passing by, Wei Wuxian lowered the jar and turned his way with a raised eyebrow. The two stared at each other for a moment, neither saying a word.

Then, Wei Wuxian grinned and held out his jar: “Care to join me?”

For a moment, Lan Wangji could almost see their fifteen year old selves standing there, officially meeting for the first time.

“...You shouldn’t drink so much,” Lan Wangji responded.

“Ah, that’s right. Your rules say-”

“Wei Ying. It isn’t healthy for you to be doing this. At least eat first.”

And now the differences between Hanguang-jun and the twenty year old Lan Wangji were more obvious than ever before.

"...And how is that any of your business?' Wei Wuxian asked, retracting his offered jar and switching his expression to a glare.

And once again, Lan Wangji's earlier realization resurfaced full-force: as embarrassing as Hanguang-jun's actions were (especially while drunk), they served him far, far better when it came to Wei Wuxian.

Which meant…

Wei Wuxian sighed, "Whatever. It's not like I'm addicted. It wasn't a problem during the war, and it isn't a problem now. If you're worried about what I'll get up to while I'm drunk, don't be."

"Wei Ying-"

"Lan Zhan, I'm fine. Just washing out the taste, I promise," he gestured to his jar. "It's no Emperor's Smile, but it tastes much better than the food Jin Guangshan's generosity offered us. They tried, but there was nowhere near enough spice."

As Wei Wuxian shrugged in a 'what can you do' fashion, the watchers couldn't help but remember the young boy who had excitedly nawed on discarded watermelon peels.

He did genuinely love spice, but they couldn't help but wonder how old he had been when he learned spice could cover up the taste of a bad memory.

Then, Hanguang-jun's mouth settled into a determined frown.

"I know several songs with a calming effect. If you're drinking because of stress-"

"Excuse me?"

"You should stop using demonic cultivation so much," Lan Wangji elaborated, holding out a hand in an offer of help. "Wei Ying, come back to Gusu with me."

The watchers froze — all the air leaving their lungs — as Wei Wuxian's eyes flashed red.

"Oh, that was not the right thing to say," Nie Huaisang muttered.

In the next instant, the resentful energy that had crashed into them like a large wave turned into an avalanche, crushing the unprepared against the floor. The simulation mercifully moved farther away from the ensuing argument, lessening the effect slightly. What they had been brought to was a pair of cultivators drunkenly wandering off from the party into the woods. As soon as they heard the distant shouting, they froze.

"Wei Ying, stop!" Lan Wangji shouted from afar.

"You — Who do you think you are? If you take one step closer, I-"

"Listen to me!"

The two wandering drunks gaped dumbly at the scene.

“Is tha’ Hanguang-jun?” one asked, blinking in the direction of the argument.

“An’ Wei Wuxian,” her partner agreed. “They’re always arguing, ar’n’t they?”

“Mmhm,” the girl nodded. “What do you think Wei Wuxian did this time?”

“What he did?!” Jiang Cheng stood. “Wei Wuxian was minding his own business. Hanguang-jun’s the one who came and-”

“In all fairness, Jiang-gongzi,” Lan Xichen interrupted. “My brother was just trying to offer help, especially since no one else was providing any to Wei-gongzi.”

(Especially since you weren’t offering any to him.)

Madam Yu bristled and Jiang Cheng flushed, looking away, but Jiang Fengmian just broke eye contact, thinking Lan Xichen’s words over.

“Honestly, the war is over by now,” the girl muttered. “Why are we still letting Wei Wuxian do these things? It’s not like we need him anymo-”

“Shh, don’t say that,” her partner responded. “You never know when one of his spirits are watching.”

Sighing in annoyance, Jiang Cheng growled, “If people hate his demonic cultivation so much, why doesn’t he just switch back? It’s not like he doesn’t have powerful spiritual cultivation!”

Wen Qing pursed her lips, Nie Huaisang looked down, and Wen Ruohan rolled his eyes at those words. However, not noticing that, Madam Jin offered an answer:

“The power demonic cultivation reveals is unique,” she pointed out. “I would assume he’s just scared that something like the Massacre of Yunmeng will happen again. The Yiling Patriarch is an even more powerful deterrent than the Core Melting Hand once was.”

There were nods from all around as people accepted the obvious explanation.

When the world shifted again, it brought the watchers back to the far future, where Wei Wuxian (in Mo Xuanyu’s body), was walking through town with Lan Wangji, watching the kids become smaller and smaller in the distance as they departed. After pausing for a moment, Wei Wuxian shook himself out of his memories and turned to Lan Wangji with a bright smile.

“What do you think? Were those kids cute? Guess who the one with the rope tied around his head was pretending to be,” Wei Wuxian laughed.

After a moment of speechless silence, Lan Wangji finally couldn’t hold it in anymore: “...What did I really do last night?”

“No, no, no, you didn’t do anything. I’m just being ridiculous!” Wei Wuxian laughed.

Lan Wangji sighed at the reminder, making Jin Zixuan — the other member of the embarrassingly-in-love-with-a-Jiang club — send him a pitying glance.

“Well, let’s see where the hand takes us this time, shall we?” Wei Wuxian suggested, beginning their trek southeast. “Is this the right direction?”

“It is,” Lan Wangji confirmed, feeling the pull of the arm within the Qiankun pouch.

“How exciting. Has the pull gotten stronger since we retrieved the other pieces?”

“No. There is more force overall, but each piece has remained consistent in its strength.”

“Got it, got it. So, how did you recognize me?”

“Think,” Lan Wangji responded without missing a beat.

Jiang Fengmian chuckled, turning to Lan Qiren and commenting, “After seeing your nephew’s past self again, Hanguang-jun’s behavior is quite a shock.”

Lan Qiren nodded in agreement, gazing upon the adult version of his nephew with a strange sort of resigned pride.

Annoyed at the constant refusals, Wei Wuxian scampered over to Lan Wangji and leaned in until his face was less than a foot away from his partner’s.

“Lan Zhan! I’ve tried so hard to get answers out of you on the way here. Can’t you fall for it just once?”

Lan Wangji had continued walking forward, not bothering to respond to Wei Wuxian’s whining.

“Good luck, Wangji,” Lan Xichen whispered. “You have big shoes to fill.”

There wasn’t so much as a twitch from the second jade, and, if Lan Xichen wasn’t able to see his now-crimson ears, he might have thought his brother had turned deaf.

(Lan Wangji absolutely refused to give into Lan Xichen’s teasing. He would not react to the words of a traitor.)

Similarly, Hanguang-jun’s unchanging stride had brought him quite a distance forward, leaving Wei Wuxian behind. Changing his expression to an even more adorable pout, Wei Wuxian followed after him.

“Just once,” he complained again, raising a finger toward Lan Wangji to emphasize his point. Lan Wangji sent him a terrifyingly blank look, and Wei Wuxian deflated as if he had just been scolded.

‘How is it even possible for those two to be this cute?’ Madam Jin wondered, mentally putting together a list of matchmakers she could bribe to ensure the two would end up together.

“Okay,” Wei Wuxian cleared his throat. “Hanguang-jun, I’m going to talk serious business now.”

“Speak.”

A nod, “Well, the coffin slamming noises of the Chang Clan had stopped for ten years. Suddenly starting again now can’t be a coincidence; there must have been another cause.”

“What do you think the cause is?”

“It must have been the corpse being dug out.”

“Mn.”

As Wei Wuxian glanced over and saw Lan Wangji’s attentive, serious expression, he couldn’t help but recall the way Lan Wangji had looked the previous night while holding both of Wei Wuxian’s fingers. His shoulders shook with barely-suppressed laughter.

The watchers, of course, had no reason to hide their amusement, and Lan Wangji soon found himself yet again surrounded on all sides by the snorts, chuckles, and giggles of an ever-growing number of traitors.

Just to deprive them of any reaction, he put extra effort into making sure his expression didn’t change at all.

Forcing himself to calm down with deep breaths, Wei Wuxian continued, “I think the dismemberment of the corpse probably wasn’t simply to seek revenge, but was a malicious manner of suppression. The person who cut up the corpse intentionally chose places haunted by evil spirits to place the body parts.”

Both Nie brothers reacted at once to those words, tensing greatly.

“Combating poison with poison,” Lan Wangji agreed. “They balance each other out to keep the other in check.”

Lan Qiren sighed; even Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation would be preferable to something like this.

“Just the torso was equal to all the Chang Clan’s spirits?” Wen Qing wondered.

Lan Xichen nodded, “I suppose we’ve been taking that corpse too lightly. I can now understand why the simulation would want to focus on it.”

“Whoever this perpetrator is, they’re probably connected to both the Nie and Lan Sects. They won’t be easy to beat.”

“There are only a few people like that,” Lan Wangji commented.

“Yup. The truth is slowly being revealed. And, since our opponent has started to move the corpse parts already, it means that they’re already starting to become anxious. They’ll definitely move again soon. Even if we don’t go for them, they’ll come find us, leaving us with more clues. But we’ll probably need to move faster as well. Only our dear friend’s right hand and head are left; we need to arrive before they do.”

Jiang Yanli took a deep breath, calming the growing tension in her body.

“And with that,” Jin Ling revealed. “Hanguang-jun and Wei Wuxian began their trek to Yi City.”

The simulation faded to black.

As the silence spread out, expressions ranging between ecstasy and despair appeared on the watchers' faces. Some, like Wen Qing, found the horrors Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning went through to have overwhelmed any happiness she could have had. Others were far more casual.

“What a ridiculous mess,” Madam Yu commented. “Whose corpse could that possibly be?”

“I’m sure we’ll find out soon enough,” Madam Jin sighed. “In the meantime, it was quite nice to see Wei-gongzi and Lan-er-gongzi interact like that.”

If Lan Wangji were anyone else, he would have squeaked at the comment.

“I can’t believe you drank alcohol!” Nie Huaisang agreed, bouncing over to Lan Wangji fearlessly. “And I can’t believe you’re such a bad drinker! Wangji-xiong, go drinking with me when this is over.”

“No,” was the simple answer.

“Aw, but you were so cute when you got all jealous like that!”

Lan Wangji was about to respond when a terrifying thought consumed his mind. In the simulation, his other self had gotten jealous of Wen Ning, and had swiftly moved to separate him and Wei Wuxian. It was the illogical behavior of a drunkard, and, luckily, it seemed no one thought Wei Wuxian had any romantic interest in the fierce corpse.

But right now, outside the simulation, was a fully-alive Wen Ning spending time with a Wei Wuxian who had never met Lan Wangji.

Which meant-

“Wangji, are you okay?” Lan Xichen asked, moving close.

“Xiongzhang…” Lan Wangji began, then paused, finding himself unable to continue.

Unaware of the gravity of Lan Wangji’s concerns, Lan Xichen sat down with his brother and leaned close to whisper “Now that you’ve seen what Hanguang-jun did while drunk, do you regret it?”

Lan Qiren looked over as well, vividly remembering his earlier conversation with his nephew, and praying he hadn’t accidentally made it worse. The longer Lan Wangji paused in thought, the more Lan Qiren’s stress grew. Luckily, before a minute had passed, Lan Wangji responded:

“I do not. That… shouldn’t have been shown to everyone here, but, just between Wei Ying and myself, I don’t believe I crossed any lines. And besides, it was….”

“Effective?” Lan Xichen suggested.

Lan Wangji nodded. When compared against the actions of the twenty year old Lan Wangji, there was no denying that the thirty five year old one’s were far more positive. Drunk or not, the real Lan Wangji had trouble believing he’d ever have the ~~courage~~ audacity to be so shameless, but it was certainly something to consider.

“Well, perhaps watching more from Hanguang-jun will help you come to a firmer opinion,” Lan Xichen suggested. “Despite the time we have spent watching him, I still feel as though there is a significant amount for us to learn.”

“...Do you think watching him will allow me to do the same?” Lan Wangji hesitantly asked. He still wasn’t sure he wanted to do the same, but it would be comforting to feel capable of that.

“I do. Are you willing to try?”

Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, and Lan Qiren relaxed at once. It was a good thing he let his older nephew talk to Wangji; Xichen always knew what to say.

Lan Xichen sighed quietly, wondering how he could even begin to articulate his thoughts. However, no matter how much he wanted to find an excuse to avoid this meeting, he knew it was something he had to do.

(Especially since he had already been invited inside.)

It was clear that Wei Wuxian was somewhat concerned about seeing Lan Xichen out of seclusion, but Wangji had apparently informed him that Lan Xichen was planning on slowly taking over more and more of his responsibilities again. Thanks to that, Wei Wuxian wasn’t as concerned as he could have been. His increasingly frequent meetings with Lan Wangji had helped with that as well, making the current situation less awkward than it could have been.

Lan Xichen cleared his throat.

“Wei-gongzi, I would like to apologize.”

“Of course,” Wei Wuxian lit up. “To whom? How can I help?”

“To you,” Lan Xichen corrected, wondering if the confusion on Wei Wuxian’s face was a good or bad thing. “During our first discussion with… Sect Leader Nie…. I feel I used you against him in an unfair way. I would like to apologize for that.”

Wei Wuxian just laughed, “Zewu-jun, there’s really no need. I didn’t take offense.”

“Regardless, you are now my brother in law,” Lan Xichen pointed out, privately delighting in the way those words brought a pink blush across Wei Wuxian’s cheeks even now. “I… had felt like if I didn’t speak up in Meng Yao’s defense, no one would — whether that be our other versions in the past or us in the present. I still believe he deserves a chance, but my desperation in what I had felt was me against the world led me to say certain things that I now regret, in hindsight.”

After thinking about his words for a moment, Wei Wuxian nodded once, his smile turning terrifyingly understanding: “I see. You had done nothing that would require an apology, but I accept yours nonetheless.”

‘If only your husband could forgive me so easily,’ Lan Xichen thought. ‘Wangji may love me, but it will take quite a bit for him to accept what I said to you.’

Well, now that Lan Xichen was slowly starting to pull away from seclusion, he would have plenty of time to earn that.

“While I’m here….”

“Zewu-jun?” Wei Wuxian asked, frowning in concern, but Lan Xichen felt as though his mouth was sealed shut. Even in the years he had blamed Wei Wuxian for the whipping, he had logically known that what happened to Wangji was not Wei Wuxian’s fault. It had been his own choice, and, in part, the Lan Sect’s fault for not having intervened before the Nightless City. But thirteen years of bitterness didn’t simply vanish upon realizing the truth.

Now that Lan Xichen had spent some time with Wei Wuxian, however, he couldn’t say he felt the same way.

(So he needed to say it, but….)

As he hesitated, Lan Xichen found himself glancing around, and quickly noticed the pile of talismans laid out across Wei Wuxiain’s desk. Alongside them were reports and papers Wangji had been working on with Wei Wuxian not too long ago. Glancing down, Xichen noticed Wei Wuxian’s ink-stained hands and traces of cinnabar that hadn’t been entirely wiped off yet.

(Right. He may have been in seclusion until now, but the rest of the world was continuing. Taking up any more of Wei Wuxian’s time would be inexcusable.)

"...I also apologize for what I said to you in Guanyin temple."

Wei Wuxian flinched back.

'Wangji was a model for the disciples when he was young, and a prominent cultivator when he grew up! His whole life he had always been honest, and righteous, and immaculate — you were the only mistake he ever made.'

Although Wei Wuxian's expression had wavered at the memory, a blinding smile soon overtook his expression and he said, "It feels a bit strange to have you apologize for the thing that got me and Lan Zhan married, but, if you insist, then I accept this apology too."

Lan Xichen nodded once, thinking back on the tired expression his brother had the last time he'd visited, and continued, "I don't know how quickly I'll manage to resume my duties as Sect Leader, but know that you have the Lan Sect's full support if you should need it, regardless of what decision you make regarding Meng Yao."

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened in shock, before he grinned back with the enthusiasm of a child being brought salvation.

"Sure," he laughed. "I'll take you up on that offer then, Da-ge!"

Chapter End Notes

The "what did Wei Wuxian eat in the Burial Mounds" scene was an original scene (not based on any versions of MDZS, though I did take inspiration from other fans' theories). However, I think that's okay because MXTX left his time in the Burial Mounds up to us to fill in with fanfiction and the like. If you're annoyed at how I deviated from canon, don't worry; this scene probably won't be relevant later. On another note, this interview is more than a little terrifying:

MXTX: Luo Bing-ge made Shen Jiu a human stick! Xue Yang cut out A-Qing's eyes and destroyed Xiao Xingchen's will to live! Wei Wuxian died a horrible, miserable death and Lan Wangji was whipped! And look at everything I did to Hua Cheng and Xie Lian!

Me, terrified: It's like there's nothing MXTX won't write about! Does she have no limits?

Me: Wait, so what happened to Wei Wuxian in the Burial Mounds?

MXTX: Oh, it was horrific. But I'll leave what actually happened up to you; I don't feel like writing it.

Me: MXTX? MXTX, what does that mean? MXTX?!

"Wen Ning! Wen Ning! Look!" Wei Wuxian, the savior of Yunmeng and its temporary representative, shouted as he bounced through the halls. "Looks at this!"

When Wen Ning glanced over, he saw what his friend had been so excited about. Unlike the red and black he usually wore, Wei Wuxian's current outfit was Yunmeng's elegant silver and purple.

"...What's this, Wei-gongzi?" Wen Ning asked, desperately praying his friend hadn't stolen it from some unsuspecting Jiang elder. It was true that the elders were giving Wei Wuxian a lot of grief, but Wen Ning didn't think that warranted this.

Hearing the worry in Wen Ning's tone, Wei Wuxian paused in his improvised fashion show to give an exaggerated expression of hurt and exclaim, "I didn't steal it! I found it!"

Wen Ning's worry quadrupled.

"But-but…."

"I thought you'd be happy. Weren't the elders constantly complaining to you about how I didn't dress like I was from Yunmeng, and so didn't work as a good representative?"

"H-how did you find out about that?"

Wei Wuxian grinned, "They're really not as subtle as they think they are. But hey, now the problem will be solved! I can wear this while meeting with the other sects, and they won't be able to complain about it anymore!"

Wei Wuxian did a little twirl before spreading his arms wide in victory and grinning confidently. Three girls and one boy behind Wen Ning promptly fainted at that, but such an incident was common enough that Wen Ning no longer paid it any mind. They would get up soon enough by themselves.

"Young Master Wei, it's-it's good that you found a solution, but… where did you find this?"

"Uncle Jiang's closet."

There was a moment of silence as Wen Ning processed those words.

"What?!"

"Wow, I think that's the loudest I've ever heard you sp-"

"Young Master Wei, did you steal from your Sect Leader?!" Wen Ning asked, then flinched and looked around, praying that no one had heard his shouting. Lucky, it seemed as though everyone within hearing distance had fainted earlier during Wei Wuxian's earlier show, and wouldn't be able to tell anyone.

"Once again, not stole; found."

"Young Master Wei-"

"It was actually my father's."

The protest that had been about to leave Wen Ning's mouth halted at that, and the bittersweet smile on Wei Wuxian's face removed it completely. He looked down at the uniform again, and noticed that the fabric did indeed look rather old in comparison to what he remembered of Sect Leader Jiang's clothing.

"One of the elders told me about it," Wei Wuxian revealed, staring at the silver embroidery on the sleeve with an achingly nostalgic expression before shrugging with a grin. "I think he was trying to make a point about how we should rely on Meishan Yu more because family is valuable and 'look how sentimental Sect Leader Jiang is, even going so far as to keep Wei Changze's robes in the treasury,' but I kinda stopped listening after that. So, what do you think?"

Given the way everyone else had fainted at the sight of Wei Wuxian showing off his new robes, Wen Ning thought the answer to that was clear enough. Then again, maybe that was the point. Wei Wuxian needed to ask someone who wasn't (physically) attracted to him to get a more honest answer.

"I…" Wen Ning paused, looking Wei Wuxian up and down one more time to make sure he knew what to say. "I think it looks good. It will identify you as a member of Yunmeng Jiang. Though, it's not the uniform of a sect leader-"

"I don't want it to be. Can you imagine how strange it would be for me to wear one of Uncle Jiang's robes?" Wei Wuxian asked, giving a fake shudder at the thought.

"Right! Right! Um… but it's also a little different than what today's Yunmeng disciples wear, which I-I think is a good thing. It should work? So long as the elders approve."

"Well, let's assume they do and not worry about asking them!"

Wen Ning really wished he could say he was surprised by Wei Wuxian's decision.

"Da-shixiong!" little A-Lu shouted from several rooms away. "We're back!"

"A-Lu, we're by the main hall!" Wei Wuxian responded, shouting just as loudly as the preteen had. "How was it?"

“He agreed!”

The identity of the mysterious ‘he’ was revealed to Wen Ning mere moments later, when not one but two children ran in. One was A-Lu, dressed in his usual uniform, and the other was a boy dressed in commoner’s clothes who took Wen Ning several seconds to identify.

“Wait,” Wen Ning straightened up, spinning to face Wei Wuxian. “Is-is that-”

“Welcome to Yunmeng Jiang, Mo Xuanyu,” Wei Wuxian greeted, smiling brightly and giving Wen Ning a look that was just a few traces too smug at Wen Ning’s surprise to be polite. If Wen Ning’s sister was here, he had no doubt she would be glaring disapprovingly at Wei Wuxian. As it was, however, Wen Ning was left to stare in open-mouthed shock at what he saw before him.

‘Don’t mention the future Mo Xuanyu to him if he joins us, okay?’ Wei Wuxian had said on the way back from Mo Manor. ‘I don’t want him to feel like I’m expecting something that impossible from him.’

But, somehow, Wen Ning still hadn’t completely expected Mo Xuanyu to agree. The future one withheld information like it was second nature and lied with a disarming smile. Now that the whole ‘time travel’ element had been revealed, Wen Ning more than understood why, it just made the open, honest, vulnerable expression on the child Mo Xuanyu’s face quite a shock.

Then again, people changed a lot as they got older, so it really shouldn’t have been a surprise.

“Was your journey over here good?” Wei Wuxian asked, kneeling down so that he was eye level with Mo Xuanyu. The boy nodded once, but it was A-Lu who answered aloud.

“It was awful, Da-shixiong!” the boy loudly complained. “Madam Mo is so… she’s so-”

“A-Lu!” Wen Ning nervously interjected, his eyes flashing to Mo Xuanyu. Luckily, it seemed the boy had no objections to whatever A-Lu had been about to say regarding his aunt, and merely continued looking at the floor, completely unresponsive. The awkward silence stretched out.

As Wei Wuxian watched the younger-self of the man he’d been working with fidget nervously, he couldn’t help but notice how round Mo Xuanyu’s cheeks were. He had heard his own had been similar at that age, but it was something else to see first-hand. If he pinched and pulled them, he could easily imagine them stretching to be at least a meter in length. And Mo Xuanyu wasn’t the only one with squishy cheeks. A-Lu and A-Yue had yet to lose their baby fat, and also had quite round, mochi-like faces. He wondered whose was the squishiest. Probably Wen Ning’s.

(It was entirely possible that Wei Wuxian had overworked his brain to the point of shorting it out, but these few minutes were the only break he’d have before his meetings started up again, so he was willing to give himself a pass on this.)

“Um… Da-shixiong?” A-Lu finally asked.

“Oh, right!” Wei Wuxian snapped out of it, abruptly remembering that he was currently the person in charge of the livelihoods of his disciples. “Mo Xuanyu, do you have any luggage with you?”

Cheeks flushing in embarrassment, Mo Xuanyu slowly shook his head ‘no.’

“No worries. A-Lu, please take him to your third shijie. She should be in the archives right now, and she can get you everything you need. The next meal is in an hour or two, but I won’t be able to join you for that. I don’t want everyone to overwhelm you while I’m not there, so why don’t you start trying to meet a few people ahead of time once you have your things? Sound good?”

There was a pause for a moment as it slowly dawned on Mo Xuanyu that Wei Wuxian was genuinely asking for his opinion. He flushed even deeper, then nodded twice in rapid succession.

“Great!” Wei Wuxian beamed, then stood up and gathered his things. “Well, I unfortunately need to head off to my next meeting and the Lans’ representatives hate when I’m late, so I should probably head off. Wen Ning, call me if there’s any trouble — I don’t mind being interrupted. A-Lu, A-Yu, have fun with the rest of The Squishables!”

He leapt out the door and darted off too quickly to hear Wen Ning’s confused, “‘The Squishables?’”

There was a buzzing anticipation floating through the air as the watchers waited to see what would be shown next. The relatively unknown “Yi City” wasn’t much of a source of excitement, but the story’s connections to Baoshan Sanren gathered the attention of even the most prideful watchers.

Which was why, when the world shifted into towering peaks in the distance of a mist filled valley, the watchers seemed to simultaneously suck in breaths of anticipation.

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were travelling through the fog in the direction the left hand pointed, and soon came across a small, worn-down village. A few rails of fencing encircled thatched houses made of mud, and a brood of chicks scuttered in and out of yards, picking on the ground for rice. On one of the roofs, a large, bright-feathered rooster looked down loftily.

Unable to resist, Jiang Yanli knelt down next to one of the illusionary chicks, practically cooing as it frantically searched around for food (and promptly ran into one of the nearby walls). Not the most well-trained animal she had ever seen.

(Of course not; she was the young lady of Lotus Pier. The things her shidi had experienced — his time on the streets and starvation in the Burial Mounds — were things she had never even imagined. A strong, illogical feeling of guilt quickly spread across her body.)

As Wei Wuxian watched the birds scurry about, he smiled to himself and thought, ‘It’s a good thing there aren’t any dogs here. Then again, the villagers can probably only get their hands on a few chunks of meat every year. There's no way they'd have enough of a surplus of bones to feed the dogs. Lucky me!'

As much as people wanted to smile at the words, their memories of the child Wei Wuxian rang just a little too strongly for them to manage that.

In front of the village, there was a forked road leading in three different directions. Two of the roads were tred bare (covered by a great deal of footprints), while the third was overrun by weeds. A square sign made of stone was pointed slantingly at this road, but it was split down the middle by a large crack, more weeds poking out.

'Please don't go down that road, Wei-xiong, Wangji-xiong,' Nie Huaisang fervently prayed. 'Please don't go down that road. Please don't go down that road. Please don't go down that road!'

The left arm was pointing toward that road.

'Stupid arm!' Nie Huaisang cursed. 'Why are you there at all?! Who thought it was a good idea to let Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong find you?! If I ever meet the person responsible for this, I'm going to-'

Before Nie Huaisang could finish his mental threat, Wei Wuxian turned to Lan Wangji and said, "Lan Zhan, the crack goes right through the characters; I can't read the sign. Let's try to ask the villagers."

Lan Wangji nodded once.

With a large grin on his face, Wei Wuxian walked over to the women feeding the chickens. Some of them were quite young, and turned nervous and fearful at the sight of the unfamiliar man approaching them. However, after just a few words from Wei Wuxian, they quickly relaxed and hesitantly returned his smile.

Jin Guangshan wished the simulation had taken them along with Wei Wuxian so that he could hear what the boy had said. As it was, the watchers instead remained with the silent Lan Wangji, waiting for Wei Wuxian to return.

Although the women started to speak, they didn't dare to look at Lan Wangji (or the sign he stood next to) whatsoever. Wei Wuxian listened to their words, smiling widely and nodding along with them. Then, as though the topic of discussion had changed, the women began to relax, quite a few blushing rosely at whatever Wei Wuxian had said.

Next to the watchers, Hanguang-jun continued to wait. As the time bore on, it began to seem like Wei Wuxian had no intention of returning anymore, too caught up in the conversation to remember his original goal. Lan Wangji's face remained as blank and expressionless as ever, but he slowly turned to look at the gravel and stone path on the ground.

He kicked a small chunk of rock that was by his feet.

"..."

"Oh my-"

"That's-"

"Adorable!" Lan Xichen clasped a hand over his beaming mouth, having not realized he had spoken until it was already too late.

Overwhelmed by the cuteness, someone let out a high-pitched squeal. A moment later, it became a ringing symphony produced by the entirely of the WangXian fanclub, making it impossible to determine who had started it.

(It was Madam Jin, but, even if you told them, no one would ever believe that.)

"My, that's quite a bit of jealousy," Nie Huaisang cackled. "Isn't a bit of an overreaction? After all, you and Wei-xiong did sleep together last night!"

"Not like that," Lan Wangji fiercely defended, glaring in a way that Nie Huaisang used to find terrifying, but now (able to see the red on Lan Wangji's ears) just found adorable. "Wei Ying isn't… interested in me-"

"I hate to say it Lan-er-gongzi," Wen Qing interrupted. "But I think even you know that's a lie."

And, as always, Wen Qing was 100% correct, so there was nothing Lan Wangji could say in response.

Meanwhile, the simulated Lan Wangji had stepped on the innocent rock, rolling it back and forth over and over again as he waited.

Even Lan Qiren was having trouble remaining impassive in front of his nephew's cuteness.

As Lan Wangji looked up again, he saw Wei Wuxian take something from his sleeves and hand it to the woman who had spoken the most. Following that, the Yiling Patriarch spun on his heel and began travelling back to Hanguang-jun, waving a cheerful goodbye to the women as he went.

Lan Wangji stood still, an unchanging, blank look on his face.

Although Lan Xichen was still the only person capable of reading all of Lan Wangji's expressions, the watchers now understood how to gain insight into the second jade's emotions. Right now, with the additional context they had….

(Jiang Cheng had already decided that he was going to find a rock to hide under when the next cultivation conference rolled around so that he wouldn't have to face the other watchers. He wondered if he should extend an offer to Lan Wangji as well. The second jade would undoubtedly appreciate it.)

Finally, Wei Wuxian returned and fell into step beside Lan Wangji, commenting, "Hanguang-jun, you should've come. There were even rabbits in the yard!"

Remaining as (outwardly) indifferent as ever, Lan Wangji asked, "What were their answers?"

"This path leads to Yi City! The first character on the sign is 'yi.'"

"Of course it does," Nie Huaisang deflated dejectedly, knowing that it was now guaranteed that Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji would go that way. Seeing that, Nie Mingjue awkwardly tried to pat Nie Huaisang's head (but, due to the no-touch rule, went straight through instead).

"Yi as in 'chivalry?'" Lan Wangji asked.

"Yes and no."

"What do you mean?"

"The character is correct, but not the meaning. It's not yi as in chivalry, but yi as in 'coffin home.'"

"Oh, of course it is!"

"Are you alright, Huaisang?" Lan Xichen asked.

"I'm just saying! When Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong went to the cold springs in the Cloud Recesses, walking corpses got loose. A few days earlier there was a waterborne abyss. At the Wen Camp, they ran into the Xuanwu of Slaughter! What's going to happen now?!"

"Yi City is a small town," Jiang Fengmian pointed out, hoping to calm the Nie heir's nerves. "I have no doubt that something happened, but how bad could it possibly be?"

As he spoke, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji stepped over a bunch of weeds in the path and soon passed the sign, prompting Wei Wuxian to continue, "The girls said that, ever since a long time ago, most people in this city have died young. Whether by poor health or accidents, the sheer number of victims here meant there needed to be a lot of coffin homes for temporarily holding the corpses. Also, they specialize in making coffins, paper money, and other sorts of burial goods. Everyone was skilled at something related to that, whether it be creating coffins or paper mannequins, which is why the city became known by that name."

Wen Chao shuddered, vividly recalling the way Wei Wuxian had embodied the death the city was named after when he hunted down Wen Chao.

'No wonder Wei Wuxian isn't worried about going into that city,' Wen Chao thought. 'Nothing there could possibly be a bigger monster than him.'

Hopping over the cracks and ditches that littered the road, Wei Wuxian added, "They said that people here don't go to Yi City, and that the people inside rarely leave either.

In the past few years, essentially no one's been seen leaving, so nobody's walked on this path for years. Sure explains why it's so grown-over."

"And?" Lan Wangji asked.

"And, what?"

"What did you give them?"

"Ah, keeping your priorities straight I see," Lan Xichen whispered, delighting in the glare Lan Wangji sent his way. It was usually almost impossible for Xichen to get a reaction out of his brother, but now...

(He truly owed Wei Wuxian more than words could describe.)

"Oh, you mean what I gave them at the end there?" Wei Wuxian realized after thinking it over for a bit. "It was the rouge. You have to show people your thanks when you're asking them things, right? I wanted to give them money, but they were too scared to take it. It seemed that they liked the scent of the rouge. They had probably never used such a thing before, so I gave it to them."

And, as always, Wei Wuxian's unrivalled understanding of the differences between various classes of wealth in their society had proved useful. Wen Ruohan had never thought such a skill could be valuable before, but perhaps he would need to reconsider that assessment.

The number of things Wei Wuxian had taught him continued to grow.

However, Lan Wangji had no reason to feel the same awe Wen Ruohan did. In fact, given his emotional involvement in the situation, what he felt was undoubtedly the exact opposite.

Perhaps realizing the same, Wei Wuxian asked, "Hanguang-jun, why are you looking at me like that? I know that the rouge's quality isn't great, but I'm not how I used to be, when I always had a ton of flowers and jewelry on me to give girls. I really don't have anything else to give them. At least it's better than nothing."

As if those words had sparked a displeasing memory, Lan Wangji's brow twitched, and he slowly turned his head away.

Meanwhile, Jiang Cheng nodded furiously in agreement, pleased that Wei Wuxian was remembering everything Yunmeng Jiang had offered him fondly.

The farther the pair went, the wider the road became, and the denser the fog appeared. Soon, it was difficult to see anything more than two meters away, making the road itself the only thing visible to human eyes.

The watchers looked around, startled by their new inability to see each other. Ever since they had been pulled into the simulation, they had become a single unit (the only exception being Wen Xu's early departure). It was strange to not be able to see the crowd they had long-since grown accustomed to.

At the end of the long path was a city gate, barely visible in the thick fog. The tower in front of the city had missing paint and a broken roof, one corner chipped off. The walls were covered in graffiti, the red doors were almost faded white, and each doornail was rusty and black.

Jin Guangshan stepped back in disgust.

The doors were unlatched and slightly ajar, as if someone had just stepped inside.

And the presence of resentful energy on the other side was impossible to ignore (especially for the watchers, who had gained a new sensitivity to it). Several people shivered as they approached.

The entire area was steeped in gray, the fog making it appear to be a world of monochrome darkness. Fences around the houses inside had long since been eaten through and toppled over, the ropes that had once been holding them together flapping uselessly in the wind. A breeze blew torn up banners into the sky.

Wei Wuxian approached casually, looking this way and that as if he could see through the fog, and commented, "Woah, this city is in ruins. I doubt we'll find anyone alive here; the feng shui is absolutely terrible."

Lan Wangji agreed: "Barren mountains and turbulent rivers."

Wen Qing nodded once, finding the health risks it posed to all travelers completely inexcusable. It was no surprise that deaths were so common there. She knew Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji could take care of themselves, but that didn't stop her from wishing she could be there to ensure that.

An especially large gust of wind blew past, and with it came a tar-like coat of resentment. Wei Wuxian frowned and rubbed at his temples, taking deep breaths to clear his mind.

"Is it the curse mark?" Lan Wangji asked.

"No, I was just affected by the resentful miasma here," Wei Wuxian explained, then, seeing Lan Wangji's unchanging worried look, added, "Don't believe me? Look. It's long gone."

He pulled open his robes to reveal his chest-

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted, quickly turning away. "You… improper-"

"Shall I show it to you again?" he asked, and, glancing up through half-lidded eyes, reached down to show the skin on his legs.

If it weren't for present company, Jin Guangshan would have given an impressed whistle.

Lan Wangji's eyes went lower and lower in synch with Wei Wuxian's motion, the golden orbs unable to pull away. Hands teasingly grabbed the edge of Wei Wuxian's pants, and, as the simulation focused on Lan Wangji's expression, an idea-like ding resounded loudly.

"What?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"Oh," Nie Huaisang mumbled, then "Oh!"

"Oh my," Madam Jin agreed, grinning brightly enough to make Jin Zixuan send the second jade a look of absolute pity.

Meanwhile, Lan Wangji stood frozen. He turned to his uncle, but Lan Qiren was very studiously avoiding eye contact with him. It was one thing to tell Wangji that desiring a romantic relationship with Wei Wuxian was acceptable; this was something else entirely. Sexual attraction was perfectly healthy (especially for a relationship as mutually respectful as Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji's), but it was not something Lan Qiren was going to speak to his nephew about while here.

Luckily for Lan Wangji's (and everyone else's) sanity, Wei Wuxian decided to stop his exhibition there and stand up again. The second jade's face was completely blank again, leaving Wei Wuxian with no clues as to what he was feeling. All he could see was the shocking lack of an angry outburst.

Taking in a big breath, Wei Wuxian grinned and bounced closer to Hanguang-jun, teasing, "Something is really off about you. In the past, every time I did something like that, you would already be telling me to mind my manners and tact!"

The real Lan Wangji, who had done just that, flushed heavily.

He elbowed the second jade, and lit up further when he saw that Lan Wangji was accepting the physical contact. After Wei Wuxian's numerous failures at getting a reaction out of him, his one success through waking up together had reinvigorated his teasing streak.

Nodding to himself, Wei Wuxian continued, "You would be going on about proper etiquette, courtesy, and whatnot. Lan Zhan, you've changed~"

The two of them made eye contact for a while, and Wei Wuxian soon found himself getting lost in those calm, golden orbs. His childish enthusiasm faded into a more mystified awe.

Ding!

Nie Huaisang fearlessly burst into laughter, loving expressions on both the real Lan Wangji and the simulated Wei Wuxian. He was joined by nearly the entirety of the watchers, drowning out the sounds of Jiang Cheng's embarrassed outrage and Wen Chao's annoyance.

Realizing that he had been frozen for far too long, Wei Wuxian coughed a few times and looked away, rushing to explain, "D-don't mind what I said earlier. The resentful miasma around here is so thick even though it's still daytime. I think this city has more problems than just terrible feng shui."

As Wei Wuxian continued to talk and talk without saying much of anything (more to fill the silence than to convey any information), Wen Ruohan found himself giving a strange huffed laugh. It was quite amusing how Lan Wangji was the only one ever able to make the brilliant Yiling Patriarch lose his composure. He found himself hoping that the real versions would be able to regain this relationship once they left.

"The easiest way to handle a place like this would just be to leave," Wei Wuxian continued, having just discussed the lack of assistance the area was likely to get from any sect. "Then again, if someone's family has been living here for generations, it'll be almost impossible for them to chose to leave where they've grown up. Even if six or seven out of ten live short lives, maybe they'd be the remaining three or four. Might not seem too unbearable."

Nie Huaisang fell silent and levied his brother a very telling look.

A gust of wind caused the fog to surge forward, leaving the area even whiter than before. The streets were empty, and, despite the daylight, no sound could be heard from any of the houses either.

"...What do you suppose caused this?" Jiang Yanli asked, glancing around nervously. She turned to Jin Zixuan, but he could only shake his head, equally befuddled.

By now, the fog had gotten so thick that they couldn't see more than five feet away. Amid the eerie silence of the town, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji's barely-perceivable footsteps echoed softly. They moved closer and closer together, disliking the extent to which their senses had been cut off.

Curious, Madam Yu held out her hand and realized that even she wasn't able to see her fingers anymore. She frowned, disliking the atmosphere of the town more and more as time went on.

'Well, this is the place the arm pointed us to. It'd be stranger if it wasn't peculiar,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Right now… if someone took advantage of this fog to sneak over and join us, I'm not sure we'd be able to notice.'

The watchers glanced between Wei Wuxian and each other, feeling awkward at how well they fit that description of unwelcome accompanists (even if unwillingly).

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian stepped on something irregular. He froze at once — tension flooding his body — and grabbed Lan Wangji's hand firmly to ensure the other didn't wander off.

The smiles which subsequently covered Madam Jin, Nie Huaisang, Lan Xichen, Jiang Yanli, and Jiang Fengmian's faces ranged from joy to gleeful smugness, but were all ignored indiscriminately by Lan Wangji.

Wei Wuxian knelt down to see what he had stepped on, and the watchers followed suit.

It was a head.

“Gah!” Wen Chao jumped back as Nie Huaisang squeaked. Wen Ruohan and Nie Mingjue both sighed at the reactions (one considerably more fond than the other).

The head had the face of a man with thick brows, large eyes, and two smudges of rouge that stood out starkly. The way it had tumbled when Wei Wuxian stepped on it proved its insignificant weight, making it impossible for any to mistake it as a human head. Wei Wuxian picked it up and squeezed it, making part of the head sink in.

Madam Yu sighed at the blatant fascination on Wei Wuxian’s face, wishing that he would be a little more careful during the investigation. It was like he didn’t understand his own mortality-

(No, that couldn’t be true. He had already died once, after all.)

“It’s made of paper,” Wei Wuxian observed, gazing in befuddlement. “Not bad; someone put a lot of work into this. I bet it’s a Nether Brawler.”

“A what?”Jiang Cheng asked, turning to his father. The question was whispered (so as to not attract attention), but there was no hesitance in Jiang Cheng’s expression. He trusted his father to answer without judgement (something the Jiang Cheng of before would have never been able to do).

“A Nether Brawler is meant to protect the deceased from the bullying of other ghosts or tricky judges,” Jiang Fengmian explained, smiling warmly. “It ensures that the paper money burned for that person won’t be stolen away. Cultivators don’t usually bother with that.”

Then, as if his own words had reminded him, he turned to Wen Qing and bowed once, thanking her for rescuing his and Madam Yu’s other-selves’ bodies.

“Someone pulled the head off and threw it into the streets,” Wei Wuxian assumed, lacing his fingers through the head’s jet black hair. “It really was skillfully crafted. Did they take real, human hair and glue it on?”

Nie Huaisang shuddered, those words making him remember the corpses floating in water as a result of the waterborne abyss. He was sure he was going to have nightmares when they left the simulation.

(But, if his assumption on the core transfer was correct, he could hope that they would be able spare Wei Wuxian a few of his own.)

Suddenly, a thin shadow swept by him, brushing Wei Wuxian's shoulder, and disappeared into the fog.

Jin Zixuan flinched as the shadow ran through him, shuddering at the cold chill he felt as it passed (and relaxing into the warmth Bichen exuded as it chased after the shadow). He turned to stare in the direction it had disappeared into, wondering at the source of that feeling.

‘Was that a resentful object?’

‘A human couldn’t have gone that fast,’ Wei Wuxian agreed.

“Pay attention,” Lan Wangji advised. “Be careful.”

Thonk.

“Did you hear that?” Wei Wuxian asked.

A nod: “Footsteps and a bamboo pole.”

‘Not a resentful object then,’ Jin Zixuan amended, unsure of whether or not to be relieved by the truth.

Then, from within the fog, someone cried out as they fell. Wei Wuxian looked up to the source of the sound, and watched as a flash of yellow toppled through the air-

“A-Ling?!” Jiang Yanli cried out.

Lan Wangji shot a hand forward, sending out just enough energy to stall Jin Ling’s fall and keep him from unceremoniously slamming against the ground.

“Oh, of course that brat’s involved in something dangerous again!” Madam Yu cursed as Jiang Cheng allowed his head to collapse into his hand, facepalming as though that was the only thing keeping him upright.

“Jin Ling!” Wei Wuxian greeted, his whole demeanor lighting up at the boy’s presence. However, hearing the shouted name, some figures in the distance immediately rushed over.

They stepped through the fog, allowing everyone to see who it was.

“Sizhui and Jingyi too?”

The three Lans tensed up at that, torn between happiness at a chance to see their future juniors again, and worry over what was to come.

“Why is it you again?” Jin Ling asked, scowling heavily.

“I wanted to know the same,” Wei Wuxian responded, staring at the kids in disbelief.

‘Them again? That can’t be a coincidence, right?’ Nie Huaisang thought.

Although he tried to contain himself, as Lan Sizhui stepped forward to speak, his voice was noticeably delighted: “Young Master Mo, if you’re here, then is Hanguang-jun here as well?”

“He definitely is!” Hanguang-jun’s number one fanboy, Lan Jingyi, proclaimed. “That power that saved Jin Ling earlier was from him, right?”

Hearing that, Jin Ling, who had been about to protest to the 'saved' description, instantly snapped his mouth shut. He was probably scared Hanguang-jun would punish him again.

Smiling at the boy's reaction, Wei Wuxian nodded once and said, "Yup. He's right here beside me. You should come over."

They did, soon revealing that they were a group of eight or nine juniors wearing clothes from different sects.

"Oh! That one!" Nie Mingjue gestured at one of the boys. "He's the final member, right?"

"Ouyang Zizhen," Lan Xichen recalled.

"Ah!" Nie Huaisang beamed. "We've collected the whole set!"

"Why are you all here?" Wei Wuxian asked, handing back Suihua. "You just went flying through the sky. It's a good thing it was us. What if you'd crashed into ordinary people?"

"There aren't any ordinary people here! There aren't any people at all!" Jin Ling shouted.

Lan Sizhui nodded: "It's daylight, but there's fog everywhere. And there isn't a single shop open."

Hearing that, Lan Qiren frowned deeply, wary of the danger the city could pose.

"And what about you?" Jin Ling added on. "Why are you always hanging around Hanguang-jun?"

"I like being around him!" Wei Wuxian laughed, grabbing onto Lan Wangji and pulling him close. "What about it?"

"I — that-"

"Just give up, A-Cheng," Madam Yu sighed, noticing the way her daughter and husband's cooing had joined most of the watchers in making the real Lan Wangji's ears turn as red as apples. "No one's capable of stopping that brat."

Jiang Cheng just scowled deeper.

(On the other hand, Jiang Yanli felt herself warm. The disgust Jin Ling had directed toward his "uncle's" relationship with Lan Wangji had been something impossible to ignore. However, right now, his tone of voice had lacked its previous revulsion, and instead mostly contained just childish annoyance.)

(Jin Ling — her wonderful, darling A-Ling — was changing. Jiang Yanli couldn't be happier.)

However, unable to resist teasing back after the judgement Jin Ling had just tried to direct his way, Wei Wuxian continued, "I noticed you seemed happy to see me just now."

"Huh? Don't think so highly of yourself!" Jin Ling shouted back, sticking his tongue out childishly.

The laugher that escaped Madam Jin at that made Jin Zixuan feel far more judged than mere words would be able to invoke. He knew he had been somewhat prideful growing up ~~(and, after the soup incident, could admit he might be even worse now)~~, but there was really no reason for his mother to laugh so heartily at that, was there?

He instantly regretted each and every time he had betrayed Lan Wangji by laughing at Hanguang-jun's actions, and resolved to not do so again.

"Ah, whatever. It doesn't matter now. How did you guys run into each other? Don't tell me you arranged a nighthunt together."

The juniors paused, glancing at each other nervously.

'There's no way, right?' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Jin Ling thinks of everyone as an eyesore and wants to fight with everyone. He's already had unpleasant experiences with the Lan disciples; there's no way they'd want to hunt together.'

Jiang Cheng flinched at the comment, turning to his sister with a mouthed, 'I'm sorry.'

She smiled back, unjudging and simply pleased that Jin Ling had gotten some experience with her side of the family even after her death. And besides, Jin Ling was still young. As the changes he was already experiencing showed, there was plenty of room for him to grow.

Finally, Lan Sizhui cleared his throat and said, "That would be a long story. We were originally-"

Before he could finish, there was a sharp scratching sound of a bamboo pole against the ground, accompanied by a set of fast paced taps that grated on the ears. The junior's faces changed at once.

"It's here again!" they shouted.

This time, Lan Qiren was the one to experience a chill of coldness as the unknown figure ran through him. He shivered at the feeling, wondering as to the source of the layer of frantic desperation he felt in the resentment.

The noise bounced around, sounding both near and far at the same time. Not only was that effect annoying, but it made it impossible to determine where the source of the noise was.

"All of you, come over," Wei Wuxian ordered. "Huddle close. Don't move and don't attack."

Jiang Cheng had unconsciously moved to follow those orders as well, only to blush and quickly back up upon remembering that he was just a watcher, rather than a person actually there.

A few moments later, the sound stopped. For several seconds, Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and the juniors simply waited, tension remaining in their bodies in case it started up again. However, time continued to pass, and yet it didn't.

Relaxing at last, one disciple frowned and grumbled, "That thing again… just how long is it going to follow us for?"

"It's been following you?"

"Since we entered the city," Lan Sizhui explained. "The fog was too thick for us to see through, so it would be easy for one of us to wander off. Because of that, we decided to stick together while we walked. Then, we suddenly heard the noise. At first it was relatively slow — one knock at a time. We managed to make out a short shadow through the fog, right in front of us, but when we chased after it, it disappeared. The noise has been following us ever since."

'Good summary,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'Clear, concise… the Lans have done well with their next generation.'

"How short was the shadow?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Lan Sizhui gestured at his chest and elaborated, "Quite short. Small."

"And how long have you been here for?"

"About fifteen minutes."

"Fifteen minutes?" Wei Wuxian repeated, swerving to face Lan Wangji. "Hanguang-jun, how long have we been in here for?"

"About thirty minutes."

And there was no way for Hanguang-jun to be wrong.

"But that doesn't… make any sense."

"See?" Wei Wuxian asked. "We've been here for longer than you have. How is it possible for you to have ended up in front of us, only running into us when you turned around?"

"We never turned around!" Jin Ling immediately disagreed. "We've always been walking forward, following this path."

Wei Wuxian stared blankly.

"Okay, this really doesn't make any sense."

‘Did someone jinx the path to make it into a cryptic maze array?’ Wei Wuxian wondered.

Just like the one outside the Nie Sect’s saber hall. Nie Mingjue sighed; with this and the corpse being placed in the burial grounds, it certainly seemed like the perpetrator was familiar with the Nie Sect. He hoped the corpse wasn’t anyone he knew.

“And was Jin Ling checking the situation out from the air?”

“Yeah. I flew a long way up-”

“Actually, it wasn’t that high,” Lan Jingyi corrected.

“And what’s that supposed to mean?! It felt like a long way up to me!”

Long-since familiar with the sorts of arguments that tended to break out amongst the juniors, the watchers merely sighed.

“What Jingyi means is that the way it felt was probably deceiving,” Lan Sizhui jumped in. “So, what did you see?”

Although he looked for all the world like he was considering being silent just to spite Jingyi, Jin Ling soon recalled that the intimidating Hanguang-jun was waiting for his answer as well, and forced himself to answer:

“Well… there were a few fuzzy shadows darting here and there. I couldn’t make out what they were through the fog and the heavy miasma made it hard to move, so I decided to come down-”

“You mean when you fell down?”

“Jingyi!” Sizhui scolded.

Failing to completely hold in her laughter, Jiang Yanli commented, “At least we can rest assured that A-Ling and the others eventually develop a close friendship.”

Despite her best efforts, the few snickers that escaped her meant her words did nothing to counteract her mother, brother, and fiance’s embarrassment.

(If Lan Wangji wasn’t the fairest and most righteous person alive, he would be feeling rather smug that the people who had laughed at him earlier were finally the ones getting embarrassed instead.)

“Anyways,” Sizhui interrupted once again, hoping to move past the incident before another argument truly broke out. “I believe it stands to reason that this is a ghostly mist, rather than a natural fog.”

Wei Wuxian nodded once in acknowledgement, ever the teacher.

“The fog isn’t poisonous, is it?” Lan Jingyi asked, glancing around nervously.

“Probably not,” Wei Wuxian answered. “We’ve been here for quite some time already, and we’re still fine.”

Wen Qing clicked her tongue again, beyond annoyed at Wei Wuxian’s ‘proof.’

“I should have brought Fairy with me,” Jin Ling declared, glaring at Wei Wuxian (whose arms had erupted in goosebumps at the dog’s name). “It’s all because of your damn donkey.”

Jingyi was furious: “We haven’t even blamed your dog yet! It opened its mouth to bite first, and then it ended up with Little Apple’s hoove. Whose fault was that? Anyhow, neither of them can move right now.”

“What?!” Wei Wuxian shouted. “My Lil’ Apple was bitten by a dog?”

Groaning heavily, Jiang Cheng buried his face in his hands at his shixiong’s ridiculous acts.

“You — how can that donkey be more important than my spiritual dog?! Fairy was given to me by my Shushu. If something happened to it, not even ten thousand donkeys would be able to pay for it!”

“A dog from the Chief Cultivator himself,” Jin Zixuan repeated, disbelievingly. Well, if nothing else, it was nice that Jin Zixuan could rest assured his brother took good care of his son.

Then, unsurprisingly, Wei Wuxian retorted in all absurdity, “Don’t use LianFeng-zun’s name to scare people off! Well, my Lil’ Apple is a gift from Hanguang-jun. How could you take Lil’ Apple out to night-hunt? And let it be injured on top of that!”

“Liar!” the juniors from the Lan Sect declared.

Jiang Cheng, Jin Zixuan, and Nie Huaisang had all shouted the same, though with varying degrees of amusement toward the situation.

All the while, Hanguang-jun himself made no comment.

And neither did the real Lan Wangji. Both were content simply watching Wei Wuxian interact with the juniors, no matter how ridiculous the Yiling Patriarch chose to be.

Finally, Lan Sizhui clarified, “Um… sorry, Young Master Mo. Your Lil’ Apple… your donkey has been making noise every day in the Cloud Recesses, and the seniors have been complaining for some time.”

“The Cloud Recesses will lose its tranquility when Wei Wuxian arrives, won’t it?” Lan Qiren asked, sounded uncomfortably resigned to the possibility as Lan Xichen began to laugh.

(Jiang Cheng, on the other hand, frowned deeper, annoyed at how everyone was assuming that the real Wei Wuxian would just go along with the Lan Sect’s second young master, despite having never met him.)

“Anyways, they ordered us to get rid of the donkey during this night hunt, so we…” he trailed off, unwilling to finish.

Not believing that the donkey was truly a gift from Hanguang-jun, Jin Ling scoffed, “I can’t stand looking at that donkey! And it’s even called something as absurd as ‘Lil’ Apple!’ It’s so damn stupid.”

“What’s wrong with ‘Lil’ Apple?’” Lan Jingyi asked, worried that the donkey might indeed be from Hanguang-jun. “The donkey likes to eat apples, so it’s called Lil’ Apple. How down to earth. This is ten times better than calling your fat dog ‘Fairy!’”

“Hanguang-jun worshiper he may be, but you have to admit that the kid has a point about the names,” Nie Mingjue said, casting a far too-entertained look Jiang ‘Princess, Little Love, and Jasmine’ Cheng’s way.

Jin Ling disagreed.

“How is Fairy fat?! Just try to find me a more fit dog than Fairy!”

“You’re not disagreeing to the name comment-”

“Not disagreeing? Fairy is a fine name that-”

The voices abruptly cut off.

“A-Ling?!” Jiang Yanli asked at once, standing up.

“What happened?” Lan Qiren demanded, not noticing the amusement on Lan Xichen’s face.

“Is anyone still here?” Wei Wuxian asked, unable to see anyone in the fog.

There were several muffled grunts and “oomphs” and “mmns,” indicating that everyone was still present. A moment later, from directly behind Wei Wuxian, came an explanation:

“Noisy,” Lan Wangji calmly said.

“Wangji-xiong, how is your cold disapproval more scary than your uncle’s anger?” Nie Huaisang whined. “That doesn’t make any sense. It’s not how it’s supposed to work!”

“Perhaps being around Da-ge has made you immune to my uncle’s anger,” Lan Xichen suggested, delighting in the way Nie Mingjue jumped at the new title he had been given.

‘He silenced everyone at once?’ Wei Wuxian thought, disbelief clear in his expression (to those close enough to see him in the fog). ‘I guess I’m quite lucky then.’

He unconsciously brought his hand up to touch his lips.

‘I won’t silence you,’ Lan Wangji thought, thinking back on his other self’s frequent use of the silencing charm with disapproval. ‘Not again. Not now that I’ve seen a world in which you were forced to be silent for thirteen years.'

He would take every bit of Wei Wuxian he could get.

Then, from the left, came a tremendous gust of wind, accompanied by a mangled groan. There was a symphony of clunks as heavy footsteps approached. In the distance, hunched over shadows got closer and closer with every step.

The Sect Leaders stood up, instantly on alert. One or two fierce corpses would be easy for any one of them to deal with (meaning worrying about the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun would be idiotic), but right now, before them, wasn't just a handful of corpses.

There were hundreds.

And the resentful energy that accompanied them was not something that could be ignored.

Ravenous hisses escaped the corpses, making the gathered juniors eep in fear. The fog made it impossible to accurately determine where their attacker were, making the situation even more dangerous than before.

The sounds got closer.

"I think I hear breathing sounds," one boy pointed out, only to flush, realizing what a ridiculous statement that was.

Another boy laughed, "You really are something else, huh? Breathing sounds. How could there be something like that from corpses?"

But the undercoat of nervousness in his voice was undeniable.

The footsteps were five meters away from the outskirts of the group. Then four. Then three. Then two-

"Ha. They're finally coming," Jin Ling humphed, bravado taking over.

"A-Ling," Jin Zixuan whispered. "Don't-"

But Jin Ling had already unsheathed Suihua and shot forward, moving into the dense cloud of fog and out of Wei Wuxian's sight.

"Jin Ling!" Wei Wuxian shouted, then sighed as some of the other juniors lept forward to follow Jin Ling's example.

There were a few golden flashes as Jin Ling fought, and the simulation moved towards it to give the watchers a better view. Within the cloud, the Jin heir was doing everything he could to destroy the corpses. The others fought by his side, wielding their blades with admirable bravery. However, when one of the juniors cut one open, there was a strange sploshing sound. Something dark sprayed everywhere.

Jin Ling dodged and covered his mouth, narrowly avoiding ingesting it. The others weren't so lucky.

“Well, if it’s any consolation,” Lan Xichen smiled. “We can at least be grateful that Wangji and Wei-gongzi are there. I’m sure things would have been much worse otherwise.”

In response to those words, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan simply paled further, horrified by the possibilities.

“Huh?” Jin Ling gasped, glancing back and realizing far too late that a corpse had snuck up on him.

“A-Ling!”

“Ah!” the boy shouted as he was blasted through the air. Wei Wuxian immediately abandoned the boys he’d been helping, spinning on his heel and lunging forward to catch Jin Ling before he fell. The force of the corpse’s attack sent the pair skidding across the ground. Wei Wuxian dug in his heels, refusing to lose his balance in such a dangerous situation.

“Thank you, Wei Wuxian,” Jin Zixuan sighed, feeling like he’d said that line over two dozen times.

“What a strong force,” Wei Wuxian muttered.

There was another set of splashing sounds, and some of the disciples screamed in fright.

“What happened?” Wei Wuxian asked, clutching the unconscious Jin Ling tighter in his arms.

“Something spurted out of the corpse's body!” Lan Jingyi responded, gagging a little. “I think it was some sort of powder. It was bitter and sweet and rotten!”

Wen Qing sighed heavily, burying her face in her hand as her stress level skyrocketed.

“Um… Wen-guniang,” Jiang Yanli cleared her throat. “Will they be alright?”

After hesitating for a moment, Wen Qing responded, “We know the four who contacted us survive. However, if this is what I think it is, I can’t make any promises for the others.”

Jiang Fengmian sucked in a breath, biting his lip in worry.

“Everyone! Get away from the corpses!” Wei Wuxian ordered. “Come here, now!”

The juniors began blindly stumbling in the direction of his voice, trying to get close. Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian turned his eyes on the approaching corpses.

There was no humor in them now.

He glanced at Jin Ling once, then looked up again, his irises a burning scarlet.

The watchers flinched at the power that filled the air.

And the corpses stalled, confused for a moment by the commands behind the song Wei Wuxian's makeshift flute played. However, a moment later, they trembled and jerked and moved.

'I can't control it?' Wei Wuxian realized.

"Oh, fu-"

Before that curse could be finished, it was exchanged for a scream. The corpse had pounced forward, and Wei Wuxian had escaped its grasp by a mere centimeter. Lan Wangji came up behind Wei Wuxian, already unsheathing Bichen, only for the Yiling Patriarch to rest a hand on Wangji's own.

"No need," he said, curling his fingers around Lan Wangji's and pressing down to re-sheath Bichen. "We can't risk any more dust getting into the kids' bodies. Let me handle this."

If the situation wasn't so serious, Lan Xichen would have cooed at the sheer intimacy of the interaction.

Twisting so that the boy in his arms was near Wangji, Wei Wuxian requested, "Take care of Jin Ling for me?"

"Okay," Hanguang-jun calmly answered, accepting the boy without complaint. No worry could be found in his expression.

As the real Lan Wangji watched the exchange, he couldn't help but find himself amazed once more. Although he was well aware of Wei Wuxian's power, the complete and utter trust his other self had in Wei Wuxian's ability — and vise versa — left him momentarily breathless.

No matter how many misunderstandings had occurred between them, their faith in each other's strength and righteousness had never faltered.

Wei Wuxian ran forward to where the corpses were most heavily concentrated, trusting Lan Wangji to take care of the kids while he did. They attacked him on all sides, but Wei Wuxian's agility (even in Mo Xuanyu's body) was more than enough to easily avoid them. They lunged for him and slashed with their claws, but only ever hit air.

Wei Wuxian gathered resentment in his body, then attacked. He slammed his power into the remaining corpses — trying to knock down, rather than control. Unlike the cuts that would result from Hanguang-jun's attacks, Wei Wuxian's did not break open the corpses' skin; the powder remained inside.

The last corpse slammed against the ground, and Wei Wuxian's flute was at its neck an instant later. One foot on the monster's chest, Wei Wuxian loomed over his fallen adversaries with a smug satisfaction that sent tingles up the real Lan Wangji's body.

“The person controlling you is indeed skilled,” he acknowledged. “But when it comes to demonic cultivation… I’m the founder.”

Wen Ruohan gave a low, impressed whistle, filling in the silence created by the other watchers’ speechlessness.

Seeing that the corpses had all been immobilized, Lan Wangji acted next. A light blue glow filled the space, and dark miasma was forced out of the bodies into the air.

Jiang Cheng stepped back, not wanting to find out how the strange resentful energy would interact with his incorporeal form.

Once most of the energy had been forced out, Lan Wangji’s free hand (which had been up in a hand signal), pressed down, causing the little tension still in the corpses to vanish.

The now-soulless bodies became limp on the ground.

Wei Wuxian had been too far to see where the other was, but Hanguang-jun’s purification gave him a general idea of where to find the man. He headed in that direction, relaxing when he spotted the figure of an adult through the fog.

“Alright, everyone get close!” he commanded. “Come here quickly. I want to see you.”

“Okay, but I can’t see you,” Lan Jingyi pointed out. “Where are you?”

Briefly recalling the only thing that had been visible in the thick fog, Wei Wuxian called out, “Hanguang-jun, draw your sword for a moment so that he can walk over.”

However, the shadow Wei Wuxian had identified as Lan Wangji’s figure neither twitched nor moved. Then, a blue glow appeared some ways away from the figure Wei Wuxian had been looking at.

Which meant the adult figure next to him-

The man darted forward and snatched the Qiankun pouch from Wei Wuxian’s side. His face was covered in a shadowy mist — it was the grave robber from before. However, a moment after he grabbed the pouch, it suddenly swelled. The string that had kept it tied snapped in half, and three enraged spirits shot forward.

The watchers jumped back as a panicking Wen Chao screeched.

“What-”

Wei Wuxian’s laughter cut the question off: “Sorry, did you want the Qiankun Pouch with the corpse? Your eyesight must be pretty bad then. Why did you take my spirit trapping pouch instead?”

‘Crafty brat,’ Jin Guangshan thought, noticing the way Wen Ruohan’s eyes had quirked in approval when the Chief Cultivator realized what Wei Wuxian had done.

‘It’s a good thing I swapped the pouches placements,’ Wei Wuxian thought, watching the unknown man take care of the spirits with ease. ‘So he really is someone with a high level of cultivation.’

That was undeniably true, but after having spent so long watching Hanguang-jun and the Yiling Patriarch perform miracles, Lan Qiren and Jiang Fengmian couldn’t help but feel a bit underwhelmed by the supposed ‘high cultivation.’

“Hanguang-jun, the gravedigger’s here!” Wei Wuxian shouted. Less than a moment later, Bichen’s piercing blue glow shot past him and engaged the unknown man in combat. Unfortunately, while Bichen’s glow couldn’t be concealed, the shadows the intruder had applied to himself masked his own cultivation. Given the gravedigger’s familiarity with the Gusu Lan fighting style, it was far from an easy battle.

Someone made a grunt of pain.

“Lan Zhan?! Are you hurt?” Wei Wuxian shouted.

“Of course not.”

There was bitter laugh, then another gasp, quite clearly not Lan Wangji’s voice.

Wei Wuxian grinned: “So it seems!”

Warmth wrapped around Lan Wangji’s heart at the interaction, and, despite the still-impassive face, Lan Xichen could tell that his brother had just fallen a little deeper than before.

(Which made it all the more unfortunate that the real Wei Wuxian wasn’t here to watch with them.)

As Lan Wangji immediately resumed his battle with the mysterious perpetrator, Wei Wuxian turned to face the juniors (confident that Lan Wangji could handle whoever the man was). There was now a large pack of new fierce corpses surrounding them on all sides, making it difficult to escape.

“How are the ones who inhaled the powder?” Wei Wuxian asked, prioritizing the health of the children, as per usual.

Wen Qing straightened up even further, praying that someone there had an antidote to corpse poisoning.

Having taken a moment to observe those who had inhaled the powder most deeply, Sizhui reported, “They are starting to have trouble standing up.”

Wei Wuxian nodded: “Alright. Come to the middle and number yourselves off.”

Despite his words, he then turned his attention to the gathering corpses just outside their little group. These were the stragglers who had been too far to be a threat earlier, but were becoming more and more of one every second.

With a cocky smile and a twirl of his flute, Wei Wuxian brought the instrument to his lips and played a single, resounding note.

Instantly, a stream of resentful energy exploded into the air. Ten or so yards off the ground, an enormous magic array made out of resentment formed.

"What the — that's as big as a house!" Wen Chao gaped, stepping back in shock.

And the effects were felt soon enough. Now that Wei Wuxian had gathered all the kids in one place, there was no need for him to hold back when it came to attacking the rest of the corpses. Resentful energy exploded into a tidal wave that launched the corpses — and many of the watchers — straight off the ground. They flew through the air as if rocketed back, only stopping when they either crashed into the nearby houses (the corpses) or got low enough to make contact with the floor, skidding across it until they stopped.

"Ow," Nie Huaisang said, miserably.

The notes Wei Wuxian was playing on his flute then switched, and an entire song broke out, just as unnervingly gorgeous as all the others had been. Within seconds, every corpse had been purified.

Wei Wuxian lowered the flute with a smirk.

If Lan Wangji were a lesser man, he knew he would be staring in slack jawed awe at Wei Wuxian (possibly releasing a bit of drool in the process). Luckily for the little dignity the second jade had left, he was far too composed to do something like that.

(That didn't stop his brain from imagining all sorts of detestable things regardless.)

The juniors, who had just finished numbering themselves off, were now staring at the sky, slack-jawed with disbelief at what they had just seen. Without explaining what he had done, Wei Wuxian approached them and cupped Lan Jingyi's face with one of his hands, using the other to feel the boy's forehead.

'A bit warm,' Wei Wuxian thought, frowning.

As Wei Wuxian moved to check the other juniors' foreheads (finding the same result each time), Wen Qing sighed. It was becoming increasingly likely that her theory was correct. She would know for sure if she could just get a good look at their-

"Show me your tongue," Wei Wuxian ordered, lifting Lan Jingyi's eyelids. "Ahh."

"Ahh."

"That settles it, then," Wen Qing sighed.

"Yup. Congratulations. You're under corpse poisoning."

“What?!” Lan Qiren stood.

“Wei Wuxian!” Jiang Cheng shouted, annoyed at his shixiong’s persistent, obnoxious positivity (especially considering what Wen Qing had said about the severity of her theory).

Similarly, Jin Ling soon added on, “How is that something to congratulate someone for?!”

“It’s a life experience,” Wei Wuxian shamelessly answered. “It’ll be a conversation starter when you get older.”

“For crying out loud-” Nie Mingjue cut himself off, groaning heavily.

Feeling much the same, Lan Xichen gave a shaky smile and commented, “I feel like one of us should tell him that there is such thing as too much positivity.”

Then again, after the things Wei Wuxian had experienced and moved past, perhaps it shouldn’t be a surprise that he considered corpse poisoning a ‘good life experience.’

“Young Master Mo, will anything happen to them?” Sizhui asked, worriedly. “Corpse poisoning happens so rarely… we don’t have any elixirs to cure them.”

Wen Qing tsked.

And the affected boys all paled considerably upon hearing that.

“Nothing will happen for the moment. When the poison travels through the bloodstream to enter the heart, however, nothing will be able to help anymore.”

“W-what will happen?”

“Whatever happens to the corpse will happen to you,” Wei Wuxian blithely answered. “If you’re lucky you’ll just rot away. If you’re not, you’ll become a long-haired zombie that’ll only be able to hop around for the rest of your life.”

If it weren’t for the constant reassurance that her grandson would be fine, Madam Yu would be cursing Wei Wuxian’s near-callous lightheartedness until the end of time.

She took a deep breath, forcing herself to calm down, not noticing the thoughtful expression her husband sent her way.

“So, do you want to cure it?”

The disciples all nodded frantically, none of them sharing Wei Wuxian’s obvious amusement with the situation.

“Alright. If you want to cure yourselves, then listen up. From now on, all of you have to listen to whatever I say and follow my orders. Every one of you.”

Many of the boys had never met ‘Mo Xuanyu’ before, but the familiar way in which Wei Wuxian referred to Hanguang-jun (and the desperate situation) commanded their obedience. Wen Ruohan smiled minutely, suddenly recalling the way every sect heir had unquestioningly followed Wei Wuxian’s plan in the Xuanwu Cave.

It was truly unfortunate that the boy seemed to have no desire to be a sect leader; he’d make quite a good one.

Wei Wuxian clapped: “Stand up. Those who aren’t poisoned, carry those who are, preferably over the shoulder. If you can only lift them over your fronts, remember to position their heads and hearts higher than the rest of their bodies.”

“But I can walk!” Lan Jingyi protested. “Why do I need to be carried?”

“If you jump around, your blood is going to circulate quickly, and it will enter your heart sooner. It’s best if you don’t move at all.”

The complaints stopped after that.

Nie Huaisang, who had stood in the center of the powder released by Lan Jingyi’s attack (only for it to phase straight through him), was very, very glad they were still intangible.

“Young Master Mo, everyone is in position. Where do we go now?” Lan Sizhui asked, carrying Lan Jingyi over his back.

‘Ah, this Sizhui boy really is the nicest, most obedient, and least worrisome one.’

Remembering the close relationship his other self had with the boy, Lan Wangji felt a bit of pride soar in his chest at the comment.

In the distance, Lan Wangji continued his battle with the unknown man. Glancing that way for a moment — still not even remotely worried — Wei Wuxian smirked.

“Right now, we won’t be able to leave the city. So, let’s go around and knock on a few doors.”

“Doors?” Jiang Cheng repeated.

Equally confused, Jin Ling asked, “Knock on the doors of what?”

Pausing for a moment in thought, Wei Wuxian asked, “Is there anything we can knock on the doors of but houses?”

The faux-confusion in his tone made Madam Yu sigh, but she refrained from commenting. No matter how infuriating the boy’s arrogant mocking was, she had to admit it wasn’t entirely unearned; he was always the one with an answer, after all.

Seeing that, Jiang Fengmian bit his lip as his thought. Recently, despite still getting annoyed at Wei Wuxian in general, Madam Yu had not said anything against him. Before the simulation, that would never have been the case. In fact, at the beginning of the simulation, she had still not hesitated to make all sorts of comments before the gathered sects. Even after watching Wei Wuxian being thrown into the Burial Mounds, certain judgements remained.

Now, however — whether it was because he had saved Jin Ling, proven his sanity, or even just had given her the time to process everything — Madam Yu was not speaking out against Wei Wuxian.

A transition Jiang Fengmian had long since accepted as impossible had happened in a handful of days.

Meanwhile, undisturbed by Jiang Fengmian's racing thoughts, the simulation had continued:

"You want us to enter these houses?!" Jin Ling demanded. "It's already dangerous enough outside. Who knows what sorts of things are hiding in the buildings, waiting and watching us."

Wen Chao paled, instantly flashing back to the Yiling Patriarch's revenge.

(The infant Wang Lingjiao thought she had seen certainly matched Jin Ling's description.)

And then, contrary to most of the watchers' expectations, Wei Wuxian just shrugged and said, "True."

"What?!"

"It's hard to say whether it's more dangerous inside or outside of the houses, but, since it's already like this on the outside, we might as well try out the inside," he said, gesturing around to the new series of corpses approaching in the distance.

"Let's go; there's no time to lose. We still need to cure the poisoning."

Unable to deny that, the juniors complied. Holding onto the sword sheaths of the person in front of them, they walked single-file after Wei Wuxian through the fog. They went from house to house, knocking on doors. There was no response from the first. Nor the second. Nor the third.

Impatient, Jin Ling suggested, "There doesn't seem to be anyone inside. Let's just go in."

"Who told you to enter if there wasn't anyone inside?" Wei Wuxian demanded. "Continue knocking. We need to get to a house that does have someone in it."

"Are you serious?" Jiang Cheng asked, groaning at Wei Wuxian's usual ridiculousness.

"You want to find one with someone inside?" Jin Ling asked.

"Yes. Knock nicely — yours were too fierce. It's quite rude."

Those words infuriated Jin Ling to the point where he looked like he wanted to kick the door down. Luckily, he controlled himself at the last second and merely stomped his foot on the ground.

"Oh, A-Ling," Jiang Yanli sighed out, a warm smile on her face. To her left, her fiance was torn between amusement and second hand embarrassment, causing him to look away. After a moment, he peaked back at her out of the corner of his eye. The pair made eye contact for a moment.

Immediately after, they both burst into laughter.

From there, they went from house to house, knocking on each door. Although each failure was clearly making Jin Ling more and more annoyed, the amount of force he was exerting had clearly lessened.

'Good job, A-Ling,' Jin Zixuan thought, feeling a new kind of pride well up within him.

On the other hand, no matter how many times they failed, Sizhui remained calm.

"Excuse me, is anyone inside?" he asked for the dozenth time.

Suddenly, the door shifted, and a thin, black slit cracked open.

"Oh? There was actually someone inside?" Madam Jin asked, having half believed that Wei Wuxian was just messing with the juniors by this point.

Time went on, but the person behind the door didn't speak. It was impossible to see them as well, due to how dark the inside of the house was. Nervous, the boys unconsciously took steps back.

Lan Sizhui quickly regained his composure, "Excuse me, are you the manager of this shop?"

Both Wen Ruohan and Lan Qiren nodded in approval, especially pleased by this junior.

Another moment passed, before an old, bizarre voice leaked from the slit a simple "Yes."

Wei Wuxian walked over with an easy grin, patting Lan Sizhui's shoulder and motioning for him to step back as he said, "Manager, it's our first time coming to this city. The fog was so thick that we got lost. We've been walking for a long time already, and we're rather tired. Would it be possible for you to lend us your shop so that we can rest?"

"...My shop is not for travelers to rest in," the gravelly voice replied.

Looking unhurried and unconcerned despite the strangeness of the situation, Wei Wuxian continued, "But this is the only shop around here that has anyone inside. Manager, are you really unwilling to do us this favor? We will gladly pay."

He flashed a charming smile, and Jin Guangshan was once again reminded of the fact that Wei Wuxian had been forth on the list of young masters. Mo Xuanyu was attractive in his own right, but something about Wei Wuxian's presence in the body elevated that to a whole new level.

Behind Wei Wuxian, Jin Ling quickly blurted out, "How are you going to pay? I'm certainly not going to lend you any money."

"No need," Wei Wuxian responded, gleefully pulling out a pouch of money and waggling it before their eyes. It was MianMian's pouch, from all those years ago.

Lan Sizhui flinched back in shock, gasping out "You — how dare you? That is Hanguang-jun's."

Upon hearing that, Lan Xichen frowned slightly in confusion. Were the juniors truly so familiar with their 'Hanguang-jun' that they could recognize his money pouch on sight?

As the argument continued, the door then slid open just a bit more. It was still impossible to see inside, but they could now make out the person they had been speaking to. A gray-haired, expressionless woman stood behind the door.

Jin Guangshan internally mourned that it wasn't a young maiden. Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were certainly quite beautiful, but, if you asked him, the overall story was somewhat lacking in the female cast.

Although the woman had a hunched back (making her appear quite elderly), she didn't actually have many wrinkles or age spots. It might even be possible to describe her as middle aged. She proceeded to open the door and move out of the way, wordlessly welcoming them inside.

Gaping in astonishment, Jin Ling whispered, "She's really willing to let us in?"

"Of course," Wei Wuxian whispered back. "One of my feet was in the slit, so she couldn't have closed the door even if she wanted to. If she didn't let me in, I would have just kicked the door down."

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli instantly scolded, mouth falling open in shock as laughter erupted around her. "You can't just-"

"In all fairness, Jiang-guniang," Wen Qing interrupted. "If he doesn't find a cure soon, the juniors will die."

"...I suppose," Jiang Yanli acknowledged, still finding herself shocked by her shidi's rudeness. Then again, perhaps this was simply an extension of their different backgrounds, as Jiang Yanli had seen throughout the simulation.

Wei Wuxian knew what it was like to be desperate. When he needed something, he knew how to make it happen.

The old woman stood waiting on the side, frowning as the disciples hesitantly brought their too-scared-to-move poisoned friends inside. As soon as everyone had entered, she shut the door.

Darkness instantly filled the room.

“Manager, why do you not turn on the lights?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“The light is on the table. Ignite it yourselves.”

Following her instructions, Lan Sizhui felt around the table for the light, swiftly moving to turn it on. He found the candles, then lit the flame.

“Ah!”

The virtual and real juniors shrieked in unison, all stumbling to the middle of the room as the unblinking faces of countless people stared back at them.

Jiang Fengmian had flinched heavily, and Lan Qiren had turned several shades paler. Even Nie Mingjue was startled, having not heard any breathing beforehand.

The reason why became apparent a moment later.

When he had flinched, Lan Sizhui had nearly dropped the oil lamp, but Wei Wuxian’s quick hand caught it before it made contact with the floor. Calmly brushing the burning fire talisman, he lit it up further and set it down on the table.

“Did you make these yourself, Manager? They’re quite well made.”

“...Oh. Puppets.”

And indeed, the silent ‘people’ in the room were in actuality paper mannequins in the forms of delicate women, adorable children, and even Nether Brawlers. Their eyes were entirely white, lacking pupils despite their noticeably rosy cheeks.

Their strange likeness to humanity made them all the more unsettling.

However, curiosity soon overcame the juniors’ fear, and they began to venture closer to the mannequins. As time went on, it became more and more obvious that they were truly just puppets. Their fears soon eased.

Seeing that, Wei Wuxian turned to the old woman and asked, “Would it be possible for us to borrow your kitchen?”

“Kitchen?” Jiang Yanli asked, tilting her head in confusion.

Glowering at the lamp, the old woman answered, "The kitchen is in the back. Use it as you please."

Before she had even finished that sentence, she had already turned around and fled the room, rushing off as though she was trying to escape the plague. The door slammed in her wake.

Shocked by the blatant disrespect, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen made eye contact with each other, somewhat surprised by Wei Wuxian's tolerance for it. Then again, Wei Wuxian had barged into her home, so it was understandable.

Jin Ling disagreed.

"There's definitely something wrong with that woman! What is she thinking? You-"

"Okay, hush. I need someone to help me," Wei Wuxian interrupted. "Any volunteers?"

Lan Sizhui immediately raised his hand, offering "I can come."

All three Lans looked on in potent approval, unspeakably proud of their to-be disciple.

"Wait, then what should I do?" Lan Jingyi asked, still standing straight as a stick.

"Remain standing," Wei Wuxian answered. "Don't move until I tell you to."

At those words, Lan Jingyi impossibly stood up even straighter, the tension in his body reaching near-critical levels.

Although Lan Jingyi hadn't been quite as perfect a disciple as the Twin Jades or Lan Sizhui, his cultivation skill could not be discounted, showing years of hard work. With his defensiveness of the Lan Sect on top of that, the three present Lans knew any damage he sustained would be a heavy loss.

'After the way he died, I might not have a right to ask this of him, but I sincerely hope Wei Wuxian will be able to help,' Lan Xichen thought, taking several calming breaths.

Lan Sizhui (and the watchers), then followed Wei Wuxian into the back room. As soon as they entered, Lan Sizhui flinched back and covered his nose as if overwhelmed by a foul stench. His head spun until he needed to support himself on one of the nearby cabinets, breathing gasps out through his mouth to try to limit the air intake of his nose.

The other person who had followed, Jin Ling, immediately spun around and fled the room as soon as he entered, shouting, "What in the world is this?! What are you doing here instead of thinking up cures?!"

"I'm so glad the simulation doesn't include smell," Nie Huaisang said with a relieved sigh. The other heirs present all nodded in agreement, and the only one who opposed the notion was Wen Qing (whose curiosity had long since overcome her sense of disgust).

But, instead of answering Jin Ling's question, Wei Wuxian just called out, "Young Mistress Jin, are you coming over? If you are, then come and help; if you're not, then go back and tell someone else to come over."

"Who are you calling 'Young Mistress Jin?!' Watch what you say!"

Leaning close to Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue muttered, "I have to admit, that name suits him rather well."

Lan Xichen quickly coughed to hide his laughter, and Wen Qing made amused eye contact with a bashful Jiang Yanli.

There was a deafening bang as Wei Wuxian opened a chest on the ground. Instantly, all the young masters reeled back in disgust, the smell increasing to intolerable levels.

"So, so glad," Nie Huaisang muttered.

Within the chest was ham and chicken, dotted in blotches of revolting green, which in itself was dotted in the white of coiling maggots. Seemingly unphased by this, Wei Wuxian picked up the chest and handed it to Jin Ling.

"Throw it away," he ordered. "Anywhere works, so long as we don't smell it."

"How is he not reacting?!" Wen Chao demanded, having moved as far away as he could possibly go. "He can even smell it! Wasn't he supposed to be a young master?! What, does he not have a tongue? He really is a freak-"

"Chao-er," Wen Ruohan spoke, the one disapproving word enough to make Wen Chao's mouth snapped closed.

After hesitating for a moment, Wen Qing couldn't help but scathingly point out, "I'm sure, after the Burial Mounds you threw him into, this is nothing."

Even if Wen Chao was willing to argue with her, he wouldn't be able to. Not only was his father annoyed with him, but, just a little further, the second jade sat, a dark cloud of hatred forming around him.

Wen Chao wasn't intimidated by the second jade, but he thought now would be an unwise time to say anything further.

Meanwhile, Jin Ling (quite reluctantly) did as he was told. After throwing the chest away, he wiped his hands with a handkerchief a few times, and threw that away as well. He shuddered at the memory of what had been inside the chest.

Once again, Jiang Yanli was overwhelmed by a feeling of helplessness. It was one thing when her shidi was fighting dangerous battles, but he and her son were doing something in a kitchen, now. She was Lotus Pier's uncontested expert on that. And yet there was still no assistance she could offer them.

(Because her other-self was dead.)

(Which made her want to find out how that had happened all the more.)

When Jin Ling returned to the kitchen, he noticed that Wei Wuxian and Lan Sizhui had fetched two buckets of water from an outside well. Rather than using it for a ritual of some sort, the pair was instead using it to clean up.

"...Is Wei Wuxian just messing with them?" Jiang Cheng couldn't help but ask. His father laughed at the question, while his mother just gave an elegant shrug.

Once again not jumping to blame Wei Wuxian, Jiang Fengmian noticed.

"Hey. What are you doing?" Jin Ling demanded.

Wiping diligently, Lan Sizhui explained, "As you can see, we're cleaning the kitchen hearth."

"What's the use of cleaning the hearth. We're not making food or anything."

"Says who?" Wei Wuxian asked. "We are making food. You can sweep the dust. Get rid of all the cobwebs up there. Go on, now."

The words were said so naturally that, without even thinking about it, Jin Ling soon found himself doing just that.

"I can't believe he got young masters to do something like this," Madam Jin commented, staring in disbelief at her numbly compliant grandson. Hearing that, Lan Xichen suddenly remembered a part from the second segment, in which, after Wei Wuxian had asked how the sluggard could have gotten money, the spirits added in a note above the Lan juniors' heads. 'Young masters who have never had to think about money' it had said.

Wei Wuxian was quite a good influence on them, it seemed. Despite the dangerous situation, Lan Xichen couldn't help but be grateful his future disciples would get to experience it.

Then, the door cracked open, and Lan Wangji stepped inside.

"Ah, Lan Zhan! Perfect timing!" Wei Wuxian beamed, not bothering to ask about the grave robber. "Help us clean up."

Nodding once, Lan Wangji did so without complaint. After a short while, the kitchen looked completely different. It almost made the house appear lively, rather than worn down and abandoned as it had before. They piled some pre-chopped firewood into the hearth and set it alight with a flame talisman, quickly warming the room in a yellow glow.

A moment later, the door to the storage room swung closed as Lan Wangji stepped out, a basket in his arm.

"I found it," he reported. "There was some glutinous rice left inside."

"...Wen-guniang, um-"

“You don’t need to worry, the kids will be fine now,” Wen Qing quickly assured her, nodding once in what she hoped was a comforting manner (because if there was one thing Wen Qing could understand, it was protective worry). “Glutinous rice is one of the cures to corpse poisoning.”

“It is?” Jin Zixuan asked disbelievingly. Wen Qing saw no need to answer him.

While they were speaking to each other, Wei Wuxian had gotten to work. Taking a clean pot, he filled it with water and put it over the hearth. Once the water had started boiling, he poured the rice Lan Wangji had washed inside. With a peaceful smile on his face, he used a wooden spoon to stir it.

“You’re making congee?” Jin Ling asked.

“Uh huh.”

Annoyed, Jin Ling hurled his cleaning rag to the ground.

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan both flushed in embarrassment, seeing their families giving them fairly knowing looks in regards to who Jin Ling got that behavior from.

“Hey now, no need for that,” Wei Wuxian scolded. “How can you get so mad after working for just a short while? Look at Sizhui. He’s worked the hardest, but he hasn’t said anything.”

Lan Qiren tried very hard to not preen with pride over his to-be disciple.

“Besides, what’s wrong with congee?”

“What’s not wrong with congee?!” Jin Ling responded. “It’s so watery and tasteless and… Wait, I’m not mad because there’s something wrong with congee!”

“Good. It’s not for you anyways.”

Those words just made Jin Ling even more angry: “What do you mean it’s not for me? I’ve worked for so long, and I don’t even get any?!”

“Wasn’t he literally just complaining about how tasteless it was?” Nie Mingjue asked, to which Jiang Yanli shook her head while hiding a laugh, silently communicating that looking for logic would be a futile endeavor.

“Hanguang-jun, Young Master Mo, is it that congee can cure corpse poisoning?” Lan Sizhui inquisitelly asked.

“Yup. But it’s not the congee that can cure corpse poisoning — it’s the rice. This is folk medicine. Normally, you’d apply the glutinous rice to a scratch or bite wound. If this ever happens to you again, try this. It’s hurts a lot, but it works pretty efficiently. However, you all swallowed corpse poisoning powder instead of being scratched or bitten, so we need to make this into rice congee.”

“Oooh.”

“That makes sense, I suppose.”

Although Lan Qiren had already seen as much during Wei Wuxian’s student days in the Cloud Recesses, it still surprised him how much the boy knew. For all that Madam Yu complained about his laziness, he was clearly quite well read.

(Then again, after what they’d seen, she probably wouldn’t ever complain about that again.)

“Oh, so that’s why you wanted a house with someone inside,” Lan Sizhui realized. “Only a house with an occupant would have a stocked kitchen. And only a kitchen could have glutinous rice.”

But Jin Ling’s objections continued: “Who knows how long that rice has been here for! Can you still eat it? This kitchen hasn’t been used for at least a year! There’s dust everywhere and the meat’s rotten. Don’t tell me that hag hasn’t eaten for an entire year. What, has she practiced inedia? That’s impossible! How did she survive?”

‘Fair question,’ Wen Ruohan thought, frowning deeply as Wei Wuxian continued to be undisturbed by the strangeness of the woman who allowed them in.

“There are two possibilities,” Wei Wuxian began. “Either she hasn’t been living here and isn’t the real shopkeeper, or she simply doesn’t need to eat.”

“...Huh?” Jiang Cheng asked, wishing Wei Wuxian could just explain normally for once.

Lowering his voice to a near-whisper, Lan Sizhui said, “If she doesn’t need to eat, then she would be dead. That woman clearly breathes.”

Still waiting for the pot to heat up enough, Wei Wuxian simply switched topic, asking, “Right, you haven’t finished explaining. Why did you come to Yi City together? It wasn’t just by chance that you ran into each other, was it?”

Everyone’s expressions quickly turned serious as Jin Ling replied, “The Lan Sect’s people, those from other sects, and I were all chasing after something. I came from around Qinghe.”

“We came from Langya,” Lan Sizhui added.

Curious, Wei Wuxian casually asked, “What were you chasing?”

“We don’t know,” Lan Sizhui shook his head. “It never showed its face. We don’t even know if it is a what or a who or… or an organization.”

“And they just chased after it?” Madam Yu huffed in annoyed. “Honestly, you’d think A-Ling at least would have someone looking after him. What an utter mess.”

“At least Wei Ying is here, now,” Lan Wangji pointed out. Madam Yu pursed her lips, but didn’t object. Internally, she had to admit there were few she trusted with Jin Ling more than Hanguang-jun and the Yiling Patriarch (regardless of the mysterious circumstances that led to her daughter and son-in-law's deaths).

A moment later, they were given an explanation. However, despite it being Lan Jingyi's voice speaking, there was no motion from the boy himself. This was a message from the version even farther in the future, who had assembled the simulation. And, accompanying it, were memories showcasing the events. Jin Ling crept out of a tavern.

"Ever since a few days ago, when Jin Ling lied to his uncle — wait, really? You did?"

The memory jerked to a halt, freezing as the narration paused.

"Just keep going!" Jin Ling complained.

"Alright, alright. So, the delicate Young Mistress had become worried that Sect Leader Jiang would really break his legs, so he-"

"Wait, what did you call me?"

As Lan Sizhui tried (mostly in vain) to stop the argument, the Jiangs shifted awkwardly. Much had happened since then, but it was hard to forget Wei Wuxian's last meeting with Jiang Cheng. And now, Jin Ling was scared that Jiang Cheng was actually going to hurt him.

For the crime of saving Wei Wuxian.

It was probably not a necessary concern — Jiang Cheng probably wouldn't actually hurt Jin Ling over this —and it would probably be fine, but there shouldn't have to be a 'probably' there. Words could not describe how much was wrong with that situation, and yet, based on the accuracy of the simulation so far, it appeared to be the truth.

"I'll continue from here," Lan Sizhui decided, presumably snatching the script from Lan Jingyi's hands. "He was worried Sect Leader Jiang would really break his legs, so he decided to sneak away and disappear for a couple of days, not wanting to meet up with his uncle again until the man's anger had subsided."

Both Madam Yu and Jiang Cheng flinched at the description, finding a churning whirlpool of anger forming within them, but having no one to direct those emotions at but themselves.

"As soon as he had passed Zidian to one of Sect Leader Jiang's trusted subordinates, he ran away. Having arrived at a city on the border of the Qinghe area, his journey paused. While searching for a location for his next night hunt, he took a short rest at a local inn. That night, while he was memorizing spells in his room, Fairy started barking at the door. It was late at night, so Jin Ling told the dog to stop, but, a moment later, he heard someone knock on the door."

"I don't like this story. It's creepy," Ouyang Zizhen complained in a low whisper, causing the memory to freeze once again.

"We've already lived it. What else is there to be scared of?" Jin Ling scoffed, then paused when he heard Lan Sizhui clear his throat with just a trace of annoyance.

‘It’s like herding cats,’ Lan Qiren thought, sighing lightly. As capable as those juniors were, their attention spans seemed to be shorter than Jin Guangshan’s periods of sexual abstinence. He thanked the heavens that Sizhui was present.

“Although Fairy stopped barking, it was still restless. Its claws dug at the ground and it growled deeply. Already on alert, Jin Ling asked who the person beyond the door was. There came no reply, so Jin Ling returned to his own business. However, half an hour later, the knocks started again.”

The memory zoomed out to show an agitated Jin Ling leap out through his back window, circling around to cut off whoever was bothering him. However-

“Jin Ling searched, but there was nobody there.”

Frowning heavily, the memory of Jin Ling set Fairy out to guard the door, presumably informing it to attack if it saw anything suspicious.

Jin Zixuan paused, torn once again between his great respect for ‘Little Fairy,’ and the overwhelming realization that the real Wei Wuxian would be heavily inconvenienced if Jin Zixuan gave his son a dog.

“The next morning-”

There was a scream.

Nie Huaisang jumped at the sudden sound.

Jin Ling kicked the door open at once, only to step in a pool of blood. A moment later, a black mass fell from the top of the door — one which Jin Ling just barely managed to dodge.

It was the corpse of a black cat.

“What kind of deranged psychopath would do something like that?!” Nie Huaisang shrieked, quickly backing away.

“Someone had nailed a cat on top of his door. He tried a few different inns, but the same thing kept happening. Eventually, he got so fed up that he told himself he would hunt down any mention of a cat nailed to someone’s door, just to find out who was messing with him.”

The memory and narration both faded away, returning them to Wei Wuxian’s cooking.

“The same thing happened to you guys?” Wei Wuxian asked the Lans, receiving several nods in response.

“We chased after it, eventually arriving at Yueyang and Young Master Jin,” Lan Sizhui explained. “We found out we were searching for the same thing, so we decided to work together, arriving in this area today. We asked a hunter in the village, and were shown the path to Yi City.”

‘A hunter in the village?’ Wei Wuxian mentally repeated. ‘Lan Zhan and I were there only a little while before them, but we didn’t see a hunter there. Just women and children.’

A tense pause spread out.

“At least the didn’t get hurt,” Lan Xichen pointed out. “The perpetrator may not be entirely malicious.”

“Perhaps,” Wen Ruohan acknowledged. “Or maybe the juniors aren’t the targets of this scheme.”

Although he wouldn’t say so out loud, Nie Huaisang had to agree.

‘Is it really a coincidence that the juniors involved include all three of the kids Wei-xiong met after coming back to life?’ he wondered.

Feeling much the same, Wei Wuxian thought, ‘It almost seems like they were led to us. To bring a bunch of juniors into a dangerous place so they could face the limbs of a fierce corpse — isn’t this what happened at Mo Village?’

“Da-ge,” Nie Huaisang whined pitifully, as if saying ‘are you really planning on leaving me alone in such a scary world?’ In response to that, Nie Mingjue could only look away, unable to reject the accusation.

The future certainly seemed to be full of dangerous people. And yet, what other choice did Nie Mingjue have?

‘Worst of all, there were corpses here I couldn’t control,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘In that case… it’s entirely possible the Stygian Tiger Seal might be in Yi City at this very moment. After all, something must have happened to the seal Xue Yang restored.’

However, at that moment, there was a sudden bubbling below.

“Oh, perfect,” Wei Wuxian grinned, showing none of his earlier seriousness. He grabbed the wooden spatula again and mixed the rice, making sure to not move too quickly.

“What do you need to put in next?” Lan Wangji asked calmly.

“That,” Wei Wuxian gestured with a jerk of his head. Lan Wangji reached over and picked up the specified wooden containers.

“Oh,” Jiang Cheng’s eyes widened in horror. “Oh, no.”

“What’s wrong?” Jin Guangshan asked.

Jiang Fengmain laughed somewhat awkwardly, sending the juniors a pitying look as he said, “Remember what we mentioned about his love of spice?”

“Come now, I’m sure it can’t be that bad,” Madam Jin suggested. She received no answer from the Jiangs.

“Thank you, Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian grinned, watching Lan Wangji add ingredients in according to Wei Wuxian’s directions. “Oh, and this!”

And so Hanguang-jun did so.

Wei Wuxian laughed as he gave instructions, not at all phased by the fact that it was Hanguang-jun helping him. And the second jade appeared equally unphased, perfectly content with helping ~~his beloved~~.

Watching from the sidelines, one of the juniors couldn’t help but comment, “Hanguang-jun… is different… from what I expected.”

“Put all of it in the pot!” Wei Wuxian told him, laughing even more as Lan Wangji complied.

“It’s because of love!” Nie Huaisang whisper-screamed, making Lan Wangji’s cheeks glow red with blush.

Then, from below where he had been fanning the flame, Lan Sizhui commented, “Senior Mo, I think the congee is ready?”

Stepping close to lean over and get a good look at the pot’s contents, Jiang Cheng was unsurprised but nonetheless disappointed to realize Wei Wuxian’s cooking hadn’t improved at all.

The flakes of red in the food were quite obvious, after all.

However, unaffected by the seasonings, Wei Wuxian tried a bit of it and smiled: “It’s ready. Take it out and feed one bowl to each person who has been poisoned.”

“Well, he liked it, at least,” Jin Zixuan mentioned. “It can’t be that bad.”

“A-Xuan, A-Xian’s cooking ability is more than fine; he makes exactly what he wants to make,” Jiang Yanli explained. “It’s just that his tastes are….”

Lan Jingyi had one spoonful, then immediately spit it out.

“What is this? Poison?!” he asked.

“How is that poison? It’s the cure! Glutinous rice congee.”

“First of all, I don’t know why would glutinous rice be the cure, but I’ve never eaten such a spicy bowl of congee before!”

Feeling skeptical that it could possibly be that bad, Nie Mingjue commented, “Well, what’s spicy for Lans might be different than what’s spicy for the disciples from other sects-”

The other boys immediately reacted the same as Lan Jingyi had, tears forming in their eyes as they nodded along with his observation.

The real Lan Wangji looked down over the bowl of apparently burningly-spicy congee, and reminded himself that the possible gains of trying Wei Wuxian’s food were more than worth such trivial mortal pains.

As Wei Wuxian finished passing the bowls out, Lan Jingyi began creeping very carefully toward the sealed door. He stepped on his tip toes, and barely breathed out of fear of being discovered. Five steps left to the door. Then four. Then three-

“Why are you running away?” Wei Wuxian asked, tapping the side of one of the bowls with his serving spoon. “Here. There’s a bowl for everyone.”

“I’ve never faced such torment before,” one of the boys complained. His friend patted him on the back, but flinched when Wei Wuxian spoke to him:

“Stop worrying about your friend. If you don’t want to join the corpse army outside, you better finish your porridge!”

Lan Wangji straightened up as well, and, as evenly as ever, ordered, “Finish them.”

In the face of a command from Hanguang-jun, the juniors had no choice but to obey.

As whines of protest and tears began appearing on each and every junior, it quickly dawned on the watchers just how awful Wei Wuxian’s food truly was.

“So even Wei-xiong has a flaw,” Nie Huaisang laughed.

“Is anyone else a bit… morbidly curious?” Jin Zixuan asked, watching the reactions with amusement. Despite himself, Lan Wangji had to nod in agreement. The taste and smell of the congee were not things the simulation could convey; if he wanted to learn about it, he would need to be brave enough to try-

“Don’t be,” Jiang Cheng disagreed. “Trust me, it’ll be your funeral.”

Loud gasps of desperate air were released as Lan Jingyi slowly lowered the now-empty bowl. His face was a brilliant red, tears filled his eyes, and air couldn’t enter his lungs fast enough.

“I’ve never had such spicy rice porridge before! Water! Water!” he ran off toward the well.

Curious, Lan Sizhui had tried a bite as well, and was now desperately fanning his tongue as his bright red face gasped out.

At those words, Lan Wangji glanced back. His blank face gave nothing away, but the action itself remaining notable.

Lan Xichen frowned, unable to determine the cause of Wangji's action.

Grinning, Wei Wuxian reached forward and squeezed Lan Jingyi's cheeks, turning him to the left and right to get a good look at his whole face.

He grinned, "Great. You'll be cured in half and hour or so."

"Thank the heavens," Lan Qiren muttered, finally relaxing.

One disciple was furious: "You — you gave us that-"

His mouth was immediately sealed shut, the silencing charm activating at once.

"Less talk, more rest," Hanguang-jun ordered as Wei Wuxian laughed.

"Is it really that bad?" Wei Wuxian asked. "You're all from Gusu, but Hanguang-jun is much better at handling spice than you guys."

"Oh? Really?" Jiang Fengmian asked, turning to Lan Qiren with an eyebrow raised in surprise.

However-

"Not at all, senior," Lan Sizhui corrected. "Hanguang-jun never has spicy food."

Right as those words were said, Lan Wangji raised his hand so that his sleeve covered his mouth, allowing him to breath in and out without smelling the spice.

Seeing everyone else's questioning looks, Lan Wangji nodded once, confirming Sizhui's words to a now increasingly-confused crowd.

"Never has spicy food?" Wei Wuxian repeated. "Is that so?"

A memory formed, overlapping over the scene as Wei Wuxian thought.

'But, back then, I met with Lan Zhan in Yiling once,' he recalled, the memory too blurry for the watchers to make out more than the notable black and white robes of the pair sitting down. 'At that time, all the dishes Lan Zhan ordered were packed with Sichuan peppers. I always thought our tastes were pretty similar.'

Another round of questioning looks were sent Lan Wangji's way, so he shook his head once.

But the fact remained that he had ordered that food. Which meant-

'...Looking back on it, I don't think Lan Zhan ever actually picked up his chopsticks. And then I said it was my treat, but Lan Zhan ended up paying for it anyways! No wonder I forgot.'

"He paid for it?!" Jiang Cheng gaped. "Wei Wuxian!"

“Oh, I see now. No wonder you ordered that.”

“Xiongzhang, please,” Lan Wangji begged.

As he thought that, he suddenly really wanted to see Lan Wangji’s face. He glanced back, and found Hanguang-jun already watching him, allowing them to make eye contact. They stared at each other for several long seconds, neither speaking a word.

A gust of wind swept by, making the door swing open and closed. An unworried expression on his face, Wei Wuxian signaled for the juniors to stay where they were and walked to the door with Lan Wangji.

The dim light of the oil lamp and candles leaked inside, illuminating the old woman. She sat with her head hung low, and didn’t react to the sound of intruders in her space. A cloth lay on her knees, stretched tightly around an embroidery frame. Above that, her hands jerked stiffly, trying and failing to thread a needle. She turned her head to glance up briefly, then looked back down again.

‘I see. That practically confirms it then,’ Wen Ruohan thought, staring calmly at the woman before him. He didn’t know how it was possible, and he didn’t know who was responsible, but the state of that woman’s life was now clear.

Lan Wangji stepped back slightly, allowing Wei Wuxian to take control of the interaction. Understanding instantly, Wei Wuxian sat down by the table, joining the woman as peacefully as possible.

“Manager, why not light the lamp if you’re threading a needle?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Here, let me help.”

He took the needle and thread, easily slipping the thread through the hole, and handed the completed product back to the woman. Then, as if nothing had happened, he stood up and walked with Lan Wangji back out the door.

“...I don’t get it,” Nie Huaisang admitted, lacking any and all knowledge on spirits. However, to his surprise, no explanation came. Even those who were familiar with the undead had nothing to say.

“When you were inside, did you get to see if that hag’s actually alive or not?” Jin Ling asked.

“Don’t call her a hag. That’s quite rude,” Wei Wuxian scolded. “The old lady is a living corpse.”

Those words made the three youngest straighten up at once, not because they knew the term, but because they didn’t. Every time Wei Wuxian was with the future’s juniors, he taught them obscure pieces of trivia and necessary strategies that even some of the adults present didn't know.

Part of Nie Huaisang wished he had a scroll to take notes down on; the rest was grateful that his brother and Lan Qiren wouldn't be able to force him to treat the simulation like a class.

Finally, quickly realizing that only 'Senior Mo' and Lan Wangji knew that term, Lan Sizhui asked, "What is a living corpse?"

"From head to toe, everything seems to indicate that they are a corpse, but the person themselves is actually alive."

"You're saying that she's still alive?!" Jin Ling asked.

If Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan weren't equally shocked by those words, they would have frowned at their son's rude tone. As it was, however-

"Have you looked inside?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Yes?"

"We were there with you and I still didn't see anything."

"What did you see? What was she doing?"

After thinking it over for a moment, expecting some sort of trap in the question's phrasing, Jin Ling reluctantly answered, "Threading a needle."

"Did it go in?"

"...No."

Wei Wuxian nodded, "Correct. She isn't capable of threading the needle. Dead people's muscles are too rigid to perform delicate tasks like that. The marks on her face aren't age spots, but livor mortis. And she doesn't need to eat, either. The only thing that makes her alive is the fact that she can breathe."

The breathing was a notable difference, but Wen Qing still couldn't help connecting the description of the living corpse to the fate her brother had wound up in. Yes, Wei Wuxian had saved his mind, but he was still dead. He wouldn't be able to eat or sleep or breathe, no matter how much he wanted to. Even the archery he so loved would be impossible as he currently was.

She promised herself to not allow that to happen in this world.

"B-but she's already quite elderly," Lan Sizhui pointed out. "Most older women have poor eyesight and cannot thread needles by themselves."

"So I helped her," Wei Wuxian agreed. "But did you notice? From the time at which she opened the door until now, she hasn't blinked even once."

Lan Wangji nodded once in agreement.

Slowly, as if trying to avoid notice, Jin Zixuan glanced over at the second jade and whispered, “The two of you are almost scarily observant.”

Lan Xichen sighed, “How is this the same person who thought Wangji was talking about Bichen when he said ‘mine?’”

“Please don’t bring that up,” Lan Wangji requested, not enjoying the reminder of all the ways he had pushed Wei Wuxian away in their childhoods, leading to that confusion.

“Living people blink to prevent their eyes from becoming sore and dried out. Dead people, on the other hand, have no need to do that. When I grabbed the needle and thread from her, did anyone notice how she looked at me?”

“Her eyeballs didn’t move… but her head did!” Jin Ling exclaimed.

“Precisely!”

Although Lan Qiren had heard of nearly every resentful beast there was, he had never heard of these before. It had been quite some time since the grandmaster of the Lan Clan had been a student himself, but, watching Wei Wuxian’s lesson, he found himself pulled back to that time of his youth.

Back when Cangse Sanren and Wei Changze had still been alive.

“When people look at something, it’s usually their eyes that move, no matter how slight that movement is. However, since dead people can’t do such subtle actions, they need to turn their heads and necks instead.”

Lan Jingyi was baffled: “Should we be taking notes?”

The juniors of the present time understood that feeling all too well. Wei Wuxian in teacher mode was a force to be reckoned with.

“Notes are a good habit, but you won’t have time to flip through them when you’re out night-hunting. Keep the information in your minds.”

Gritting his teeth together, Jin Ling complained, “Walking corpses are already weird enough. Why do things like living corpses exist?”

Nie Huaisang nodded fiercely.

Wei Wuxian shrugged, “There are quite a few disadvantages the dead have to deal with. Rigid muscles, slow movement, and no taste, to name a few. However, there are several advantages as well: the lack of fear towards pain, inability to think, and how easy they are to control.”

“I suppose the Yiling Patriarch would know best,” Wen Qing commented.

“Someone thought they could counter the disadvantages of corpses and create perfect corpse puppets. The end result was these living corpses.”

Although the boys didn’t say anything out loud, it was clear what they were all thinking.

‘Who could that person be but Wei Wuxian?’

“Fair enough,” Madam Yu acknowledged.

‘But it wasn’t me!’ Wei Wuxian mentally protested.

“Really?” Jiang Fengmian asked. He didn’t know who else could have come up with them, in that case. Xue Yang came after Wei Wuxian’s death, so, if it was him, Wei Wuxian wouldn’t have known. Did the Yiling Patriarch really have hoards of disciples in Yiling doing research with him?

‘Doubtful,’ Jiang Fengmian decided. ‘Even as the Yiling Patriarch, he was still A-Xian. He wouldn’t allow his disciples to act however they pleased.’

Finally, Wei Wuxian decided to clarify the situation.

He cleared his throat: “Alright, Wei Wuxian started it. He successfully made Wen Ning, or the Ghost General — though, I’ve wanted to ask, who exactly came up with that title? It’s sounds dumb.”

“Huh? No it doesn’t! It sounds cool!” Nie Huaisang protested.

“I honestly thought Wei Wuxian was the one who came up with that,” Wen Qing commented, having felt it matched the boy’s sense of humor. Though, on second thought, it was Jiang Fengmian who had named Suibian, not Wei Wuxian. If he had given her brother a name, it probably would have been more along the lines of Chenqing.

“Anyways,” Wei Wuxian continued. “Some people wanted to imitate what he did with Wen Ning but weren’t skilled enough, so they used improper means. They targeted living people instead, and developed living corpses. A type of failed imitations.”

‘It definitely wasn’t with his blessing, then,’ Jiang Fengmian thought, relieved despite having already assumed that.

“Wei Ying himself used improper means,” Jin Ling snapped.

The Jiangs flinched. They had already known Wei Wuxian, and the other watchers had gotten to see what kind of a person he was. That made it hard to remember, sometimes, that everyone in the future hated him.

(Not that they could completely blame them. Before they knew why Wei Wuxian had used resentment, they had felt much the same. With the Yiling Patriarch’s kill count on top of that….)

But Wei Wuxian was unphased, continuing, "Yup. The ones who created living corpses used the most improper of improper means."

"Then, Senior Mo, what should we do?" Lan Sizhui asked.

"Some living corpses may not know they're already dead. I think that old lady is one such corpse; let's not disturb her for now."

'Daozhang,' a girl's voice said, and Wei Wuxian turned to see a wispy, silver figure chasing after a tall, white one.

It vanished a moment later.

"What the-"

"What is it?" Hanguang-jun asked.

Wen Ruohan frowned, "Did he not see it?"

"It must be like the voices within the saber tomb," Nie Mingjue pointed out. "Only Wei Wuxian can detect them."

Wei Wuxian frowned, "Just now, that was-"

Then, out of the blue, there were the taps of a bamboo pole against the ground.

"The ghost?" Jin Guangshan asked, looking around for the source of the sound.

It came from a nearby window which had been sealed shut by strips of black, wooden boards. The disciples all turned pale.

"It's that bamboo pole again," Lan Jingyi realized. "That thing's been following us since we entered the city. Nothing good happens when it sounds."

"W-what sort of demon is that?" Ouyang Zizhen asked. Although he hadn't been formally introduced within the simulation, the watcher's memories of the four who caused this mess were as strong as ever, so he was easy to point out.

"We will know after we take a look," Lan Wangji pointed out. Smirking, Wei Wuxian gestured for the juniors to be quiet, then walked to the window to peak through.

The watchers were brought close as well. Curious, some approached the gaps in the boards to take a look.

A pair of hideous, white, pupil-less eyes glared back.

Someone screamed.

Everything faded away.

“What was it?” Jiang Yanli asked, having not seen what Wei Wuxian was looking at.

“I’m… not entirely sure,” Lan Xichen admitted, frowning minutely. “It resembled a face with eyes, but even ghosts don’t look quite so… blank. Especially given the obvious intelligence it has shown.”

Jiang Fengmian nodded, “It disappeared too quickly for us to get a better view than that. The next segment will most likely have the answers we want.”

Giving a sigh that contained a strange trace of fondness, Madam Yu agreed, “Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun are there. They’ll figure it out quickly.”

“Those two aren’t the only ones there~” Nie Huaisang sang, leaning close to Lan Wangji. “Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong went out and adopted a whole pack of ducklings!”

“We didn’t,” Lan Wangji snapped back, annoyed that Huaisang’s fear of him had decreased to the point where the boy had no hesitation when it came to teasing. He missed the days where his mere presence would make the Nie heir flinch back in fear.

“To be honest, if A-Ling has to be adopted by someone in a world where A-Li and I are gone, you two would probably be my first choice,” Jin Zixuan commented.

“He’s the heir to the Jin Sect,” Lan Wangji calmly pointed out. “We can’t adopt him.”

“Even though A-Xian’s in Mo Xuanyu’s body?” Jiang Yanli asked.

“That isn’t — I-” he cut off, not sure of how to answer in the face of attacks from all sides, and Lan Xichen grinned. Recently, Wangji’s new acceptance of his own feelings in regards to Wei Wuxian took away many of the avenues Lan Xichen could use to tease him. However, it appeared the acquisition of children with Wei Wuxian had remained a delectable weak point in Wangji’s mask.

Right as Lan Xichen was about to fulfill his role as a responsible older brother (teasing him until his ears were glowing red), Wen Ruohan spoke up:

“Due to the nature of the time travel, we were assured that the four who sent the information over would be born into their appropriate bodies, yes?” the Chief Cultivator asked. “Then does that mean the other miscellaneous juniors who were present are likely to be erased from our world?”

All the humor in the room abruptly died with those words. Although most of the juniors shown hadn’t had more than one speaking line, they had still been there. Now they had a sect, appearance, and voice to match to the unknown masses who might not be born as a result of the time travel that occurred.

An uncomfortable feeling wormed its way into the chests of the watchers, but, long since accustomed to the tragedies of the world, they managed to avoid dwelling on it for too long. If it was impossible for them to change, worry would do them no good. Still, it reassured them greatly that those juniors would still exist in the future Wei Wuxian’s world.

(The one least bothered by the situation, Wen Chao, began picking at the floor, disliking the pointlessly awkward atmosphere.)

"...Yi City was pretty neat though, wasn't it?" Jin Zixuan commented, hoping to change the subject. "Maybe, when this is all over, we should head over there and try to purify some of it."

"The feng shui of the terrain there would make it difficult," Lan Wangji pointed out. "Though I would not be opposed to trying."

"Great! Sounds like a plan then."

Jiang Cheng was about to joining the conversation, only to pause when he saw his father step closer to his mother. They were a little too far away for him to hear the conversation, but he tensed up nervously nonetheless.

'Please don't fight,' he thought, clenching his hands. 'We've spent hours together without a big fight. Please stick to that. Please don't fight.'

But, unwilling to say that aloud, he had no way to ensure that.

"San-niang," Jiang Fengmian greeted as he approached, having left Lan Qiren behind with his nephews. "Can we speak?"

"What do you want?" she snapped back, suspicion growing, but not to the point where she would refuse to talk (especially not while they were in the simulation and physically unable to get away from each other).

"I…" he hesitated, glancing back at his children momentarily. "I have a concern that I… thought I would share. I don't intend to force you to do anything you don't want to, and I can assure you that my focus on it doesn't mean I love our children any less-"

"Where are you going with this?" she demanded, rage growing.

"I simply wonder if we should do more for A-Xian. We could offer guidance — tell him about his future — help him more."

Madam Yu sighed as though unsurprised but nonetheless disappointed by Jiang Fengmian's concerns and asked, "What makes telling him now any different from telling him after we leave? Except, of course, that we'll be able to keep the boy from doing something idiotic in the later case. Not to mention that Wen Ruohan might act if we do something now."

"Wen Xu is in the real world, isn't he? How do we know he won't tell A-Xian something that leads him to be reckless?" Jiang Fengmian asked. "How long can we justify leaving A-Xian to fend off against Wen Xu? While trying to help us on top of everything else. You're right about the risk of provoking Wen Ruohan, but surely we can at least give him a bit more information."

The question made Madam Yu scowl even deeper, but it was a different sort of anger than Jiang Fengmian was used to. Rather than accusations and rage, Yu Ziyuan's mind appeared occupied by a mix of frustration, fear, and uncertainty. She didn't have a solution.

"Perhaps we can tell him more. Or maybe it will just cause a bigger mess," Madam Yu decided, sighing. "Speak to me about this later. And, if you do decide to tell Wei Wuxian more, figure that out before you start speaking. You'll just be a fumbling mess, otherwise."

Jiang Fengmian nodded once, then fell silent, allowing his thoughts to take over once again.

Chapter End Notes

Wei Wuxian: We'll be fine, kids. The corpse poisoning is no match against us! We have something no one else has! points at his chest

Lan Sizhui: Heart?

Wei Wuxian: What? No. Me. We have me. I'm pointing at myself.

"Sect Leader!" a terrified Nie disciple shouted as she burst through the door. "Sir, sir-"

"What is it?" Huaisang squeaked out, immediately putting down the fan he had been in the process of painting. In the distance, he heard a crack, followed shortly after by a scream of terror.

"We're being attacked. By-by the Yiling Patriarch!" the disciple revealed.

Huaisang simply blinked.

"By Wei-xiong?"

Less than ten seconds later, the door was swung open and Nie Huaisang's terrified disciple valiantly moved to defend him from Wei Wuxian (who entered the room looking as casual as ever).

"Hey!" he greeted, waving cheerily.

"Welcome, Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang responded, more than a little confused. "Would you… like some tea?"

"Tea sounds great!" Wei Wuxian replied, completely ignoring the Nie disciple and sitting down across from Nie Huaisang, giving the fan he was painting an appreciative look.

With a wave of his hand, Nie Huaisang sent his disciple off to grab the specified tea, pretending not to notice the shocked and befuddled look said disciple sent his way.

"Sorry about the mess on the way in. I know I don't have an appointment with you, but I figured you were going to avoid me until you could make sure the meeting was on your terms," Wei Wuxian shamelessly confessed. "I tried asking politely — I even waited for you to be done with your meeting with those merchants — but the people outside still said you were busy!"

"I… heard something break," Nie Huaisang nervously admitted. "Was that…."

“No need to worry, it wasn’t someone’s bones,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “Just one of the staircases next to where a particularly stubborn disciple was. I’ll pay you back for it, promise!”

Nie Huaisang had actually been worried about it having been a wall; the snap being a bone hadn’t even crossed his mind. Now that the possibility had been raised, he found himself more nervous than ever before.

He and Wei Wuxian stared at each other for a moment, both waiting for the other to speak. The disciple came back swiftly, setting the tea down before them and scampering out just as fast.

(This was what Huaisang got for putting a disciple almost as cowardly as him as one of his guards. He should have known that, regardless of how good Nie Lifen’s taste in books was, he would abandon him when Huaisang needed him most!)

“I was talking to Zewu-jun a bit more,” Wei Wuxian began, swirling the tea in his cup around until it made a miniature whirlpool. “Do you know what he told me?”

After pretending to think it over for a moment, Nie Huaisang hopefully suggested, “Was it about the wedding? I know you and Hanguang-jun are happy having eloped, but I still think a proper wedding’s as good an excuse as any for a celebration! Though, from what I heard, you two haven’t exactly been saving yourselves for marriage.”

“Oh, I wanted to, Sect Leader Nie, I really did,” Wei Wuxian faked a sniffle. “But my darling Lan Zhan was just too tempting — I couldn’t hold out! Surely you understand.”

“Of course, of course,” Nie Huaisang nodded seriously, only minutely frustrated that Wei Wuxian remained perfectly composed despite his words. Then again, he should have expected this; although Nie Huaisang had been the one to pass around spring books during their time in the Cloud Recesses, not even he had ever been able to beat Wei Wuxian in shamelessness. He should have known the other man would just roll with the punches. Tapping his fan lightly, Nie Huaisang took a deep breath and held in a sigh.

This would be so much easier if his mask of uselessness was still effective against Wei Wuxian!

“Sect Leader Nie, do you remember the time we spent together during the disciple exchange at the Cloud Recesses? On one of the first days, Lan Qiren told me to ‘spend my night copying down Righteousness to see if some of the lessons could get through my thick skull!’”

“Of course I remember; I’m the one who copied it for you.”

“And do you remember what you said when you offered to copy it for me?” Wei Wuxian asked. “You told me that if you copied, I would need to be the one to go down and grab some alcohol from Caiyi town. ‘Compromises must be made,’ you said. ‘Society as a whole works best when people specialize! People must give up a little for society to run smoothly.’”

“Did I say that?” Nie Huaisang tilted his head, fluttering his fan nervously. “I must admit, I don’t really remember….”

He trailed off, seeing the amused but unfaltering expression on Wei Wuxian’s face, and deflated in defeat. Really, there was no reason for Wei Wuxian to be so mean. Huaisang couldn’t understand why his former friend refused to allow him to save even the slightest face.

“I was talking to Zewu-jun,” Wei Wuxian repeated. “He’s terrified that if he doesn’t help Meng Yao, no one will. The other people in our world don’t care about him, and the ones in our past won’t have built up an emotional connection to him before the betrayal is revealed. He’s getting desperate-”

“I know,” Huaisang responded evenly. Not a trace of sympathy could be found in his gaze.

Although he didn’t allow his smile to falter, Wei Wuxian tensed slightly at Huaisang’s words, not due to their meaning, but because of the terrifyingly blank way Nie Huaisang said them. He knew full well — possibly better than Wei Wuxian did — why Lan Xichen was so desperate. He just didn’t care.

That made this slightly harder.

“I told Zewu-jun that we can’t just offer Meng Yao protection,” Wei Wuxian continued. “Not only would it be nearly impossible to get the people in that world to agree to such a thing, but it would be more than a little unfair to people like your brother. I told him that he would need to compromise.”

“Did you?” Nie Huaisang poured himself some more tea. “Like what? We let Meng Yao live, but hand him over to the Wens? With the full knowledge that he killed their leader in our world? I can agree to that.”

“Xichen-ge would probably disagree with that even more than killing him,” Wei Wuxian laughed, but Nie Huaisang heard the words for what they were. ‘Xichen-ge’ instead of ‘Zewu-jun.’ Whatever Lan Xichen had said, it had convinced Wei Wuxian Meng Yao didn’t deserve torture.

Unfortunate.

“Then, what are you suggesting?”

“I told Xichen-ge that I would keep Meng Yao alive and relatively unharmed. In exchange, he would be forbidden from ever cultivating, and I would let you be the one to tell my younger self who Meng Yao grew up to be.”

“And he agreed to that?”

“Yup!” Wei Wuxian beamed. “My charm was overwhelming. He simply couldn’t refuse!”

“If only your charm could have been so effective at the end of your first life,” Nie Huaisang ruthlessly commented, giving an internal impressed whistle when Wei Wuxian didn’t so much as flinch.

However, the lack of reaction meant something else as well. Wei Wuxian was set on this result, and was willing to take a few hits to get Nie Huaisang's cooperation. Which meant the lengths it would take to stop him were probably farther than Nie Huaisang was willing to go.

Wei Wuxian would rather not have an enemy of him, and Nie Huaisang knew for a fact that only an absolute idiot would try to be an enemy of the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun (for the two were an eternally connected set now, even more so than they had already been).

Honestly, it was completely unfair that Nie Huaisang had to go against them. Why couldn't Sect Leader Yao have been the one in charge of the past Meng Yao? Nie Huaisang was sure he'd have been able to come up with a solution then!

Unfortunately, it wasn't Sect Leader Yao in control of the Píngxíng Gateway, it was Wei Wuxian.

"...In that case," Nie Huaisang tentatively began. "I have a few additional conditions of my own."

"I would expect nothing less," Wei Wuxian agreed instantly.

"Ah," Wei Wuxian gasped, leaning in even closer.

The virtual juniors (and Nie Huaisang) jumped at the sound, apprehension filling their bodies.

"What happened?" one boy asked, his hair practically standing on-end.

"Shh," Wei Wuxian whispered lowly. "Don't talk. I'm looking at it."

"Why are you so fascinated? Who could possibly find something like that pretty?" Jiang Cheng asked, rolling his eyes. His sister, on the other hand, just watched Wei Wuxian with a warm, soft expression. His fascination with the world around him had always been one of the things she admired most about him.

(That said, her intuition as Wei Wuxian's shijie told her that there was probably a little more to his reaction than just awe.)

Jin Ling kneeled close, lowering his voice so that it was even quieter than Wei Wuxian's as he asked, "Then what do you see? What's outside the door?"

Rather than answering the question, Wei Wuxian just hummed, "Yes, this is amazing… truly amazing."

Jin Ling tilted his head, confusion growing.

A strong flicker of suspicion rose up within Lan Wangji, and he was abruptly reminded of the many, many times the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian had tricked Wangji's younger self. He glanced back at Hanguang-jun, but saw only a warm indulgence in his older-self's expression.

It didn't reassure him whatsoever.

Several juniors tried to get close to see what was behind the door, but Wei Wuxian's body blocked the only available holes. They got more and more impatient, Wei Wuxian's continued gasps and sighs sucking their interest in.

Finally, Lan Sizhui asked, "Senior Mo… what's truly amazing?"

"Shh! Wow, it's so pretty! Be quiet you guys, don't scare it away. I'm not done looking at it."

Jin Ling leaned close, commanding, "Move! I want to see!"

"Me too!"

"Are you sure?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Ah," Wen Ruohan shook his head disbelievingly. "I see now."

It took Lan Qiren an additional second to understand.

"Wait, is Wei Wuxian-"

Wei Wuxian slowly moved aside, as though he was unwilling to leave. Impatient, Jin Ling abruptly shoved him out of the way, then leaned close to the door. He closed one eye, long, feminine eyelashes covering his cheek as he moved the open eye closer and closer to the slit in the wall.

This time, the simulation moved forward and allowed them all to see what was behind the wall. At first, it appeared to be just a mass of white fog — less than before, having dissipated slightly as night approached, but still too much to see more than three meters away.

"It's all white…. There's nothing at all," Jin Ling observed, sounding somewhat disappointed. He looked even closer, observing every detail of the small space revealed by the crack.

An eye encompassed all.

"The fu-"

"Wah!" Jin Ling immediately stumbled back, tripping over his own feet and only avoiding a collision with the ground due to Wei Wuxian's fast reaction.

Unfortunately, Jiang Yanli, Jiang Cheng, Jin Zixuan, Nie Huaisang, and a decent portion of the adults weren't so lucky. Even those who managed to avoid falling to the ground had jumped out of their seats and tensed (largely saved by the fact that they had gotten a glimpse of what laid beyond earlier).

That said, it was still absolutely-

“How was it? Exciting?” Wei Wuxian suggested with a wink. “Didn’t it look pretty?”

Abruptly realizing what Wei Wuxian was doing, Lan Wangji gave a fond sigh, torn between an urge to shout at Wei Wuxian’s ridiculousness and laugh at Wei Wuxian’s truly unpredictable mind.

Realizing as well, Jin Ling abruptly switched to an exaggerated act of calmness, agreeing “Y-yes. Though, only so-so at best. Barely worth a look!”

The next curious juniors approached the crack in the window.

“Is this how all of Wei Wuxian’s night hunts go?” Lan Qiren asked, unsure of which answer he would prefer.

Being the only Jiang to regularly go on night hunts with Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng was forced to sigh and answer, “Every. Single. One. It’s not always this, specifically, but he really likes startling our new recruits.”

“It keeps them from reacting poorly when startled in a less controlled situation,” Jiang Fengmian added proudly, then, noticing a minute twitch in his son’s expression, made sure to add, “It works especially well with A-Cheng’s leadership, as he always manages to find good adversaries for them to go up against.”

Lan Qiren nodded in understanding, and Jiang Cheng was forced to look away, blush quickly spreading across his cheeks.

Lan Sizhui, Ouyang Zizhen, and Lan Jingyi got there first, moving to different cracks so that they could look at the same time. They moved closer and closer to the holes, peering through in search of the ‘beautiful thing’ Wei Wuxian had-

Ouyang Zizhen shrieked, while Lan Jingyi yelped and jumped back, spinning on his heel to run away from the door.

Seeing that, Nie Huaisang felt a deep kinship form between himself and these juniors from the future.

On the other hand, Lan Sizhui had simply tensed, bringing one hand to rest on his sword so that he could draw at a moment’s notice. In the distance, the tapping of a bamboo pole could be heard against the ground.

“Senior Mo…” he trailed off. “There is… a-”

“There’s a that, right?” Wei Wuxian interrupted knowingly. “No need to say it outloud. If you do, it’ll no longer be a pleasant surprise for everyone else. Come on back now. Let everyone go see it for himself.”

“I can’t believe Hanguang-jun is just letting this happen,” Nie Mingjue muttered, watching the next set of juniors approach the door and repeat the process. “You’d think this would be too ridiculous for him.”

“It… does seem like an okay teaching strategy, though?” Jin Zixuan commented, his words sounding more like a question than anything else. “Maybe he’ll accept that.”

“Or perhaps he’ll gladly experience anything Wei Wuxian does,” Jin Zixuan’s mother added, sounding far too cheery, in Jin Zixuan’s opinion.

However, by now, the Lan boys and Jin Ling’s reactions had allowed the juniors to realize that whatever was beyond the door was far from a ‘pleasant surprise.’ They shook their heads.

“No thanks. No thanks,” they agreed.

Jin Ling sighed, “The situation’s already like this and you’re still playing tricks. Just what in the world were you thinking?”

“You joined me, didn’t you? Don’t imitate your uncle’s tone with me,” Wei Wuxian playfully scolded.

Jiang Cheng gave a heavy roll of his eyes at that, unsure if it was at his ridiculous shixiong or his equally insane nephew.

“So Sizhui, was it scary?” he continued.

“Yes,” the Lan boy answered, obediently nodding.

“Not bad,” Wei Wuxian praised as he sat down. “Even then, you didn’t panic. You’ve got guts.”

The more Lan Xichen saw from this particular disciple, the more proud he was. He couldn’t wait to meet him in the real world.

“Why do ghosts scare people? It’s because when one becomes frightened, their spirit and concentration becomes disturbed,” the Yiling Patriarch added, patting his hand with his flute as he spoke.

“They’re most vulnerable to attacks when that happens, as it makes it easy for ghosts to suck out their Yang energy.”

“Who are you bluffing?” Jin Ling snapped.

Somewhat-begrudgingly, Lan Qiren was forced to acknowledge that Wei Wuxian was right as always. His teaching style was certainly unconventional, but….

Lan Qiren couldn’t quite fault it, either.

“I’m serious. Ask Hanguang-jun if you don’t believe me,” he glanced back at the man with a wink.

“Mn.”

‘Teaching together!’ Lan Xichen realized, watching the older version of his brother gaze happily down at Wei Wuxian. ‘Not for a long time, perhaps, but when we leave the simulation…’

It might be a possibility some day.

“Anyways, this is why ghosts are most afraid of those who are fearless,” Wei Wuxian elaborated. “They have no opportunities to seize, so there’s nothing the ghosts can do. Thus, as cultivation disciples, your number one goal is to become braver!”

As someone who worked with Lan Wangji to kill the Xuanwu of Slaughter at seventeen, Wei Wuxian was definitely speaking from experience. For a moment, Wen Qing had been about to gratefully sigh that — regardless of how many dangerous situations Wei Wuxian was put in — at least Wen Ning wouldn’t be so reckless.

Then, she remembered how little choice Wei Wuxian had in getting involved and recalled that Wen Ning had done something all too similar when he betrayed the Wen Sect by helping Wei Wuxian.

(She truly had the most infuriatingly kind kids in the world, didn’t she?)

However, the children disagreed.

“Braveness is determined at birth,” Lan Jingyi objected. “What could one possibly do if they were born a coward?”

“Were you born knowing how to fly on swords? People only gain skills after practicing and practicing.”

‘Cultivation and riding on swords also used to be just wild dreams,’ Wei Wuxian had said in response to Jiang Cheng’s disbelief in his theory on the Compass of Evil.

And then he’d actually gone on to make one. Wei Wuxian’s willingness to branch out into the impossible and new had always been an aspect of his personality, regardless of everything that had happened since.

‘How are you still so unchanged after everything?’ Lan Wangji wondered, both grateful and stunned that that could be true.

However, unaware of the past-watchers hanging on to his every word, the Yiling Patriarch continued his lesson for the kids:

“Just like learning to fly, people can get used to being scared. Does the outhouse reek? Is it disgusting? Trust me, if you live in the outhouse for a month, you’ll even be able to eat meals there!”

‘And if you stay in the Burial Mounds for three months, you’ll be able to eat rot? Wen Ruohan suggested, frowning slightly at the thought.

The virtual juniors professed their disbelief at Wei Wuxian’s words.

“You can’t do that!” one shouted.

“No way. No way!”

“It’s only an example,” Wei Wuxian said, waving their complaints off casually. “Okay, I admit I haven’t lived in an outhouse before. I don’t know if you can actually eat in there — I’ve got no evidence either way. However, you must all try the one outside the door. You must not only look at it, but look carefully. Watch for details, and, from the details, find any hidden weaknesses in the shortest time possible. You must take in the situation calmly and look for chances to counter-attack. So, how about it? It’s a rare chance to receive my guidance. You ought to appreciate it.”

Agreeing completely, Lan Wangji calmly stood up and made his way to the wall, taking a good look at the spirit who lurked beyond. At first, Jin Zixuan had gaped at the second jade’s easy compliance. Did he really have no objection to Wei Wuxian’s audacity in expecting them to be grateful for his lesson?

Then, he quickly realized that a) he had no right to criticize Wei Wuxian’s arrogance, and b) Wei Wuxian’s words were more than justified by the simple fact that the juniors were getting a lesson from the Yiling Patriarch.

After hesitating for another second, he joined Lan Wangji as well.

“Come on, now. Single file, please,” Wei Wuxian ordered. “One look at a time.”

“...Do we have to?”

“Of course. I’m always serious. I never try to fool people either.”

“That might be the biggest lie he’s said to date,” Nie Mingjue observed.

“Let’s start with Jingyi, again. Both Jin Ling and Sizhui have gotten good looks already.”

Hesitantly, the juniors lined up (including Ouyang Zizhen, who could reluctantly admit he hadn’t gotten a good look the first time around).

After hesitating for a moment longer, Jiang Cheng joined Lan Wangji, Jin Zixuan, Nie Mingjue, and Lan Xichen in observing the spirit outside. Wen Qing, who had never felt any hesitance to begin with, had already long-since observed the spirit to completion, and had since stepped back.

Nie Huaisang was perfectly happy staying behind, thank you very much.

Desperate, Lan Jingyi made one last attempt:

“I don’t see why I have to look again!” he protested. “When I was startled back, I moved a lot. People under corpse poisoning can’t move, you said. You said so yourself!”

Without faltering, Wei Wuxian simply leaned close and ordered, “Let me see your tongue. Ah.”

“Ah.”

Wen Qing moved close, giving the boy a thorough analysis along with Wei Wuxian.

“Congratulations! You’ve been cured! Bravely step forward and try looking again!”

“I’ve been cured already? You’re kidding, right?!”

“He actually managed to make the kids disappointed that they’d been cured,” Jin Guangshan muttered, shaking his head disbelievingly. And yet, no matter their reluctance, the juniors did what Wei Wuxian said anyways.

The boy’s ability to take leadership was as impressive as always; Jin Guangshan would need to remember that for when he left.

Terrified beyond measure, Lan Jingyi very slowly approached the wall. He peeked through the hole, then hurriedly looked away. After taking a deep breath he peeked again, only to turn back right after.

Huffing fondly, Wei Wuxian knocked on the board twice and asked, “What are you so scared of? I’m standing here, and Hanguang-jun’s right over there. It won’t break through the board, much less eat your eyeballs or anything.”

Jingyi had decided he was done and walked off, allowing the next junior to look, but Jiang Yanli’s mind was on something else. Just like Wei Wuxian had said, he was a safety net for the juniors. If something went wrong, he would be able to deal with it.

When Wei Wuxian had been Jin Ling’s age, he had been the one tasked to save Su She from the waterborne abyss. When he had been Lan Jingyi’s, he was fighting the Xuanwu of Slaughter with only Lan Wangji to help him. Just a little after, he was fighting for his life in the Burial Mounds. In the real world — their present — he was leading the Jiang Sect alone.

All the comfort he was providing to the juniors was a level of safety no adult in his life had ever offered him. And the last time he had seen her parents-

‘You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!’

‘A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.’

The juniors went one by one, observing the being behind the door and gasping in fright at what they saw.

“A-Die?” Jiang Yanli whispered.

He glanced back, giving her his full attention as he waited for her to speak.

"I…" she trailed off. "I heard what you and A-Niang were talking about. Earlier. When you suggested giving A-Xian more information about what was happening. I agree. I… would appreciate it if we could help him a bit more."

With each word, Jiang Fengmian's eyes had widened slightly. He glanced back, but, despite having heard their conversation, Madam Yu had no objections to offer. When Jiang Fengmian glanced up at his obviously-eavesdropping son, he saw no disagreement in the boy's expression.

"Thank you, A-Li," he breathed out, smiling warmly. "I will."

Several minutes later, all the juniors had tried, and Wei Wuxian activated teacher-mode again.

"Finished looking?" he asked. "Then, everyone, tell the group what you saw. Let's summarize."

As per usual, Jin Ling fought to speak first: "White eyes. Female. Short and skinny. Fine looks. Holding a bamboo pole."

After thinking for a moment, Lan Sizhui added, "The girl's height reaches about to my chest. She is only wearing rags, and doesn't look very clean — like a beggar roaming the streets."

Jin Guangshan shuddered at the description, wondering why, now that another girl had finally been introduced, she had to look like that. He leaned back in his chair, sighing at his own boredom.

"The bamboo pole appears to be a white cane," Lan Sizhui added. "It seems possible that her white eyes are not blindness formed after death, but instead due to being blind even before passing away."

"Good. Jin Ling had higher quantity, Lan Sizhui had higher quality," Wei Wuxian commented. Jin Ling's lips twitched in dissatisfaction.

Biting his lip, Nie Huaisang did his utmost to not laugh at the truly Jin Zixuan-like expression on the boy's face.

Finally, Ouyang Zizhen spoke up: "The girl is only around fifteen or sixteen. She has an oval face with a lively air about her delicate features. She fastened her long hair with a wooden hair clip, which has a small fox carved into the end."

As he spoke, an image appeared behind him: an imagined version of how she might appear once she was cleaned up. It was clear that the boy's imagination was getting away from him slightly.

(An imagination Jin Guangshan greatly appreciated. She did indeed look quite fine.)

Zizhen continued, "She's not just small — her figure is slender as well. Although she's not especially tidy, she's not grimy either. It's not at all repulsive. After some grooming, she's bound to be a lovely girl."

Lighting up at the description, Wei Wuxian praised, "Not bad, not bad — you could tell she was a beauty from just one glance. The observations are both detailed and unique. Child, you'll definitely be the romantic type after you grow up."

The boy blushed and turned to hide his face in a wall, surrounded on all sides by his peers' laughter.

As Lan Xichen glanced to the side, he couldn't help but notice that the expressions on the real and virtual Lan Wangji's faces were, at that moment, completely identical. And both were aimed at that laughing Patriarch before them.

'Oh, Wangji,' Lan Xichen smiled. 'You've fallen this deep already?'

The loving expression on his brother's face more than answered that.

Finally, another boy spoke, "It looks like those sounds we've been hearing are from the bamboo pole she uses to walk. If she was blind before she passed away, she won't be able to see even now that she's become a ghost, so she has to rely on the white cane."

"But how could that be possible?" another one of the boys objected. "You've all seen blind people, haven't you? Because they can't move their eyes, they move and walk very slowly to avoid bumping into anything. However, the ghost outside the door moves quite swiftly. I've never seen such a nimble blind person before."

"Good point," Wen Qing agreed, frowning in confusion. It seemed relatively apparent that the girl was blind now, but her movement brought doubt to that assumption.

Clearly, there was something they were missing.

But Wei Wuxian seemed undisturbed by the mystery, twirling his flute once and praising, "Good job. That is exactly how you should analyze something. Don't dismiss any information."

He then stood up and stepped toward the door.

"Alright, you've all observed the situation," he grinned. "Let's move on to the real thing!"

"Huh?" the juniors collectively asked.

And the real versions joined them, tilting their heads in abject confusion.

But then, without answering them, Wei Wuxian simply tore off one of the wall's boards.

"Ah!"

“You-"

“What?!”

The juniors — real and virtual — as well as the ghost herself all jumped at the action, the latter raising her bamboo pole warily as she did.

Well, Wen Chao supposed that if there was anything both ghosts and humans should be scared of, it was Wei Wuxian.

Saluting respectfully, Wei Wuxian greeted the ghost and calmly asked, “Maiden, do you have any business here, having followed us all this way?”

The girl widened her eyes in a manner that would be adorable if it weren’t for the twin rivers of blood flowing out of them.

‘So he does have it in him to be polite,’ Madam Yu thought, then scowled, overcome by a sudden churning feeling within her — one she could now recognize as guilt. She clicked her tongue, annoyed at her own sensitivity to the words which would have been first nature to her just a week ago.

Someone in the back whimpered in fear, terrified by the sight of the mangled ghost before them, no matter how beautiful she must have once been. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian turned and gave a warm smile.

“What are you scared of? You’re gonna need to get used to seeing people bleeding from the seven qiao in the future. It’s only two of the seven that are bleeding on her, and you already can’t handle it? This is why I said you need to experience more things and toughen up.”

“Your time as a teenager should not be viewed as normal, Wei-xiong!” Nie Huaisang shouted, terrified that the simulation would warp Lan Qiren and Nie Mingjue’s expectations regarding him. Then again, perhaps there was no reason to worry; his future self had already shown he wasn’t capable of leaving any sort of meaningful impact on the world.

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian’s attention was drawn outside once again as the girl stomped her feet on the ground, glaring fiercely. With several large, sweeping gestures she (quite impatiently) tried to express a message to them. She bounced around and pointed, trying to express something.

Quite a number of people just stared blankly at her performance.

“Strange,” Jin Ling wondered. “Can’t she talk?”

Hearing this, the ghost paused, then opened her mouth.

“What the #@k!%!!”

At any other time, Madam Yu would have scolded her son for his language in the presence of the other sect leaders. Right now, however, she had to admit she was inclined to agree.

Blood gushed out of the open mouth in a waterfall of red. Her tongue had been pulled out from its root.

"Who would do such a horrible thing?" Jiang Yanli gasped, turning unhealthily pale at the sight.

'So that's why she couldn't speak,' the disciples realized. 'Both blind and mute; how unfortunate.'

Uncaring, the ghost returned to making her initial gestures as Wei Wuxian asked, "Is she using sign language? Does anyone understand?"

Nie Huaisang didn't understand sign language, but the 'get out' in the ghost's actions seemed pretty obvious to him.

The girl got so anxious she stomped her feet. Then, truly desperate, she used her pole to write on the ground. Unfortunately, due to her now-obvious lack of scholarly education, she was illiterate and couldn't be understood. With only a mess of stick figures, no one could understand what she was trying to say.

Even Lan Qiren (resident expert at making sense of the ridiculous visual reports only teenagers could come up with) had no idea what it was meant to be.

Suddenly, from the far end of the street, there was a series of footsteps and human pants. The girl flinched, then disappeared.

Wei Wuxian frowned.

"What do you think?" he asked, glancing back at Hanguang-jun.

Without hesitating for even a moment, Lan Wangji answered, "She will most likely return."

"I think so too," Wei Wuxian agreed. "But I'm worried. If someone here has something resembling the seal…"

The kids tilted their heads in confusion, but Lan Wangji understood at once. If someone here had Wei Wuxian's Stygian Tiger Seal, they were a demonic cultivator. A demonic cultivator would be more than capable of destroying the girl's spirit.

If this was the Madam Yu of before, she knew she would have rolled her eyes and snapped "Then maybe you should have thought twice before you invented demonic cultivation!" As it was, however, she knew that any sense of victory she might have felt from those words would be cheaper than air.

She pursed her lips, remaining silent as the simulation went on.

"I'll try to find her," Lan Wangji offered, not waiting for a response before he'd unsheathed Bichen and taken to the sky. It was the logical option, especially given the fact that the abundant corpse poisoning in the area made Wei Wuxian's fighting style better for protecting the juniors than Lan Wangji's was.

Nevertheless, watching his other-self separate from Wei Wuxian made a shock of nervousness spread across the real Lan Wangji's body. Last time they had split up like this, Jiang Wanyin's future self had found Wei Wuxian and tortured him.

He prayed that wouldn't happen a second time.

Nevertheless, Hanguang-jun was gone, leaving Wei Wuxian and ~~their~~ the juniors alone. Wei Wuxian quickly put the board he had removed back in the wall, peeking out through the slit to see what had made the noise that frightened the ghost away. The disciples also wanted to see the situation outside, squeezing themselves together by the door and becoming a row of heads stacked on top of each other, peaking through the slit.

As Jiang Yanli watched the juniors squish their faces together, she felt it was becoming very clear that Wei Wuxian's weakness to children had undoubtedly remained consistent even after his death. She couldn't wait to show her A-Ling to the real version of her shidi waiting outside.

(Though perhaps she was still a little too young for that.)

Although the fog outside had been thinning for a while, the second the watchers laid eyes on a shadowed figure in the mist, it started circulating again. Realizing how much harder it was getting to see, the figure broke through the fog and rushed over.

They were dressed in black and staggered as they ran, limping forward as if injured. A sword covered by a black cloth hung by his waist, jostling with each tumbling step the man took.

He nearly tripped as his leg temporarily gave out.

Cursing, Wen Qing stormed forward, uncaring of the fact that she couldn't do anything when there was an obviously-injured patient before her. She tried walking to him, but the barrier surrounding the simulation cut her off before she could get close enough to truly see him through the fog.

Huffing in annoyance, she cursed again and prayed that — no matter what happened next — Wei Wuxian would be safe.

Noticing all the black the man was wearing, Lan Jingyi turned to Sizhui and asked, "Is he the mist-faced man?"

Jiang Cheng tensed at the possibility.

"Probably not," Lan Sizhui whispered back. "The mist faced man had an entirely different kind of movement than this person does."

And he was right. Due to the man's limping movement, a group of corpses soon caught up to him. However, right before they were able to tear into him, the figure unsheathed his sword and cut the closest corpse clean in two.

'Not bad,' Wen Ruohan admitted, somewhat impressed.

And Wei Wuxian clearly agreed. Unfortunately, right after that attack, there was a splattering sound yet again, and the man was soon hacking out the powder.

"Oh, no," Jiang Yanli gasped. "That poor man — he's already injured too."

Lan Sizhui straightened up, tension filling his body: "Senior Mo, this man… we-"

He cut off as the man attacked again, spraying more powder into the air.

Wen Qing sighed. Despite knowing nothing about the figure, Sizhui was the first to suggest saving him. There wasn't any real connection between the events, but, seeing the boy's wide-eyed earnestness, Wen Qing couldn't help but recall how Wen Ning had looked when he asked her to help hide Wei Wuxian from the roaming soldiers.

Had it really only been a few days ago that she learned about that?

Another group of walking corpses soon surrounded the mysterious figure. The circle became smaller and smaller, closing in on the man and making it so that each time he cut down a corpse, some of the powder sprayed into his eyes. He breathed in more of the substance, and soon began swaying back and forth in the air.

"We need to help him," Wei Wuxian finished for Sizhui.

"And how do you expect to do that, Wei Wuxian?" Jiang Cheng shouted, the stress of the situation beginning to get to him. "If you go out, you'll get poisoned yourself. In such a weak body — helping him can't be your priority right now. You're supposed to be protecting the kids!"

As he was shouting, Jin Ling raised many of the same concerns: "How do you intend on helping him? We can't go over there right now! The corpse powder is everywhere; you're gonna get poisoned if you go near."

Perhaps, but Lan Wangji wasn't concerned. Based on Wei Wuxian's performance against the Wens in the Xuanwu Cave, the second jade knew Wei Wuxian wouldn't act without a plan, and wouldn't be Wei Wuxian if he didn't act.

The barest hint of a smile crossed Lan Wangji's face as he watched Wei Wuxian get to work.

Having thought about it for a moment, Wei Wuxian frowned and stepped away from the window.

Outside, more and more corpses were piling up. They were coming from every direction, all attracted to the blood being let out by the unknown figure's injuries. There had been ten, and then twenty.

Then another dozen staggered over from the left; then another thirty from the right. More and more were arriving by the second — not at the man yet, but approaching quickly. It was almost as if someone had summoned them.

They were running out of time.

One junior, tense with terror, had stepped away from the wall and unsheathed his sword. Wei Wuxian walked straight to him.

"A-Xian?" Jiang Fengmian asked. "What are you-"

Wei Wuxian grabbed onto the exposed blade and slid his hand across, sending a splash of his own blood splattering onto the floor.

"A-Xian!"

"What-"

He lifted his hand until it was as high as his eyes, and let the blood drip into a green light rapidly spreading out below. With it came resentment, which grew and grew in potency until it encompassed the house — the block — the whole village-

The unknown figure seemed to turn towards Wei Wuxian, as though able to feel the spreading resentment. The ground underneath him was shining a sickly green.

"Those corpses… must be destroyed."

The Patriarch commanded them.

The watching spirits felt they had to comply.

And yet the command was not meant for them, as became apparent a moment later. A large drop of Wei Wuxian's blood finally made contact with the ground, and, with it, came an explosion of resentful energy. Tendrils of darkness burst out of the green, dancing through the air as they followed the resentment farther and farther out. The watchers were zoomed out into the sky, and saw that the entire town was now covered in the sickly green-ish hue. Somehow, even though Wei Wuxian's hands were empty, they could still hear the ringing of a note.

"The flute," Wen Chao tensed up, paling at once. "That flute!"

A song played on a flute that commanded the surrounding resentment to move. No flute was actually there — no air vibrated with noise — but to beings who had been controlled by resentment before, Wei Wuxian's powerful commands were far too associated with the sound for them to separate it. The resentful energy moved. As it went, it surged through the houses and streets of Yi City, — a town that specialized in burial goods.

It should be no surprise, then, that it came into contact with hundreds of life-sized puppets as it went.

Wei Wuxian breathed out once, bringing two fingers up in one position, then both hands up in a set of complex seals. By now, the resentment was so thick that it made the very air appear green.

Allowing his hands to fall down, he approached two paper mannequins of young girls which lay on the ground. Using the blood dripping from his still-injured hand, he painted irises on them.

A new wave of resentment burst out.

“Eyes behind thy long lashes,” Wei Wuxian whispered.

The mannequins across the whole town jolted.

“Lips parted, smiling in tease.”

There was a gust of air sending the town’s banners flying wildly. It took the watchers a second to realize what the source of that wind had been. Above them, hundreds of female mannequins were flying through the sky at nearly supersonic speeds, sending air flying out widely with their unmatchable velocity.

“Mind not the good or evil-”

The army circled in the sky, nearly generating a tornado above the city as they swarmed.

“With smeared eyes, I summon thee.”

A hundred crashed onto the ground around the mysterious figure, leaving craters in their wake. The smiling painted faces seemed to grin, their unseeing eyes impossibly focusing on the corpses before them.

“...What?” Jin Guangshan breathed out, unable to do anything but gape at the simulation.

“Bring the living person here,” Wei Wuxian ordered. “Other than that… kill them.”

And they did.

The world darkened instantly as the little sun in the sky was blocked out by the near-endless flock of puppets which filled the air. They dived down, crashing into the fierce corpses and slamming them against the floor, only to leap up again and use their bare hands to rip apart the ones that remained. It seemed impossible that they were made of paper — their strength easily eclipsed the corpses a hundred-fold. There had been dozens upon dozens of corpses in the street, but the population of puppets dwarfed them easily.

It couldn’t even be considered a fight.

"...I suppose we should have expected this outcome," Wen Qing eventually sighed, breathing out sharply through her nose. "With the amount of resentful energy in Yi City-"

"He can control puppets?!" Wen Chao cut her off, so pale he was nearly translucent. "I thought — isn't it only corpses? No one said anything about puppets!"

After thinking for a moment, Lan Qiren suggested "They might be a less efficient tool than the corpses, and much harder to come by during war. However, given that Wei Wuxian couldn't control those, this was the best option he had."

When he had been brought back to life, he had cut open a stalk of bamboo to make a new flute. When he couldn't control the corpses, he instead used puppets. Practitioners of normal cultivation were far weaker without their swords — that had been the whole reason the Wen Sect took them at the indoctrination camp — and yet they'd still had the gall to look down on Wei Wuxian's supposedly inferior method time and time again.

A now-familiar sense of shame filled Lan Qiren, and he couldn't help but remember the vicious scolding Cangse Sanren had given him when his adherence to the rules had nearly cost Jiang Fengmian his life.

'It seems I truly hadn't learned anything, Cangse,' Lan Qiren thought, sighing at his own arrogance. 'I needed to meet your son to understand what you had tried to teach me.'

The only mannequins which hadn't been used were the adult men — whose structures were most likely different enough that Wei Wuxian's blood on the child mannequins couldn't affect them. At first, some of the watchers had been concerned that just the women and children wouldn't be enough to destroy the corpses; they soon realized those fears were unnecessary. By now, the corpses had been reduced to motionless chunks of flesh on the ground, and the giggling of women and children filled the air like a maniacal symphony.

Wen Ruohan was impressed.

'Although the environment the battles take place in matters more for demonic cultivation than spiritual, Wei Wuxian's ability to use it regardless of the body he inhabits has proven to be invaluable. Does that mean physical injuries are irrelevant? Could cripples use it? Off the top of my head, I can think of at least three cultivators whose futures were ended due to the loss of a limb. Perhaps this could be a way for them to return to the field.'

Something to consider, for later.

Obeying Wei Wuxian's earlier command, the puppets of two young girls swiftly carried the injured man inside, only to exit once again after they set him down. They joined the rest of the puppets, spreading around the building like the lion statues that guard noble estates.

The disciples inside were shocked speechless.

Seeing their expressions, Lan Xichen couldn't help but laugh: "We might be getting accustomed to Wei Wuxian's particular brand of impossibilities, but this is the first time most of the juniors are seeing it."

"Seeing it actually makes me feel better about how I reacted at the beginning," Jiang Yanli admitted. "Learning what led to it made everything seem like such a natural outcome… I had almost wondered if my initial disbelief was silly."

Huffing a laugh at that, Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes and said, "Even thirteen years in the future, Wei Wuxian is just…."

Before he could find a word to accurately describe the boy, the juniors' thoughts took over.

'In all the lessons we'd had on demonic cultivation, I could never understand why anyone would want to learn.'

'It had seemed weird that we relied on so many of the Yiling Patriarch's inventions — he was a demonic cultivator, after all.'

'But if* this *is demonic cultivation…..'

Suddenly, everything made much more sense.

Jin Guangshan had to agree. With this sort of power, no wonder his other-self had put so much effort into saving Xue Yang. It was one thing for it to be a powerful weapon in open war, but, after watching this, the potential applications of demonic cultivation truly seemed endless.

'That was The Summoning of Painted Eyes, wasn't it?' one boy thought, fascination clear in his tone. 'That's supposed to be a simple part of demonic cultivation. If this is the power of a spell like that, what could powerful demonic cultivation do?'

Lan Qiren instantly bristled, then flinched back. He pursed his lips together, sealing his mouth shut and fighting his instinctive reaction to scold the boy for showing such interest in demonic cultivation.

(Intellectually knowing he had to be more accepting and actually being more accepting were two very different things. He resolved to stay vigilant.)

However, to the side, there was one boy who didn't share the others' enthusiasm.

Simultaneously, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan rushed to Jin Ling's side, kneeling beside the boy as he stared at the destruction the dolls had left with a terrifyingly blank expression. Although the two to-be parents knew it was impossible for the boy to feel their presences, they retained a hope that being there — with him, watching over him with a single-minded dedication their own parents had never managed when it came to them — would somehow be able to help.

Finally, shaking himself out of his thoughts, Lan Sizhui stood up and moved to help Wei Wuxian with the stranger.

“Nobody move,” Wei Wuxian ordered. “Be careful to not touch the corpse-poisoning powder. Even just physical contact might be enough to poison you.”

Yelping, Nie Huaisang quickly backed away from the man, phasing straight through several cabinets as he did.

There were two coughs from below, and the unknown man shifted as if starting to wake up. He had covered his mouth with his hand to prevent other people from being affected by any corpse poison, and was breathing shakily as he spoke:

“Who… are you?” he asked.

The sheer exhaustion in the man’s tone made Jiang Yanli unconsciously step closer, sympathy and concern overtaking her mind.

Wei Wuxian observed the white bandage over the man's eyes, quickly realizing that he was most likely blind. Despite that, he appeared quite young and even handsome, somewhere between a boy and a man. It was quite likely that the blindness had been caused by an injury.

‘Why have I been coming into contact with so many blind people these last few days?’ he wondered. ‘Both heard and seen; both alive and dead.’

“I’m honestly starting to lose track of all of them,” Jin Zixuan admitted. “Especially when you add in the story about that Baoshan Sanren disciple Lan-er-gongzi’s future self told us about.”

There were nods of agreement from all around.

Suddenly, Jin Ling called out, “Hey! We don’t know who he is, or whether he’s on our side at all. Why should we save him without taking that into consideration? If he’s a bad guy, then won’t we be letting a snake in?”

Jiang Yanli blushed, glancing down at the clearly-listening man and hoping he wasn’t too offended.

Strangely, however, rather than getting angry, the man simply nodded, “Young Master, you’re very right. My apologies, it would be best if I left.”

Jin Ling did a double take at that, clearly not having expected it at all.

And Wen Qing straightened up, fully prepared to knock out her (virtual) patient if he truly tried to leave.

“But it’s also possible that he’s not a bad person,” Lan Sizhui pointed out, rushing to intervene before things got drastic. “No matter what, not helping a dying person is against our sect’s rules.”

The three Lans and Wen Qing all nodded in approval, their fondness for Lan Sizhui growing even further.

"Fine." Jin Ling stubbornly huffed. "You're the good guys. But if somebody dies, it's not my fault."

"You-" Lan Jingyi began, before forcing himself to stop.

'It serves you right to be bored to death!' Jiang Cheng had told his shixiong. 'You shouldn't have played hero, and you shouldn't have cared for such a hell of a thing. If in the beginning you didn't-'

'Jiang Cheng,' Jiang Fengmian had interrupted, sternly.

Jin Ling wasn't necessarily wrong, in this case — they didn't know who the man was, after all — but direct contrasts between him and Sizhui were easy to draw. First at Dafan Mountain, when Jin Ling's mocking of those trapped in the nets was contrasted against the help the Lans offered them, and now, when the differences between the boys themselves became apparent.

(Differences which, it seemed, had a lot to do with who raised them.)

While the Jiangs' thoughts were preoccupied by that, the rest of the watchers focused on something else entirely. When Lan Jingyi had cut off earlier, it wasn't because Lan Wangji had miraculously returned to activate the silencing spell. His attention had been attracted by the man's sword, which lay propped up on the table. A thick black cloth had been wrapped around it, previously obscuring the sword from view. However, right now, some of it had fallen off the very edge, allowing the body of the sword to be seen.

The sword had been forged with unequalled skill. The sheath was a steady bronze, an intricate pattern of frost carved along its body. Behind the pattern, the body of the sword shone as though it was made of silver stars, glistening with snowflake-shaped flecks of luminescence. It emanated a pure yet brilliant beauty.

Seeing it, Jiang Fengmian couldn't help but be reminded of the majesty of Cangse Sanren's sword when she came down the mountain all those years ago.

Having overcome his speechlessness (but not his shock), Lan Jingyi opened his mouth to begin, "That-"

He cut off abruptly as Wei Wuxian pressed a hand to his mouth, silencing whatever he had been about to say. Jingyi glanced back angrily, but Wei Wuxian simply raised a finger to his mouth in a shushing motion.

'He covered his sword with a cloth,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Clearly, he doesn't want it to be seen.'

Flinching at the silent reprimand, the crowd of juniors covered their mouths with their hands, as though trying to physically trap in the noise that had been about to escape. Taking a deep breath, Jin Ling remained silent while stepping forward to write something on the dust-covered table. After a few seconds of work, he stepped back and allowed Wei Wuxian to see.

The characters for 'Shuanghua' lay drawn-out in the dust.

"Wait, isn't that-"

'Xiaoxingchen's sword?' Wei Wuxian realized. He turned to Jin Ling and mouthed the question, receiving nods from all the juniors in response. Apparently, the sword was quite well known.

Wei Wuxian's eyes turned to the unknown man again.

'If the sword is Shuanghua… and this person is blind…'

"He's A-Xian's martial uncle," Jiang Fengmian realized, relaxing into a soft smile. "If A-Xian is actually meeting him-"

"He might learn more about his mother?" Madam Yu snapped, only to look away right after. She knew she had no reason to stop this (especially when she was the reason Wei Wuxian didn't know more about his mom), but her husband's mention of Cangse Sanren still stung regardless.

The right thing to do would be to let it happen without complaint. She couldn't do anything to stop it, and causing a scene would only embarrass herself.

(Besides, Wei Wuxian deserved to know.)

But, no matter how well she knew that, the stinging, stretching pain of ~~jealousy~~ hate just didn't go away.

None of the virtual people shared her discomfort. Curious beyond measure, several of the juniors reached forward to the bandaged man, hoping to get a better look, only to freeze when the man flinched back.

"Sorry, sorry… it wasn't on purpose," one boy lied, swiftly taking his hand away.

The man shook his head, responding with an unconvincing, "...It's fine."

Although he was far too dignified to talk to illusions outloud, internally Lan Qiren was knee-deep in a lecture at the future boy about 'proper conduct and behavior while on missions.'

(Lan Xichen, who could read his uncle's expression quite well, had to bite his lip to reign in his laughter as his uncle's silent scolding reached new heights.)

"Well, thank you for the help," Xiao Xingchen nodded once, reaching out to take his sword. "I'll take my leave-"

Before he had even finished, Wei Wuxian's hand darted out lightning-fast to cover Shuanghua with the black cloth, hiding the fact that they'd seen it. A moment later, the man reached over and picked the sword up, rising from his seat and bowing once.

"Stay here for now," Wei Wuxian objected. "You're under corpse poisoning."

“Is it severe?”

Without hesitation, Wei Wuxian bluntly admitted, “Quite so.”

“If it’s severe, then what’s the point in staying? I’m long past hope anyways. Why not kill a few more corpses before I become one as well?”

The juniors flinched back.

“What the — how can he be so callous about his own life?” Jiang Cheng asked, gaping openly. Wen Chao was in complete agreement with the question. Did the man somehow not understand how scary death was?

Well, Wen Chao supposed he could think of one other person who was more than willing to risk death.

‘It’s exactly because I’m close to death that I’m happy!’ Wei Wuxian had exclaimed, madness seeping into his eyes. ‘Go on, torture me if you dare! The crueler the better! After I die, I’ll return as a fierce ghost. I’ll haunt you until you’re forced to join me.’

The Wen heir shuddered at the memory, glaring at the illusion of Wei Wuxian before him.

The juniors had similarly been shocked by the man’s statement — though for completely different reasons — and protested his suggestion.

“You can’t-”

“No, wait-”

“Just stay. It’ll be fine-”

“Who said that you’re long past hope?” Lan Jingyi demanded, raising his voice. “Stay here. He’ll cure you!”

“Me?” Wei Wuxian asked, pointing at himself.

“Yes, you,” Madam Yu huffed in a manner that quite clearly conveyed the implied ‘obviously.’ However, across from her, Wen Qing instead frowned, transitioning into a grim acceptance.

Seeing her sect leader’s questioning look, she elaborated, “It’s too late. He’s had too much corpse poisoning for congee to cure it. He would need an elixir.”

“Eh?” Jiang Yanli asked.

And it seemed Xiao Xingchen knew that as well.

“I have already killed a number of corpses in this city,” he explained. “They continued chasing after me, new ones arriving as soon as the old ones died. If I stay, you’ll be drowned in an ocean of corpses sooner or later.”

And, having seen that very event happen to him right before Wei Wuxian performed the Summoning of Painted Eyes, the watchers couldn't offer up much of an objection.

"Do you know how Yi City became this way?"

"No," Xiao Xingchen shook his head, turning to vaguely face Wei Wuxian. "I'm only a roaming cul… roaming around the area. I heard about the strange events here and decided to night hunt in the city. You haven't seen how dangerous the corpses can get here in terms of both quantity and power. Some move too quickly to take precautions against. Others, when killed, release corpse poisoning powder that infects people upon touch. However, if you don't kill them, they charge after you and attack. Both result in poisoning, which is truly difficult to deal with."

Paling even further, it occurred to Wen Chao once again that Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun were probably some of the only people who would be capable of dealing with the situation. His father as well, of course, and maybe (annoyingly) Nie Mingjue or Lan Xichen, but not many others — and especially not without casualties.

No wonder his father wanted to ally with the two of them-

But his experience in the simulation had shown Wen Chao that the pair was comprised of two terrifying, unfaltering freaks-

But they wouldn't be dangerous if he had them under control-

Could he be sure of that?

He sat back in his seat, lost in thoughts and plans for the third time that day.

(Even those who noticed weren't especially worried; thinking wasn't exactly Wen Chao's strong suit.)

"Judging from your voices, there are quite a few young masters in this group, right?" Xiao Xingchen asked. "It's best if you leave this area as soon as possi-"

He cut off, tensing instantly as the laughter of the puppets outside grew in volume.

A shudder ran up Nie Huaisang's spine and he quickly backed up to his brother again.

Lan Jingyi glanced out through the door slit, then immediately spun around and covered the hole with his body, eeping, "Th-there are so many!"

"Walking corpses?" Wei Wuxian checked. "How many?"

"I don't know, they fill the entire street! Possibly hundreds! And more are coming!"

"And Wei Ying can't control them," Lan Wangji grimly pointed out. Although the strength of the puppets under his command was notable, they were still made of paper. The corpses' numbers could replenish in an instant; there was no telling how long Wei Wuxian would be able to hold out for.

As corpses continued to appear, Wen Ruohan began to frown, wishing Wei Wuxian had come to Yi City with a few more tools than just a shoddy flute and his own blood.

"I don't know how much longer the mannequins can hold out!" Lan Jingyi exclaimed, making the rest of the juniors immediately turn to face the outside. If the mannequins fell, the corpses on the street would rush into the shop. In such an enclosed space, if even one of the corpses were to be killed, everyone inside would surely end up poisoned. Fighting off the other corpses would make the poison circulate quickly, and, if they didn't fight back, they would soon be ripped to pieces.

Xiao Xingchen stood up as if planning on leaving and drawing the corpses to him, only to stumble and fall to his knees.

Nie Huaisang jumped.

"You can just sit back and relax," Wei Wuxian told him. "It's all going to be over soon."

"...What?" Nie Mingjue asked, staring blankly. He turned to Lan Xichen, but the first jade appeared just as lost as him. That confusion gave way to horror as soon as he saw what Wei Wuxian did next.

With a simple flick of his arm, Wei Wuxian cut his finger on Lan Jingyi's sword again. Droplets of blood dripped down, painting the wood underneath a scarlet red.

(Again.)

The sight of it nearly made Lan Wangji nauseous.

'Mo Xuanyu barely has a golden core. There's only so much damage your body can take, Wei Ying,' he thought, clenching his fists in anger at his other-self's continued absence. 'How much blood can you use before you get in serious trouble?'

He was not interested in finding out.

Perhaps worried about the same, Lan Wangji's own #1 fanboy spoke up:

"Are you using The Summoning again?" Lan Jingyi asked, stepping forward and pulling back his sleeve to reveal his arm. "How much are you going to lose if you do it again? Do you need me to give you some?"

The other boys also rolled up their sleeves.

"I can also spare some!"

"Me too!"

As the juniors offered themselves up one after the other, Jiang Fengmian leaned close to Lan Qiren and asked, "Aren't you worried about the poor juniors being seduced into demonic cultivation?"

"Fengmian-" he cut himself off, knowing his initial reaction to Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation more than warranted the teasing. "I'll… make an exception. This time."

He very pointedly pretended not to hear Lan Xichen's poorly-disguised laughter from behind him.

"Senior, please take some blood from me."

Wei Wuxian looked like he couldn't decide whether to laugh or sigh, shaking his head and telling them, "It's okay. Does anyone have blank talismans?"

'At their age, you were doing far more reckless things than offering a bit of your blood. Or did you forget about volunteering yourself to distract the Xuanwu?' Lan Wangji thought, frowning at the reminder.

Lan Xichen, instantly realizing his brother's feelings, could only think, 'Wangji, given what we've seen, you have no room to talk either.'

As though he could feel his brother's judgement on him, Lan Wangji very carefully turned away.

The disciples had all pulled out their talismans. However, their cultivation was not yet at a level that would allow them to write runes on the spot, and therefore all the ones they had were already full.

"No blank ones," Sizhui slowly reported. There was a growl outside and further laughter from the mannequins, making the juniors back away warily from the wall.

"That's fine," Wei Wuxian decided. "Already-written ones will work as well."

Hesitantly nodding once, Lan Sizhui took out a stack of yellow talismans from his Qiankun Pouch, holding them out in offering. After looking for a moment, Wei Wuxian grabbed a single one of them and gave it a thorough inspection.

"He only wants one?" Jin Zixuan frowned, turning to Jiang Cheng for answers.

"Don't look at me," the other boy responded. "I never know what he's doing."

Pleased with the one he had chosen, Wei Wuxian then scratched from top to bottom, writing on top of the pre-existing cinnabar runes. The crimson blood and vermilion cinnabar formed new characters with a new purpose. With a flick of Wei Wuxian's wrist, the talisman was sent hovering in the air for a moment before it ignited in flames.

Jiang Yanli jumped back, startled by the sudden light.

And yet Wei Wuxian simply reached a hand out to catch the sprinkling ashes. He brought them to his mouth, then blew them out the door to the mannequins fighting desperately against the dead.

"What is he-"

“With prairie fires it fails to die; when spring winds blow it regains life.”

This time, the puppets of adult men (who had remained on the ground until now) sprung to life. They twitched, then forced themselves up, then looked forward.

Their faces were painted for war.

With thick, powerful hands, they reached onto their backs and unsheathed the blades that laid there.

Many of the watchers’ mouths were making gaping “oh” shapes.

They were Nether Brawlers — designed to fight through the afterlife to protect their charges. And now they were all it took to turn the tide.

The female puppets were more than capable of destroying corpses, but their lack of defensive abilities meant they could be slowly worn down over time. The addition of the Nether Brawlers provided tanks to absorb the majority of the damage the corpses were capable of dealing out, making the army perfectly balanced. The puppets had already been winning, only possibly in danger due to the ever-growing number of their foes. Now, they could conceivably go on forever.

When Wen Ruohan had first learned of Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation, he had thought the prospect of an undying, unending army needing neither food nor shelter was worth millions. It soon became clear that Wei Wuxian’s inventions were worth even more than that, but it didn’t erase the initial uses he had observed.

The cultivation world had two great enemies in the past few decades. One was the Wen sect built up over hundreds of years; the other was Wei Wuxian alone.

With every segment of the simulation, it was becoming more and more obvious why.

After ensuring that the situation outside was more than dealt with, Wei Wuxian turned to the juniors and asked, “Nobody breathed it in, right?”

“No.”

“I’m good.”

“Me too.”

Nodding once, Wei Wuxian reached out to Xiao Xingchen, hoping to find a place for him to lie down. Unfortunately, the only option left was the cold, dust-covered ground — made even more uncomfortable by how tightly Xiao Xingchen was gripping Shuanghua. It seemed that transition was enough to pull Xiao Xingchen back, however, as a moment later he shifted and coughed a few times.

“Was that… the Summoning of the Painted Eyes?” he asked, speaking weakly.

Wei Wuxian just shrugged: “I know a thing or two.”

Here, Nie Mingjue leaned forward, watching Xiao Xingchen's reaction carefully. With how many people were seeing the simulation, it seemed unlikely that the Nie Sect's cultivation techniques would remain a secret for much longer. Getting a good idea of how the future's adults reacted to demonic cultivation would be immensely helpful in informing his later decisions.

Having thought for a while, Xiao Xingchen gave a weak smile and said, "Yes… to eliminate those walking corpses, that was indeed the best method. However, this path can easily lead to the backfiring of one's ghosts or spirits. Even the founder of the path, the Yiling Patriarch, couldn't avoid such an end. I suggest you refrain from using demonic cultivation except in dire situations. You can always cultivate using other paths…."

Sighing quietly, Wei Wuxian nodded once and said, "Thank you for your advice."

At the words 'even the Yiling Patriarch couldn't avoid such an end,' Lan Wangji had flinched and zeroed his attention in on Wei Wuxian, watching him carefully and searching for any negative reaction. That meant the slight twitch in Wei Wuxian's expression at 'you can always cultivate using other paths' was quite obvious to him.

And quite confusing. Was it simply that Mo Xuanyu didn't yet have a golden core, and so it wasn't an option? Or was it that the risks of demonic cultivation were often exaggerated by others — as supported by the lack of protest from Hanguang-jun at the resurrected Wei Wuxian's cultivation. The latter option seemed most likely, and yet Lan Wangji still couldn't help but feel like there was something he was missing.

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian felt nothing but awe for the usual acceptance 'Xiao Xingchen' showed.

'Most famous cultivators would take a decisive stance on the matter, drawing distinct lines that indicated their absolute hatred toward a certain someone. And yet my Shishu tried to persuade me instead, despite being only half-alive himself right now, warning me about the potential backlash. He truly is a kind-hearted person,' Wei Wuxian decided, his eyes falling to the bandages wrapped around Xiao Xingchen's once again. 'Really, I can't help but sympathize.'

At that last line, Jiang Yanli frowned, hoping that he was sympathizing with the damage Xiao Xingchen had due to the events they had already seen, and not additional horrors which hadn't been revealed yet.

However, unlike the adults (and Jin Ling), most of the juniors couldn't help but feel an immense curiosity towards the tools Wei Wuxian had used.

"Oh my… that mannequin woman's nails are so scary!" one boy, crammed with the others in front of the crack, exclaimed. "One scratch from her and the corpse's head has been sliced into five lines!"

"Why's that little girl's tongue so long and hard? Is she a hanged ghost?"

“The man is so strong! How can he lift up so many corpses at once? He’s gonna throw them on the ground — look, look! He threw them! They broke!”

Nie Huaisang had very intentionally avoided stepping outside to look at the mannequins (who, despite being under Wei Wuxian’s control, were honestly more terrifying than the army of corpses from earlier). The laughter they let out was more than enough to give Nie Huaisang nightmares. Now, however, he was getting a full play-by-play from the future’s juniors regardless of what he wanted!

The future was the worst! Who on earth thought it would be a good idea to let those kids into Yi City in the first place?

As the children continued to gawk and whisper at each other, Wei Wuxian moved to pick up the last bowl of congee, turning to Xiao Xingchen to say “The poison has already worked its way through your body. The glutinous rice here might be able to slow it down, but it also might not work at all — not to mention it tastes really bad.”

“Oh, so you do realize that!” Jiang Cheng scoffed, having been forced to taste one too many of Wei Wuxian’s concoctions throughout his life.

(Technically he had only tasted one before learning his lesson and never accepting another, but that was still far too much in his book.)

“So, do you want to try? If you want to live, then ignore what I just said.”

“That was the least convincing sales pitch I’ve ever heard,” Jin Zixuan commented, unable to resist smiling at the absurdity.

Without hesitation, Xiao Xingchen took the bowl from Wei Wuxian, responding, “Of course I want to live. If I can, there’s no reason to not try.”

Yet, after only one mouthful, the corners of his lips twitched and he was forced to purse his lips together to avoid spitting it all out. Red covered his cheeks as his brain tried and failed to process the indescribable levels of spice he had just been given.

A moment later, he respectfully replied, “Thank you.”

“His mental discipline must be quite strong,” Lan Xichen whispered, to which Nie Mingjue immediately snorted. It was becoming increasingly apparent that the legend of Wei Wuxian’s spice tolerance actually undersold the severity of the situation, rather than exaggerating it.

However, as if willingly blind to that, Wei Wuxian bluntly spun on his heel towards the juniors and said, “Did you see that? Did you see? Did you hear what he said? You guys are the only ones with such high standards! Honestly, so full of complaints after having just a little of my congee….”

Unable to simply accept that, Xiao Xingchen was forced to admit, “But… now that I think about it, if I had to eat this every single day to survive… I think I’d rather die.”

Wei Wuxian spun to him, a look of complete and utter betrayal written clearly across his face, as Jin Ling dissolved into uproarious laughter.

"...Don't worry so much, Wangji," Lan Xichen told his brother, raising his voice slightly so as to be heard over the room's deafening howling. "In the Cloud Recesses, your food will be prepared for you. We can just add spice to Wei-gongzi's."

Frowning, Lan Wangji countered, "But what if he wants to cook me a meal on a special occasion?"

"I… well-"

"Xiongzhang, will you help me?" he requested. "I will need to increase my spice tolerance. Do we have any books in the library's restricted section on changing tastes?"

Seeing the utter desperation in his younger brother, Lan Xichen simply didn't have the heart to tell him that it was most likely beyond hope. He could only give a slow, hesitant nod.

"We can… look when we get home?"

"It's finished!" Lan Jingyi suddenly declared (resulting in a very thankful real Lan Xichen, who had no idea how to continue the conversation). "All of the corpses have been killed. We won!"

Hearing that, Madam Yu turned to her husband and — slack jawed — asked, "How long has it been? It can't have been more than ten minutes since Hanguang-jun left!"

Her equally shocked husband could only disbelievingly reply "It's been eight minutes," clearly remembering how many corpses there had been just a short while ago.

"Don't open the door just yet," Xiao Xingchen advised, putting down the bowl of congee. "Be careful. More might still come-"

"Don't put down the bowl. Pick it up and drink everything," Wei Wuxian ordered.

Although it was hard to read the man's expression without being able to see his eyes, the horror on Xiao Xingchen's face was clear as day. A sigh escaped Madam Yu's throat as she bemoaned the ridiculousness Wei Wuxian brought with him everywhere he went.

Seeing that Xiao Xingchen had (reluctantly) returned to drinking, Wei Wuxian then began moving toward the slit in the door, peeking through it to get a good look at the situation outside. Due to the inhuman battle that had just occurred, purplish-red powder pervaded the entire street, clearly visible even through the fog. Luckily, the corpse poisoning powder was beginning to dissipate, and the mannequins were working hard to clear the corpses off the street. If any of the body pieces littering the ground so much as twitched, they would be stomped on mercilessly.

Soon, pools of muddied flesh were all that was left.

It really was a shame that the other sect leaders were there as well, Jin Guangshan thought. If it had been just him, he would have free rein to manipulate Wei Wuxian into using demonic cultivation against the other clans without anyone being able to trace the destruction back to him. A pity.

However, if he could just get Wen Ruohan to agree, then maybe it wouldn't matter if the acts were traced back to them — Wei Wuxian's power would be theirs all the same.

Some time passed without any new corpses appearing, and the juniors slowly began to relax. Silence stretched out and Wei Wuxian was about to join the others, when a series of imperceptible noises came from above.

Wen Ruohan glanced up.

The sound was extremely difficult to pick up, but it appeared to be someone walking rapidly across the roof. The footsteps were abnormally light, making it nearly unnoticeable. Only those with especially keen senses would be able to tell.

However, noticing Wen Ruohan and Wei Wuxian's reactions, more and more of the watchers soon became aware that something was off. They joined the pair in looking up.

(Lan Wangji clenched his hands, praying that his other self would be back soon.)

Although the juniors were too inexperienced to notice, Xiao Xingchen (whose eyes were covered) relied quite heavily on hearing. A moment passed, and he turned his head toward the ceiling as well.

Frowning, he cautioned, "From above, there's-"

"Disperse!" Wei Wuxian suddenly shouted, pushing the juniors out of the way right as a large hole was smashed through the ceiling of the central chamber. Dust, grass, and broken roof tiles rained down from above-

Many phasing straight through the screaming watchers-

And crashing onto the ground below. Fortunately, as most of the disciples had already scattered, the resulting injuries weren't too severe. A moment later, a black figure dropped down from the opening in the roof.

His clothes were obsidian cultivation robes, and were decorated by the horsetail whisk strapped over his shoulder. He had a tall stance and a straight back, as well as a long sword he held in his hand. His handsome face was upturned, showing the man's personality as haughty and aloof.

And yet there were no pupils in his eyes, only a blank field of white.

'Just like A-Ning,' Wen Qing realized at once (and hating the truth of the statement). 'I see. He's a fierce corpse.-'

The virtual cultivators realized the same, but had no time to react before the corpse had launched an attack. Jin Ling was the first one he reached-

"A-Ling!" Jin Zixuan cried out, running over, but unable to interfere.

Although Jin Ling managed to defend against the attack, its power was so great that the Jin heir's arms were numbed on impact. If it wasn't for Suihua's immense spiritual power, his sword would almost certainly have broken, leading to his death. The corpse attacked again immediately after, but, this time, his sword was stopped long before it came into contact with Jin Ling's.

Even with the poison filling his veins, Xiao Xingchen had managed to protect the junior.

"Oh, thank the heavens," Jin Zixuan gasped out, tension leaving his body until he swayed on his feet. If his other self wasn't dead, he would be able to be there, helping Jin Ling. He had no idea what events led to his death, but his determination to discover that strengthened anew.

(The fact that it had been his sword that defended Jin Ling — an indirect form of protection from him — was a small but nonetheless appreciated consolation.)

Xiao Xingchen and the corpse dueled while Wei Wuxian worked to ensure all the juniors were out of the strike zone. However, largely due to the corpse poison still filling his body, Xiao Xingchen faltered a moment later and fell to his knees.

"Xiao Xingchen!" Jiang Yanli stood up, horror filling her body. "A-Xian, you have to help-"

A sharp note filled the air, its piercing, high-pitched nature forcing the listeners to cover their ears and wince in pain. Hearing the sound, the corpse reeled back, his hands trembling. And yet, a moment later, he turned to face the Yiling Patriarch and attacked.

'I can't control it,' Wei Wuxian realized, eyes widening. 'This corpse has a master!'

A master whos was also most likely the one using Wei Wuxian's Stygian Tiger Seal. Recalling the highly questionable report on Xue Yang, quite a few people turned their eyes on Jin Guangshan, watching disapprovingly.

His sword struck as fast as thunder, and yet Wei Wuxian dodged time and time again. Watching the fight between Wei Wuxian and the corpse continue, Lan Jingyi quickly began to panic.

"That — just what is he, dead or alive?! I've never seen such a…."

He couldn't finish, but his meaning was obvious. Who had ever seen a corpse with such high-quality swordsmanship and agility? It was a moment later, however, that he realized the answer to that question.

Knowing as well, the spirits switched the simulation to a memory. It was Wen Ning, the Ghost General.

‘A-Ning,’ Wen Qing thought, her heart squeezing at the sight of a corpse standing there, rather than a boy.

Jumping back, Wei Wuxian gained enough distance to buy himself a handful of seconds. Without wasting a moment, he pulled out his flute again and calmly played another tune, this one invigorating and persuasive.

As sweet and playful as the tune was, it made Wen Chao freeze like a cornered rabbit. He knew what the orders were — he knew it had nothing to do with him — but he would never again be able to listen to flute music without recalling the face of the demon who caused his other-self’s demise.

Luckily, with no regard for the real Wen Chao’s feelings, the simulation continued as usual.

Through the walls of the house, the juniors could hear the laughter of the mannequins increase in volume. Wei Wuxian dodged another attack from Song Lan, and, a split second later, the puppets patrolling outside hopped onto the roof and down through the hole the corpse had made. Sensing that something was wrong, the corpse sliced twice, vertically stabbing two of the mannequins into four halves.

“Wha — but they took down fierce corpses so easily!”

Lan Qiren frowned deeply: “That just demonstrates how powerful this corpse is.”

While it continued to slice with its right hand, its left reached towards its back and grabbed onto the horsetail whisk. It snapped out like a whip, and, as if the soft, white strands had turned into poisonous spikes on a mace, it demolished the puppets that came its way. If it touched a person, it would undoubtedly leave a bloody gash in its wake.

Furthermore, to the now quite-sensitive watchers, the resentful energy the corpse contained was quite obvious. The beings it resembled most closely were the Ghost General, the Xuanwu of Slaughter, and the Yiling Patriarch himself, fresh out of the Burial Mounds.

(Though, thankfully, this new corpse appeared to be a little less powerful than those three.)

Fully aware of the necessity of multitasking, Wei Wuxian lowered his flute for a moment to shout at the children, “Nobody come here! Be good and stay in the corners!”

As soon as he finished speaking, he began playing his flute once again. The song switched back and forth between sounding vivacious and vehement, calling forth an endless stream of the paper mannequins. No matter how many puppets the cultivator’s powerful attacks destroyed, more would replace them shortly after. Once he destroyed the ones on the left, a dozen more would swarm on the right; when he killed the ones in front of him, the rest would attack from behind.

No matter how powerful one was, it was impossible to deal with everything at once.

And that was the true worth of Wei Wuxian's power. No matter how many first class fighters Wen Ruohan had access to, none of them could wipe out an army by themselves. Demonic cultivation, on the other hand….

The corpse crushed a child mannequin's skull beneath its foot, then turned to face an approaching woman with knife-like claws. He kicked her to the side, getting a gash across his pants in the process. Suddenly, a Nether Brawler shot down from above and landed on him, pressing him against the ground with a foot on his shoulder. This action was immediately supported by three more Nether Brawlers, who also jumped down from the ceiling to crush the corpse against the ground.

Sounding as though he was reading from a textbook, Ouyang Zizhen began to recite, "In legends, Nether Brawlers had incredible strength. Therefore, when craftsmen designed them, they often added additional components to increase the puppet's weight. After being possessed by Senior Wei's roaming spirits, their weight was multiplied exponentially. A single one of them was as heavy as a mountain."

Lan Xichen looked over at the Nether Brawlers holding the corpse down and found himself wincing in sympathy at the obvious heavy strain on the man's arms.

The corpse tried to struggle out, but was quickly slammed to the ground again. With four puppets 'as heavy as a mountain' on it, its guts not gushing out was quite fortunate enough in itself. Thus, the hold the four mannequins had on it was quite secure.

Wei Wuxian approached the corpse, kneeling down to smooth out the rumpled, torn clothes on the cultivator's back. As he did, however, he noticed there was a thin wound near his left shoulder blade.

Frowning, Wei Wuxian gave a careless gesture to the corpses and ordered, "Turn him around."

They complied at once. With the cultivator's front facing up, it was much easier to inspect. Wei Wuxian smiled in a mix of satisfaction and pride at their work, then stepped closer to give them their reward. He held up the finger he had made the cut in, watching the blood drip down slowly.

Several of the watchers swallowed, feeling a signal from the resentful energy in the air, but unable to determine what it meant.

The reason why the message was so shaky became clear a moment later: this was only for the Nether Brawlers. Only the strongest puppets, which had done so well, deserved this prize.

Wei Wuxian extended his hand out, placing his finger near the lips of the closest puppet, and watched as a red tongue made of paper slowly slipped out. At first hesitant, the tongue slowly approached the finger, resting just below and allowing one drop of blood to make contact with it.

As soon as it did, there was a change in the air.

Someone sucked in a breath.

The tongue came out again, more ferocious this time, and licked up the finger as if getting a taste of paradise. Emboldened by the first's success, the others soon approached as well. They leaned forward, silently begging for a taste, and relished in the drops Wei Wuxian calmly set across their tongues.

The resentful energy within them surged.

Someone fell to their knees with a gasp.

All four silently fought to take in more and more of the liquid — not audacious enough to battle before their master, but certainly not above begging. They truly cherished the delicacy they had been offered, nearly worshiping the Patriarch's hand with the same fervor a drug addict would exhibit.

Then, at long last, Wei Wuxian pulled his hand away, forcing the Nether Brawlers to turn their attention back to the corpse under them. He covered the cut on his hand with a strip of fabric, turning his attention back to the former cultivator captured below.

However, the watchers couldn't forget that scene quite so easily.

"Did that just… happen?" Nie Mingjue asked, mouth gaping open.

Coughing awkwardly, Lan Xichen rushed to say, "It wasn't meant to be anything other than a… reward. Wei-gongzi is just encouraging the puppets to try harder, it wasn't-"

He cut off, a blush rapidly rising across his cheeks. Normally, most of the watchers would never consider Wei Wuxian in such a way. Normally, their tastes either ranged elsewhere, or their affections already lied in someone else. As the first jade of Lan, while not completely ignorant, Lan Xichen was highly sheltered in regards to more sensual acts, and would normally never consider it. However, the blood wouldn't be much of a reward if it wasn't desirable. Every vaguely resentful being in the area knew how much power that blood contained, and, with the extra kick Wei Wuxian's commands have given the feeling, wanted nothing more than to join those lucky puppets and wrap their own tongues around Wei Wuxian's offered appendage.

The simulation had forced that all-encompassing desire in them, and the only way their human souls knew to comprehend it was sexual attraction (not at all helped by the fact that Wei Wuxian was a very beautiful young man, no matter what body he resided in).

And then they'd had to stand back and watch as those impossibly long tongues twisted their way around his finger and sucked in his blood, trembling like the liquid had been-

"Very, very impressive," Jin Guangshan muttered, licking his lips.

"Excuse me?"

Still somewhat dazed by the show he had been given, it took Jin Guangshan a moment to respond, "Just fascinated by the power of demonic cultivation. It has quite a few different uses, doesn't it?"

"Nothing we need to worry about!" Jin Zixuan blurted out, too quickly to care about how discourteous he was being. "The Jin Sect has no reason to lead Wei Wuxian towards demonic cultivation, right?"

There was no reason for Wei Wuxian to have to do that again. There was zero reason for the Jin Sect to want him to. There was even less reason for Wei Wuxian to have to do that in front of Jin Guangshan, specifically.

The blush which had risen up Jin Zixuan's cheeks vanished at once as though washed away by a cold stream.

'You…. What are you implying about your Sect Leader?' he asked himself, looking down. 'Sect Leader? He's your father. Do you honestly think he would do anything like… anything like-'

He couldn't finish, horrified enough by his thoughts.

'A-Die wouldn't do that. Of course he wouldn't. I was just… saying that because of Wen Ruohan. Who knows what the Wen-dogs were thinking.'

Unfortunately for Jin Guangshan, Jin Zixuan was the only one who had a reason to try to convince himself of that.

Quickly realizing that everyone present had become suspicious of where his thoughts had been leading, Jin Guangshan scoffed and turned his gaze on Lan Wangji, mentioning, "I'm far from the only one who thought of it that way. If even the ever-so-honorable twin jades thought it looked-"

"Guangshan!" Madam Jin snapped, standing up completely. "If you finish that sentence, I will gladly leave the simulation just to make you pay. Right now he's even — he's in your son's body!"

'Son's,' Madam Yu noticed, not 'bastard's.'

"That wasn't-"

"Enough," Wen Ruohan ordered.

"...Of course, my apologies," Jin Guangshan smiled, directing the apology at Wen Ruohan, rather than any of the people who had spoken before. Privately, he felt that if the simulation would just include a few women (not counting the terrifying, deformed ghost-girl) then perhaps he wouldn't have felt the need to think of Wei Wuxian that way.

(Meanwhile, Lan Wangji sat tenser than a taught bow, unable to deny what Jin Guangshan had said. After all, as he was watching the puppets clean Wei Wuxian's hand of blood, his mind had indeed twisted in such a way. Even with his Uncle's permission to pursue something with Wei Wuxian, that didn't mean he could think whatever he wanted about someone without their permission, no matter how infuriatingly tempting they-

The second jade bit his lip, taking in deep breaths and reminding himself to wait until he had ~~courted~~ met the real Wei Ying before thinking things like that.)

As the watchers' argument had transpired, Wei Wuxian had examined the corpse. The mark he had seen earlier also appeared on the front side; on the cultivator's chest, there was a long, thin wound. It appeared his cause of death was being stabbed through the heart.

Throughout it all, the corpse continued to struggle as hard as he could. Low growls came out of his throat, and blood the color of ink trickled down from the corners of his lips.

As Nie Huaisang squirmed at the disgusting scene, Wen Qing stepped closer, watching curiously.

Reaching forward, Wei Wuxian pinched his cheeks, forcing the corpse to open his mouth. Inside, he saw the source of the blood: the corpse's tongue had been pulled out from the root.

Quite a few people flinched back in horror, this time.

'Another removed tongue?'* Wei Wuxian thought. 'Blind eyes and detached tongues. Why are these two traits appearing so often?'

If Jiang Fengmian weren't preoccupied with expressing his disapproval to Jin Guangshan, he would have nodded in agreement; it was honestly getting difficult to keep track of all this.

'Come to think of it, this corpse is behaving pretty similarly to how Wen Ning had been when he was controlled by those black nails, huh?' Wei Wuxian thought, frowning slightly as he reached forward to feel around.

Wen Qing nodded frantically, having noticed the same thing herself. Which meant this corpse might be a chance for her to figure out who was responsible for the nails that had been imbedded into her brother.

Before too long, Wei Wuxian found what he had been looking for. Two metal points were inserted into the acupuncture points on the corpse's head, altering him immensely.

Clearing his throat dramatically, the far future Jin Ling's disembodied voice explained, "These nails were used to control high level corpses so that they'd lose consciousness and the ability to think for themselves. Without knowing the corpses identity and character, Wei Wuxian didn't want to take them out, instead choosing to interrogate him first. However, since his tongue was no longer there, even if Wei Wuxian managed to help the corpse regain consciousness, he wouldn't be able to talk."

With every word Jin Ling spoke in a tone halfway between boredom and haughty annoyance, Jiang Yanli became happier and happier. The mystery surrounding her death was still a massive point of concern for everyone in her family, but, whatever went down in the future, it was clear that it helped her A-Ling see that Wei Wuxian was far more than just The Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation.

'Which means it's entirely possible that will happen in our world too. It would be wonderful if A-Xian was allowed to explore whatever he wished in terms of his inventions,' she thought, her eyes drifting to her mother. 'By this point, I doubt even A-Niang would try to stop him.'

A smile bloomed across her face.

Having thought over the problem for a while, Wei Wuxian finally turned to the Lan juniors and asked, "Does anyone here know how to play Inquiry?"

The three real Lans straightened at the question, their full attention immediately zeroing in on the simulated Lan juniors.

Unsurprisingly, the one who raised his hand was Sizhui, who confirmed, "Me. I have."

'Impressive,' Wen Ruohan acknowledged, and saw Wen Qing give an amused huff at the pride she saw in Lan Xichen's warm smile.

"Have you brought your guqin?"

"Yes," Sizhui confirmed, immediately pulling it out of his Qiankun pouch. It was a simplistic guqin, but the wood was bright and the spiritual energy within bold and pure.

Observing the instrument carefully, Wei Wuxian thought, 'Given the state of the wood, it would seem the instrument is fairly new.'

He frowned.

"How proficient is your qin language? Have you had actual experience? Will the spirit you summon be able to lie?"

Excitedly, Lan Jingyi interjected, "Hanguang-jun said that Sizhui's qin language is fine."

Hearing that, Wei Wuxian settled, instantly relaxing.

The sheer deviousness in the grin Nie Huaisang sent Lan Wangji's way sent shivers down the second jade's spine. Normally, he would move closer to his brother in such a situation, seeking to present a united front.

Unfortunately, the look on Lan Xichen's face wasn't much better.

'Well, if Lan Zhan says it's fine, then it's definitely fine. He wouldn't exaggerate or understate Sizhui's skill, so there's no reason to worry,' Wei Wuxian decided, nodding once to himself.

Jin Guangshan raised an eyebrow, finding Wei Wuxian's absolute faith in Hanguang-jun's character to be as surprising as ever. Then again, it was clear that Wei Wuxian possessed some manner of physical attraction towards the second jade, so it was quite likely that was clouding his judgement. Plenty of women had trusted Jin Guangshan far more than they should have, after all; he had plenty of experience with this sort of thing.

Clearing his throat in embarrassment, Lan Sizhui cut off the continued praise Lan Jingyi was giving him to clarify, "Hanguang-jun told me to focus on quality instead of quantity. The spirit I summon will be able to avoid answering, but it will not be able to lie. If it is wiling to answer, it will have to speak the truth."

"Hanguang-jun told him to focus on that?" Nie Mingjue asked, turning a open grin towards Xichen. "It appears your brother's even more involved in teaching than you expected."

Lan Xichen nodded once in agreement, adding, "And it appears he's doing quite well at that."

As he spoke those words, Lan Xichen's gaze had been directed at Wangji, rather than Nie Mingjue. The second jade didn't flush (too drained from the constant embarrassment of the previous segments to manage that), but did turn away, focusing 100% of his attention on the simulation.

"Alright then," Wei Wuxian nodded once. "Let's start."

The guqin was laid across Lan Sizhui's lap, near the corpse's head. As he sat on the ground, the young Lan junior's robes spread out neatly around him, making him truly resemble the teenage version of Lan Wangji. He reached forward and flicked his wrist, practicing a few notes:

Spiritual energy flooded the room, tickling at Wei Wuxian's (and the watchers') senses. Feeling comfortable with the effect, Lan Sizhui looked up at Wei Wuxian and nodded once.

"Alright, first question: who is he?" Wei Wuian asked.

There was a pause.

🎵♪ the spirit responded.

The three present Lans all sucked in a breath of air, their eyes widening noticeably (an especially rare feat, given who the three Lans were).

"What?" Jiang Cheng asked, frowning at their expressions.

Seeing that Lan Sizhui had also widened his eyes at the answer, Lan Jingyi excitedly leaned forward and demanded, "What did he say? What's his name?"

"Song Lan!" Lan Sizhui revealed.

"What?" Jiang Fengmian breathed out. "Xiao Xingchen's-"

'Xiao Xingchen's most intimate friend and fellow cultivator? That Song Lan?' Wei Wuxian realized.

"I guess there was a reason we learned so much about those two," Wen Qing supposed. "The simulation really doesn't waste any time, does it?"

No one could respond, most still too shocked by the revelation to have processed her words.

In unison, everyone (both real and virtual) turned their heads towards the simulated Xiao Xingchen, who lay unconscious on the ground. Tensing up nervously, Lan Sizhui watched Xiao Xingchen carefully as he whispered to the rest:

"Does he know that this corpse is… Song Lan?"

"Probably not," Lan Jingyi responded, also lowering his voice. "He's blind, while Song Lan is mute, and has even become a fierce corpse who lost his sense of reason…. It's best if he doesn't know."

No one could argue with that. Jiang Yanli frowned, an ocean of pity for the man lying on the ground before her.

"Second question then: who killed him?" Wei Wuxian continued, unwilling to waste too much time.

This time, the silence that followed the question was three times longer than before. Then, right when the humans were starting to think the corpse wasn't going to answer at all, the strings of the guqin vibrated three times, their tones echoing grief:

Once again, the Lans jolted at his answer.

“That’s impossible!” Lan Sizhui blurted out, staring down at his own guqin in blatant disbelief despite having personally confirmed that the spirits couldn’t lie to him.

Seeing that Lan Sizhui was too stunned to continue, Wei Wuxian prompted, “What did he say?”

What could be so unbelievable about the person who had killed him?

“He said… Xiao Xingchen.”

“What?” Madam Yu demanded, scoffing once at the absurdity of that. “That can’t be right. The Lan boy must have done something wrong-”

“Everything he did was correct,” Lan Wangji calmly objected, bowing once in apology for having interrupted his senior so rudely, but not truly looking regretful.

But if Sizhui was right-

The juniors voiced their concerns:

“You played it wrong, right?” Jin Ling asked.

“But ‘who are you’ and ‘who killed you’ are two of the easiest and most common questions in inquiry!” Lan Sizhui insisted. “Those are the first two sequences one learns when studying inquiry. One would practice them no less than ten thousand times. I double checked them before I played; I am certain they were correct.”

“Either you played inquiry wrong, or you interpreted his response incorrectly!” Jin Ling insisted.

Lan Qiren just shook his head once, refuting the claim.

And Lan Sizhui shook his head at the exact same time, adding, “If playing them wrong is improbable, then interpreting them wrong is impossible. The characters of ‘Xiao Xingchen’ are extremely rare among spirit’s answers. If I interpreted a different answer wrong, it would not have sounded like that name.”

Seeing the questioning gazes from Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan, Lan Wangji nodded once to confirm Lan Sizhui’s words.

Deflating at the grim possibilities, Lan Jingyi quietly murmured, “Song Lan left the cultivation world to find Xiao Xingchen, and yet Xiao Xingchen killed him. Why would he kill his good friend? He didn’t seem like that kind of person.”

As Lan Jingyi dropped, Wen Ruohan wanted to scoff at the boy’s trust a man he didn’t know. Xiao Xingchen could very well have just been putting on an act, after all. However, a second before he did, he remembered that he had no room to talk on the matter.

His other-self’s death had been the result of a betrayal, after all.

“Let’s not worry about this for now,” Wei Wuxian suggested, patting Lan Jingyi once on the back in support. “Sizhui, for the third question, who is controlling him?”

Adopting a stern face, Lan Sizhui played the question, not daring to so much as breathe while he did.

Every person’s eyes were locked onto the guqin, waiting for Song Lan to answer. The response came slowly, one note at a time, and so Sizhui translated one at a time:

“The. One. Behind. You.”

Everyone swerved to look back at once, laying their eyes on Xiao Xingchen’s sleeping form.

Or at least, what should have been Xiao Xingchen’s sleeping form. Instead, sometime during the discussion they were having with Song Lan, Xiao Xingchen had sat up, leisurely resting his chin on his hand. Giving them a dark smile, he raised his black-gloved left hand and snapped.

The sound waves travelled out, past Wei Wuxian, the juniors, and the watchers, until it reached Song Lan and exploded in power. Song Lan instantly stood up, throwing the mountain-heavy Nether Brawlers off him and unsheathing his sword once more. Before anyone could react, the paper mannequins had been cut to shreds, and the corpse’s sword was resting against Wei Wuxian’s neck, his whisk pointed threateningly at the disciples.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji shouted, standing up at once and cursing the fact that his other-self had chased after the ghost when the most dangerous threat was clearly here.

Wei Wuxian continued forcing himself to breathe steadily, but it was clear that even just swallowing would be enough to cause his throat to make contact with the point of the blade.

Wen Ruohan took a deep breath in and out, watching as Lan Wangji marched forward and stood between Song Lan and Wei Wuxian. For once, the emotions on the Lan heir’s face were easy to read.

Fear. Worry. Guilt. And hate.

Not hate towards a person, necessarily, but hate towards the simulation, which dangled a situation Lan Wangji would give anything to intervene in before him, yet left him unable to act.

The visible emotions vanished a moment later as Lan Wangji forced himself to calm down, but they had been there nonetheless.

(Not that Wen Ruohan didn't understand. The audacity this 'Xiao Xingchen' had to play so helpless before Wei Wuxian and target his good will was as infuriating as it was impressive.)

(And the still-calm expression Wei Wuxian had only made the watchers even more nervous. He had never shown much fear in regards to his own death, after all.)

"Don't move!" Wei Wuxian suddenly snapped, directing the command at Jin Ling, who had been about to unsheath his sword. "Don't make this worse. In terms of swordsmanship, even everyone here combined wouldn't be a worthy opponent to this… Song Lan."

The juniors complied.

'My body right now has almost no spiritual power,' Wei Wuxian thought, his eyes drifting around and making note of the whole situation. 'I don't have a sword, either. Besides, I also have Xiao Xingchen to worry about, and I don't know what he's doing or which side he's on.'

"Why does he sound so calm?!" Jin Zixuan asked, staring at the sword resting by Wei Wuxian's throat with wide eyes. His fiance could only shake her head, having no answer to give.

However, at that moment, Xiao Xingchen stood up (making the watchers and juniors flinch). He waved his hand dismissively at the kids, beckoning them out.

"The adults are going to talk; children can wait outside."

Jiang Yanli honestly didn't know whether or not to be relieved by that. Then again, even if the juniors stayed, they would probably only be liabilities, so perhaps she should just be grateful.

Song Lan moved to drive the children outside, but they hesitantly shuffled along until Wei Wuxian instructed, "Go outside for now. You won't be much help here, anyways. The corpse poisoning powder should have settled already. While you're outside, make sure you don't run around; you'll stir up the dust again. Breathe slowly."

At the words 'you won't be much help,' Jin Ling had shifted as though about to protest, only to cut himself off. There truly wasn't anything he could do, so he had no choice but to storm outside.

Jiang Cheng clenched his fists, far too familiar with that feeling of frustrated helplessness to not relate. And it wasn't as though the juniors were weak; they had more than enough talent for nearly any situation. They might have been able to help, if they had stayed. It simply wasn't fair. If Wei Wuxian wasn't so set on getting glory for 'bravely sacrificing himself-'

Jiang Cheng had slammed his hand into Wei Wuxian's injured chest, demanding 'If that hurts you so much, why did you play the hero back then? Serves you right. This'll teach you better!'

And then the Wens had come, just like Wei Wuxian said.

And then-

'I don't care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die! What's their deaths got to do with us?!'

Jiang Cheng flinched at the memory, hating the mental image of the burning pier that accompanied the words. However, as he did, he was forced to admit something else too.

Even while he was choking Wei Wuxian, the simulated Jiang Cheng had known it wasn't really Wei Wuxian's fault. That the Wen's hadn't attacked just because Wei Wuxian wanted to 'play the hero.'

But still-

Before Jiang Cheng could finish that thought, Wei Wuxian turned to the still-hesitating Lan Sizhui and spoke: "Sizhui, you're the most sensible one here. Lead them for a bit, won't you? Can you do that?"

Lan Sizhui nodded.

"Don't be scared," Wei Wuxian ordered, smiling reassuringly.

Another nod: "I am not."

"Really?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Lan Sizhui smiled, "Really. Senior, you remind me of Hanguang-jun."

"Eh?" Lan Xichen asked, watching as his brother straightened up at the unexpected words.

"Hanguang-jun? How are we alike?"

The puzzlement on Wei Wuxian's face made his thoughts clear. In everything — from clothes to status to reputation — it appeared that they couldn't be more different. The two of them were like fire and ice, and yet Lan Sizhui just grinned in reply, following the others out.

'I can't explain it, either,' the boy mentally continued. 'They just feel similar. It's as though, when either of them are present, I know I don't need to worry about anything.'

Lan Wangji abruptly sucked in a breath of air, feeling his heart pulse at the comment. Although he didn't show anything on his face, the speed at which his heart was beating multiplied with every word. Around him, the group Nie Huaisang and Lan Xichen had formed were squealing quite loudly at the words, but Lan Wangji paid them no mind.

All he could focus on was the simulated Wei Wuxian's still-puzzled expression, and the warm smile Lan Sizhui sent back his way.

A powerful, overwhelming warmth spread across his chest.

The door clicked closed. After ensuring all the juniors had left, Xiao Xingchen took out a red elixir and popped it into his mouth, muttering a quick, sarcastic, "How touching~"

A few seconds after he swallowed, the purplish-red hue on his face cleared.

Raising an eyebrow, Wei Wuxian asked, "An antidote for corpse poisoning powder?"

"Correct! A lot more effective than your scary bowl of congee, right? And it tastes sweet."

"So not even deranged psychopaths can tolerate Wei-xiong's cooking," Nie Huaisang mused.

Frowning at the description of Xiao Xingchen, Jiang Fengmian clenched his hands into fists. He knew well the supposed 'curse' that fell on people who left Baoshan Sanren's mountain (his best friend had gotten caught up in it, after all). All her disciples had been promising individuals, and all had either gone missing or insane once enough time had passed.

(He wondered if 'the Yiling Patriarch' being Cangse's son had been incorporated into the legend as well.)

Part of Jiang Fengmian had hoped that Xiao Xingchen would be able to break that curse. He had already been disappointed enough to learn that Xiao Xingchen had gone missing. Going by the antidote the man had on him (and Song Lan's words), it was entirely possible that Xiao Xingchen had gone insane as well. If that was true-

The Jiang Sect Leader took a calming breath in and out, feeling that the worst was yet to come.

Breathing out as calmly as ever, Wei Wuxian spoke next: "Your performance was wonderful. From courageously killing corpses and tiring out from their attacks, to blocking the sword for Jin Ling and losing consciousness. Were they all for our entertainment?"

Grinning, Xiao Xingchen raised a finger and wagged it in front of his face, correcting, "Not for 'your' general entertainment, but 'your' singular entertainment. I've been looking forward to meeting you — the Yiling Patriarch, that is."

He smirked.

"How — why is everyone so willing to believe that Wei Wuxian came back from the dead! Now…" Madam Yu trailed off, abruptly realizing the danger this posed to her former disciple.

"Oh, no," Jiang Yanli whispered, horrified at the realization that this man had become the second to know after Lan Wangji. Was this blackmail? If he took the information to ~~the future Jiang Cheng~~ the other sects-

“It’s better to see first-hand than to listen to other people’s tales,” Xiao Xingchen continued. Those words were quite similar to Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji’s earlier ones, when they had agreed not to pass judgment on Xiao Xingchen without confirming the full story for themselves.

(But that was just in regards to the literal meaning. With context, the words couldn’t be more different.)

Seeing that Wei Wuxian hadn’t reacted, Xiao Xingchen continued, “I’m guessing that you haven’t told anyone who you really are, right? So I thought ahead and sent those kids away, allowing you to keep your secret while we converse in privacy. How’s that? Aren’t I thoughtful?”

“That’s certainly one way to describe it, Madam Yu huffed, sarcasm dripping off every word like a poisonous sap.

Ignoring that mocking, Wei Wuxian asked, “Are the walking corpses in Yi City under your control?”

“Of course!” the man shamelessly answered. “Right as you guys entered the city, your whistles started, and I began to think that something was a bit weird. I headed over to investigate the matter personally. As I expected, someone who could imbue low level sorcery like The Summoning of Painted Eyes with so much power could only be the founder.”

The absolute glee in the man’s tone told the watchers all they needed to know. This was a demonic cultivator, and one who was skilled enough to have controlled everything in Yi City. Their past experiences told them they needed to be wary of judging him so quickly (Wei Wuxian’s circumstances certainly hadn’t been something any of them could have expected), but the utter delight the man exuded as he described what had occurred unsettled quite a few of them.

Violent, deceiving, and cruel — Xiao Xingchen seemed to be everything Lan Qiren had feared when he first heard about the invention of demonic cultivation.

Knowing that he couldn’t fool someone who knew the demonic path as well as Xiao Xingchen did, Wei Wuxian didn’t bother denying it and instead asked, “So, you took the children hostage. What is it you want me to do for you?”

Xiao Xingchen laughed: “Senior, I want you to do me a small favor.”

Several people raised their eyebrows at the ‘senior’ title, knowing that the rankings didn’t match up. This was not lost on the simulated Wei Wuxian either, and he raised an amused eyebrow at what his mother’s shidi had called him — proving that the future hadn’t somehow caused the standard order of seniority to change.

“Then again, he is the Yiling Patriarch,” Wen Qing supposed. “Could anyone be more senior than the founder of a path?”

Before Wei Wuxian could comment on the phrasing, Xiao Xingchen took out a spirit trapping pouch and placed it onto the table.

"Please," he whispered, desperation filling his tone.

'Don't do it, A-Xian,' Jiang Fengmian mentally requested. 'Whatever Cangse's shidi wants, it can't be good.'

Then again, with the juniors as hostages, Wei Wuxian might not have much choice in the matter.

Wei Wuxian reached over to the pouch and rested his fingers on it for a while, as though he was feeling someone's pulse. After a few seconds, a tense frown formed on his face.

"Whose soul is this?" he asked. "It's already in shambles. Even glue won't stick it together. There's only one breath of life left!"

Remembering their initial fears about the state of Wei Wuxian's soul during his death, several of the watchers flinched. All of them, however, remained keenly aware that Wei Wuxian's soul not having been shattered was far from saying it was alright.

'The world sucks,' Nie Huaisang thought unhappily, scooting closer to his brother's reassuring figure as he did.

And yet Xiao Xingchen appeared unsurprised by Wei Wuxian's words, responding, "If this person's soul was easy to stick together, why would I need your help?"

"You want me to fix this soul?" Wei Wuxian asked, taking his hand away at last. "No offense, but there isn't much of it left in here. This person probably suffered a lot of torture while they were alive-"

A nearly-unnoticeable flinch passed through Xiao Xingchen's body, so slight that only Wei Wuxian and Wen Ruohan managed to notice it. If Hanguang-jun had been here, he most likely would have as well, but the fifteen year old version just barely lacked enough cultivation to do so.

The Wen Sect Leader hummed thoughtfully.

"It was undoubtedly rather painful," Wei Wuxian continued. "They probably committed suicide, so it's unlikely they'll be willing to come back to this world. If the soul itself doesn't have any desire to live, then it'll probably be impossible to save. If I'm not wrong, this soul was probably patched up by force. As soon as it leaves the spirit trapping pouch, it'll dissipate in an instant. You know this better than anyone."

"I don't know and I don't care," Xiao Xingchen snapped back. "Even if you don't want to, you'll have to do me this favor, Senior. Don't forget that your children are still waiting outside for you to come and rescue them from danger."

"Honorless brat!" Madam Jin hissed, infuriated he would use the children as hostages. And beyond that-

“Didn’t Wei Wuxian literally just tell him it was impossible?!” Jiang Cheng demanded. “Who gets told that and goes ‘I don’t care, do it anyways?!’”

“Insane lunatic,” Jin Zixuan agreed. “Wei Wuxian’s still human, you know. You can’t expect him to rewrite the laws of the universe with a snap!”

All of that was true. Even Wei Wuxian’s former sect motto, ‘do what is right, even if it seems impossible’ was a far reach from ‘make literal miracles happen because you’re Wei Wuxian.’

‘But do we have any right to say that?’ Jiang Fengmian wondered. ‘Putting the simulation aside, we’re leaving our lives and sects in A-Xian’s hands right now, and the version out there is only fifteen. Only…’

Fifteen, the same age the simulated Jin Ling was. That was who he was putting all this responsibility on?

Forget their roles as sect leader — not even a farmer would think that was a good idea.

However, Wei Wuxian remained unnervingly unsurprised by Xiao Xingchen’s unreasonable expectations, instead focusing on the way those words had been said:

‘He speaks in a bit of a strange tone, doesn’t he? Affectionate — almost sweet — but with a viciousness that has arisen from nowhere. It seems like he could call me brother or senior one moment, and turn hostile or kill me the next…. Oh, I see.’

“See what?” Jiang Cheng asked, becoming beyond impatient with being constantly left out of the loop of Wei Wuxian’s thoughts.

And that question was answer a moment later, when Wei Wuxian suddenly began to laugh.

“I must agree with you that it’s much nicer to meet someone in person rather than just listening to the tales!” Wei Wuxian exclaimed. “Xue Yang, why are you pretending to be a cultivator instead of the delinquent you truly are?”

“WHAT?!

After a momentary pause, ‘Xiao Xingchen’ reached up and removed the bandages around his head. They fell layer by layer, eventually coming to reveal two bright, shrining eyes.

Undamaged eyes, that couldn’t belong to Xiao Xingchen.

“...Oh.”

“Wait... what?"

The newly-dubbed ‘Xue Yang’ had young, attractive features, making him look almost handsome. The canine teeth that appeared when he smiled were childishly cute to an extent that nearly concealed the untamed cruelty within his eyes. With a careless shrug, Xue Yang tossed the bandages to the side.

"Oh, no," he chuckled. "You found out."

Confirmation. Xue Yang, who had been executed by Jin Guangyao, was there before them. Now, Wei Wuxian's mere existence meant there was a chance Xue Yang had been killed then revived, but given the likelihood of that….

"Is there a traitor in A-Yao's sect?" Lan Xichen asked, clenching his fists nervously. Something as big as this could ruin Jin Guangyao's reputation if it got out. And to save a man as despicable as Xue Yang appeared to be-

"Or perhaps he just failed," Jin Guangshan suggested, feeling defensive of his sect. "I'm sure A-Yao did his best, but mistakes happen. And really, how much can you really expect from the son of-"

"Of someone like you?" Madam Jin snapped, practically seething where she sat. "Considering how well A-Xuan has done throughout his life, I'm sure the boy's parentage wasn't too much of a handicap."

There was a half-second pause, and then Madam Jin realized what she just said. Her eyes widened in a horror that nearly matched her husband's gaping shock. The two of them stared at each other for a moment, unable to speak.

Due to the unfathomable words that Madam Jin had spoken — ones that, for once, didn't blame the women Jin Guangshan had slept with because how could that feel right now when it was her husband who kept saying deplorable things about Wei Wuxian at every turn — complete silence engulfed the room.

Therefore, to the few who were still paying attention, it was quite easy to hear Wei Wuxian's deduction:

"I see," Wei Wuxian hummed, nodding once at Xue Yang in acknowledgement. "Purposefully pretending the pain was so unbearable that our consciences wouldn't allow us to take off your bandages and see; purposefully showing us some of Shuanghua; purposefully making it seem like you'd accidentally blurted out you were a rogue cultivator. You not only knew how to make yourself appear injured and defenseless, but also how to gain the sympathy of others. You truly brought out an image of the genuine, virtuous Xiao Xingchen. If you hadn't revealed that you knew things you shouldn't have, I might have believe you were him."

"I wish it was him!" Nie Huaisang grumbled. "Why do we keep running into scary things, here?"

Whoever that mysterious arm was would pay for dragging them around to these places, Huaisang would make sure of it.

‘Besides,’ Wei Wuxian added. ‘During inquiry, Song Lan’s answer to the second question was ‘Xiao Xingchen,’ but his answer to the third one was ‘the one behind you.’ If ‘the one behind you’ was also Xiao Xingchen, there would have been no reason for him to answer the question so differently. Song Lan wanted to warn us that Xiao Xingchen wasn’t the person with them, but if he’d simply answered Xue Yang, the juniors and I might have remained ignorant. He could only answer as such.’

Gratitude for this ‘Song Lan’ filled Madam Jin, and she thanked the heavens he’d seen it fit to warn them. Even if he hadn’t it was more than likely Wei Wuxian could have gotten everyone out alive, but it was hard to be sure.

Her grandson kept getting involved in insane messes, but there were luckily a few people willing to protect him.

Xue Yang shrugged, then grinned: “Well, it’s true that Xiao Xingchen’s reputation is better than mine. I had to pretend to be him; I’d never have been able to get your trust otherwise.”

Nodding once, the picture of unconcerned, Wei Wuxian complimented, “That was some excellent acting.”

“Now you’re flattering me,” Xue Yang laughed. “I have a very famous friend. His acting is what I’d truly call excellent. I still have a long ways to go.”

Nie Huaisang tilted his head at that explanation, wondering if the specified actor had anything to do with how Xue Yang escaped his supposed execution. You would need to be a truly excellent actor to fool the whole cultivation world.

(Not that he would know anything about that.)

“Anyways, enough with the chit-chat. Senior Wei, you really have to do me this favor.”

“You’re the one who invented those long nails that controlled Wen Ning and Song Lan, aren’t you?” Wei Wuxian asked. “You even managed to restore half the Stygian Tiger Seal, why would you need my help to restore a soul?”

Xue Yang smile faltered as he insisted, “It’s not the same at all. You’re the founder. If you’d never made the first half of the seal, I would never have been able to recreate the second half. There’s no doubt you’re better than me. If there’s something I can’t do, you must be able to do it!”

“...Hold up, what?”

“Is he serious?”

“...I think he is,” Lan Xichen disbelievingly confirmed. They had already seen first hand how illogical Xue Yang’s faith in Wei Wuxian’s abilities were, but for his logic to be ‘the second best can’t do it, therefore you can’ was an entirely different level of delusion.

Jiang Fengmian breathed out sharply through his nose, guilt rising once again.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian was much in agreement: 'I really can't understand why strangers always have an inexplicable sense of confidence in me. Am I supposed to pass a few compliments back out of respect?'

Bringing a hand up to cover his bemused mouth, Wei Wuxian nodded once in return:

"You're too humble."

"I'm not being humble; it's the truth. I never exaggerate when I'm talking. If I say I'm going to end someone's entire clan, then I really will kill each and every one of them. I won't even leave a dog behind!"

"Like the Yueyang Chang clan, for example?"

The sheer smugness in every one of Xue Yang's revolting words sent shivers down Jiang Yanli's spine, and Jin Zixuan moved closer to her, ready to help if she ever needed more support.

(Some part of Jin Zixuan hoped Jiang Yanli would want some help with something just so that he could distract himself from what had just occurred. No one was discussing what his mother had said a short while ago, not even his parents, but it remained on every mind nonetheless.)

"What's wrong? You don't agree?"

"This may surprise you, but I-"

Before Wei Wuxian could finish, a black shadow swept inside. The pair were on their feet in an instant and quickly stepped back from the table, Xue Yang grabbing the Spirit-Trapping Pouch as he did.

"Song Lan?" Nie Mingjue asked, recognizing the intruder.

Resting one hand against the table, Song Lan flipped in the air and landed on top of it. As he steadied, he turned to face the door, black streaks of blood running down his cheeks.

There was a clink of iron. Then, chains trailing across the ground behind him, Wen Ning stepped out of the fog.

"A-Ning," Wen Qing gasped out. Now that she could see Wen Ning and Song Lan standing side by side, their innumerable similarities became even more apparent than before.

(But Song Lan was a corpse whose tongue had been ripped out and whose skull was embedded with nails — the last person her brother should have had any similarities to. She clenched her fists, swearing once again that she would not allow this to happen.)

'It's a good thing I ordered Wen Ning to come over while playing to flute earlier,' Wei Wuxian thought.

“Oh, of course he did. No wonder he seemed so calm,” Madam Yu sighed, wondering why she was still surprised by Wei Wuxian’s foresight.

(‘Because you kept accusing him of ‘not thinking ahead before playing hero,’ remember?’ some part of her brain felt the need to remind her.)

Glancing at Wen Ning calmly, Wei Wuxian ordered, “Fight outside. Be careful to not beat him up too badly. Watch the living people and don’t let any other corpses approach them.”

In answer, Wen Ning swung a chain at Song Lan with the snap of a viper’s attack, forcing the other corpse to defend with his whisk. It collided with the chain, and the two twisted together.

When Wen Ning took a tremendous leap back, Song Lan refused to let go, leading to the latter being dragged out of the room as a result.

Song Lan tried to crush Wen Ning’s skull, but the Ghost General slammed him to the floor first. The two corpses then engaged in battle, creating craters in the dusty ground each time they collided.

If it weren’t for the awkward situation created by his idiotic wife’s thoughtless words, Jin Guangshan would have given an impressed whistle at the scene. As it was, his desire to not attract attention meant he could only silently watch the destruction on display before him.

‘So this is what a battle between two skilled demonic cultivators looks like,’ he thought, watching the still-sitting pair as the corpses reigned destruction down on the general area. ‘No wonder my other self was so desperate to get access to it. Even people who aren’t Wei Wuxian can use it as a powerful weapon.’

If he wanted to gain access to Wei Wuxian before anyone else, Jin Guangshan would need to be the first to act once they left.

By the time the two fierce corpses had gotten outside, the disciples had already found another shop to hide inside. They understood the danger full well, and yet couldn’t help but peak out through the cracks in the walls, stretching out their necks to stare fixedly at the scene.

Seeing an equal amount of fascination on his brother’s face, Nie Huaisang found himself very, very glad the simulation couldn’t touch any of them (including his brother, who somehow thought it was a good idea to march close to the corpses and get a front row seat to their battle). Given who Nie Mingjue was, Nie Huaisang was sure his brother would be fine even if he could be touched, but-

But the future Nie Mingjue was already dead, and Nie Huaisang wasn’t going to forget that anytime soon.

To everyone other than Nie Huaisang, however, it was easy to see why the juniors were so captivated by the sight before them. With the horsetail whisk, the iron chains, and the long sword, the battle had become a frenzy of clanks and clashes, each strike creating a grating sounds whose volume showcased the attack's power. Each move was ruthless, and each attack lethal — only two fierce corpses could fight in such a way. If two humans tried the same, they would soon become nothing more than severed limbs and battered flesh.

Even Wen Ruohan was impressed. He could now understand what Wei Wuxian meant when the boy had described a corpse's inability to feel pain as an advantage. This style of combat (with more focus on power, and less on technique), was clearly extremely effective despite how different it was from everything Wen Ruohan knew. It was no wonder everyone was captivated by the scene.

(Well, almost everyone. From what Wen Ruohan could see, the real Lan Wangji had barely taken his eyes off Wei Wuxian, and continued standing next to him as an ever-faithful guardian.)

Watching the titanic battle, Xue Yang's lips twitched up into a smirk as he asked, "If you had to guess, who do you think is gonna win?"

"Why would I need to guess? Wen Ning, of course," Wei Wuxian responded.

"Really?" Jiang Yanli asked. "But Song Lan seems so powerful-"

A kick from Wen Ning sent Song Lan flying through the air and skidding across the ground. Watching the fight occur, Wei Wuxian's lips twitched up into a smirk.

Although every cell in her body disagreed with the notion of Wen Ning fighting as a corpse, Wen Qing nonetheless couldn't help but find Wei Wuxian's unquestioning faith in her brother comforting.

Then again, perhaps it should be a surprise. Even when Wen Ning was still just human, Wei Wuxian had shown similar belief in his abilities; he had recommended Wen Ning for the archery competition, and hadn't shown even a trace of annoyance despite Wen Ning's failure.

Wei Wuxian had always trusted her brother, and he had responded with unwavering loyalty each time.

Xue Yang sighed: "Yes, you're probably right. It's such a shame. No matter how many nails I put into his head, he was still unwilling to obey me."

Wen Qing twitched.

"Things that are too loyal are also quite troublesome."

She stood up, her chair rattling against the floor as she growled, "You-"

"Wen Ning is not a 'thing,'" Wei Wuxian responded calmly, not showing even a trace of weakness.

Wen Qing froze. ‘Not a thing,’ Wei Wuxian had said. He was the one who had turned her brother into this, but, now, the very fact that had sparked Wen Qing’s hate for him at the beginning of the simulation served as a reassurance instead. Wei Wuxian was the Yiling Patriarch; as she had pointed out time and time again, he would know best.

Just a few days ago, she had been terrified of the fact that, outside of the simulation, the real Wen Ning was spending time with Wei Wuxian. Now, it reassured her more than anything else. Wei Wuxian respected her brother like almost no one else did, and Wen Ning had repaid that time and time again.

In all honesty, Wen Qing couldn’t ask for anything else.

“Not a thing…” Xue Yang repeated with a laugh. “Do you really think so?”

“You don’t?”

“Well, what you said could be interpreted a different way. Saying that he ‘isn’t a thing’ could just as easily be calling him a despicable person-”

Wei Wuxian dropped to the floor, dodging Xue Yang’s attack by a hair’s breadth. He immediately got up and darted to the side, gaining some distance as Xue Yang’s sword resumed its assault.

“What the-”

“Do you often sneak up on people while you’re in the middle of a sentence?” Wei Wuxian asked, easily dancing around Xue Yang’s attacks, his long robes fluttering elegantly with each twist and spin. The cocky grin on his face was both boyish and playful, as though this fight was just a game.

“Of course,” Xue Yang responded, sounding surprised Wei Wuxian had even asked. “I’m a delinquent, aren’t I? I’m sure you’d realized that already. Anyways, it’s not as though I want to kill you. I just want to make it so that you can’t move. Then, I can take you somewhere else.”

‘Fair enough,’ Jin Guangshan thought, feeling that the plan had a surprising amount of merit to it.

“You can take your time repairing the soul for me, then.”

“I already said that I can’t do anything about it,” Wei Wuxian reminded him, twisting behind Xue Yang with a well placed step.

Undeterred, Xue Yang continued, “Don’t be so quick to refuse me. If you don’t know what to do, then the two of us can discuss the matter together.”

“You — what is wrong with him?!” Jiang Cheng demanded. “If he’s willing to do all this, then surely there are easier methods! Why is he so convinced that Wei Wuxian is the only one who can possibly help him?!”

“Wei Ying’s reputation has gotten out of control,” Lan Wangji agreed. “They all have complete faith that he can do the impossible, but none of them believe he would every try to do anything righteous.”

No one could disagree with that.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian continued slipping out of Xue Yang’s grasp, the latter’s blade always just barely missing its target. Wei Wuxian dodged again and again, springing over the countless slips of paper that littered the ground.

‘The little delinquent has some good moves,’ Wei Wuxian admitted, hopping onto a table to leap over Xue Yang’s next attack and land behind him, keeping himself from getting cornered. The next attack from Xue Yang struck out at once, creating a small tear on the edge of Wei Wuxian’s robes.

For durable but flexible fabric to get cut like that, Xue Yang’s sword would need to be moving too fast for it to keep up. Although she had very little experience with combat, Jiang Yanli did at least know that much.

Which made the battle all the more nerve-wracking for her to watch.

Seeing Xue Yang’s attacks become even more lethal and breathtakingly fast, Wei Wuxian exclaimed, “Are you taking advantage of my body’s low spiritual power?”

“Of course!” Xue Yang answered.

Both Wei Wuxian and the watchers faltered, shocked to meet someone more shameless than even the Yiling Patriarch.

Twisting out of the way of yet another attack, Wei Wuxian returned Xue Yang’s smile and said, “It’s better to upset a hero than a rogue, which is you, in this case. I’m not interested in dealing with you any longer. Let’s have someone else.”

“Who else?” Xue Yang laughed. “Hanguang-jun? While he was out there, I got more than three hundred walking corpses to gang up on him! And I sent even more after him later.”

Lan Xichen sucked in a breath as if he’d just been punched, and Lan Wangji straightened further. Now, he finally knew why his other self was taking so long to find the one spirit.

And because of that, Wei Wuxian had been isolated with Xue Yang.

The maniac grinned, “It’s just us right now! We won’t need to worry about him for quite a while. Now he-”

Before he finished his sentence, a white robed figure dropped down from the sky, and Bichen’s icy-blue gleam cut forward through the air. Then, surrounded by an ambience of frost and ice, the white figure paused before Wei Wuxian.

The hiding juniors reacted the exact same way.

Jin Zixuan blushed at their parallel responses. Even knowing that most of those juniors were older than him, the fact that they came from a later generation made them seem much younger than they actually were.

Shuanghua collided with Bichen, just barely managing to fend of Lan Wangji's attack. The two blades ricocheted off each other, then flew back to their respective owners.

"Would this be 'to come on time is better than to come early?'" Wei Wuxian asked. Lan Wangji nodded once in answer.

The second their short exchange finished, Lan Wangji turned his attention on Xue Yang.

The battle began a moment later.

Unlike Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation, Lan Wangji's spiritual cultivation was a package ready for use at any time. His tools were always easily carried on him, and his power never fluctuated depending on the surroundings. Where a demonic cultivators' capabilities could alter through a huge range depending on how much time they'd had to prepare, Lan Wangji was always ready to fight.

Therefore, Wei Wuxian could comfortably step back and allow Hanguang-jun to take over the fight. Going by how much Xue Yang was already being pushed back, Wei Wuxian knew the demonic cultivator's spiritual cultivation was far less than Hanguang-jun's. Right now, Wei Wuxian would be better utilized elsewhere.

Right as he was about to leave, he saw Xue Yang reach into his sleeve and froze.

'Corpse poisoning powder?'

Lan Qiren tensed.

But that wasn't it at all. Instead, Xue Yang unsheathed another blade, and seamlessly adjusted to a dual-wielding fighting style instead.

"...The pinnacle of unorthodox," Lan Qiren mumbled, instinctively disagreeing with it (even if watching Wei Wuxian's experiences had shown him that such a concept wasn't inherently bad).

Despite adding the second sword, Xue Yang didn't falter at all. The new blade was grim and dark, seemingly emitting a black aura as it was wielded which stood in direct contrast to Shuanghua's blinding white. Using both swords equally well, Xue Yang's hands kept in perfect time with each other. He gained the upper hand at once.

As Lan Wangji leapt back, dodging an especially fierce attack, he frowned and questioned, "Jiangzai?"

There was a laugh: "Hmm? Hanguang-jun, you know of this sword? What an honor!"

Huffing once in disgust, Nie Mingjue wondered, “Why am I not surprised that’s his sword.”

And the meaning behind his words was clear. Like its name and its owner, Jiangzai was an ominous sword that carried with it the stench of bloodshed. It fit someone like Xue Yang perfectly.

If it weren’t for the fact that Lan Xichen had absolute confidence in Hanguang-jun’s combat prowess, he might have gone against every teaching he’d ever received and cursed Xue Yang’s line for generations.

Jiangzai shot forward, and Hanguang-jun jumped away yet again. This time, however, the tip of his hair was nearly grazed by the blade — closer than Xue Yang had ever gotten before.

“Hanguang-jun,” Wei Wuxian called out, but-

“Step back. You’re not needed here,” Lan Wangji instructed him, continuing the fight. Wei Wuxian had been about to leave before Xue Yang unsheathed Jiangzai anyways, so he humbly stepped back upon Hanguang-jun’s request.

Outside, an expressionless Wen Ning was gripping Song Lan by the neck, lifting him into the air and slamming him against the wall repeatedly (creating a man-shaped dent). The action continued, Wen Ning drawing his captive back only to crush him against the wood over and over and over again.

“...A-Ning?” Wen Qing asked, not recognizing the man before her. She wasn’t scared — she could never be scared of Wen Ning — but the violence was so opposed to everything she knew about her brother that she couldn’t help but gape at it.

Nie Mingjue had to agree. Although Huaisang was a very different person than Wen Ning was, they shared their general aversion to violence despite being members of cultivation clans. If it was somehow revealed to Nie Mingjue that his brother was actually a ruthless, terrifying monster, he would undoubtedly react the exact same way.

Luckily, there was no chance of that happening.

However, Song Lan wasn’t defeated yet. Just as expressionlessly as Wen Ning, the former rogue cultivator grabbed onto Wen Ning’s wrists and, with a backflip, threw him onto the ground. Both corpse’s fought expressionlessly, ceaselessly smashing and banging.

‘Since neither of them can feel pain, they’ll continue fighting even if one of them loses a limb or two,’ Wei Wuxian thought, watching the battle with an expression that could only be described as bemusement. ‘Unless they get cut to pieces, nothing will stop them.’

And yet, his faith in Wen Ning never wavered. It was that alone that allowed Wen Qing to relax her hands from the tense position they had been in. If Wei Wuxian trusted him, then she would as well.

'I guess I'm not needed here, either,' Wei Wuxian supposed, turning again to look at the juniors. Lan Jingyi was frantically waving at him from inside a dimly lit shop, doing everything he could to silently attract Wei Wuxian's attention.

"He's definitely needed there," Lan Xichen laughed, finding the relief on Lan Jingyi's face upon seeing Wei Wuxian adorable.

Right as Wei Wuxian left, an explosion of spiritual energy burst out of Hanguang-jun's body from behind him, making Wangji's blade light up like the moon.

Xue Yang tensed instantly: 'He was holding back? I-'

Before he could finish that thought, Lan Wangji shot forward, Bichen knocking Shuanghua out of Xue Yang's grip. The blade flew through the air for a moment before Hanguang-jun caught it.

The next attack Xue Yang let out was even more vicious than all the others combined, and it was aimed at the arm that held Shuanghua. As the attack was dodged, a chilling rage flashed in Xue Yang's eyes.

"Give me the sword back," he ordered.

Undeterred, Lan Wangji calmly responded, "You do not deserve this sword."

A choking, bitter laugh escaped Xue Yang, the look in his eyes turning crazed with hate.

Nie Huaisang gave a long, low whistle.

"I take it back, Wangji-xiong. You're still as scary as ever."

On the other hand, as relaxed as he always was, Wei Wuxian walked over to the disciples.

"Everyone alright?" he asked.

"Yes!"

"We all listened and held our breaths."

Wei Wuxian nodded, "Good. If anyone doesn't listen to me, I'll feed him congee again."

The undeniable flinches each junior who had tried to congee exhibited were far more telling than they had any right to be. Once again, quite a few of the watchers found their morbid curiosity piqued.

Wei Wuxian gathered the juniors together again and quickly did a headcount. Luckily for everyone involved, each junior was present and accounted for. Right as Wei Wuxian was about to direct them to a farther location, he heard a rumbling sound in the distance and froze.

“What’s that sound?” Jin Ling asked, swerving to face the source. In the distance — barely visible through the endlessly-thickening fog — was yet another squadron of corpses.

(And Song Lan had already destroyed all of Wei Wuxian’s mannequins.)

“Are you kidding me?!” Jin Zixuan asked. “We literally just got rid of the last swarm.”

“They seem endless,” Lan Xichen agreed.

Frowning, Lan Wangji commented, “Xue Yang must have summoned more while Wei Ying was distracted.”

“These are… walking corpses?’ Jin Ling realized.

“Gah! How can there be so many of them?”

“Is this an army?”

The juniors stepped back, shuffling away from the direction Wei Wuxian wanted them to go in. Then, sending Bichen hurling forward to continue the fight alone, Hanguang-jun pulled out his guqin and flicked his wrist across the strings.

The walking corpses’ heads were crushed and their bodies were sent flying through the air. Lan Wangji returned to his fight with Xue Yang a moment later as though he’d never faltered at all.

And the real Lan Wangji watched on in awe. For all his skill with the guqin, he could tell at a glance that what Hanguang-jun had just done was far beyond his capabilities.

But it would be possible for him one day.

And, with that realization, came a sudden urge to practice — to try — to find a way to make his technique even remotely resemble the skill he saw before him. It was exceedingly rare for Lan Wangji to meet someone more skilled than him in anything, musical cultivation most of all.

Now that he had seen it, he found his drive to grow spurred on like never before.

Xue Yang was soon pushed back, unable to gain an advantage over Lan Wangji even though Hanguang-jun had been fighting a battle on two fronts just a second before.

“He’s amazing,” Jin Ling couldn’t help but blurt out.

There was a shuffle of papers, and then Lan Jingyi (the one from the far future, putting together the simulation) suddenly exclaimed, “Ooh! This seems fun! I want to read this one.”

“Jingyi-”

A groan from Jin Ling and Lan Sizhui’s no doubt reasonable protest was cut off as Lan Jingyi cleared his throat and began, “Jin Ling had seen Sect Leader Jiang and Jin Guangyao go on night hunts and kill beasts, leading him to believe his two uncles were the two most powerful cultivators in the world. Toward Hanguang-jun, however, he’d always felt more fear than respect, especially towards his awesome ability to silence others and his admirable cold temper-”

“I don’t think ‘awesome’ or ‘admirable’ are in the script,” Ouyang Zizhen pointed out.

“Well, they should have been!”

“I told you we should have read through the script before recording,” Jin Ling grumbled, sounded quite tired.

“No need!” Lan Jingyi insisted. “So Jin Ling had always been irrationally scared of Hanguang-jun. However, right now, had no choice but to admire Hanguang-jun’s abilities!”

A warm flush dusted Lan Wangji’s ears.

And the simulated Lan Jingyi approved: “Of course he’s good; that should be obvious! He just never likes to show it off. He’s very low-key, right?”

That blush got darker.

The ‘right’ had quite clearly been directed at Wei Wuxian, who tilted his head and asked, “You’re asking me? Why are you asking me?”

“The kids can sense what’s between you,” Madam Jin proudly declared, making Lan Wangji flush darker than ever. However, as she was his senior, rather than his peer, he couldn’t even glare at her for the comment. Lan Xichen gave a tiny cheer.

Seeing that Wei Wuxian clearly didn’t know why he’d been asked, Lan Jingyi gave an angry stomp and demanded, “Are you trying to say that you don’t think Hanguang-jun is strong?”

After thinking it over for a moment, Wei Wuxian touched his chin with a smile and admitted, “Yeah, he’s strong.”

“He’s super strong!” an excited Lan Jingyi agreed.

“Of course he’s good,” Wei Wuxian nodded again, then broke into a heartbreakingly soft smile to whisper, “He’s the best.”

Everything around Lan Wangji might as well have turned to dust in that instant for all the attention he was paying to it. The laughter of the watchers, the grins of the simulated juniors, the battle in the distance, and the annoyed huff the real Jiang Cheng gave were all nothing more than washed-out background noise. All he could focus on was Wei Wuxian.

‘Wei Ying,’ he thought, watching that warm smile until his heart felt like it melted into goo. ‘Wei Ying.’

They might not have officially met yet, but Lan Wangji would stop at nothing to get to know Wei Wuxian once he returned to the real world.

‘We need to move quickly,’ Wei Wuxian thought, shaking himself out of the dazed state his previous thoughts had left him in. ‘Soon, it will be dawn, and when that happens the fog will become thicker than ever. It would be fine if it were only me and Lan Zhan, but with the juniors here too… I can’t promise nothing will happen.’

“Who even brought those kids here?” Madam Yu huffed, not having forgotten the cat story all the juniors told.

As Wei Wuxian tried to think of a solution, there came a series of taps from behind him. They were the pats of the bamboo pole; the ghost girl was back.

Without any hesitation, Wei Wuxian straightened up at once and ordered “Let’s go!”

He took off after the bamboo pole, and the confused juniors began following behind. A moment later, the world shifted, and everything faded to black.

Soon, the light returned, easily illuminating the still-flaming ears on Lan Wangji’s face as he tried (and failed) to stop thinking about how Wei Wuxian had looked while whispering ‘he’s the best.’

Unfortunately for him, not every watcher was willing to pretend they didn’t see it.

“My, are you already this enamoured?” Madam Jin asked, making even the ever-unflappable Lan Wangji flinch at the accuracy. If it was anyone other than his mother speaking, Jin Zixuan would have offered his fellow embarrassed romantic a helping hand; as it was, however, the Lan heir was on his own.

“...No,” Lan Wangji finally answered, but, despite the perfectly even tone, not a single person believed him.

(And what kind of friend would Nie Huaisang be if he didn’t immediately capitalize on such weakness?)

“How can you say that Wangji-xiong!” he cried out, gasping in shock and covering his mouth with one hand. “And to think, after all this time… what will the kids say?!”

“The kids?” Lan Xichen asked.

“Of course! The little juniors. I know some of them will only exist in the future timeline, but we’ve already gotten it confirmed that A-Ling, Sizhui, Jingyi, and Zizhen are going to be born! Wangji-xiong, you know my Da-ge. He’s never going to get married!”

“What? How am I part of this-”

“If you and Wei-xiong don’t get together, then-then Wangji-xiong,” Huaisang sniffed. “I won’t be an uncle anymore!”

“You are not an uncle,” Lan Wangji bit out, doing his upmost to avoid giving Nie Huaisang the reaction the boy was looking for. So long as Lan Wangji managed to remain calm, the vultures would eventually lose interest and move onto new prey.

(He hoped.)

Those hopes were immediately dashed when, in the biggest betrayal of all, Lan Qiren commented, “You should at least speak to Wei-gongzi before giving the children up, Wangji. I quite like the idea of being Sizhui’s grand uncle.”

“Wha — I-”

“Definitely!” Jiang Yanli jumped on, sharing a conniving grin with Lan Xichen. “After all, it simply wouldn’t be fair for A-Ling to lose his Shishu without ever getting to meet him.”

Wei Wuxian was Jiang Yanli’s martial brother, so, if Lan Wangji married him, he would actually be Jin Ling’s Shishu.

If they married.

Married.

Jin Zixuan jumped slightly as Lan Wangji swerved to face him, the dangerous glare in his eyes quite clearly saying ‘stop your fiance or I will eviscerate you when we get back to focusing on your relationship instead of mine.’

The Jin heir gave a nervous laugh.

Watching it all, Jin Guangshan felt a smile form on his face. Just a short while ago, he had considered to pros and cons of attempting to baby trap Wei Wuxian by forcing a child on him. However, as it turned out, that wasn’t even necessary. Both the real Lan Wangji and the virtual Wei Wuxian had grown attached to the juniors in only a few hours; all Jin Guangshan would need to do would be to find an orphaned child in the Jin Clan and put them in danger around Wei Wuxian.

Well, so long as he maintained his alliance with Wen Ruohan, this would all turn out to be far easier than he’d feared.

“While we’re on the subject of A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian spoke up. “Have we considered offering him more assistance? The real one, that is. I’m concerned.”

“Assistance?” Lan Xichen inquired.

Nie Mingjue frowned, “You want to tell him more? What could we tell him now that we can’t tell him later? Won’t it be easier to explain it all at once after we’ve left the simulation?”

“Yes,” Nie Huaisang added with a too-sharp grin. “Why does it matter when you find something out so long as you eventually learn it? It’s not as though there are any secrets certain people might keep that could have saved their own lives if they’d just told someone a little sooner, rather than continuing to train using a faulty method that led to them dying young.”

Nie Mingjue jerked back as if shot by an arrow, and fell silent once more.

“And what do you expect to tell him?” Wen Ruohan asked, frowning minutely. “That Mo Xuanyu is his future-self? That he becomes the Yiling Patriarch and invents demonic cultivation?”

“Perhaps,” Jiang Fengmian agreed. “Too many half-truths and lies may cause unforeseeable problems later.”

“And yet the truth can cause quite a number of foreseeable problems in the near future,” Wen Ruohan countered. “Based on his reports, I’m assuming members of the gentry are already turning against him. Whether that is due to the fact that he has the most information on the simulation or because he gained control of Yunmeng Jiang is irrelevant; if you reveal something like that, you’ll only give the opposition ammunition to use against him.”

Lan Qiren frowned, “Our sect’s wouldn’t-”

“Wei Wuxian initially died in a siege your sects led against him,” Wen Ruohan pointed out. “Are you really going to risk destroying such a unique mind for no reason?”

After thinking it over for a moment, Lan Xichen pointed out, “I understand the concern that people would turn against him, especially after how we initially reacted, but I don’t see why they would know. So long as we only tell Wei-gongzi, it should be… fine.”

“Should be,” Wen Ruohan agreed, showing quite clearly how little faith he had in that assurance.

“I must apologize, but I’m afraid I have to say that I don’t think the current Jin representatives would react well to that information,” Jin Guangshan pointed out, quite firmly cementing himself on Wen Ruohan’s side. “A-Xun, in particular, tends to err more on the side of caution with such things.”

‘A-Xun,’ Madam Jin mentally repeated, still reluctant to speak up after the disaster that was her earlier thoughtless words. ‘I suppose Jin ZIxun would indeed react poorly if he thought he had a way to get one over Wei Wuxian. Especially if the Yunmeng Jiang sect is doing better under Wei-gongzi than the Jin Sect is under him. And given that that’s undoubtedly the case, the ‘son of a servant’ having a weakness such as this….’

So now it was just a question of whether they could offer help to Wei Wuxian without letting everyone else find out about Wei Wuxian’s future. If they were all outside the simulation, they could regulate other people’s decisions through their power as the leaders of the great sects. As it was, however….

“I’m sure, so long as we tell A-Xian to keep it a secret, he will,” Jiang Fengmian insisted. “I understand that we could tell him later, but I can’t, in good conscience, leave A-Xian to continue doing my job for me without any assistance.”

After thinking it over for a moment, Madam Yu nodded once and said, “I agree. The brat is capable of quite a bit, but helping him couldn’t hurt.”

“Yeah!” Jin Zixuan spoke up. “I’d rather… not be like Xue Yang. We just need something we can tell Wei Wuxian that would help him.”

Something that wasn’t Yunmeng Jiang telling Wei Wuxian’ their sect’s secrets in front of all the other clans, went unsaid.

“And what about when the other Clans ask Wei Wuxian for information about Mo Xuanyu?” Jin Guangshan asked. “For now, he can honestly say ‘I don’t know.’ If it’s revealed later that he was hiding the fact that it’s himself, I have no doubt many of our sects would be quite furious.”

Lan Xichen frowned at that, unable to discount the point.

Wen Ruohan thought for a moment. Normally, he would have no problem with the information being revealed, even with the reasons he had already mentioned. After all, Wei Wuxian was currently Yunmeng Jiang’s representative. No matter what happened, he would probably be fine.

Unfortunately, after watching the simulation, Sect Leader Wen’s trust and faith in the Yunmeng Jiang Sect had reached rock bottom.

‘They didn’t even try to prepare for my attack,’ Wen Ruohan thought. ‘Wei Wuxian had helped the other sects escape the Xuanwu cave several months before my army came, and yet Yunmeng Jiang hadn’t done a single thing to prepare. The only one who’d even suggested they should prepare was Wei Wuxian, who was all but imprisoned on the pier at the time. I predicted they wouldn’t, of course — that’s half the reason my other self attacked, but doesn’t that just make this worse? If something happens that causes the information to be revealed to the Jins. A-Xu doesn’t have enough information to defend Wei Wuxian’s case. If we let things go on too long before we tell everyone the full truth, Wei Wuxian’s reputation will take a hard hit.’

At the beginning of the simulation, Wen Ruohan had found all the rumors surrounding Wei Wuxian to be an amusing parallel between the boy and himself. However, now that he knew just how wrong most of the rumors were (as well as the consequences they had), he couldn’t view them the same way.

“...We will not tell Wei Wuxian who Mo Xuanyu is, nor will we tell him who invented demonic cultivation,” Wen Ruohan decided, speaking the words as an order, rather than a suggestion. “However, so long as I can trust you to not do that, there may still be a way for you to help.”

His eyes transition to his useless second son, who was a distracted lump sitting on the floor. As annoying as the boy was, perhaps Wen Ruohan would finally be able to put him to use. Then, he turned his attention to the array etched into the floor, and glanced back at Jiang Fengmian.

Sect Leader Jiang's eyes widened in understanding.

Jiang Fengmian hesitated, obviously wary of what Wen Ruohan had in mind, but paused when his son and daughter walked close to him to whisper something. The other watchers were no doubt unable to hear, but Wen Ruohan's superior senses meant the words were just loud enough for him to make out.

"A-Die," Jiang Wanyin whispered. "...A-Jie and I were talking. We-we think we should try."

Jiang Yanli nodded, "I'd like to help A-Xian, if we can. I know the simulation hasn't happened to him, but I still feel as though he needs a break. He also sounded a little tired last time he called, so…."

'It's the least we can do,' was no doubt the end to that statement. It was quite interesting to hear that from the Jiangs, who, as far as Wen Ruohan had seen, loved to hold the debt Wei Wuxian supposedly owed them over the boy's head. Then again, perhaps that was just Madam Yu.

(Who, despite being close enough to have heard her children, made no move to interfere.)

"Are you sure?" Jiang Fengmian whispered.

Jiang Cheng clenched his fists, looking toward the ground.

'Ah,' Wen Ruohan realized. 'So the boy is finally accepting that Wanyin's future self is indeed out to torture Wei Wuxian, and has hunted down similar people for years. I suppose 'better late than never' is the phrase to use, here.'

No matter. If that guilt was what it took to get Wen Ruohan what he wanted, then he would gladly accept it.

Jiang Fengmian looked up at him, then nodded once.

Wei Wuxian groaned, stretching his arms over his head as he leaned back in his seat. Serving as Yunmeng Jiang's acting sect leader was far from an easy task, and it left him with almost no time to work on the simulation. So, as a compromise, Wei Wuxian had (of course) cut down on the hours he slept instead.

Finished with his stretching, Wei Wuxian forced himself to turn his eyes back on the paperwork before him. He stared for several seconds, but exhaustion had turned his brain into glue, and each neuron was fighting an uphill battle to get from one place to another. The characters before him began to blend together, until Wei Wuxian wasn't sure whether he was looking at one of the budget reviews, or another report of a night hunt gone awry.

“Da-shixiong! Da-shixiong!” someone shouted from the hallway.

“Over here!” Wei Wuxian called out, rubbing his drooping eyes and slapping his own face a few times to wake himself up. “What is it? Is Wen Ning finally ready to join me in the Fabulous Kite-Painting Competition I challenged him to?”

Wei Wuxian was on his feet in an instant.

He tore through the hallway, not even waiting for the disciple to finish his report (forcing said disciple to run after him while shouting the update on the way). Within a minute he had arrived at the medical bay.

Without waiting for permission from the healers inside, he threw open the door.

“Changze?” a voice asked, sounding mystified, yet hoarse and dry.

Wei Wuxian looked down, quickly realizing that he was still wearing his father’s old robes (left over from a meeting he had with the Nie representative earlier that day), until his brain caught up with him and he realized who had spoken.

“You… you’re…” he blinked several times, half certain he was hallucinating from lack of sleep. “Uncle… Jiang?”

“Oh, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian smiled, shaking himself further awake from the deep sleep the simulation had put him in. “I’m back.”

“I… you-”

It was rare to find Wei Wuxian this speechless. He blamed the lack of sleep, but he supposed Jiang Fengmian returning to the outside world was a good enough reason too.

Jiang Fengmian sat up from the medical bed he was resting on and turned to face him, giving a warm smile. It wasn’t Wei Changze, but it was Wei Wuxian, and Jiang Fengmian knew he would never be able to pay back the unending loyalty Wei Wuxian’s other self had given him.

He patted Wei Wuxian on the head twice, making the boy freeze. Jiang Fengmian would normally have never shown physical affection, too wary of accidentally offending Madam Yu and getting into another needless argument. Now, however, he was sure she would understand.

“You’ve done well, A-Xian,” he whispered.

Quite some ways away, in the fortress of Qishan, Wen Chao snapped awake from the simulation, full of new instructions to give Wen Xu, and leaving behind a very grateful Lan Wangji (who was elated he would no longer have to stay with both Wen Chao and Jin Guangshan when the concealment zone activated).

Chapter End Notes

Does anyone else ever forget how scarily powerful Wei Wuxian is in the book? Even in Mo Xuanyu's "weaker" body, he's clearly far more physically capable than the juniors! Either Mo Xuanyu was stronger than we thought, or Wei Wuxian's reactions are just so good that he can still manage to play with them them. And that's essentially his only weakness!

(Oh, and no need to worry. I'm far from done with JFM's character arc. He still has more to learn!)

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Sect leader Jiang," Jiang Fengmian's third disciple called out. "Training's going to start soon, but Da-shixiong hasn't gotten out of his room yet. Should I go wake him up?"

"No need," the man responded, giving a warm smile. "He often enjoys sleeping in and staying up late, doesn't he?"

"Er-yes. He just — recently, he…" the disciple trailed off awkwardly, allowing Jiang Fengmian to fill in the rest himself. 'Recently,' Jiang Fengmian had been gone, so it was Wei Wuxian's job to run all of Lotus Pier. 'Recently,' he had been forced to take on far more responsibility than he should have been expected to, just like in the simulation. Which was why Jiang Fengmian was there now-

'By leaving your actual children behind? They may have agreed that they wanted you to help A-Xian, but that doesn't mean they won't feel abandoned.'

All this time, they had constantly accused Jiang Fengmian of valuing Wei Wuxian over them. He had always been certain that it wasn't true, but had he just proved them right?

(He didn't think so, but that had been the first thing Wei Wuxian had worried about when Jiang Fengmian had explained why he was out. 'What about Jiang Cheng or Shijie?' the boy had asked. 'What if they need you?')

Yu Ziyuan was there with them-

(And since when had that ever been a good thing?)

But she was changing.

(Was she?)

(Hopefully.)

Jiang Fengmian bit the inside of his cheek to keep himself from sighing. As per usual, his thoughts were running in circles without getting anywhere. Every option before him seemed like a wrong choice, and Jiang Fengmian's instinctive response was to simply do nothing — to wait until there was a more obvious solution.

But if there was one thing the simulation had taught him, it was how bad of an idea that was. It was one of the main reasons why the Massacre of Lotus Pier had happened, after all.

Forcefully suppressing the discomfort he felt, Jiang Fengmian journeyed to the open training grounds, greeting every disciple he passed with an encouraging smile (which he hoped they didn't realize was a lie). Although every part of him was overwhelmed by shame for feeling this way, he couldn't help but be certain of one thing:

In a situation like this, the best thing would be to figure out what Wei Wuxian would do.

(What a fifteen year old child would do?)

He didn't stay fifteen forever. Jiang Fengmian had already seen him at twenty two.

'Because that's so much better,' a voice that sounded quite a lot like Yu Ziyuan's snapped. 'No matter how smart the boy may be, he died even younger than us. Can't you come to a decision on your own?'

The answer to that was a humiliating, resounding 'no.'

Besides, there was plenty of good that could come from this. If the simulated Jiang Fengmian had just listened to Wei Wuxian's warning and prepared for the coming Wens, Yunmeng would never have been destroyed, and Wei Wuxian would never have been forced into demonic cultivation. The question of whether demonic cultivation was actually evil and corruptive was a moot point; what mattered was that it alienated Wei Wuxian from the rest of the world, and had only happened because Jiang Fengmian had failed to protect him.

'And A-Cheng,' a scolding voice reminded. 'You also failed to protect him. And what about A-Li? Don't focus all your attention on one kid.'

How did Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji make raising a large group of kids look so easy? The pair had only been with those future juniors for a few hours, and their relationship had already been better than Jiang Fengmian's was with any of the children under his care. It was true that Jiang Fengmian had relatively good relations with his other disciples, but even they were all aware of how tense the relationship between their Sect Leaders was. Whenever Madam Yu returned to the sect, their shouts could be heard across the city (to say nothing of the punishments she would often dish out when annoyed). And Jiang Fengmian, despite being sect leader, had just let it happen. And that wasn't even considering the mess that was his immediate family.

(How would Jiang Cheng feel, back in the simulation? Did he think he was being abandoned? Was he being abandoned? And what about A-Li? Would she simply worry for her brother, not caring how she felt because she had long since adjusted to not feeling like her own opinion mattered?)

"Sect Leader, are you sure you're okay to start up again?" one disciple he passed asked, worry clear on his face. "I-I can take over if you need-"

"Thank you, but it's fine," Jiang Fengmian responded. "Have the disciples finished warming up?"

"Yes, Sect Leader."

“Then let’s pair up,” he said to the group as a whole, raising his voice accordingly. “Go through the first five repetitions twenty times each with each other. The upper disciples and I will give assistance where needed.”

“Yes!” the disciples responded. Despite that, his highest ranking disciples paused before walking off, question clear in their gazes:

‘Are you sure you’re alright, Sect Leader?’

Of course he was; leading a sect was the easy part. The hard part was, ironically, qualifying as at least a decent parent. He took a deep breath in, returning his attention to the present for the time being.

“How many new recruits do we have?” Jiang Fengmian asked his third disciple, noticing the plethora of unfamiliar faces.

After counting on his fingers for a moment, the disciple gleefully responded, “Two to three hundred, Sect Leader.”

“Of an appropriate age for cultivation?”

“A few that are a bit old, but the ones that are were checked out by Da-shixiong personally; we’re sure they have potential. Recently we’ve actually had to start refusing even the qualified newcomers. We don’t have enough space or money to take them all, even with the increased trade here,” he reported with a grin, then thought for a moment and added, “Oh, though Da-shixiong did bring in one new one even after that.”

“Really?” Jiang Fengmian asked. “Were they unusually talented?”

“No sir. They weren’t even old enough to start training yet.”

An confused expression crossed Jiang Fengmian’s face, but his disciple could only shrug, equally perplexed.

“I’m not entirely sure why, sorry Sect Leader. Da-shixiong just went around one day with a kid no one had ever seen before and told us that he would be staying. He should be in the library right now.”

“And what is that boy’s name?” Jiang Fengmian required.

“It was Lu… no, no,” he thought for a moment. “Ah, Mo! It was ‘Mo Xuanyu.’”

The stunned double-take Jiang Fengmian did at those words made the third disciple flinch, and he bowed at once toward his sect leader, apologizing for distressing the man.

“Should I… get Da-shixiong?” the boy asked. “I-I’m sure he can explain-”

“No, it’s… there’s no need,” Jiang Fengmian responded. “You’re certain that boy’s name is Mo Xuanyu?”

“Yes, sir.”

‘Jin-xiong’s son,’ Sect Leader Jiang recalled, frowning at the horrible conditions he could remember the boy in the simulation living in. ‘And, as far as A-Xian knows, the person who created the Píngxíng Gateway.’

Although he didn’t have any real objections to Mo Xuanyu’s presence, it was quite clear that Wei Wuxian’s decision had been founded upon the lie the Yiling Patriarch told him. He must have become curious about the man who had (supposedly) created the simulation, leading him to seek out Mo Xuanyu's younger-self. An urge came over Jiang Fengmian to explain at once, the falsities between him and his head disciple scratching maddeningly at his mind.

But Wen Chao had woken up as well.

‘It’s just insurance,’ Wen Ruohan had said. ‘Chao-er will be there to ensure those of us inside will be alerted should something go wrong. After all, if word of who Wei Wuxian becomes gets released, we’ll need to be able to respond as soon as possible.’

‘I can handle it myself,’ Jiang Fengmian objected, not liking the idea of Wen Chao watching Wei Wuxian so closely.

But Wen Ruohan had just smiled — not a trace of warmth in sight — and ignored Jiang Fengmian’s objection. Wen Chao wasn't good for much, but telling Wen Xu that 'any hints of Jiang Fengmian disobeying Wen Ruohan's orders should be met with violence' was tragically within his capabilities.

Still, there were options. It was actually quite likely that Jiang Fengmian would be able to keep it a secret between just himself and Wei Wuxian, so long as he explained the situation. If he stressed the importance of discretion, Wei Wuxian would know to not allow word of it to spread around. It would probably be fine.

Probably.

(But he knew, from the too-calm way Wei Wuxian would sometimes observe him, that that wasn’t completely true. After all, Wei Wuxian was watching — constantly, closely — for any sign of side effects from the simulation. A too-slow reaction, or a trace of the insanity he had suspected them of. If Jiang Fengmian truly tried to explain everything that Wei Wuxian’s future self had done to end up in Mo Xuanyu’s body, there was little doubt Wei Wuxian would discuss the matter with Wen Ning, his assistant. If Wen Ning went to check for the same signs in Wen Chao or Wen Xu, would Jiang Fengmian truly be able to keep what he’d done a secret?)

(No. Absolutely not.)

“Move a bit slower, A-San,” Jiang Fengmian recommended to one of the younger disciples. “You can try speeding up once you’ve mastered the details of the form.”

“Yes, Sect Leader!” the young boy enthusiastically agreed.

And yet Jiang Fengmian's mind was elsewhere.

(He really should have stopped Wen Chao from joining him.)

'Did you hear?' Jiang Fengmian's disciples had whispered to each other, unaware that their sect leader was listening in. 'Apparently Wen-er-gongzi, Wen Chao, has gone crazy!'

'Wen-er-gongzi? Isn't he the one-'

'Who came out at the same time as Sect Leader Jiang did? He is!' the first nodded frantically. 'According to the watermelon seller down the street, he's gone and bought an entire army of dogs!'

Jiang Fengmian had frozen, unable to take another step forward.

'Seriously? What's he got a bunch of mutts for?'

'Not sure. Apparently, he's training them in the dungeons of the Wen Sect, and takes them everywhere with him. Because of that, he stays within the walls of Qishan all the time now.'

Confused, his companion repeated, 'Because of that?'

'Yeah. Rumor has it that Wen Ruohan ordered him to keep the dogs inside. Not sure how Sect Leader Wen knew Wen Chao would go and get dogs, but…'

They shrugged at each other, equal confusion on both their faces.

"Take a wider stance, A-Ruo," Jiang Fengmian advised, grateful that teaching came so naturally to him now that he could dedicate his mind to other matters.

"Understood, Sect Leader," the man responded, determination failing to hide his growing exhaustion.

If he was being honest, Jiang Fengmian felt the same way. No matter how long he stayed up at night thinking over Wen Ruohan's goals, he couldn't figure them out. After all, unlike his disciples (who heard everything through rumors), he knew what Wen Ruohan's instructions had been. Jiang Fengmian hadn't been meant to hear, but he supposed Wen Ruohan hadn't cared enough about the Jiang Sect Leader to lower his voice as he gave his son those commands. It wasn't 'if you get any pets, keep them inside Qishan,' or even 'don't go outside.'

'If you touch so much as a hair on Wei Wuxian's head, I'll crush your skull against the castle walls and leave you to the crows,' Wen Ruohan had said.

'I — Father-'

'Considering what your actions brought our sect in the other timeline, I'm being generous. Am I understood?'

And Wen Chao could do nothing but nod his head.

(Was it comforting that Jiang Fengmian was at least a better father than Wen Ruohan, Jin Guangshan, and Qingheng-jun? Or was it pathetic that those were the people he was comparing himself against?)

At the very least, Jiang Fengmian could rest assured that Wen Chao wouldn't do anything against Wei Wuxian. A coward and a monster though he may be, he would never disobey his father. Nor was Wen Xu likely to believe just anything Wen Chao said unless it matched what he already knew. The chances of the Wen Sect launching an unprovoked attack against Yunmeng were quite low.

(And besides, Wen Chao had already seen first hand just how badly his last attempt at killing Wei Wuxian went.)

However, despite all the negatives, there was still one unquestioningly positive thing that would come out of Jiang Fengmian's presence here. Now that he had left the simulation, it was possible for him to contact the future Wei Wuxian as well. Due to how busy he had been (and how exhausted his Wei Wuxian currently was), Jiang Fengmian had not yet gotten a chance to speak with the future version of his best friend's son. After having spent so long seeing 'Mo Xuanyu' in the simulation, it was bound to be quite an experience.

(As well as a way to apologize. What for, exactly, Jiang Fengmian wasn't sure yet — there were almost too many things to choose from. 'I'm sorry for not stopping what San-Niang did to you' was simply redirecting the fault and felt too much like avoiding responsibility. 'I'm sorry I didn't treat you like a real son' would be perceived as a lie; Jiang Fengmian's own last words had proven to Wei Wuxian exactly where he stood in their family. 'I wish I had been able to protect you' went without saying, but it didn't even come close to capturing what Jiang Fengmian was trying to say.)

But, other than that, Jiang Fengmian actually found himself somewhat looking forward to the experience. Wei Wuxian had always had a personality that was quite easy for Jiang Fengmian to get along with. Once the apology was out of the way, perhaps he could speak directly with the twenty-two year old Wei Wuxian and ask for advise. It would be somewhat embarrassing to seek help from his former ward, but given everything Wei Wuxian had ended up becoming it was impossible for Jiang Fengmian to still view him as a child. The only problem was whether the past Wei Wuxian's presence would make the conversation too awkward to have. Asking him to leave would make it obvious that Jiang Fengmian had something to hide, but talking to Mo Xuanyu (who, as far as the current Wei Wuxian knew, was a relative stranger from twenty years in the future) about how to raise his children would be equally bad. Unfortunately, Jiang Fengmian couldn't imagine a better person to ask than him.

'You could at least try to figure it out by yourself,' the voice inside his head pointed out. Although he did acknowledge that point, he had also found his faith in his own decisions significantly lowered by the simulation, and was reluctant to do so.

With that thought in mind, Jiang Fengmian glanced back at the emergency rooms where his family laid. Although he felt somewhat comforted by the fact that the people inside couldn't touch each other, he was nonetheless nervous. After all, he was ~~abandoning~~ leaving his children behind in a room with Wen Ruohan himself.

He prayed nothing would happen.

A scowl crossed Madam Yu's face as a shiver ran down her spine. She didn't know how she knew, but she was certain her husband had just said one of his usual, hopeless, despairing comments about her. What, did he not think she could take care of their children on her own? Who was it, exactly, that had defended Lotus Pier for him when the Wens attacked?

~~And had failed in the process.~~

And her husband wasn't the only one. Now that he had left, her children had become more on edge too. They didn't look as though they regretted encouraging him to leave, but the newfound tension in their bodies was obvious. Apparently, they didn't trust her either. The thought infuriated her.

She had already acknowledged her mistakes, hadn't she? What more could they ask after that? She hadn't said a single word against Wei Wuxian in hours!

(It took several seconds for it to occur to her how warped her standards had gotten.)

But what else was she supposed to do? It wasn't like the boy was there for her to make amends with. And now that Jiang Fengmian had already left to join him, she had no choice but to stay.

(So why were her children looking at her like that?)

It was almost a relief when world blurred in fog as the simulation started again. If nothing else, it would distract from the less-than-ideal thoughts she had running through her head.

From within the fog, frantic, fast-paced footsteps echoed. Some were soft and controlled, the weight evenly distributed despite their speed. Most of the others, however, were slamming against the gravely ground like a symphony of drums that projected their positions even through the fog.

The yelling didn't help either:

"Why are we following the sounds of the bamboo pole?!" Lan Jingyi cried out, huffing loudly as he did. Normally, such a run would have been child's play for a cultivator, junior or not. However, after the stressful day they'd had of running through the fog and encountering Xue Yang, the boy's mental reserves were all used up.

"We're going after the ghost," Wei Wuxian explained, far too cheery for someone who knew full well he wasn't actually answering the question.

Jin Ling growled, "You want us to follow a ghost? Are you insane?! Who knows where she's going to take us to!"

"That's exactly what we're doing. The sound's been following you ever since you came into this city, right? You all were trying to go deeper in, but she was trying to lead you to the city gates, where you ran into us. She was trying to chase you out — to save you!"

"Oh!" Jiang Yanli gasped at once, realizing how true Wei Wuxian's statement was. She relaxed at having located another ally for her son, and saw Wen Qing giving her a warm, encouraging smile.

'I see,' Sizhui thought. 'So those strange, sporadic sounds she was making with her bamboo pole were a technique she used to scare people away from the city.'

'That Nether Brawler's head I stepped on earlier must have been her doing as well,' Wei Wuxian mentally agreed. 'Something meant to startle and alert us.'

"Well, she certainly chose the wrong people to use something like that on," Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes, finding Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and the juniors' insistence on investigating dangerous matters exhausting. Not that he had much room to talk, he supposed. Given the death-glare Huaisang was sending him, he still hadn't forgotten Nie Mingjue's easy acceptance of his own death.

The young sect leader turned to Lan Xichen in search of support against his brother, but found an expression that matched Huaisang's just a little too well. The first jade hadn't forgotten either.

Nie Mingjue — in all his 191 centimeter glory — wilted on the spot.

Finally, Wei Wuxian continued, "Do you remember? Last night, she wanted to tell us something really important, but she disappeared as soon as Xue Yang came. She was most likely going to tell us to avoid Xue Yang."

Jiang Yanli tensed in apprehension.

"Anyways, she definitely isn't working with him."

"...Wait, did you say Xue Yang?!" an uninformed junior repeated disbelievingly.

"Huh? Why is Xue Yang here as well?"

"Yeah! Wasn't it just Xiao XingChen and Song Lan? I mean, the Chief Cultivator executed Xue Yang!"

Lan Xichen frowned, silently vowing to watch carefully to figure out who had betrayed his sworn brother's trust. Clearly, something had gone wrong.

But the juniors insisted, "It can't be Xue Yang!"

"Um… I'll explain later," Wei Wuxian said instead. "Anyways, the one fighting Hanguang-jun inside isn't Xiao Xingchen; it's Xue Yang. That delinquent was pretending to be him."

The bamboo pole's wacks picked up in intensity, as though the ghost girl was becoming impatient and was urging them to hurry up. Without needing any spoken directions,

Wei Wuxian and the juniors all picked up their paces.

Nie Huaisang was very glad the simulation would simply bring them along. If he had been forced to run this far, he had no doubt he would have given up and accepted death long ago.

(In all honesty, he probably would have just climbed onto his Da-ge's back and been carried the rest of the way, but that was embarrassing even for him! There was only so much laziness he had the face to show after watching Wei Wuxian literally crawl out of the Burial Mounds ~~without his golden core~~.)

They traveled for some time, the ghost girl's sounds getting farther in tandem with their progress so that she could keep leading them away. At times they could see a small, vague shadow through the thin fog in the distance, but it would often disappear shortly after. Behind them, the sounds of Hanguang-jun and Xue Yang's battle rang clearly through the fog, the clangs piling together to create a barrage of notes.

Jingyi's head turned back to the sound as he ran, worry clear on his face.

Another clang resounded.

Finally, unable to take it anymore, he turned to Wei Wuxian and asked, "So we're just going to run off like this?"

In response, Wei Wuxian turned toward the distant fight without pausing in his steps and shouted, "Hanguang-jun, it's up to you now! We're gonna go ahead!"

The strings of the guqin vibrated as though Lan Wangji was responding with an 'mn.'

"He's seriously just leaving?" Jiang Cheng asked, and Madam Yu felt much the same. After all, Wei Wuxian choosing to prioritize the safety of the kids while letting someone else fight the main villain was-

'Would Wen Chao really have dared to do anything to the two young masters of the GusuLan and LanlingJin Sects? Even if he did, that'd just mean they ran out of luck! Since when was it his turn to play hero?'

-It was further proof that she truly hadn't understood a thing about him.

(Well, that's fine. She understood him now. She wouldn't make a mistake like that again, and her husband leaving the simulation showed that he trusted her judgement. She was a changed person now.)

(And yet the skeptical glance Madam Jin sent her way every once in a while left her just the slightest bit uncertain about that.)

The juniors and Wei Wuxian had continued running, getting farther and farther from that battle. However, as the fight went on behind them, Lan Jingyi found he couldn't take it anymore:

"That was it? You're not going to say anything else?" he asked.

“‘Anything else?’” Lan Qiren repeated.

“What else could I have done?” Wei Wuxian responded. “What did you want me to say?”

Jiang Yanli curiously tilted her head.

Lan Jingyi gaped as though he couldn’t understand why Wei Wuxian was asking such an obvious question:

“Why did you two not say ‘I’m worried about you, I’m staying!’” he gasped and reached a yearning hand out, before sweeping his hand back as if forcefully pushing the earlier words aside, responding to himself with, “‘Just go!’”

“What?”

“No! I’m not going! I won’t leave you behind! If I go, you’re coming with me!’ ‘But-’ ‘Please!’ I… Is that not a must?”

“...Is it?”

Wei Wuxian gaped speechlessly, and the juniors behind him all perfectly matched his expression.

“...Who on earth taught you that? Who told you that’s a conversation that needs to happen?! It’d sound fine coming out of my mouth, but can you even imagine your Hanguang-jun saying such things?!”

“No.”

“No way.”

“Zero chance,” the juniors chorused one after the other.

The real juniors (as well as Lan Qiren) all nodded enthusiastically in agreement.

When he saw how disappointed Lan Jingyi was in that answer, Lan Qiren sighed. Truly, it was a good thing Sizhui was there; he would have lost all faith in his bloodline otherwise.

Smiling warmly, Wei Wuxian continued, “Besides, someone as reliable as Hanguang-jun will definitely be able to deal with it. I can just focus on my own things and either wait for him to find me, or go find him myself.”

At the sheer, unquestioning trust in Wei Wuxian’s words, Lan Wangji felt a burning heat spread across his cheeks. Although by now everyone knew better than to mention it (given that doing so would quickly cause the boy to simply malfunction), none were ignorant to the glowing red that painted the ivory skin pink.

The group continued to follow after the ghost girl, travelling across a significant portion of the town as they did.

And Lan Wangji's ears glowed rose.

They turned a corner, at least two juniors stumbling with how long they'd been sprinting for.

And the second jade remained red.

They crossed a long stretch of land, the nearby banners fluttering ominously in the cloudy day. Quite a few minutes had passed since they'd left.

And yet Lan Wangji remained just as red as ever. After a while, Lan Xichen began to grow concerned. Surely simple embarrassment couldn't be lasting this long. Was Wangji somehow sick?

He thought for a moment.

...Unlikely. Putting aside how difficult it was to get a cultivator of Wangji's caliber sick, they were in the simulation right now; there was no way Gusu Lan's healers would have allowed someone to infect their real bodies during this time.

But, even as the other watchers began to grow bored with the unending display of nothing but running, Lan Wangji remained just as flushed as ever. In fact, if Lan Xichen wasn't mistaken, his cheeks were actually getting darker overtime.

'Is watching Wei-gongzi run really enough to provoke this sort of reaction?' he wondered, tilting his head idly. 'That seems unlikely, but what else could be making him so flustered-'

Ah. Although the scene was over now, Lan Wangji had never gotten time to process Wei Wuxian's flirtation in the cold springs. Or process Wei Wuxian climbing onto his bed and trying to disgust him. Or that time they were in the Xuanwu cave and Wei Wuxian tricked Wangji into letting out bad blood by undressing. Or-

Really, there was a countless number of things Wangji could be remembering right now. Lan Xichen truly pitied his brother; due to the fact that Wangji had gotten no alone time between segments, he had simply needed to continuously suppress whatever he felt after those scenes. It was no wonder he was falling into those memories now.

Slowly, Lan Xichen glanced from side to side and made eye contact with Madam Jin, Jiang Yanli, and Nie Huaisang. Understanding at once, the quartet all nodded in agreement.

It would be their sworn duty to help Wangji once they left the simulation. They would not fail.

Finally, just as Lan Xichen starting to get bored as well, the sounds of the bamboo pole abruptly came to a halt. Wei Wuxian and the juniors had arrived at their destination.

The house stood alone in a field of fog that was rapidly becoming thicker and thicker. The virtual children, who could feel the temperature, felt goosebumps quickly spread across their arms despite the way they had been running just a short while ago.

Shivers ran up several people's spines.

Wei Wuxian extended an arm out, silently commanding the juniors to stay behind, and walked toward the house.

'Careful, A-Xian,' Jiang Yanli thought, nervousness seeping into her body. Once again, she found herself quite grateful that the real version of her martial brother had some help now. Given everything she had seen Wei Wuxian go through alone, her father's current presence outside was quite reassuring.

A squeak resounded as the door swung open, pushed into position by an unseen force before Wei Wuxian could reach it. Although the juniors tensed nervously at the welcoming gesture, Wei Wuxian remained calm.

"We've already come this far. Let's go in," he advised.

'Stupid boy. What kind of logic is that?!' Madam Yu internally demanded, before abruptly realizing she had just called the Yiling Patriarch 'stupid' and grumbling to herself instead.

By now, even she couldn't deny that Wei Wuxian planned his every action through. Still, it was difficult to break such old habits, and it would take quite some time to unlearn her instinctive scorn.

"Watch for the threshold," Wei Wuxian called out as he hopped inside. "Don't trip."

As expected, one of the boys nearly tripped over the threshold a moment later.

"Why is the threshold so high?!" he complained, rubbing his sore foot. "It's not like this is a temple or anything!"

Sighing, Wen Qing gave the troublesome brat a quick once-over, quickly confirming that there were no injuries.

"It's not a temple," Wei Wuxian confirmed. "That doesn't mean it doesn't need a high threshold."

When Wei Wuxian didn't elaborate, Jiang Cheng tensed, his Wei-Wuxian-instincts immediately alerting him that there was probably another lesson coming up.

Spreading out, Wei Wuxian and the juniors lit the house up with a dozen fire talismans. The flickering orange light offset the icy blue of the outside fog, giving the area a far warmer feeling than it would have otherwise had.

The ground was decorated in a field of straw, which practically served as a carpet over the floor. In the center, there was an alter next to a few fallen stools, each at a different height. On the right, there was a small, unlit room, as well as seven or eight black coffins.

Jin Guangshan shuddered, having never been in such a disgusting building in his life.

Luckily for everyone else, his grandson was nowhere near as bad about it.

“This is a so-called ‘coffin home?’” Jin Ling asked. “Where the dead are temporarily put?”

Grinning proudly, Wei Wuxian nodded and confirmed, “That’s right. Corpses that aren’t claimed by anyone, ones that would make a house ominous, and ones that are waiting to be buried are often put into coffin homes. It could be described as a courier station for dead people.”

“He sounds far too cheerful about that,” Nie Huaisang grumbled, still vividly recalling his brother’s foretold death. Considering the truth behind the Nie sabers, he had no doubt his brothers corpse had ended up in a state that would ‘make a house ominous.’

Now, he found himself wondering what his other self had done with his dear Da-ge’s body.

“Senior Mo, why is the threshold to the coffin home so high?” Sizhui asked, helping everyone find a place to sit as he did.

Smiling lightly at the question, Wei Wuxian calmly answered, “In case any corpses transform.”

A shudder ran up the watcher’s bodies. Somehow, hearing those words from the Yiling Patriarch gave them a very different feel than they would have coming from anyone else.

Frowning in confusion, Lan Jingyi tilted his head: “How does a high threshold prevent the corpses from transforming?”

“It doesn’t prevent the transformation, but it can sometimes keep already-transformed corpses from going outside. Say, for example, that I’m dead and I’ve just transformed-”

“Strange to hear that from someone who was dead,” Lan Qiren pointed out, then scolded himself for his callous words when he saw a slight twitch in his younger nephew. Although none of them had ever forgotten what had happened to Wei Wuxian, his cheerful attitude made his death was somewhat hard to recall.

Truly, that boy and his mother were two of a kind.

But Wei Wuxian (of course) couldn’t hear the comment Lan Qiren had made. Instead, he moved to stand by the threshold, acting out the part of a freshly-transformed zombie.

“Since I’m a corpse, my limbs are really stiff, right?” he asked, demonstrating as he did. “I can’t perform precise actions?”

“That goes without saying,” Jin Ling agreed. “You can’t even walk. You’d trip if you stepped forward, so you can only… jump….”

He trailed off, an ‘oh!’ expression filling his face.

“Correct, I can only jump,” Wei Wuxian agreed. Sticking his feet together, he tried to jump outside several times. However, due to how high the threshold was, he failed every time.

Watching this, the twin jades nodded in understanding, committing what they saw to memory. Their uncle was a phenomenal teacher, and his teaching style worked very well with them, but there was something about Wei Wuxian’s lesson that sucked them in like nothing else ever had before.

(The laughter of the simulated juniors didn’t hurt either.)

“Do you see now? Don’t laugh!” Wei Wuxian scolded, but the blinding smile on his face told a different story. “This is the ingenuity of common folk. Although it’s lame and seems too simple to work, it is indeed effective against low-level corpses. If a corpse who has transformed gets tripped by the threshold, they’ll fall to the ground and, given their stiff bodies, won’t be able to get back up for quite some time. When they finally do manage to rise, the sun will nearly be up and the rooster will call, or the person guarding the coffin home will have discovered them. It’s actually quite impressive how ordinary people with no knowledge of cultivation were able to come up with such an effective solution.”

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes at those words. Yes, non cultivators could manage slightly against low level corpses, but Wei Wuxian’s praise was a bit excessive for something any two-bit cultivator with a sword could deal with easily. The common people were reaching a bare minimum due to their limitation; that was hardly something to be stunned by.

(After all, even though it was solved almost immediately after, he hadn’t forgotten the sheer helplessness that had encompassed his other self when Wen Zhuliu destroyed his core. Without cultivation — without his golden core — he would only ever be able to reach this standard. Then again, there was no point in being mad; Wei Wuxian clearly understood the severity of the situation. After all, he was the one who had told Jiang Cheng how to get back his core.)

Although he had laughed with everyone else earlier, once he’d managed to calm down, Jin Ling gained a serious expression: “Why did that ghost girl bring us to a coffin home? Don’t tell me it’s so that we can avoid being overwhelmed by walking corpses. And where did she head off to, anyway?”

“It is indeed likely that it’s so we won’t be overwhelmed by them,” Wei Wuxian announced simply. “We’ve been standing still for a long time already. Has anyone heard any walking corpses?”

Jin Zixuan shook his head along with the simulated juniors, forgetting for a moment that he wasn’t actually there.

One of the juniors was about to add more, only to cut off when he saw a flash on the right. They all turned toward the movement, tensing and bringing their hands to their swords, only to relax again once they realized who it was.

The ghost girl had appeared on top of one of the coffins.

Despite the girl's still-ghastly appearance, all the juniors had relaxed at once upon seeing her. The reason why occurred to Lan Qiren a moment later. Wei Wuxian had already forced them all to get used to her appearance one by one.

It was just as Jiang Fengmian had said: despite his unconventional methods, Wei Wuxian was a phenomenal teacher.

The girl didn't have a physical form. She was a soft, dim, wispy figure surrounded by a pale blue aura. Both her face and her figure were small, but, after some grooming, she could easily appear to be a charming girl-next-door. However, her body language and posture weren't delicate at all. She sat with her legs apart, swinging them back and forth anxiously while her bamboo pole rested against the coffin.

Jin Guangshan nearly clicked his tongue in annoyance. She was quite a fine girl, but her unrefined body language ruined most of the charm she had. Unfortunately, given her age, he knew voicing such a thought aloud would only lead to angering his wife all over again. With an annoyed huff, he remained silent.

From where she sat on the coffin, the ghost girl began insistently tapping on the lid. She then hopped down and circled around the coffin a few times, gesturing at it while she did.

"She… wants us to open the coffin for her?" Jin Ling guessed.

"Obviously," Madam Yu sighed, having trouble believing that this particular night hunt relied so heavily on what essentially amounted to a game of charades. Then again, that sort of weirdness was just par for the course when Wei Wuxian was involved, so perhaps she should have expected this.

"Perhaps it's her body inside there," Sizhui suggested, approaching the coffin cautiously. "She may want us to burry her and bring her to peace."

'Not an unreasonable assumption,' Wen Ruohan supposed. 'The next generation of Lans had quite a few diamonds in the rough, doesn't it? I'll have to keep that in mind for the future.'

All in agreement with Sizhui's suggestion, a few of the juniors approached the coffin to help open it, only for Wei Wuxian to interrupt, "You don't have to help me. All of you, stand farther back. What if it's not a corpse in there, or some more corpse poison spurts out and gets all of you?"

The juniors backed away quickly at that.

‘And what happens if it gets you?’ Wen Qing wondered, pursing her lips together. ‘I’m sure you’re more than capable enough to deal with nearly anything that comes your way, but… you’ve already died once. You should know better than anyone that you’re not invincible. Don’t be a moron, Wei Wuxian.’

Luckily for everyone involved, that was not what happened. The lid cracked open without any attack from the inside, and Wei Wuxian was able to calmly set it on the ground. When he stood up again to see what had been inside, he saw not a girl, but a young man.

The man lay still, his hands folding together over his chest, on which rested a single horsetail whisk. The cultivation robes he wore were as white as snow, and the silhouette of his face appeared handsome and refined. The upper half of his face was covered by bandages wrapped tightly over where his eyes should be. Instead of eyes, however, the bandages sunk in to reveal two gaping holes, hollow where there should have been flesh.

Shuddering at the creepy image, Nie Huaisang slowly began inching closer to his brother.

Having heard the coffin open, the young girl frantically stumbled over. She stuck her hands into the coffin and, after a short stint of searching around, located the corpse’s face. She stomped her feet, having no other way to convey the desperate agony she was experiencing, and tears of blood fell from her eyes.

A sight that had been so horrifying just a short while ago now only seemed tragic to Jiang Yanli. She moved closer to the ghost, watching helplessly as crimson tears trickled down to the floor.

It was clear to everyone who the corpse was.

“Xiao Xingchen?” Lan Wangji spoke aloud, approaching the body calmly.

After taking a moment to search through the other possibilities, Lan Xichen was forced to nod in agreement: “So it seems.”

Suddenly, the girl straightened up and spun toward Wei Wuxian, beginning to gesture again. Her body language was both angered and irritated, as though her desperation to be understood was quickly giving way to impatience.

Pulling out his guqin, Lan Sizhui asked, “Should I play inquiry again?”

“There’s no need,” Wei Wuxian responded. “We would probably ask the wrong questions. It would take far too much time to get somewhere productive. Besides, it seems likely that her reply will end up being quite complex and difficult to interpret. Inquiry is unreliable, in this case.”

Hanguang-jun could probably have managed it. Although he knew dealing with Xue Yang was just as important, Lan Wangji couldn’t help but wish the simulated second jade was there to help Wei Wuxian more.

But Wei Wuxian had trusted him to deal with Xue Yang; he could offer Wei Wuxian the same.

Sizhui, on the other hand, struggled to feel such confidence. Wei Wuxian's words hadn't contained even a trace of blame, and yet the young Lan disciple still felt rather ashamed.

'I'll practice Inquiry more diligently when we get back. I will have to be as fluent, as quick, and as accurate as Hanguang-jun.'

Lan Xichen chuckled at the boy's resolve, finding the enthusiastic child adorable (despite the fact that they were technically about the same age). Perhaps, when they left the simulation, they would be able to get in contact with this parallel future. He would love to get advise from his other-self on how to teach such students.

"So, if we can't use Inquiry, what are we going to do?" Lan Jingyi asked, finally pulling Sizhui's thoughts back into the present.

Without considering the matter for long, Wei Wuxian easily suggested, "How about empathy?"

Jiang Cheng jolted at that, a sudden rush of glee going through him at the suggestion. After all, empathy was a Jiang technique; even if Wei Wuxian was spending his time with the Lans and Jins right now, there was plenty of Jiang left in him.

However-

"That's too dangerous!" Jin Ling protested at once. "Using such a dark technique without someone-"

"Okay, okay, we're running out of time," Wei Wuxian cut him off at once. "Stand up properly. Quick. We still need to go back and find Hanguang-jun once we're finished. Jin Ling, you'll be the supervisor."

"That is not an expression you want your supervisor to make when they find out their role," Wen Qing glared, giving an internal sigh at the gobsmacked disbelief on Jin Ling's gaping face.

"Me?" Jin Ling finally asked. "You want a Young Mast… you want me to supervise you while you do this?"

"If young master Jin does not want to, I can do it," Sizhui volunteered.

But Wei Wuxian just focused on Jin Ling again and asked, "Jin Ling, did you bring a Jiang Sect's silver bell?"

"Ah," Wen Ruohan said at once, realizing Wei Wuxian's thought process.

And the narration of the far-future Jin Ling filled in the rest: "The silver bell was a signature accessory of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect. When I was young, I was brought up by two sects, living at the Lanling Jin sect's Jinlin Tower half the time, and Yunmeng Jiang's Lotus Piers the other half. I, of course, was carrying things from both my sects."

To further support his future-self's claim, the simulated Jin Ling reached into his robes and, with a complicated expression on his face, pulled out a small silver bell.

Jiang Cheng was grinning so much it physically hurt.

A moment later, delighted laughter filled the air and Jiang Yanli turned to her brother to whisper, "Thank you, A-Cheng. This is… this is wonderful, I-"

She cut herself off, smiling at her equally-elated brother, as Jin Zixuan added, "I can't believe you managed to get Meng… Jin Guangyao to agree to borrowing the heir — his nephew. Thank you for being there for him. Maybe we can… do something similar in our world."

"Maybe," Jiang Cheng agreed, nodding enthusiastically, then blushing at the attention.

Contrary to their elation, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but feel like certain things made a lot more sense now:

'Proud, headstrong, condescending… he's learned all of his uncle's and father's bad traits, and none of his mother's good ones,' Wei Wuxian had thought, watching Jin Ling attack the charlatan over his Yiling Laozu paintings.

However, at that moment, Wei Wuxian wasn't thinking anything of the sort. Instead, his eyes were focused on the bell, a memory forming around him. It was something added in by the spirits, to show what the simulated Wei Wuxian was thinking of.

The Yiling Patriarch stood before them. Wei Wuxian's original body, hair down as it had been when they had last seen him. Across from him stood the Ghost General, who the watchers now knew truly possessed the human consciousness his solemn expression implied.

'So long as my martial nephew wears this silver bell, no weaker ethereal creatures will be able to approach him,' Wei Wuxian observed.

Jiang Yanli sucked in a breath.

"He has A-Ling's bell?" Madam Yu asked. "When was this? Did Wei Wuxian ask to look at the bell after A-Ling was born? Why would the Ghost General be near my grandson?"

"A-Ning wouldn't hurt him," Wen Qing pointed out. Madam Jin was about to snap back that Wei Wuxian and the Ghost General had allegedly killed Jin Zixuan, only to suddenly stop herself.

Regardless of the public's consensus on what happened, it was clear that Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning would not have voluntarily killed her son. Until she understood what had happened, she couldn't speak on the subject.

However, the little faith she had in Wei Wuxian was tested further when the man adopted an overwhelmingly morose expression. The regret in it was clear, as was the guilt that-

“What?” Jin Ling suddenly asked, snapping Wei Wuxian out of his thoughts.

“...Wait, what as that about?” Jiang Cheng asked, not understanding why they had seen such a memory.

“Wei Ying had been staring at Young Master Jin’s bell for quite some time,” Lan Wangji observed, watching the simulated Wei Wuxian wave off Jin Ling’s concerns. “Given his expression... this scene may become relevant again later.”

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered, worry filling her mind.

“Here,” Wei Wuxian offered Sizhui the bell. “The silver bell of the Jiang Sect can steady one’s focus and calm one’s mind. Use this as the code-”

Before he could finish, Jin Ling suddenly snatched the bell back with a rushed, “Actually, I’ll do it!”

Lan Xichen hid a laugh.

Lan Jingyi rolled his eyes, “You — first you didn’t want to do it, and now you insist on it. With such a hot-and-cold temper… are you a young mistress?!”

Nowhere near as reserved as Lan Xichen, Nie Huaisang burst out into laughter at that: “Both Jiang-xiong’s future self and this junior called him the same thing! It’s just that obvious!”

A deep flush spread across Jin Zixuan’s cheeks, and the simulated Jin Ling reacted with an explosion of rage.

Ignoring the interactions the juniors were having, Wei Wuxian turned to the ghost girl and requested, “Come in.”

All other conversations stopped at once, everyone turning their attention toward Wei Wuxian and the girl before him. She hurriedly wiped her eyes and her face, then crashed into his body.

Her soul was squeezed inside.

Wei Wuxian dropped to the ground.

Once again, Lan Wangji reached forward to catch him, only to realize belatedly that Wei Wuxian was just going to slip through his fingers. It was somewhat embarrassing how often he forgot that.

(No one could blame Lan Wangji though. After watching Wei Wuxian get thrown into the Burial Mounds, they couldn’t deny how much most of them had also wished their other selves had been there to catch him before he fell.)

(Unfortunately, as time went on, many of them were beginning to wonder if their other-selves had instead been the ones to push Wei Wuxian down.)

The boys hurried to bring over a pile of straw for the sleeping Wei Wuxian to sit on, and Jin Ling clutched the bell tightly, his expression carefully blank.

There was a surge of darkness, and the watchers were pulled inside the Empathy as well.

Considering how difficult it would be for someone else to see through the empathy, Lan Qiren found himself wondering if the ghost girl was one of the spirits who had put together the simulation. He had to admit, it wouldn't surprise him if that was true; the humor occasionally on display in the editing certainly seemed to match her behavior.

However, a moment later, Wei Wuxian suddenly thought of a problem: 'Wait, the maiden is blind. If I empathize with her, won't I not be able to see anything either? The effectiveness will plummet. Oh, well. Only being able to hear will work well enough too.'

"This is a dangerous technique. Your response should not be 'oh, well' when it turns out to be less useful than you thought it would be!" Wen Qing scolded, glaring quite fiercely at Wei Wuxian. Some of the other watchers backed away from her nervously.

After a few more dizzying moments in the blackness, however, they suddenly jerked to a stop as if landing on the ground, and the girl opened her eyes.

A bright landscape with clear colors appeared before them.

"Eh? She wasn't blind?" Nie Mingjue asked, looking around disbelievingly.

"Apparently not," Lan Xichen agreed, fairly mystified as well.

'I guess she wasn't blind yet when this memory occurred,' Wei Wuxian agreed, quickly adapting to his new circumstances. 'Empathy shows the scenes in her memories with the strongest emotions — the ones she most wants to express to other people. I'm in her memories right now, so I can just sit back and relax as we go through this. Her eyes are my eyes; her mouth is my mouth.'

Considering the horrors Wei Wuxian had gone through, Nie Huaisang was suddenly very, very glad that their simulation didn't work the same way.

Sitting by a brook, the girl smiled sweetly at the water. She kicked her feet in, combed her hair back with her fingers, and observed her own reflection while humming a joyful tune.

Clearly the actions of someone who could see, despite her dull, grey eyes.

Suddenly, right as the girl reached toward the back of her head, there was a jerk of aqua light from around her.

"Wha — what was that?!"

‘Based on what this feels like… is she fixing a hairpin?’ Wei Wuxian assumed.

And the watchers, who could still see in 360°, knew that she was. That didn’t explain the flash of blue.

At that moment, there was another slight flash. Those who were watching closely could see its source.

“It’s Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji realized.

Jiang Yanli did a double take: “It’s A-Xian?”

“Empathy laid his soul on top of her in her memories, but they are still technically separate. When he focuses his attention somewhere or reacts with a jerk, as we saw just now, his soul must separate from her body slightly.”

“I see. So it’s is the outline of his soul jumping away from hers,” Wen Qing supposed, turning back to the simulation with a thoroughly dissecting gaze. Now that she knew what to look for, she could indeed see how the whisps of motion appeared to be Wei Wuxian’s soul seeping out of her body.

“But…” Jiang Cheng looked back toward Wei Wuxian. “Empathy is supposed to lay the user’s soul directly on top of the spirit’s. We shouldn’t be able to see individual reactions from Wei Wuxian. It should just be his thoughts.”

“Well, has anyone ever looked at empathy from the outside?” Nie Huaisang countered, and Jiang Cheng had no way to respond to that.

Once the girl had fastened her hair, she dusted off her clothes and leaped up. Grabbing the bamboo pole by her feet, she skipped along the road, speeding forward at a rate only the most energetic of non-cultivators would be able to manage. She swung the bamboo this way and that as she walked, swatting the branches above her head. In the process, she knocked over several rocks in the road, terrorizing innocent grasshoppers with her movements.

Although she wasn’t his type — far too brash, dirty, and crude to even come close — even Jin Guangshan had to admit she had a certain youthful playfulness about her that was quite enticing.

(A shudder ran up Madam Jin’s back as her instincts began sounding alarms at full force, and a second later she was death glaring at her husband despite not being entirely sure why.)

A moment later, however, they heard footsteps in the distance, and the girl halter her skipping. Holding onto her pole properly, she knocked it on the ground and slowly stumbled forward, feeling her away across as though she truly couldn’t see. The sounds of the footsteps had come from a few villager women, who stepped out of the way upon seeing her, whispering among themselves as they did.

The girl nodded hurriedly, “Thank you. Thank you.”

One of the women watched for only a moment longer before her face collapsed with pity. Lifting the white cloth covering her blanket, she took out a steamed bun and handed it over.

"Sister, be careful. Are you hungry? Take this and eat it," the woman offered.

Seeing the open generosity, Jiang Yanli couldn't help but smile at the scene. After all the endless tragedies the simulation had shown them, it had become a little difficult to remember that there were genuinely good people out there.

The reassurance was comforting.

As if agreeing, the girl gasped at the offer and responded, "H-how could I take it? I-I…"

The woman shoved the bun into her hands, commanding, "Take it."

She finally did.

"Sister, A-Qing is very thankful!"

'Ah, we finally have a name,' Wei Wuxian realized.

"A-Qing," Wen Qing repeated, a trace of amusement in her tone. Her aunts and uncles tended to refer to her like that when they visited; it was somewhat odd hearing that refer to someone else.

But, if it had to refer to someone else, Wen Qing was quite pleased that it was for such a resourceful and fearless young lady. A bit of affection sparked within her.

Bidding the women farewell, A-Qing continued forward, finishing the bun in just a few bites before resuming her earlier skipping. As a spirit attached to her memory, Wei Wuxian ended up bouncing up and down with her, the blue light of his soul serving as an after-image for the half second it took him to be dragged along.

'I'm getting dizzy,' he mentally complained. 'This maiden is so full of energy. Now I understand; she's pretending to be blind. She was probably born with those white eyes. Although she looks blind, she can actually see; she's just pretending to be sightless to make people feel sorry for her.'

Unable to help herself, Madam Yu scoffed: "Pretending to be weak to garner sympathy. Well, I've never heard of anything more pathetic. Has she no pride? With everything as it is, I bet she's a lowly thief too. Though I guess that's all that can be expected of a commoner."

Jiang Yanli flinched slightly at the words, that last one having been given the exact same tone and hate as what Madam Yu would use when she said the words 'the son of a servant.'

'What's wrong with servants?' Wei Wuxian had asked, disliking the way Jiang Cheng had described MianMian. 'I'm also the son of a servant, aren't I?'

And worst of all, as the simulation had shown them, the child Wei Wuxian had been living in even worse conditions before Jiang Fengmian had picked him up. Jiang Yanli could only be grateful that Wei Wuxian had managed to remain confident in himself regardless.

And he continued to be so now:

'She's a girl who roams the streets alone. If she pretends to be blind, people will naturally think she truly can't see and lower their guards. However, in reality, she actually can see, and can therefore adjust according to the circumstances. That is indeed a clever method of self preservation. Though, there must have been something to make her lose her sight before she died….'

Wei Wuxian fell silent once more, pondering the circumstances that could have led up to that.

Some of the watchers, however, were more focused on what he had said before.

"...I agree," Lan Wangji spoke up. "There should be no shame in doing the best she can to survive, given the conditions she lives in. Thievery aside, pretending to be blind is not a sin."

Nie Huaisang gaped, having never known Lan Wangji to speak so rudely to one of his elders in his life. The words were as polite as could be, but the implied scolding of Madam Yu was obvious to everyone listening in. And yet Lan Qiren didn't bother to berate his nephew for it.

A hot fury sparked within Madam Yu-

And got doused a moment later when, out of the corner of her eye, she saw her two children flinch at her reaction.

A voice in her head seemed to laugh:

'Didn't you just get done saying you would be fine without Fengmian? Where did all that confidence go?'

But even if Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren had stepped in front of Lan Wangji protectively, she couldn't allow a slight like this to go unpunished-

A-Qing laughed, skipping along the road as she went. Everytime someone passed by, she shrunk down and pretended to be blind, occasionally earning herself a bit of food through that.

And Madam Yu shifted uncomfortably, quickly glaring at the ground to mask it as annoyance. From what she could see, the look Wen Ruohan was giving Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji was just as approving as usual (and the fact that Wei Wuxian experiencing the Chief Cultivator's approval had become commonplace was a topic she wasn't willing to delve into quite yet). Perhaps it shouldn't have been a surprise — regardless of his own illustrious rank and bloodline, Wen Ruohan had always been perfectly happy to raise up any low born trash he saw-

Where was she even going with this?

Jiang Cheng, who had been watching his mom warily in preparation for the inevitable explosion, watched in abject disbelief as she instead looked away, backing down from the fight the second jade had all-but challenged her to.

By now, A-Qing had arrived at a marketplace.

It was bustling with people, which made it a perfect time for A-Qing to show off her skills. Sinking deep into her performance, she knocked her pole against the ground frequently, practically radiating wariness as she did. Slowly walking through the crowd, she suddenly tripped and ran into a man with expensive-looking, brightly colored clothes. She flinched back, pretending to be frightened:

"I'm sorry! I'm sorry! I can't see! I'm sorry!"

'Can't see?' Wei Wuxian mentally repeated. 'She clearly rushed right to him.'

Pursing her lips together, Madam Yu quite forcefully prevented herself from speaking any of the thoughts she had. Everyone else was grateful.

The man she had run into faltered. When he had felt someone run into him, he had angrily turned around, prepared to curse whoever had been responsible. However, seeing that it was not only a blind person, but also a young maiden who looked rather pretty, he knew that slapping her would result in fervent criticism from the surrounding crowd.

After thinking it over for a moment longer, he could only grumpily snap, "Watch where you're going!"

A-Qing continued to apologize, but the gaunt-faced man merely sneered. The man turned to leave, but, as he did, he decided he still wasn't satisfied. Smirking to himself, he reached over and squeezed A-Qing's buttocks with his right hand.

Wei Wuxian's soul flinched back with a yelp, goosebumps rising up his arms-

And Lan Wangji and Wen Ruohan simultaneously stood up, knocking their chairs to the ground with the force of the movement. The man didn't know Wei Wuxian was also there — not that that made it better — and yet that sheer audacity he had to attack the Yiling Patriarch like that….

The other watchers gulped nervously at the bloodlust Lan Wangji was letting out, and, as Jin Guangshan saw the ice-cold expression on Wen Ruohan's face, he found himself very glad that he had managed to avoid laughing at the scene. He had no doubt that would not have been received well.

Keeping up her act, A-Qing had shrunk down into a seemingly-frightened ball, making it even more obvious that the blue glow of Wei Wuxian's soul was repeatedly jumping out of her body, reacting with utter indignation. Once the man had gone a significant distance away, she tapped her way into an obscure alley, shivering as she did.

Then she tsked and spat on the ground.

"Eh?"

By now, she was out of sight of the street, so she had no reason to keep up her act any longer. She reached into her robes, fishing out a money pouch made of cheap leather.

"...It was all just an act?" Nie Mingjue asked disbelievingly.

"Wah! How scary!" Nie Huaisang shuddered. "She looked completely genuine! People who can hide their intentions like that are terrifying!"

"You think everything's terrifying," Jiang Cheng blandly pointed out, rolling his eyes at the act of fear. Out of the corner of his eye, however, he carefully watched his mother.

(Rather than being smug that A-Qing had indeed been proven to be a thief, Madam Yu merely seemed tired, now. Jiang Cheng wasn't quite sure what that meant.)

A-Qing poured the pouch's contents into her palm, counting out the scant number of coins and clicking her tongue again:

"Those lousy men. All of them are like this. Dressed like they're something, but without even a penny on them!"

Wei Wuxian looked halfway between frowning and bursting into laughter.

'She looks younger than fifteen, but it appears she's already quite adept at cursing,' he observed. 'And even better at snatching people's money pouches.'

Some part of Nie Mingjue wanted to frown at the girl's dishonorable action, but, remembering how the child Wei Wuxian had looked (starving and freezing in the bitter snow), he couldn't muster up the energy to do so.

That supposed-victim's inexcusable actions didn't help either.

Watching the girl furiously recount the coins in her hand, Wei Wuxian couldn't help but reminisce, 'If I had been the one you'd stolen from, you wouldn't be cursing like that. Back then, I used to be quite wealthy as well…'

"That isn't something you should want to happen," Wen Qing pointed out with a roll of her eyes. Normally, Jiang Cheng would have joined her, but at that moment he was so smug over Wei Wuxian remembering the good of being in the Jiang Sect that he didn't have the concentration to focus on anything else.

'There, you see,' he grinned, the thoughts slipping out despite himself. 'Lan-er-gongzi might not mind when you steal his pouch, but we gave you your own. You don't need him.'

And that was all that mattered.

Just as Wei Wuxian finished sighing about how he had become poor, A-Qing found her next target. Resuming her act of blind helplessness, she walked out of the alley startled with an "ah" as she ran into a white-robbed cultivator.

"I'm sorry! I'm sorry! I can't see! I'm sorry!"

'Are you not even going to change your lines, Little Beauty?' Wei Wuxian wondered incredulously.

Having been jolted by her, it took the man a moment to turn around. In complete juxtaposition to the previous man A-Qing had stolen from, this one moved to help her up before anything else.

"It's fine," he calmly assured. "Young Maiden, you can't see either?"

The man was fairly young. His cultivation robes were simple, yet clean, and he carried a sword wrapped in white cloth on his back. The visible part of his face was quite handsome, though thin and emaciated. The rest of his face, however, was covered with white bandages thick enough to completely cover his eyes. A soft tinge of blood vaguely seeped from beneath them.

Although no one said it aloud, everyone had the same thought at once.

'Xiao Xingchen!'

Realizing that she had been asked a question, A-Qing straightened up and nervously responded, "Y-yes."

"Then, walk a little slower. Don't move so fast. You don't want to bump into someone again, do you?"

Once again, the differences between Xiao Xingchen and the person A-Qing stole from earlier couldn't be more apparent.

Holding A-Qing's hand, Xiao Xingchen led her to the side of the road and instructed, "Walk here. There aren't as many people."

His words were gentle, yet careful. They made A-Qing pause for a moment, but, after a bit of thought, she nonetheless reached out to snatch his money pouch.

Nie Mingjue sighed slightly, but didn't otherwise protest. It made Nie Huaisang quite hopeful; perhaps, as impossible as it seemed, his stubborn, obnoxiously-meatheaded brother was learning to be understand nuance! He could only hope this newfound generosity would carry over to Huaisang's study habits when they left the simulation.

"Brother, A-Qing is very grateful to you!" she chirped out.

Smiling warmly, Xiao Xingchen corrected, "It's not 'Brother,' but 'Daozhang.'"

The girl blinked: "But you're both Daozhang and Brother."

“Then, since you’re referring to me as Brother, why don’t you give back Brother’s pouch.”

Although they hadn’t been caught doing anything, Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Huaisang all jumped at the accurate accusation, and were forced to fight the urge to protest the claim.

‘Ah,’ Wei Wuxian thought, then huffed, a smile on his face that was truly and undeniably dripping in amused smugness. ‘No matter how quickly a mortal street roamer like A-Qing is, she won’t be able to fool the senses of a cultivator.’

And Wei Wuxian would know that better than anyone, having been surrounded by street kids for a good portion of his life. At that thought, Lan Wangji found himself unconsciously clenching his hands into fists.

Startled, A-Qing took off a moment later, but she hadn’t made it more than a few feet before she was grabbed by the back of her collar and pulled back.

“As I just told you, you shouldn’t run so fast,” Xiao Xingchen warned. “What if you bump into someone again?”

“Is his composure limitless?” Jin Guangshan wondered, looking on in disgust at the struggling little thief. Although many of them didn’t approve of the tone he had used, no one could disagree with Sect Leader Jin’s words. The aura of calmness Xiao Xingchen exuded hadn’t faltered in the slightest.

Seeing that her struggles weren’t working, A-Qing bit down on her upper lip.

‘Oh no,’ Wei Wuxian realized, ‘She’s going to shout ‘molester’ and-’

However, before she could, the actual molestor from earlier stormed out of the street corner. Upon seeing her, he was overwhelmed by fury and began to shout:

“You little bitch! I’ve finally caught you. Give me back my money!”

He pulled his arm back, ready to swing towards her face.

Jiang Yanli flinched back, and Jin Zixuan jumped protectively in front of her.

Yet, before the slap could land on her cheek, it was forcefully stopped.

A-Qing blinked her eyes open.

“Sir, please calm down for a moment,” Xiao Xingchen requested, his hand quite firmly wrapped around the man’s wrist. “That’s quite an impolite way to treat a young maiden, don’t you think?”

At that, Jiang Yanli was finally able to release the breath she had been holding, and tension poured out of her body at once. Even if Wei Wuxian wasn’t currently fighting for his life in the Burial Mounds, the simulation could still prove fairly stressful. She sent a grateful look Jin Zixuan's way, and was met by a blush and a smile in return.

Although the man had used quite a bit of strength just then, Xiao Xingchen had no problems stopping him. The seemingly light grip the latter had on the man's hand didn't let him move a centimeter, which only made the fury within that man grow.

Although he was clearly nervous, he nonetheless stubbornly accused, "What is an eyeless freak like you doing here? Saving the damsel in distress? Who do you think you are, playing the hero right now?! So the little bitch is your lover? Don't you know she's a theif? She stole my money! If you protect her, then you're also a dirty thief!"

He continued to curse, and, as the words became increasingly vulgar, the little warmth that had been in Madam Jin's expression seeped out completely. Several people backed away from her nervously.

(Unfortunately, that brought them closer to Madam Yu, whose expression had gone carefully blank at the words "playing the hero.")

"Thieves like you should be castrated before the town!" the enraged man continued. "You-"

Then, with the man in one hand and A-Qing in the other, Xiao Xingchen turned toward the girl and instructed, "Give the man back his money."

A-Qing immediately fumbled out the small bits of money and handed it over. At that, Xiao Xingchen finally relaxed his grip, allowing the man to count the coins out. After ensuring that everything had been returned, the man looked back over toward the blind cultivator.

'Not worth it to kick up anymore of a fuss,' he decided warily. With that, he awkwardly trudged away.

"Good," Madam Jin scoffed. "It's more than he deserves after what he did to that girl!"

Although they didn't say anything out loud, it was clear by the darkness in their expressions that both Wen Ruohan and Lan Wangji completely agreed.

Finally, seeing that the man was out of hearing distance, Xiao Xingchen set A-Qing down and commented, "You really are too bold. Stealing from him even though you're blind?"

A-Qing leapt five centimeters in the air in indignation, shouting "He touched me! He pinched my butt, and it hurt so much! What's so wrong about me taking some of his money?! There were only a few coins inside such a bit pouch, and yet he was being so mean about it! He's clearly gonna die flat broke."

Although there wasn't any condemnation in his expression, Wei Wuxian nonetheless disagreed: 'You were clearly intending to steal by bumping into him, but now you're trying to imply that he wronged you first. What a misleading argument.'

Nonetheless, Xiao Xingchen once again shook his head: "Even in that case, you really should have known better than to provoke him. Today, if you were alone, the matter wouldn't have ended with a mere slap. Maiden, take care."

And with that, he turned and began walking away.

'He didn't even ask for his money back,' Wei Wuxian realized, eyes widening.

'What a fool,' Madam Yu instantly thought. 'Is he honestly just going to accept that? Look at the state of his clothes. Of course he's only able to wear that; if he gives all his money to any thief he runs across, then what else could be expected? Does he really care that much about feeling good about himself? That foolish-'

'This Shishu of mine is gentle towards women as well,' Wei Wuxian concluded, a smile forming on his face.

And Madam Yu's thoughts screeched toward a blinding halt.

She didn't have to agree with Wei Wuxian on everything — knew she wouldn't, in fact — but their differing observations here laid out a picture that the Madam of the Jiang Sect wasn't sure she liked. After all, Wei Wuxian saw this action in nothing but a positive light.

(And who was it, exactly, that she had constantly accused of 'playing the hero' until her other-self's last breath?)

But she was thinking this about Xiao Xingchen, not Wei Wuxian. She had been wrong about Wei Wuxian; that didn't mean she was necessarily wrong about Xiao Xingchen.

(Right?)

Holding tightly onto the money pouch she had stolen, A-Qing stared blankly for several seconds as Xiao Xingchen walked away. Suddenly, she stuffed the bag into her lapel and chased over with her pole, promptly crashing into Xiao Xingchen's back.

The cultivator immediately steadied her again.

"Is there anything else?" he asked.

"I still have your money pouch!"

The exclamation rang out into the distance, and Lan Xichen couldn't help but laugh, "To tell that to the person himself…."

"Hm. Good on her," Nie Mingjue grinned, pleased that Xiao Xingchen's actions had altered the girl's behavior.

However-

“It’s yours now,” Xiao Xingchen told her. “There’s not much inside anyways. Make sure to spend it all before you steal from someone else, alright?”

‘Is he serious?’ Wen Qing sighed, looking upon the scene with an undeniable layer of fond exasperation. ‘Honestly, that's just… ridiculous.’

“I heard that filthy man curse,” A-Qing said instead, changing the subject. “So, you’re blind too?”

At that question, Xiao Xingchen’s expression faltered at once, and his smile vanished as well.

‘The bold, innocent remarks of children are often the cruelest,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Children don’t know anything. But it’s precisely because they don’t know anything that they can hurt people’s feelings in the most direct ways.’

And at those words, Lan Wangji couldn’t help but recall Wei Wuxian’s expression as he watched the children playing cultivators. They had recreated the Sunshot Campaign, and yet needed to decide on a new leader. The kid pretending to be the Yiling Patriarch had volunteered with the endless confidence of the real version.

Then, another kid had objected.

‘I’m Sandu Shengshou. I’m the most powerful!’ and then, ‘Hmph. Why can’t I be better than you? Don’t you remember how you died?’

The children hadn’t even been speaking to Wei Wuxian, and yet-

On the bandages wrapped around Xiao Xingchen’s eyes, a red smear of blood formed. It grew darker and darker, almost seeping through the cloth. He raised his hand to hover it over his eye, his hands trembling.

‘The pain and injury that came with gouging out one’s eyes were not easy to heal,’ Wei Wuxian thought, his expression shifting into something that could only be described as sympathetic. ‘However, A-Qing had no way to understand that.’

‘He must be feeling dizzy,’ she thought, proving Wei Wuxian’s point.

Wen Qing could only shake her head. If Wei Wuxian's core was where she thought it was, then he would know that all too well, wouldn't he?

Xiao Xingchen moved to leave.

“Wait!” A-Qing insisted again, running in front of Xiao Xingchen to cut him off. Although Xiao Xingchen was genuinely blind, his enhanced senses as a cultivator allowed him to stop without running into her.

“Yes?” he asked.

“I’ll go with you!”

“Hm?” Lan Qiren asked, startled once again by the girl’s unhesitant lack of formality. Her actions would be inexcusable among his own students, but….

Could he really say that remaining outwardly formal while singling out Wei Wuxian to answer questions in class (and claiming that it was “only to be expected” when the boy got them all right) was somehow more appropriate than how A-Qing was acting now?

“Why would you want to follow me?” Xiao Xingchen finally asked, his still-pleasant smile showing that his question was out of curiosity, rather than disapproval. “Do you want to become a cultivator?”

“No,” she disagreed at once. “You’re tall-blind, and I’m little-blind. We’re both like this, but if we travel together, we can take care of each other. My parents are gone and there’s nowhere I can stay. I can follow anyone to anywhere!”

Xiao Xingchen shifted at that, but remained hesitant.

Thus, as any respectable street urchin would do, she cleverly zeroed in on the man’s weakness: “I spend money really quickly. If you refuse to take me with you, the money will be gone at once, and I’ll have to go steal from and trick people again!”

“...Is she-”

“And-and when that happens, someone will slap me hard and I’ll fall down and I won’t be able to get up again so I’ll be lost! I won’t be able to find my way after that! Poor me!”

Her silver, pupil-less eyes glistened with tears.

A laugh slipped out of Wen Qing’s lips, and she looked upon A-Qing with newfound admiration: “Going straight to the heart of it, huh?”

“She’s impressively shameless,” Nie Mingjue agreed.

But Xiao Xingchen just laughed, “Someone as clever as you will just fool other so that they can’t find their way. Who in the world would be able to do the same to you?”

‘See, this is what happens when you let people realize how smart you are,’ Nie Huaisang thought, feeling pity for the young girl.

‘Huh. I’m starting to get a feel for what Xiao Xingchen’s personality was like. Seems as though Xue Yang’s impersonation was really spot-on,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Aside from his face, he was basically indistinguishable from the real Xiao Xingchen. If someone had told me he was the genuine one, I’d have believed them.’

Meanwhile, still pleading, pestering, and pretending to be pitiful, A-Qing clung onto Xiao Xingchen, demanding to be brought along. Xiao Xingchen warned her quite a few times of how dangerous it could end up being, but she stayed firm in her determination.

Considering the ghost she had ended up as, the watchers were hesitant to support that mindset.

What came next was the voice of Ouyang Zizhen, the disembodied words serving to provide further context:

"In the following days, Maiden A-Qing wandered freely with Xiao Xingchen. He continued to work as they did, night hunting when the opportunity came, and traveling toward the sources of any rumors they came across."

"Ah, Uncle, doesn't this remind you of Wangji?" Lan Xichen asked, keeping his voice low so as to not disturb the other watchers. "His future-self, I mean."

"Hm. Hanguang-jun goes wherever the chaos is, they said," Lan Qiren agreed, casting a proud look upon his nephew. For all the pain and suffering in the future, it was reassuring that there would be sources of joy as well.

"Xiao Xingchen kept warning her, but Young Maiden Qing never listened. Even when Xiao Xingchen had to go exorcise an old castle that had gained sentience, she remained unafraid. She continued calling him 'Daozhang,' sticking to him as though she was syrup, and never getting more than three meters away!"

And the simulation displayed this accordingly, showcasing a montage of their travels, and displaying the obvious bond coming into being between the pair.

"After she had followed him for a while, possibly realizing that A-Qing was quick-witted, brave, and never a hindrance despite being a young, blind maiden, Xiao Xingchen finally gave her permission to stay with him. Ah, Lady A-Qing is so cool!"

Jiang Yanli giggled at the romantic boy's proclamation, finding his overt enthusiasm adorable.

'Huh. I thought Xiao Xingchen might have had a destination in mind while he was traveling, but I guess not,' Wei Wuxian thought as he watched the scenes flash by. 'Based on the climates and dialects of these memories, he's not following a direct route at all. He's simply going wherever people mention things are happening.'

"He is?" Jiang Cheng asked, having not noticed anything of the sort. He turned to his right to look at his sister and her fiance, then to his left to look at Wen Qing and Nie Huaisang, but all four could only shake their heads. They hadn't memorized the geography of random towns according to their accents, so they could only take Wei Wuxian's word for it.

Luckily, if there was anything they had learned to trust throughout the simulation, it was that.

Finally, after thinking it over for a bit more, Wei Wuxian mentally added, 'Maybe the Yueyang Chang's case was too big of an blow. Perhaps he doesn't want to be among the clans and sects anymore, so, unable to give up on his aspirations, he's chosen to night hunt around, solving as many problems as he can.'

Remembering the corpse that had been found in Yi City, Lan Wangji thought for a moment, then bowed lowly in respect for the fallen cultivator. However, as he did, he couldn't help but connect the line "doesn't want to be among the clans and sects anymore" to someone else:

'Why is he here?' the newly-returned Wei Wuxian had asked, seeing Hanguang-jun coming to the aid of the juniors. 'I need to get out of here.'

Part of Lan Wangji hoped that the events which led Wei Wuxian to want to leave behind the cultivation world were not as severe as the ones that had led Xiao Xingchen to do so. The rest of him knew that was a foolish wish.

Right now, Xiao Xingchen and A-Qing were walking down a wide, flat road with grasses as high as a person's waist growing on both sides.

Suddenly, A-Qing stumbled with an "Ah!"

"What's wrong?" Xiao Xingchen immediately asked, turning towards her.

"Ugh. Nothing. My ankle's just twisted."

Except it… wasn't. Even without Wen Qing's confirmation, that much was obvious. A-Qing exclamation had been one of surprise, upon seeing a black figure in the grass.

(A figure she wouldn't have been able to see if she had actually been blind, necessitating the lie.)

'Dead or alive, dealing with that will be a pain,' she thought, glaring at the possibly-alive body. 'I don't want Daozhang to find it.'

Lan Qiren sighed, but knew trying to lecture someone in the simulation would be about as effective as trying to lecture the real Wei Wuxian.

"Daozhang, let's go, let's go," the girl requested. "Let's rest a bit in whatever city's up ahead. I'm so tired!"

"Didn't you twist your ankle? Do you want me to carry you?" the kind man asked.

Lighting up at the suggestion, A-Qing knocked her pole against the ground a few times and ecstatically shouted, "Yes! Yes! Yes!"

The cultivator turned around and kneeled on one leg, waiting for her to get on. Just as A-Qing was about to throw herself over, Xiao Xingchen suddenly stopped her.

"Daozhang?"

Pursing his lips together sternly, Xiao Xingchen stood up and looked around: "...Something smells like blood."

"Hm," Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow, slightly impressed Xiao Xingchen had been able to smell it from such a large distance away. It appeared his cultivation was truly as high as the rumors said.

However, at that moment a gust of wind swept by, bringing the air near the body toward them.

'Ah, I can smell it too,' she observed.

But then-

"Really? Why can't I smell it?" the girl asked. "Do you think families around here are killing livestock?"

"She's scarily good at lying!" Nie Huaisang gaped, and quite a few people nodded in agreement.

However, a moment later (as though Heaven itself wanted to go against her wishes), the person in the bushes coughed. It was nearly imperceptible, but Xiao Xingchen's hearing was good enough to identify it. He immediately turned toward the source.

With hurried steps, he approached the man laying on the ground. Stepping into the bushes, he squatted down beside the collapsed person, reaching over to check on them.

Seeing that Xiao Xingchen had already discovered the person anyway, A-Qing stomped on the ground, then pretended to find her way over. After a few (faked) wrong turns, she eventually made her way toward Xiao Xingchen.

Jiang Yanli moved close, but, due to all the blood, was unable to make out the victim's face.

"What happened?" A-Qing asked.

"Someone is lying here," Xiao Xingchen responded, feeling for the person's pulse.

"So that's why the smell of blood is so strong. Are they dead? Should we make a ditch and bury them?"

Uncaring for the typical tradition of respecting the dead, she reached forward with her bamboo pole and poked the body a few times, digging into its shoulder.

Watching the interaction, Wei Wuxian couldn't help but snort: 'Of course. A dead person is much less trouble than a living person. A-Qing must deeply hope this person is dead.'

However-

"He's not dead yet, just badly injured," Xiao Xingchen revealed. After giving it some thought, he gently shifted so that he was carrying the person on his back. A-Qing pouted seeing her seat stolen, but, unable to see that expression, Xiao Xingchen simply began to walk towards the city without another word. Knowing that there was no way Xiao Xingchen wouldn't help, A-Qing soon sighed and began to follow along. A mere moment later, it because obvious where they were going.

‘Wait, isn't that… the path Lan Zhan and I took to get into Yi City?’ Wei Wuxian realized.

Once again, a heavy layer of foreboding dread filled Jiang Yanli’s blood.

Sure enough, Yi City was at the end of the road. However, unlike before, its gates were unmarred by graffiti, and the doors remained in pristine condition. The inside of the town was also quite fine. Despite being an obscure place, there was a distinct liveliness to the area. Disaster had yet to strike.

‘Considering the state of the person I’m carrying, no shop will let me inside,’ Xiao Xingchen realized.

Luckily (or unluckily, depending on your point of view), he knew where to go.

“Excuse me, sir,” he nodded once at a city watchman. “Are there any idle coffin homes in this city we could rest in?”

Nodding once, the guard responded, “There’s one over there. The guy guarding it passed away last month, so there’s no one living there right now. Say, you’re blind, aren’t you? Here, let me lead you over.”

And thus, he did. As they went, they passed by bustling crowds of children all playing together, their parents either working or watching fondly on the side. All the town’s citizens seemed content.

And all of them had been gone in the future.

Lan Xichen frowned, casting a glance at a young girl who had just tripped in the street. Her older brother rushed over to help her up at once, and she quickly returned to the game they were playing.

What had happened to all these people?

Finally, the group reached the coffin home.

It was the building Xiao Xingchen’s body had been found inside.

Lan Wangji frowned.

“Thank you,” Xiao Xingchen told the watchman, heading inside to set the injured man down. Reaching into his Qiankun pouch, he pulled out several valuable elixirs and pushed them through the person’s teeth.

‘Genuine elixirs?’ Jin Guangshan gaped. ‘Is he really going to waste them on a stranger?’

It appeared he was.

Meanwhile, A-Qing wandered around, feeling at the surroundings and pretending to investigate what was there. It was truly a great act; even though Xiao Xingchen wasn’t watching, they wouldn't have been able to tell she wasn't genuinely blind without prior knowledge.

"Wow, there's so many things in here!" she observed. "Here's a basin!"

"Is there a stove?"

"There is!"

After thinking over the danger for a moment, Xiao Xingchen requested, "A-Qing, why don't you try to boil some water. Be careful. Don't hurt yourself."

Although she pouted at the request, A-Qing nonetheless got to work. Soon, Xiao Xingchen had cleaned up the unknown person's face, revealing a handsome young man.

One who they knew.

"Oh, come on! Him?! Seriously?!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

Despite having already suspected it, Wei Wuxian's face fell as well.

It was Xue Yang.

'Enemies really can't avoid each other, huh?' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Xiao Xingchen you really are… hopelessly unlucky.'

It was clear that Wei Wuxian wished he could do something, and was angry at his own helplessness.

The watchers (who were currently viewing a possible future in which Wei Wuxian was watching a past which happened while he was dead) were even more helpless, and understood his feelings quite well.

'If I'm guessing the years correctly, this is probably after Jin Guangyao became Chief Cultivator,'* Wei Wuxian thought. 'The damage on his body seems to imply he just got out of a difficult situation; Xue Yang most likely just escaped Jin Guangyao's 'elimination.' Since he had failed to kill him, Jin Guangyao naturally wouldn't want anyone to find out. Or maybe he believed that Xue Yang was going to bleed out, and thus told the public that he had already been eliminated.'

Nie Mingjue cursed, furious at the carelessness of his to-be sworn brother.

"Let's not make assumptions… Da-ge," Lan Xichen told him, switching to the term his future self would one day use for extra reassurance. "Whether A-Yao thought he was dead, or simply didn't want the public to panic will be revealed eventually. I'm sure everything will make sense then."

After thinking the words over for a moment, Nie Mingjue finally nodded in acceptance.

The blue silhouette of Wei Wuxian sighed: 'Villains always tend to outlast heroes, huh? On the brink of death, Xue Yang was saved by his old rival Xingchen. It's unfortunate that Xiao Xingchen wasn't cautious enough to examine his face. He's saved his enemy — the one who made his life this way — completely by accident. Although A-Qing can see, she isn't a cultivator, she she has no way of knowing of Xue Yang, much less the intense hatred between him and Xiao Xingchen. She doesn't even know Xiao Xingchen's name.'

"This is just getting worse and worse," Lan Qiren pursed his lips together, frowning deeply.

Unable to resist, Nie Huaisang piped in, "It's too bad Da-ge isn't still alive. The only reason Xue Yang wasn't executed to begin with is because of that, right?"

"Huh?" Nie Mingjue paused. "Well, I-"

"It sure is fortunate that he thinks so little of himself that he didn't even bother trying to find a solution. I really don't know why he would ever think his life could possibly involve more people than just himself. Well, let's hope everything Xue Yang does after this justifies that decision of yours, Sect Leader Nie."

By this point, even Wen Ruohan couldn't resist gaping at the now cheerfully-smiling Nie heir. The faked aura of innocence was blinding in its intensity, and Nie Mingjue couldn't muster up a single sound. The blow wasn't just powerful; it had a layer of unjustified cruelty that made it truly devastating beyond compare. Lan Xichen hadn't even known Huaisang had it in himself to be so ruthless.

(Privately, Lan Qiren felt that if Nie Huaisang had managed to show even a tenth of that bravery and audaciousness while night hunting, his brother would have had far less to worry about.)

Luckily (unlike all of them), the simulated Wei Wuxian continued focusing, unable to hear what Huaisang had said. Watching Xiao Xingchen continue to tend to Xue Yang, he sighed.

'Xiao Xingchen really couldn't be any more unlucky. It's as though all the ominous energy in the world has tainted him.'

Suddenly, Xue Yang frowned. Having been in the middle of tending to his wounds, Xiao Xingchen noticed right away and rested a hand on the other's chest firmly.

"Don't move," he ordered.

Xue Yang tensed at once. His eyes sprang open and he sat up, throwing aside the arm that had been on his chest and tumbling into the corner of the room. He glared at Xiao Xingchen, eyes bloodshot and wide. They made him resemble a trapped beast, filled with undisguised malice and cruelty.

Was this where Xiao Xingchen died? It seemed hard to believe Xue Yang would be able to beat him while so heavily injured, but this was the place Xiao Xingchen's body had been found, and-

Jiang Yanli gasped, clenching her hands together as the tension in the room became thicker than blood.

The watching A-Qing gripped tightly onto her bamboo pole, her breath stalling, and Wei Wuxian glared.

'Talk!' he mentally ordered of the scoundrel. 'Xiao Xingchen definitely won't have forgotten Xue Yang's voice.'

Madam Yu's eyes narrowed, and she checked on the positions of her children again as though she would need to protect them in the coming conflict.

Finally-

"What…" Xue Yang gasped out.

And Wei Wuxian's face fell.

"Oh, no," Nie Mingjue clenched his fists, his brother's earlier words ringing in his mind.

There was damage to Xue Yang's throat. It didn't matter if Xiao Xingchen knew his voice, there was no way he would possibly be able to recognize it now. The rascal coughed up a large quantity of blood, making his voice even hoarser.

Sitting on the edge of the bed, Xiao Xingchen raised his hands peacefully and assured, "I told you not to move. Be careful, your wounds are going to open. Don't worry; I saved you, so I obviously won't hurt you."

"You won't hurt him; that doesn't mean he won't hurt you," Madam Jin hissed out, the 'idiot' in her tone quite clear. To her right, her son nodded once and clenched his fists. As the only legitimate heir, Jin Zixuan had been spared a lot of the attacks and verbal traps that went on in Koi Tower. That didn't mean he wasn't aware that they went on behind the scenes.

And right now, watching this disaster unfold before his eyes, he couldn't help but move closer to Jiang Yanli, wanting to share some of the emotional strength she wielded every day.

After staring for several more seconds, breathing harshly through his damaged throat, Xue Yang began to understand the situation. It was obvious that Xiao Xingchen didn't recognize him, and he hadn't given himself away quite yet. With a roll of his eyes, he coughed once again then straightened up.

"Who are you?" he asked.

"You have eyes. Can't you see for yourself?" A-Qing interrupted. "He's a roaming cultivator. He went through such lengths to carry you here on his back — he even gave you magical elixirs to save you — and yet you're so mean!"

'Mean' she said. And yet, due to his throat, there was no way for her to have known he was being 'mean' just from his voice. She would have had to see him roll his eyes. Xue Yang frowned.

Wen Qing cursed, and Wen Ruohan leaned back in his chair. As clever as the girl was, she had no chance now that she'd given herself away.

The delinquent turned his cold eyes upon her and spoke sharply: "...You're blind?"

Someone swore-

"Do you discriminate against blind people?! Well, it was a blind person that saved you! A blind man was the one! No one else would have cared even if you rotted on the side of the road! The first words you said weren't even to thank Daozhang! How rude! And you called me blind in such a tone…" she turned away, breathing in sharply as if hurt by his words. "...What's wrong with being blind?"

The words had trailed off right at the end, and she began muttering to herself dejectedly. At once, Xiao Xingchen turned towards her, a look of calm sympathy on his face.

Even Wen Ruohan was impressed.

"Not bad," he admitted, watching as Wen Qing relaxed at once. It appeared A-Qing had truly been lying her whole life, to be able to react to Xue Yang's accusation so smoothly.

Xiao Xingchen moved to comfort A-Qing, and, once she was calm again, turned to Xue Yang to say, "Don't sit by the wall. I haven't bandaged your leg yet. Come here."

Xue Yang didn't respond, merely continuing to analyze the situation with an indifferent expression.

Sensing the hesitation, Xiao Xingchen added, "If it's not treated soon, you might end up crippled."

"All the better then," Jiang Cheng grumbled, quite visibly recalling the danger his future-nephew was put in thanks to the man.

However, Xiao Xingchen had no clue of what was to come, and remained earnest in his offer. Rather than attempting to run again, Xue Yang acknowledged the state his body was in and relaxed marginally in the corner. Based on the frown marring his face, it was clear he was thinking hard.

And it was easy for Wei Wuxian to guess what about.

'His body is covered in wounds. If he doesn't get help, he's not going to be able to go anywhere, no matter how much he wants to. I'm sure he thinks Xiao Xingchen is an idiot who placed himself right at Xue Yang's disposal. In that case, he might as well accept the help.'

Lan Xichen withheld another sigh. It was truly unfortunate that Jin Guangyao hadn't managed to kill this 'Xue Yang.' The wounds on the other's body made it clear the new Chief Cultivator had put in a valiant effort, but Xue Yang had wound up found by the worst possible person. A flash of pity filled him for both Xiao Xingchen and his to-be sworn brother.

It appeared Wei Wuxian's thoughts were right on the money. At once, Xue Yang's expression changed. He smiled and, in a voice full of gratitude, responded:

"Then… thank you, Daozhang."

Nie Huaisang couldn't help but shiver watching Xue Yang change from merciless to affectionate in an instant. Honestly, people who could act that well were terrifying!

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian's thoughts were much the same. Based on the tense expression on his face, as well as the way his gaze drifted toward A-Qing, it was clear that he was concerned for the girl.

'She can see just fine,' he recalled. 'If Xue Yang discovers this….'

He cut off, recalling the ghost form of the girl he knew was inevitable.

Xiao Xingchen approached with the water basin, ready to apply more care to Xue Yang's wounds. Silently, so as not to attract the other cultivator's attention, Xue Yang hid his left hand behind his back.

A hand which, as Wen Qing and the simulated Wei Wuxian moved closer to observe, was revealed to be missing a finger.

'Oh, so that's why he wore a black glove earlier,' Wei Wuxian realized. 'It looks like an old wound. And based on his actions, Xiao Xingchen definitely knows about it.'

Jiang Cheng lit up with a grin: "Then maybe, if Xiao Xingchen notices that-"

"He dies. We don't know how or why, but we do know that," Madam Yu snapped, the reminder sucking away the enthusiasm Jiang Cheng had felt. "A-Cheng… don't get your hopes up."

As soon as Madam Yu's attention left her son, Jiang Yanli moved closer to him, smiling comfortingly.

(A sharp pain stabbed into Madam Yu's heart, and she wondered if her husband would have said it a different way.)

While that was happening, Xiao Xingchen completed his aid rather admirably. After applying medicine to the wound, he bandaged it in a remarkably neat manner.

Wen Qing smiled slightly in approval.

"It's finished, but it's best for you to avoid moving right now, or your bones might dislocate again" Xiao Xingchen reported.

Rather than considering the words themselves, Xue Yang narrowed his gaze on his caretaker: 'He really doesn't recognize me.'

Quite a few people sent fierce glares over, clearly communicating just what they'd do to fix that if they were able to interact with the simulation. It was nowhere near as bad as when Lotus Pier was burned, but this slow build-up of tension towards the inevitably tragic conclusion left them quite annoyed at their own powerlessness.

Unfortunately, there was nothing they could do.

Although he was covered in blood and wounds, a lazy grin formed on Xue Yang's face as he asked, "Is Daozhang not going to ask who I am? Or why I'm so badly injured, for that matter."

Turning to put away the medical kit and bandages, Xiao Xingchen softly responded, "If you won't answer regardless, then why would I ask? I just happened to see you and decided to lend a hand. It's not difficult for me anyways. After your injuries heal, we'll go our separate ways. If I were you, there would be many things I wouldn't want others to ask me about."

Giving an internal sigh, the blue glow that was Wei Wuxian thought, 'Even if Xiao Xingchen did ask, Xue Yang would probably just make up a seamless explanation and keep messing with him. It's natural for people to have complicated pasts; Xiao Xingchen only avoided inquiring too much out of respect…. After Xue Yang recovers, I'm sure they won't just 'go separate ways' either.'

Unfortunately, ignorant of what was to come, Xiao Xingchen then picked up a large pile of straw, telling the girl, "A-Qing, since he's injured, we're giving him the bed. I'm afraid I'll have to trouble you to sleep in the coffin. I'll set down a layer of hay, so it should stay relatively warm."

Despite her occasionally bratty behavior, A-Qing's response was a simple: "There's nothing troublesome about it. It's good enough just having a place to sleep. I won't be cold, so you don't need to give me your outer robes this time."

Smiling at that response, Xiao Xingchen reached over and patted her on the head twice.

Jin Zixuan shifted awkwardly. Although his mother wouldn't say as much, he knew she had reacted the same way as Madam Yu when A-Qing's thieving was first revealed — with scorn and distrust. After all, she had even tried to steal from Xiao Xingchen, who had been so kind to her.

And yet here she was, perfectly satisfied with living conditions that Jin Zixuan had never experienced in his life. Her cleverness and confidence had seemingly been offset by her greed before, but, after watching this, Jin Zixuan couldn't deny the complexity of the situation.

He let out a large breath of air and rubbed his temples tiredly.

“Well then, off I go,” Xiao Xingchen informed them, venturing outside to go night hunting once again and leaving A-Qing alone with Xue Yang. As they had seen in the montage earlier, Xiao Xingchen never let A-Qing follow when there was a chance of it being a dangerous night hunt. It was quite responsible.

“But that’s assuming she’ll be safer here,” Madam Jin sighed.

As if to prove her right, a moment later Xue Yang’s voice rang out: “Little Blind, come here.”

Jiang Yanli sucked in a breath.

“What?” A-Qing asked, poking her head out from the coffin she had been laying inside.

“Do you want candy?”

At the suggestion, A-Qing lit up for a moment, before she forced herself back and responded, “I’m not interested. I’m not coming.”

“Smart girl,” Wen Qing breathed out, nodding once.

“Are you sure you don’t want to eat it?” Xue Yang asked, his smile stretching out into a threatening sweetness. “Are you too scared to come? Do you think I actually can’t move? If you don’t head on over, I’ll just go and find you.”

“You-” Nie Mingjue stood up at once, righteous fury burning through his soul.

(Suddenly, Nie Huaisang wondered if implying that his brother was responsible for what was to come was a little crueler than he had intended for it to be.)

After another moment of hesitation, A-Qing slowly got out of the coffin and tapped her way over to Xue Yang’s room. She slipped through the door, and saw a small object fly towards her.

Jiang Cheng subconsciously flinched back, and even Lan Xichen tensed at the attack.

Wei Wuxian also reacted, the blue outline of his soul jerking back, a strangled, ‘Watch out!’ echoing in his mind as he tried to determine what the weapon was.

Then, simultaneously, Nie Huaisang and Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened in horror as they realized the same thing.

It was a trap!

And then-

The object hit the expressionless, unblinking A-Qing’s forehead, and she jumped back at once, shouting “Hey! What did you throw at me?!”

Annoyance and confusion were clear in her expression now, but, even when she'd first noticed the flying object, there had been nothing before. It was only after the red sphere made contact with her body that she had acknowledged it.

"He was testing her blindness," Wen Ruohan realized. "And she…."

"Kept up the act," Lan Qiren finished. Trickery and the ability to lie were not skills that the Lan Sect had ever valued, and yet, given the situation, even Lan Qiren couldn't help but be awed by the girl's skill.

Now that A-Qing had passed his test, Xue Yang began to relax.

"It's candy for you," he responded. "I forgot that you're blind and can't catch. It landed by your feet."

"Stop calling me Blind-this and Blind-that. I have a name — my name is A-Qing!" A-Qing humphed and squatted down, searching around for it with her hand as though she were really blind. Once she found it, she wiped it off on her clothes, swallowed, and then plopped it in her mouth.

She had never tasted anything like this before.

Despite the tense situation, Jiang Yanli couldn't help but smile as A-Qing crunched the candy in her teeth, practically glowing in joy. It reminded her of Wei Wuxian's reaction every time he got to have her Lotus Root and Pork Rib Soup.

"You're a strange person," A-Qing said at last. "You're covered in blood and you're this injured, and yet you have candy with you."

Hearing that, Xue Yang grinned and responded, "When I was young, I really liked candy, but I couldn't get it no matter what. I could only watch other people eat it. I always told myself that if I became wealthier one day, I would always carry an infinite amount of candy with me to eat."

Right as he finished that explanation, A-Qing swallowed what was left of the candy. Although she was still scared of the person before her, her desire for candy outweighed that.

"This is good. I've never had it before. Do you have any more?" she asked.

"Of course I do," he smirked. "Come here, and I'll give you some more."

A-Qing stood up and, using her bamboo pole, walked over to him.

"It's a promise then," she insisted, acting out the tapping of her bamboo pole on the ground. "If I come over, you better give me some more!"

One step. Two. She got closer and closer, and then, when she was just a meter way, saw a silent flash of silver from Xue Yang's sleeve. Jiangzai pointed towards A-Qing.

“He’s still testing her?” Nie Mingjue gaped. “I mean, he’s right to be suspicious, but-”

But A-Qing continued forward in a calm and orderly manner, not showing even the slightest trace of hesitation. When the tip of the sword was a half inch from her stomach, Xue Yang finally lowered it and put it away.

Lan Xichen was starting to feel lightheaded from the constant stress.

(That was at least still better than Nie Mingjue, who looked about twenty seconds away from trying to fist-fight the simulated Xue Yang, regardless of how futile that would be.)

Fulfilling his promise, Xue Yang pulled out two pieces of candy. He gave one to A-Qing, and plopped the other in his own mouth. A few seconds passed as he rolled the treat around his tongue, and A-Qing maintained her act of blindness dutifully. Finally:

“A-Qing, where’s that Daozhang of yours gone in the middle of the night?”

Licking and munching on the candy, A-Qing thought for a moment before responding, “I think he went hunting.”

“Hunting?” Xue Yang tittered. “More like night hunting.”

“Eh? Is that it? The two are pretty much the same anyway, what’s the difference? It’s just helping people fight ghosts and beasts without receiving any money for your efforts.”

Several of the watchers laughed at her reaction, but paused when the illusion of Wei Wuxian gave an impressed whistle.

‘What a clever girl,’ he grinned. ‘I see. It’s not that A-Qing can’t remember what Xiao Xingchen told her; in fact, she probably remembers better than anyone. She said ‘night hunt’ wrong on purpose. Since Xue Yang corrected her, he practically confirmed that he’s also a cultivator. His test failed, and then he got tested by her. This maiden is so young, and yet she already has such tactics.’

“That’s what she was doing?” Lan Qiren asked, having trouble believing Wei Wuxian’s claim. He looked over at A-Qing again, focusing on her still-calm face. Despite everything that had happened, A-Qing’s act hadn’t faltered once.

(But she still ended up dead, and Xue Yang had lived. Clearly, this wouldn’t last.)

As A-Qing left the room, having convinced Xue Yang of her blindness, she finally allowed herself to frown: ‘This person is probably a cultivator, too. And a very dangerous one. I have to tell Daozhang as soon as possible.’

However, the next morning, after hearing A-Qing’s explanation, Xiao Xingchen responded, “You already ate his candy. You should stop trying to chase him off. He’ll leave once his injuries are healed — no one could be willing to stay in a coffin home.”

‘Ahh! Tell him! Tell him about the missing finger!’ Wei Wuxian mentally shouted. ‘Otherwise Xiao Xingchen won’t know he’s Xue Yang! Ah… but A-Qing doesn’t know why the missing finger’s important, so she won’t tell!’

Nie Mingjue gave a groan of defeat, and even Nie Huaisang (who had often heard that groan in regards to himself) couldn’t disagree. The kind, foolish man before them was going to end up a corpse in this coffin home, after all. And the brilliant girl doing her best to save the other would wind up a ghost with a torn-out tongue.

“A-Qing, there’s no need to worry.”

“But he-”

“Are you talking about me?” a voice asked from behind.

Jin Zixuan jumped in his seat, already on edge from the previous interactions.

But A-Qing recovered without missing a beat, snapping back, “You think we’re talking about you?! Don’t flatter yourself! Narcissist!”

With one last huff, she shook her bamboo pole angrily in the air and then stormed back inside. Once out of sight, however, she hid near the door and learned close to it, listening in on the conversation.

Outside, Xiao Xingchen had turned to Xue Yang and asked, “Your wounds haven’t healed yet, but you’re walking around already. Are you sure you’re fine?”

“It’ll heal faster if I walk around,” Xue Yang answered easily. “And it’s not like my legs are broken or anything. I’m used to injuries like these. I grew up getting beaten by others, you know.”

“As in… training?” Jiang Cheng asked, scowling in confusion at the man.

Similarly befuddled by Xue Yang’s words, after a long pause Xiao Xingchen could only respond, “...Oh.”

“Daozhang, are the things you brought here gonna be for repairing that roof?”

Nodding, Xiao Xingchen explained, “Yes, I’ll most likely be taking up temporary residence here for a while. The broken roof won’t be beneficial to A-Qing or you, given your injuries.”

‘Idiot. You’re putting trust in the wrong person,’ Wen Qing cursed, Wen Ning’s corpse flying into her mind. ‘Why are half the people I meet like this? I thought A-Ning was unique in his stupidity, but you and Wei Wuxian are also idiotically self-sacrificing, no matter what happens to you. Honestly....’

Easily reading Wen Qing’s thoughts, Wen Ruohan couldn’t help but mentally comment, ‘Qing, if your other-self really did perform a traitorous golden core transfer for two boys you’d only known for a handful of days, then you have no room to talk.’

Then, to the surprise of most of the watchers, Xue Yang then asked, "Should I help?"

"No need. I'll be fine."

"Daozhang, do you know how to do this?"

With an awkward laugh, Xiao Xingchen responded, "Sorry, no. I've never done this before."

And so the two of them began to work together, Xue Yang giving verbal directions (with the helpful addition of a few witty comments), and Xiao Xingchen doing the work.

"That Xue Yang… his style of speaking is quite unusual," Lan Qiren observed, finding the man's inflections and sense of humor to be odd. His nephews nodded in agreement, while Nie Mingjue fell silent, thinking that over.

"I think it's… a sense of humor common in street markets?" Nie Huaisang finally spoke up, then (flinching back when everyone turned their attention on him) quickly explained, "Wei-xiong brought me to one before, and taught me how to not draw attention. He-he said most of their humor uses a 'presumptuous tone' and that I should try to fit that if I wanted to go, um, unnoticed."

"When was this?!" Nie Mingjue demanded.

"I… think it was a few years ago, when we went to Lotus Pier!" Nie Huaisang said (lied), knowing that telling him it happened during the last discussion conference would go quite poorly. After all, during that time, Nie Huaisang was technically supposed to have been studying in preparation for the competition.

Luckily, his Da-ge seemed to buy that lie, so Nie Huaisang's life would go on a little bit longer.

Within the simulation, however, one person wasn't so easily convinced. As A-Qing stood and listened to the way Xiao Xingchen kept laughing at Xue Yang's remarks, she moved her lips, looking to be mouthing out syllables.

Focusing on the girl's mouth, Wei Wuxian tried to read the words, 'That looks like… 'let me… kill you, damn thing.' Ah. Well, I feel the same.'

Madam Yu held in an urge to snort, finding the girl's outrage amusing.

'The severe injuries that nearly took Xue Yang's life were partly due to Xiao Xingchen. The two had a relationship of absolute hatred. In his heart, Xue Yang probably hopes Xiao Xingchen will die in the most gruesome way possible, and yet he's still able to converse with Xiao Xingchen in such a lighthearted manner,' Wei Wuxian frowned.

Nie Mingjue nodded in agreement, having trouble believing anyone would be able to hide so much animosity behind such a realistic grin. He unconsciously shifted closer to Nie Huaisang, and noticed his bother lean close to him as well.

“And then — do you know what that man told me?”

“No, what did he say?” Xiao Xingchen asked, turning his attention to Xue Yang once more.

After watching for a moment longer, Wei Wuxian sighed and continued, ‘If I was the one hiding behind the window watching all this, I would have killed Xue Yang regardless of the consequences to avoid later trouble.’

Although Jiang Yanli shivered at the cold tone her shidi spoke in, Wen Ruohan and Nie Mingjue both nodded in agreement, the latter glaring at Xue Yang hatefully. Knowing the tragedies that were to come, even Lan Xichen found himself wishing that was possible. However-

‘The one watching all this isn’t me; it’s A-Qing. I’m not in my own body, and, even if A-Qing wants to take action, she isn’t capable of killing him.’

So Wei Wuxian could only frown in silence, watching the memories continue. Having been just as helpless as him throughout the entirety of the simulation, the watchers could certainly understand that.

(Most especially Lan Wangji.)

There was a flash forward, and the fog grew even thicker.

“About a month later — in A-Qing’s memory, not a month the real world,” Lan Jingyi elaborated, then, voice lowered as though he was whispering to his friend, added “Say, is anyone else getting confused about all the layers of time here?”

“Well, that’s why I said we should do everything chronologically, but you-”

“Jin Ling, not now,” Lan Sizhui desperately requested. There was an annoyed humph in the background.

Jin Zixuan grinned at the interactions, and Madam Jin give a fond smile.

Meanwhile, A-Qing had been slowly getting ready for bed on the pile of hay she had made her own. The evening sunlight peaked out through the clouds, giving the air a lackadaisical atmosphere. Before her was a Xue Yang in casual clothes, his bandages long-since discarded.

“Under Xiao Xingchen’s meticulous care, Xue Yang’s wounds had mostly healed,” Lan Sizhui revealed, and (steadily ignoring the groans of annoyance the other three had given at his words) continued, "Aside from how he limped slightly as he walked, nothing posed any inconvenience. Despite this, he still hadn’t mentioned anything about leaving. He continued to live in the cramped coffin home with the two others.”

‘What is he scheming?’ Wei Wuxian wondered.

“Hmm,” Nie Huaisang thought for a moment, then turned to Jiang Cheng to suggest, “Revenge?”

A frown: “Why would he keep waiting? Surely he’s healthy enough by now to do something.”

“Hm.”

Checking one last time to ensure that A-Qing had been taken care of, Xiao Xingchen turned to leave, only to pause when Xue Yang’s hoarse voice asked, “Daozhang, why don’t you take me with you tonight? You’re going night-hunting, right?”

“That’s strange,” Wen Qing commented. “His throat should have healed by now. It looks healed, so-”

‘He’s purposefully disguising his voice now,’ Wei Wuxian realized with a curse.

“That clever little rat,” Nie Mingjue growled, his eyes switching back and forth between the resting A-Qing and the ignorant Xiao Xingchen. If something happened to them-

(Except, they already knew what was going to happen, didn’t they?)

Unaware of all that, Xiao Xingchen thought over Xue Yang’s request for a moment before laughing and shaking his head: “You probably shouldn’t. If you start talking, then I’ll start laughing. If I start laughing, my sword won’t be steady anymore.”

Giving a piteous pout, Xue Yang promised, “Then I won’t talk. I’ll carry your sword and help you. Please don’t give me a cold shoulder.”

After hesitating for a moment longer, Xiao Xingchen (well-accustomed to having to take care of his shidi on Baoshan Sanren’s mountain) found himself nodding and caving in.

‘Xue Yang definitely isn’t so nice as to offer Xiao Xingchen help on the night hunt,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘If A-Qing doesn’t go, she’ll miss something important.’

But, contrary to Wei Wuxian’s fears, A-Qing was far too clever to fall for Xue Yang’s innocent tone. After the two had left, she waited a handful of seconds, then sprung out of the coffin and followed them. Unfortunately, in waiting to ensure she wouldn’t be discovered, A-Qing had lost sight of the other two.

‘While he was washing vegetables earlier, Daozhang told us to be careful while playing around because there’s a small village being plagued by walking corpses nearby. I bet they’re there,’ A-Qing thought. She rushed over to the village. Once there, she slipped into a small dog hole in the fence, then hid behind one of the houses, sneakily peeking out.

The blue shadow of Wei Wuxian suddenly flinched and straightened up.

Lan Wangji tensed.

Before them, under Xue Yang's playful watch, Xiao Xingchen stood with his sword through a man's chest. This wasn't a walking corpse; based on the man's appearance and reactions, it was clear that he was still alive.

"What?" Lan Xichen breathed out. His uncle approached in a hurry, but, no matter what angle he looked at it from, the situation remained unchanged.

Trembling, Jiang Yanli backed up and fell to the ground, a sickened feeling filling her stomach. After watching the massacre of Lotus Pier (the endless deaths of her friends and family as they fell one after another) this was too much for her to handle. A sudden lightheadedness overwhelmed her, and her breaths came out in rushed, desperate gasps.

Where a normal young girl might have screamed at the sight, A-Qing merely stiffened, her breathing stopping momentarily. Standing amid a sea of villagers' corpses, Xiao Xingchen sheathed his sword.

"How can there not be even a single living person in this village?" he wondered, tranquil as ever.

All at once, Wen Ruohan realized what Xue Yang had done. Raising an eyebrow, he gave a low hum and turned his gaze on the street rat once more. It appeared brat's cruelty was even more impressive than the Chief Cultivator had realized. No wonder Jin Guangshan had been willing to risk so much for him.

'Still, he's nowhere near as valuable as Wei Wuxian,' Sect Leader Wen couldn't resist adding.

The ignorant Xiao Xingchen then disbelievingly added, "It's quite strange. They were all walking corpses."

"No," someone shook their head. "No they weren't-"

"Yeah. Good thing your sword can identify corpse energy on its own," Xue Yang answered, his voice solemn, confused, and somewhat pained — completely at ends with the devious grin on his face. "Or else, with just the two of us, we might have been in a lot of trouble."

Nodding in agreement, Xiao Xingchen added, "Let's examine the village again. If there really aren't any survivors, we should burn these corpses on our own."

They walked into the distance side by side, leaving A-Qing behind. She waited for nearly a minute, frozen in shock, until finally strength began to return to her legs. She sneaked out from behind the house toward the corpses, her hand covering her horrified, gaping mouth.

She looked down.

'They were all killed by a stab to the heart,' she and Wei Wuxian noticed. 'Wait… aren't these people-'

A memory formed on top of the one they were already watching.

“Several days ago~” Ouyang Zizhen sang out, clearly having no idea what that time period referred to. The new memory displayed Xiao Xingchen, Xue Yang, and A-Qing walking through town and coming across a handful of idle men playing dice at the entrance to a village. As the men looked up, they saw a blind man, a blind girl, and another man who limped, and couldn’t help but laugh at the pathetic sight. They pointed and snorted and attracted each other’s attention toward the scene, lording their own superior health over the trio before them.

‘Oh? I wonder, would you still be able to laugh at them if I paralyzed your legs and kicked you toward a pack of wolves?’ Wen Qing wondered, a truly vicious smile on her face. However, a moment later, that smile of hers disappeared.

Her mostly-exaggerated desire for revenge had just been carried out to the fullest, after all.

Now that A-Qing thought about it, Xue Yang’s grin at the men hadn’t carried even a trace of amusement back then. His eyes hadn’t been smiling with him. She shivered and clutched her arms tighter around herself.

“Rotten man,” she hissed.

Then, she shook herself out of her fear and moved to investigate. After flipping over quite a few corpses, she began moving through them one by one and opening their eyelids. All of them had white eyes. Livor mortis had already climbed over most of their faces. As he watched A-Qing investigate, Wei Wuxian’s heart sunk lower and lower.

‘Although they look a lot like walking corpses, these people had indeed been alive. The only problem was that they had been under corpse poisoning.’

Nodding in agreement, Wen Qing kneeled close to one of the bodies, observing the reddish-purple powder around the woman’s mouth.

‘Even if they haven’t finished transforming into walking corpses yet, the people infected will exhibit several traits walking corpses have,’ the Yiling Patriarch added. ‘One of which is emitting corpse energy.’

Remember how close the situation his disciples had been was to this, Lan Xichen’s frown grew increasingly stern. Lan Jingyi had also been infected by corpse powder, but, thanks to Wei Wuxian’s help, would be able to return to normal with no consequences. These people, whose circumstances had been so similar, were instead murdered.

(Regardless of whose weapon had done the killing, it was clear that these villagers were victims of Xue Yang’s malice.)

A-Qing opened a victim’s mouth.

“Huh?” she blinked. “Why has his tongue been cut off?”

“A cut-out tongue yet again?” Nie Huaisang complained, inching away from the gruesome scene. “I’m starting to think that Xue Yang guy has a fetish for this.”

Nie Mingjue sighed at the comment, but was too emotionally exhausted by the simulation to put up much of a fight.

'I see,' Wei Wuxian's thoughts continued. 'They would have shouted for help. Although Xiao Xingchen can't see, Shuanghua can point towards corpse energy. Because the villagers had lost their tongues, the only sounds they would have been able to make were mangled groans similar to the noises real walking corpses make. Xiao Xingchen would have had no reason to doubt that all the villagers he had come to protect were already dead.'

"That's horrible!"

"That little-"

Nie Mingjue couldn't even finish his curse, too overwhelmed by fury to speak another word.

'It's too bad Da-ge isn't still alive,' Nie Huaisang had said, giving a dramatic sigh. 'The only reason Xue Yang wasn't executed to begin with is because he died, right?'

It wasn't Nie Mingjue's fault, but it was — if he hadn't been so careless with his own life — if he had looked for another solution sooner, trained Huaisang better-

Perhaps, this wouldn't have happened.

"That bastard," A-Qing muttered, staring at the white eyes of the corpses. "Is he really helping Daozhang?"

'No!' Wei Wuxian mentally shouted. 'Those people were still alive at the time. They could have been helped! Please don't believe Xue Yang just like this!'

Jiang Yanli sucked in an apprehensive breath.

Luckily, A-Qing had sharp intuition. Although she lacked the cultivation knowledge required to understand what happened, she continued to listen to her gut instinct:

'No. No way. I don't know what that guy's problem is, but that bastard can't possibly be a good guy. From now on, every time they go out night hunting, I'll have to follow them.'

Wei Wuxian's figure nodded insistently in agreement.

"With A-Qing's mind made up, she turned on her heel and began to run back, desperate to return to the hut before Xiao Xingchen and Xue Yang did," Lan Jingyi revealed. "Meanwhile, Senior Wei watched on, helpless to change what was to come."

The world faded to black.

And returned to white shortly after.

The atmosphere was tense and sensitive, as though they were all wound tightly enough to snap. With the exception of a scant few (read ‘Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan’), everyone was too worried about Xiao Xingchen and A-Qing to raise their voices.

Luckily, someone eventually got up the nerve to speak.

“Will there be any way for us to find Qing-xiaojie after we leave the simulation?” Lan Wangji asked. “Regardless of whether we manage to stop Xue Yang or not, it may be wise to get in contact with her.”

“One street-rat orphan among a million?” Wen Ruohan asked. “I highly doubt it. Not with the amount of information we have.”

The second jade frowned at that response, but didn’t disagree.

“And what about Xue Yang?” Lan Xichen asked. “We need to determine what to do with him.”

“Well… we agreed to not punish for events that have yet to occur, but given what he did I’d say it’s obvious that-”

“No,” Lan Wangji shook his head, bowing once in apology for cutting Yu-furen off. “We made a decision at the beginning of the simulation, and I would like to stick to that. We will not punish for events that have yet to occur. The current Xue Yang is only a young child.”

“So we can’t kill him, but we can’t just leave him alone either,” Nie Mingjue concluded.

After thinking for a moment, Madam Jin suggested, “Why not just have one of the sects take him in? Not necessarily to be a cultivator — it would simply be best to make sure we monitor him.”

Jin Guangshan straightened up, but (at his wife’s bloodthirsty glare) refrained from volunteering the Jin Sect as a place to take him. In all honesty, that was probably for the best. Given that it had been revealed that he had protected Xue Yang after Nie Mingjue’s death, he doubted that would go over well.

To Jin Guangshan’s left, Wen Ruohan considered whether to volunteering his own sect. The other sects would no doubt disagree, but he was sure they could be pressured into caving over something like this. However, the more he thought about it, the less appealing it seemed. Even Xue Yang himself had admitted that Wei Wuxian was his superior in every way (except, of course, in senseless cruelty). If Wen Ruohan did accept Xue Yang, the other sects could use that as further justification to hinder his relationship with Wei Wuxian. In addition, he had no reason to believe the two would get along even if he did attain both.

No sense in aiming for a rat if it meant loosing track of the prized fox.

“There’s also a matter of finding him,” Nie Mingjue pointed out. “ Though… if we do manage to track him down, the Nie Sect would be willing to take him. Given what we’ve seen of him, I’d say he probably fits better with us than with the Lan or Jiang Sects.”

No one asked why the Jin and Wen hadn't even been considered.

“We can search for ways to find the boy later,” Lan Qiren decided. “For now, I would prefer to hold off on making any decisions until we’ve seen all there is to see of him. The simulation has an annoying habit of hiding certain information for a more surprising reveal later.”

Wen Qing flinched at that, wondering once again whose core it was that burned in the future Jiang Cheng’s chest.

“Fine, then. But what-”

There was a pulse of energy from above.

Conversation cut off at once, and everyone looked towards the pure white ceiling (their sensitivity to resentful energy having apparently increased once again).

Someone cleared their throat, then greeted, “Yu-furen, Sect Leaders. Is this an okay time?”

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli lit up, greeting her shidi enthusiastically. Jiang Cheng straightened as well, about to ask about the situation outside when-

“A-Li, A-Cheng. I… are you both well?” Jiang Fengmian’s calm, soothing voice inquired.

“A-Die?!” Jiang Cheng asked, having not expected to hear from him again so soon.

“What?” Madam Yu wondered with a bitter hiss. “No greetings for your wife?”

“I… apologize, San-niang. How are you?”

“Fine,” she responded succinctly. “Nothing that was just revealed is especially urgent for you to know. We’re getting an explanation of how Yi City became the way it was, but haven't gotten to the most important parts yet.”

“I see. I’ll try to check in fairly regularly, so I would appreciate being updated if that changes,” Jiang Fengmian said.

“Of course,” Lan Qiren rushed to agree before Madam Yu could speak up. Honestly, things had been going relatively well for the couple before Jiang Fengmian had left; Lan Qiren could only hope that they would be able to get back to that point soon.

(But, given how annoyed Madam Yu had gotten at the response to her own reaction toward A-Qing’s thievery, quite a few people doubted the likelihood of that. Jiang Yanli resisted the urge to sigh.)

“Are the… future’s kids still doing well?” Jiang Fengmian asked. It was clear at once who he meant.

‘A-Ling,’ Jiang Yanli thought, her smile becoming even warmer.

Now that they had confirmation that Jin Ling's soul would be born, there was no real need to keep his existence a secret. However, Jiang Fengmian had felt it would be wrong to reveal something so important without his daughter's permission and presence, and so hadn't yet told anyone about it.

Jiang Yanli greatly appreciated the gesture.

"I believe they are safe, Sect Leader Jiang," Lan Xichen answered calmly. "They are waiting right now, but we have no reason to believe they are in any immediate danger. Hanguang-jun is protecting them. In addition, the slight roughhousing our narrators take part in imply a fairly happy ending after all this."

"If only they could hold themselves back for more than thirty seconds," Lan Qiren sighed.

"I — they're not… that bad," Jiang Cheng tried to protest, protective over his to-be nephew, but unwilling to directly disagree with a teacher like Lan Qiren.

Laughing heartily, Nie Mingjue corrected, "Sizhui isn't that bad. The rest are pretty awful."

"Hey!" Jin Zixuan protested. "Sect Leader Nie, just because you don't have one there-"

"No need to worry. I was including the future Huaisang in that group."

"What? Da-ge!"

"Now, now, no need to fight," Wei Wuxian said through his laughter, the unusually casual relationship between the sect leaders and the disciples drawing him in. "I can only keep this conversation going for so long. Focus, people!"

"Ah, sorry, Senior Wei," Jin Zixuan responded, deflating sheepishly.

There was a beat of silence. Then two. Slowly, the Jin heir's eyes widened in horror as he realized what he had just said. Then-

"'Senior' Wei?" the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian repeated. "Jin-gongzi… you do realize you're older than me, right?"

"I-I…" a bright flush covered his cheeks, nearly as dark as it had been when the simulation focused on him and Jiang Yanli. There was nothing he could say. The baby patriarch might know about the time travel, but Wen Ruohan's current expression made it very clear he was still unwilling to let other people know how much the simulation focused on Wei Wuxian. Therefore, the true explanation of 'Sorry, but I've been hearing the narrating juniors call you that for a while now, and the thirty-five-but-physically-twenty-four-but-technically-twenty-two version of you in the simulation seems like such a dad that I've started viewing you that way as well' was not an answer he could give. But then-

"A slip of the tongue, I'm sure," Wen Ruohan smiled, and no one dared to correct him.

Clearing his throat quickly, Jiang Fengmian nervously piped in, "Is there any other information you can give us about the simulation?"

“Of course,” Madam Yu hastily switched topic. “It appears Xue Yang is even worse than we expected him to be. A handful of people insulted him, so he massacered a village. He’s needlessly cruel and merciless towards those who have only the slightest relation towards those who offended him.”

She supposed she wasn’t really one to talk, but given the nature of the current situation, she still felt completely justified.

“I see. Thank you for telling me, San-niang.”

“...Who’s Xue Yang?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“He’s a man from the future,” Lan Qiren explained. “He’s wiped out several clans on his own using demonic cultivation. Unfortunately, he managed to escape from the future's Chief Cultivator's attempts at finishing him off, and has nearly completely recovered. Right now, he's posing a danger to several juniors from the Lan, Jin, Ouyang, and several other clans.”

“Can he be dealt with?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Based on how you and Mo Xuanyu have described it, it seems to be an art with very different uses than normal application, especially in its applicability to traps and ambushes. Is there another demonic cultivator nearby who can help?”

“There is,” Jin Guangshan reported with a grin. “W-Mo Xuanyu is there, in fact. And he is by far the better cultivator. If the spiritual cultivators can’t handle Xue Yang for some reason, he’ll take care of it.”

“What about for you?” Yu Ziyuan asked. “Is there anything of note happening outside?”

“Not especially,” Jiang Fengmian replied. “Though, I do feel a need to mention that Wen Chao has gained a new hobby of training dogs in the Qishan dungeons.”

All the light seemed to leave Wen Ruohan’s eyes at once, and an icy aura of annoyance filled the room.

“I see,” he said simply. “Thank you for telling me.”

“Ah… A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli spoke up. “Now that A-Die is back, you don’t need to go to Qishan yourself, right? It’s… fine for you to stay in Yunmeng?”

“No can do, I’m afraid, Shijie,” Wei Wuxian sighed, giving a laugh that the watchers couldn’t help but read as fake. “Young Master Wen has apparently heard of my charming personality and has personally invited yours truly to Qishan to-”

“You don’t need to go,” Jiang Fengmian interrupted at once. “I-you should have told me about this. I’ll go in your place.”

“Huh?”

It would be quite odd for someone other than the invited party to arrive, even if they were a sect leader. However, as Wen Ruohan continued to make no objection to Jiang Fengmian’s suggestion, Wei Wuxian gradually felt his fear of what lurked beneath Qishan overtake his hesitance.

“...Thank you?” he said at last. “I… okay?”

“Great!” Jiang Yanli beamed.

“Good luck!” Nie Mingjue all-but ordered, feeling his fighting spirit arise at the report of Wen Chao’s actions.

“Have fun,” Madam Jin requested easily.

“Goodbye,” Wen Qing nodded once.

‘Stay safe,’ Lan Wangji thought.

“...Right.”

To Jiang Fengmian's great relief, as soon as he informed the Wen Sect that 'Wei Wuxian is unfortunately recovering and too busy to journey to Qishan right now, but, in honor of the relations between the sects, Sect Leader Jiang would be happy to come in his stead' they retracted their offer. No one from Yunmeng had been forced to go to Qishan, and Wen Xu had managed to tame Wen Chao for the time being. Part of Jiang Fengmian had been worried that Wen Chao would be taking a more subtle approach to revenge, but, upon remembering that it was Wen Chao, he quickly discarded that idea.

(Which made it all the more humiliating that Wen Chao had managed to take over Lotus Pier, Wen Ruohan's guidance or not.)

"Uncle Jiang?" Wei Wuxian asks from behind him, the voice nearly making Jiang Fengmian jump at its unexpectedness. "Are you alright?"

"Ah, yes. Thank you, A-Xian. I'm fine," he responded, pleased to see how much more rested his ward looked. "I was just thinking."

"You've been doing that a lot lately," Wei Wuxian observed with a laugh, not putting any suspicion or inflection into his tone despite the fact that it was certainly hidden underneath.

"Ah… the simulation just gave me quite a bit to think about," Jiang Fengmian responded.

"Hmm…" Wei Wuxian leaned closer, a mischievous grin on his face. "Like what?"

"I-I…" Jiang Fengmian trailed off. "Like I said, the Sect Leaders agreed to not speak about that until we were all together. So that we would be able to give a full story-"

"Then what's on your mind? Surely it wouldn't bother you so much if you were content waiting."

How had Jiang Fengmian forgotten how terrifying it was to be on the opposing side of Wei Wuxian? He had seen first hand how his best friend's son could dig into anyone's argument and tear it apart, all while smiling like a naive child. If Jiang Fengmian didn't already know how sharp Wei Wuxian could be, he would have thought it was genuinely just childish curiosity driving Wei Wuxian's questions forward.

He had to think of an answer. Fast.

So he said the first thing that popped into his mind:

“Have you considered going to Gusu to see Lan-er-gongzi?” he asked.

The befuddlement that covered Wei Wuxian’s face at that was, at least, genuine.

“To Gusu? Why would I do that? Is there something wrong with the Second Jade?”

Ah, right. This Wei Wuxian barely knew Lan Wangji’s name.

(And that was so wrong on so many levels, even though it was the version of Wei Wuxian Jiang Fengmian had always known.)

“There’s nothing wrong with him, as far as I know,” Jiang Fengmian acknowledged. “I just feel that inner-sect relations are especially important during a confusing time such as this. I understand if you don’t want to see him while he’s still asleep, but perhaps keep that option in mind for when everything begins returning to normal.”

“Second young master Lan, huh?” Wei Wuxian muttered halfheartedly. Although he wouldn’t say it to his Sect Leader’s face, it was pretty clear Wei Wuxian was thinking ‘isn’t he supposed to be the most prim and proper of all? Why would I want to go see someone like that? Sounds annoying.’

Jiang Fengmian worked hard to swallow down his instinctive response of ‘Because he gladly accepted an even harsher punishment when the two of you left the Cloud Recesses after curfew — something that I now see would have never happened in Lotus Pier. It’s because he worked hard to protect you after you came back to life, not taking advantage of your teasing offers. It’s because you find him to be hilarious, and just speaking with him is enough to bring a huge smile onto your face. It’s because, as you mention time and time again, you apparently find him to be really, really pretty.’

If Wei Wuxian didn’t think he was insane before, he would undoubtedly feel so after hearing Jiang Fengmian say something like that. The Sect Leader was quite grateful that he had managed to hold that comment in.

He cleared his throat.

Then, by a stroke of pure luck, before Jiang Fengmian was forced to find a way to smoothly change the subject, little A-Lu and A-Yue came running over.

“Sect Leader! Da-shixiong! Mo Xuanyu’s trying to contact us again!” the boy shouted.

“Really?” Wei Wuxian excitedly asked, immediately spinning on his heel and sprinting toward the room the siblings had come from. As the sect leader followed behind his ward (at a slightly more relaxed pace), he wondered to himself at the budding friendship apparently sprouting between the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian and “Mo Xuanyu” — the twenty-two year old version. Would they be considered siblings? Twins, except different ages? Except their souls were also the same, and even twins didn’t have that.

After a bit more thought, Jiang Fengmian decided that they would need a new word to describe the pair. However, considering that Wei Wuxian was able to come up with names like “Chenqing” while he picked “Suibian,” he probably shouldn’t be the one to decide on it.

Finally, Jiang Fengmian caught up with Wei Wuxian, who was practically bouncing on his toes as he examined every inch of the glowing, crimson array which had appeared in the air.

“Any issues?” Jiang Fengmian asked.

“I don’t think so. It’s the same as last time, meaning we’ll be able to speak back and forth,” Wei Wuxian reported. “Are you going to join me? It could be helpful to introduce you to each other.”

“If you don’t mind,” Jiang Fengmian agreed with a nod, before glancing back at his avidly-watching fourth disciple and instructing, “If we are not out in an hour, summon Wen Ning-gongzi and ask him to force us out.”

“Understood, Sect Leader,” she responded immediately, looking pensive but unsurprised by his orders. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, clearly couldn’t wait to get started.

(For all the mistrust the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian had for “Mo Xuanyu,” it was undeniable that they had clicked in a way only two identical souls could.)

Breathing in once more to calm himself, Jiang Fengmian smiled at Wei Wuxian and nodded once. Simultaneously, they both reached a hand forward to make contact with the floating array of resentful energy.

Then, everything went black.

”Ah! They just appeared out of thin air!” a terrified voice exclaimed.

Jiang Fengmian blinked a few times to adjust to the change in lighting, then a few more times right afterward to make sure he wasn’t hallucinating what he saw in front of him.

Right next to the illusion of Mo Xuanyu was the future’s Sect Leader Nie Huaisang, who stared at them in awe and fear.

It took a few more moments for Jiang Fengmian to recover, but, as soon as he did, he quickly managed to right himself and bow slightly in greeting: “Sect Leader Nie…. Mo-gongzi.”

“Ah, hello! Sect Leader Jiang!” the Nie Sect Leader stuttered out, saluting him in return. To the man’s left, the future’s Wei Wuxian stood completely still, staring at Jiang Fengmian in abject shock.

The fifteen year old Wei Wuxian didn’t look much better.

“...Nie-xiong?” he asked. “Nie Huaisang?”

Ah, even if Wei Wuxian had seen the future version of Jiang Cheng, Jiang Fengmian supposed it would be hard to accept that this was a gateway to a world twenty years in the future. Everyone Wei Wuxian knew would be twenty years older there (for all that cultivators didn't age much), and it was a reminder that, according to 'Mo Xuanyu,' Wei Wuxian's future self was already dead.

(Well, he had died, so it wasn't strictly a lie.)

"Ah, Wei-xiong!" Nie Huaisang lit up. "My, you look so tiny. How cute!"

He zoomed forward, making the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian jump back slightly at the suddenness of the action.

"How precious!" Nie Huaisang sang out again. "Oh, this brings me right back to our days as students! Sneaking out to catch fish and drink alcohol and look at porn-"

The younger Wei Wuxian gave a dramatic gasp, quickly getting over his initial surprise, and countered, "Nie-xiong, alcohol and porn in the Cloud Recesses? Surely you jest."

Despite his best efforts, he couldn't keep himself from grinning as he said those words. Neither could Nie Huaisang, whose somewhat softer gaze spoke of a strange, sorrowful nostalgia.

"Well, I would, of course, never be one to advocate for breaking the rules," Nie Huaisang assured him. "Though, just between you and me, your older-self definitely recommends Gusu's 'Emperor's Smile.' If you have a chance…."

"Of course, of course," fifteen year-old Wei Wuxian laughed, then allowed himself to show some of the bewilderment he was experiencing. "Wow, this is… so weird. I feel like I'm in a warped fever dream."

"I appear in your dreams?" Nie Huaisang asked, delighted. "I hope it's all good things you see. What was your last dream about?"

After pretending to think it over for a moment, Wei Wuxian recalled that he actually did remember his dream from the previous night. There were bright green bowls containing soup floating in the lake and fish, much like the kite Jiang Fengmian had made for him, soaring through the sky. It was pretty obvious what it meant.

Nonetheless, he responded, "Well, no, you unfortunately weren't included, but I do recall dreaming about giant, flying goldfish last night."

Nie Huaisang gave a dramatic gasp: "Oh no! Wei-xiong, I got a dream-book a few months ago. It's meant to tell you what your dreams represent! I-I think that goldfish appearing in your dreams foretell that you will be cursed with just missing out on all the best sales for the next two weeks!"

He looked genuinely terrified.

(Some part of Jiang Fengmian wondered what the 'real' Nie Mingjue would do if he found out his younger-but-now-technically-older brother was wasting his time memorizing fortunes from random books. He resolved to avoid mentioning it to the man.)

"Oh, dear. You think so?" Wei Wuxian asked, excitement filling his body as he quickly began to accept that the Nie Huaisang in front of him was genuinely the person he knew. "There were also bowls of soup floating in the lake in my dream. What does that mean?"

After thinking it over for a moment, Nie Huaisang revealed, "Ah! If I'm remembering correctly, that means that your paints will spill into each other and mix when you don't want them to, turning into an ugly brown mush instead of the individual colors. Ah, how unfortunate…. Say — the bowls the soup was in weren't green, were they?"

Wei Wuxian blinked, started: "Wait, how did you know-"

Nie Huaisang gave the greatest gasp of all and continued, "The book said that if the bowls in the lake were green, your destined true love was going to spend the whole day sneezing! Oh, your poor soulmate."

Although Wei Wuxian was clearly disregarding the 'soulmate' comment, the apparently-accurate guess of "green bowls" was still mystifying him. The nonsensical 'dream book,' suddenly appeared a lot more credible.

Regardless of how curious he was as well, Jiang Fengmian knew he had far more important things to worry about. Moving slowly, so as to not attract too much attention while his Wei Wuxian spoke with the future's Nie Huaisang, he approached the twenty two year old Wei Wuxian.

"Hello, A-Xian," he whispered, too quietly for the past version to hear.

The boy flinched.

While some movement was good — Jiang Fengmian hadn't seen Wei Wuxian be still for so long in years — the flurry of emotions flashing across Wei Wuxian's face twisted the blade deeper into Jiang Fengmian's heart.

'A-Cheng, be well,' he had said.

And then-

'A-Xian, A-Cheng… you must look after him.'

He didn't specifically disagree with the words, but, after seeing everything that ended up happening, he wished he had asked Wei Wuxian to keep himself safe as well — especially since those words had been right after Madam Yu's.

Luckily, Wei Wuxian had never been one to stay chained by the past.

"Hi… Uncle Jiang," he finally managed to say.

Then, as though quickly shaking himself out of whatever he was thinking, he took a deep breath. When his eyes opened again, he managed to send Jiang Fengmian a far more genuine smile than his previous attempts.

"I didn't realize you had left the simulation," he said. "It's good to see you again."

"You as well," Jiang Fengmian said. Then-

"I'm sorry."

Everything paused for a moment.

Yes, those were the right words. When Jiang Fengmian imagined this conversation in his head, that was exactly the next thing to say.

They were just being said by the wrong person.

"...What?" he asked.

"I heard from the juniors about some of the moments they included. I'm sorry about Shijie. You asked me to defend her and Jiang Cheng, and I wasn't able to. I'm sorry you had to see that."

While that was true — and brought up many questions, as "wasn't able to protect" was very different from "intentionally killed" — it wasn't at all how Jiang Fengmian wanted this conversation to go.

"No. No, A-Xian, I-"

He paused, terrified he would say the wrong thing and make the conversation worse.

'Really? After all that talk earlier, you're going to back down now*?!*' Madam Yu's voice asked. 'You know full well that your hesitation has been exactly the problem all this time. Just say something. Anything!'

"We-we've realized by now that the circumstances were complicated," Jiang Fengmian coughed. "You at least… regret it, right?"

That was perhaps the least convincing way he could have possibly said those words. And Wei Wuxian clearly caught onto that hesitation, interpreting it as a lack of belief in his regret.

But then, to Jiang Fengmian's surprise, Wei Wuxian replied "...I don't regret any of the conscious decisions I made that led me to that point, but I am nonetheless sorry that it happened."

That also opened up far more questions than it answered. Jiang Fengmian wondered how rude it would be to inquire further about this during their first meeting after around fifteen years.

‘Oh, hesitating again? What was even the point of you leaving the simulation then! You might as well stay in that self-imposed coma for all the difference you make!’

“A-Xian, that wasn’t what I was trying to say.”

He tilted his head curiously, waiting for Jiang Fengmian to continue.

“You… ah, well, I acknowledge that you wish it hadn’t happened. That’s enough.”

‘Be honest and straightforward and get to the point!”

“I didn’t mean to imply otherwise. Some of the memories we were shown were a little upsetting to A-Cheng, A-Li, and San-niang, so I just… I was hesitating because of that, so-”

“Ah, of course. I apologize; that, on the other hand, is something I do regret,” Wei Wuxian bowed once. “I am sorry for not keeping track of the Píngxíng Gateway and wrapping you all up in this. Thank you for your understanding on the matter.”

‘Heavens, would you look at that?’ Jiang Fengmian’s inner Yu Ziyuan scoffed. ‘We’ve just made him accustomed to always being at fault. It's just like Lan Qiren said, isn't it? Some apology this is turning out to be!’

“That also wasn’t what I meant to say.”

“Uncle Jiang?”

“I just… you-”

“I’m sorry!”

It was in the sudden silence that followed that Jiang Fengmian realized his initial plan of staying quiet so that he could speak to the future Wei Wuxian privately was going up in flames. The surprised stares the future Nie Huaisang and the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian were giving him were back-breaking in their intensity.

‘So, what? You’re going to hesitate again?’

“Uncle Jiang?”

“I’m sorry,” he said again. “I… regret the last thing I — my other self — said to you. I apologize for having left you and A-Cheng alone like that. I should have… done more. To stop San-niang. I... before you…”

Before Wei Wuxian had started thinking that he would be blamed for everything without getting a chance to defend himself.

By this point, both versions of Wei Wuxian were staring at him blankly, not fully believing what they were seeing. The fifteen year old version was quite clearly trying to determine what they were talking about, but the older one surely understood just fine.

"I see," Wei Wuxian smiled. "Thank you, Sect Leader Jiang. Apology accepted."

Or maybe not.

"Pardon?" Jiang Fengmian asked.

Accepted? Just like that?

No, that was far, far too easy. If it only took this much to earn Wei Wuxian's forgiveness, then his forgiveness was by no means an accurate representation of whether Jiang Fengmian had done enough.

But now-

The future Wei Wuxian cleared his throat: "If you don't mind, Sect Leader Jiang, could you update us on what the simulation is focusing on right now? Sect Leader Nie and I have something to speak to you about, and it'll be easier to do that if we understand how much context you have."

'No,' Jiang Fengmian wanted to say. 'I can't; not now. Not when you so clearly don't understand what I'm trying to say.'

But at this point, what could he do that would help Wei Wuxian understand? He had already apologized in as clear terms as he could; if he wanted to genuinely show both Wei Wuxians what he meant, he would need to do that through his actions.

"...Alright," he accepted at last, and began to explain.

Suddenly, Lan Wangji sneezed.

Several people jumped in surprise, and quite a few sent confused glances in his direction. They were in a simulation; there was literally no dust or air. How could Lan Wangji have sneezed?

Strange.

However, right as Lan Xichen was about to ask (the equally-bewildered) Lan Wangji if anything was wrong, a voice cut in.

"One night, the winter winds howled outside," Lan Jingyi explained, lowering his voice dramatically and following the words up with a comically spooky "Ooooooooooo."

Lan Qiren just sighed.

Xiao Xingchen, Xue Yang, and A-Qing were crammed inside a small room, warming themselves with the old furnace. As Xiao Xingchen mended a basket with a broken strip of bamboo, A-Qing leaned on his shoulder, wrapped up in a blanket like a zongzi snack.

Xue Yang slouched with his chin in his hand, quickly getting annoyed as he listened to A-Qing continuously pester Xiao Xingchen.

“Daozhang, Daozhang-”

“Stop being so noisy! I’ll tie your tongue into a knot if you keep yapping,” he snapped.

Those words weren’t too different from the ones close siblings would exchange with each other, but, in this context, they left many of the watchers glaring hatefully.

After all, the ghostly form of A-Qing had been noticeably lacking that specific body part.

However, A-Qing wasn’t deterred whatsoever.

“Daozhang, I wanna hear a story!” she continued unflinchingly.

Laughing at the request, Xiao Xingchen pointed out, “When I was young, no one told me any stories. How would I know how to tell a good one?”

In response, A-Qing’s tantrum reached new heights.

Most of the watchers laughed at that, but Lan Wangji merely sat up slightly straighter, sealing Xiao Xingchen’s words into his mind.

It had been mentioned several times throughout the simulation that Wei Wuxian’s knowledge on his parents was pitifully lacking. Yu Ziyuan’s senseless grudge meant even Jiang Fengmian had been unwilling to speak about them to Wei Wuxian. In the Cold Springs Pond, the simulated Wei Wuxian had revealed to Lan Wangji that he didn’t even remember what they looked like.

Well, if that was the case, then Lan Wangji would do everything he could to correct that — starting with gaining information on the mountain Cangse Sanren had come from.

Seeing that A-Qing wasn’t going to give up anytime soon (and was, in fact, about to start rolling on the ground as an outburst of emotions), Xiao Xingchen caved in.

“All right. I’ll tell you a story that happened on a mountain,” he said.

Lan Wangji’s determination surged anew (though it was offset slightly by the sudden, unexpected sneeze that inexplicably wracked his body).

Excited, A-Qing suggested, “Once upon a time there was a mountain and on that mountain there was a temple?”

“No. Once upon a time, there was a celestial mountain that nobody knew the location of.”

‘Nobody except Wei Wuxian,’ Jiang Cheng thought with a grin.

“On the mountain, there was an immortal who had reached enlightenment. The immortal accepted many disciples, but she didn’t allow any of them to leave the mountain.”

‘Baoshan Sanren,’ the blue illusion of Wei Wuxian thought, his form flickering visibly as A-Qing (and Xue Yang) leaned forward in interest.

“Why didn’t she let them leave?” A-Qing asked.

With a sad smile, Xiao Xingchen answered, “The immortal had only hidden in the mountain because she couldn’t understand the world outside it. She told her disciples, ‘if you leave this mountain, then there’s no need for you to come back. Don’t bring the disputes of the outside world onto this mountain.’”

“Huh?” A-Qing straightened up indignantly, letting the watchers see the contemplative shadow of Wei Wuxian for a brief moment before he was pulled along. “How would the people on that mountain be able to withstand the boredom? There’d definitely be disciples who’d want to go outside and play!”

“You’re right,” Xiao Xingcheng acknowledged. “The first disciple who left was quite outstanding. Due to his mastery of cultivation, after leaving the mountain he received praise and admiration from everyone, becoming a famous cultivator on the righteous path. Afterwards, however, no one knows why, but his personality changed drastically, and he suddenly became a villain who killed people without blinking twice. In the end, he died under thousands of swords,” Xiao Xingchen concluded.

Giving a minute sigh, Wei Wuxian added on, ‘The first disciple of Baoshan Sanren who ‘didn’t die a peaceful death’: Yanling Daoren. Even to this day, no one knows what caused his personality to change so much. It’s likely no one will ever find out.’

A mocking laugh.

“Well, that sure sounds a lot like what people say about Wei Wuxian, doesn’t it,” Nie Mingjue asked. No one could deny the connection, many pursing their lips together and looking away from the storyteller.

Once Xiao Xingcheng finished mending the basket, he set it down and continued the story: “The second disciple was a girl, and also very outstanding.”

The blue shadow of Wei Wuxian straightened up at once, and the smile on his face was warm enough to single-handedly melt the arctic.

(Lan Wangji sneezed.)

“Is she pretty?” A-Qing asked.

‘Absolutely,’ Jin Guangshan recalled, then added, ‘She and Wei Changze both — really, it’s no wonder Wei Wuxian looks the way he does.’

“I wouldn’t know,” Xiao Xingchen admitted. “She was rumored to have been very pretty.”

“Ah, I know!” A-Qing suddenly lit up. “There must have been a lot of people who liked her and wanted to marry her after she left the mountain. She must have married a high ranking official or the leader of a big sect! Hee hee.”

“You would think so, wouldn’t you?” Madam Jin muttered.

“You guessed wrong,” Xiao Xingchen laughed. “She married the servant of the leader of a big sect. And the two lived happily ever after.”

But A-Qing frowned: “I don’t like this. How could an outstanding and beautiful cultivator settle on a servant? This story’s so cliche. It was probably made up by some poor scholar.”

Madam Yu flinched at those words, hearing her own voice hurl accusations at Jiang Fengmian in the back of her mind. After all, Cangse Sanren had been desired by the head of one of the great sects. Why wouldn’t she have had an affair with him?

‘But, right at the end, in that pivotal moment, Fengmian chose your A-Cheng over A-Xian, didn’t he?’ Cangse’s voice whispered in her mind.

“And then what happened?” A-Qing asked. “What were their lives like after they ‘lived happily ever after?’”

Smile fading, Xiao Xingchen concluded, “The two of them lost their lives in a night hunt.”

A-Qing did a double take.

“What kind of a story is this?” she demanded. “She not only married a servant, but they died together! I’m not listening anymore!”

Laughing, Wei Wuxian mentally added, ‘It’s a good thing Xiao Xingchen didn’t tell her that the two of them gave birth to another big villain that everyone wanted to beat up. She’d probably be spitting mad about me if he had.’

“...I wish he wouldn’t accept the hate everyone has for him so easily,” Jiang Yanli muttered, leaning closer to the equally-dejected Jin Zixuan as she did.

“That story was horrible!” A-Qing shouted.

“This is why I told you at the beginning that I didn’t know how to tell stories,” Xiao Xingchen pointed out, not bothering to object to her criticism.

“Then, Daozhang, you must remember the night hunts you’ve been on, right? I wanna hear those! Tell me, what sorta monsters have you fought?”

Xue Yang had been lost in thought during the previous story, listening with his eyes shut. Now, though, his expression grew a bit more serious and attentive. His pupils shrunk, and he glanced at Xiao Xingchen.

Shaking his head, Xiao Xingchen objected, "There are too many for me to remember."

"Oh?" Xue Yang tilted his head. "Then, Daozhang, have you always night hunted alone?"

"Wha-"

"That — how dare he?!" Nie Mingjue stood up. "When he's the one responsible for everything that happened. Pretending like he doesn't know what those words mean…. And now-"

'It's too bad Da-ge isn't still alive,' Nie Huaisang piped up. 'The only reason Xue Yang wasn't executed to begin with is because of that, right?'

After a pause, Xiao Xingchen softly answered, "No."

Curious, A-Qing piped in, "Who else was with you?"

An even longer pause followed.

'Wei Wuxian was right; the naive inquiries of a child truly can hurt the most,' Jin Zixuan sighed. 'Ah, I don't like this. I don't like this at all.'

At long last, Xiao Xingchen responded, "...A very good friend of mine."

"He tried to avoid the topic of the third of Baoshan Sanren's students to leave the mountain, but it seems as though he'll have to tell this story regardless," Lan Qiren frowned, directing a fierce glare towards the grinning delinquent.

An eerie light flashed inside Xue Yang's eyes.

'It seems that peeling off Xiao Xingchen's scabs gives him quite a bit of pleasure,' Wei Wuxian observed, tone colder than ice.

A-Qing, on the other hand, was genuinely curious: "Daozhang, who's this friend of yours? What sort of person are they?"

"A sincere man of noble nature," Xiao Xingchen answered.

Xue Yang rolled his eyes in contempt, mouthing out curses, but, a moment later, spoke in a neutrally-curious tone as he asked, "Then, Daozhang, where's this friend of yours now? Why hasn't he come to find you when you're already like this?"

"You just don't know when to stop, do you?!" Jiang Cheng snapped. "Xiao Xingchen even saved your life. You would be dead without him — how can you say this after that? A street rat will never amount to anything more, huh?"

Nodding, Lan Qiren scathingly observed, "No sense of honor in that man."

The silence stretched on. Although A-Qing didn't know the context, she looked as though she had sensed that something was going on. Holding her breath, she clenched her teeth and, as though wanting to take a bite out of his flesh, glared at Xue Yang. Xiao Xingchen continued spacing out.

Finally, he said, "As for where he is right now… I don't know. But, I hope that…."

He never finished that sentence. After a while, he merely patted A-Qing's head.

"I think that's enough from me," he said. "I… I truly don't know anything about how to tell such stories."

If he had still had eyes, the watchers had no doubt they would look as vacant and haunted as his voice sounded. Wen Qing clenched her fists together, glaring down at Xue Yang with a level of disdain she had previously reserved for just Wen Chao.

And then, unable to see her glare, Xue Yang carelessly spoke up again.

"Then, how about I tell one?" he asked.

"Yes, yes!" A-Qing bounced excitedly. "You tell one."

Unhurried, Xue Yang cleared his throat and began: "Once upon a time, there was a child. The child really liked eating sweets, but because he had no parents or money, he could rarely eat them."

At once, an image of the starving eight year old Wei Ying flashed into Lan Wangji's mind, and he clenched his hands into fists.

(Then, just as unexpectedly as before, he sneezed once again.)

"...One day, the same as any other day, the child was sitting zoned-out on a flight of stairs," Xue Yang continued. "Opposite to those stairs was a liquor shop. A man sat on a table inside that shop."

Although this story wasn't great, it was much better than Xiao Xingchen's. As he spoke, A-Qing leaned forward, listening intently to the anecdote.

"When the older man saw the child, he gestured for him to come over."

'What on earth is the point in showing us this?' Nie Mingjue wondered, his growing hatred of Xue Yang leaving him without much patience for the man.

But, undeterred, Xue Yang continued, "Being naive and puzzled, the child, who had nothing to do anyways, immediately ran over. As he did, he saw the plate full of fresh pastries on the man's plate. The man pointed at them and asked, 'do you want this?' Of course the child wanted it."

A sad smile crossed Jiang Yanli's face as she was once again reminded of Wei Ying's first few days at Lotus Pier, as well as his quite memorable reactions to all the food he got to try.

"The boy nodded as fast as he could to the man. Seeing that, the man gave the child a piece of paper and said, 'if you want them, take this paper to a certain room in a certain place. I'll give these to you after that."

A strange foreboding sensation overcame Nie Huaisang, and he silently moved closer to his brother as a result.

"The child didn't know how to read, so he just took the paper and went to the specified place. After he opened the door, a huge, brawny man came out. He took the paper, looked at it, then slapped the child so hard his nose started bleeding. The man pulled the child's hair and asked 'Who told you to take this over?'"

'I see,' Wei Wuxian thought. ''The child' in the story must have been Xue Yang himself.'

"Huh?" Jin Zixuan asked, swerving to look at Xue Yang again. "But that… what?"

'I never would have thought someone as crafty as Xue Yang could have been so honest and dim witted as a child,' Wei Wuxian continued. 'Whatever was written on that piece of paper couldn't have been nice. The man at the liquor shop must have had some sort of conflict with this man, but didn't dare curse the latter to his face, and so sent a child to carry the message. How perverse.'

"The child felt scared and gave the man directions to the liquor store," Xue Yang continued, "The man went there at once, pulling the child along by his hair. But, when they arrived, the other man was long gone. The leftover pastries had been taken away by the waiters as well."

Jiang Yanli tensed at those words, feeling something within her squirm in dismay, despite the true identity of 'the child' having been revealed.

"The man was furious — kicking over a few tables before storming out. Similarly, the child was frustrated. He ran an errand for someone, got beaten up, and was held by his hair on the way back. His scalp was almost pulled off; of course he wouldn't be able to accept not having gotten any pastries. So, tears in his eyes, he asked the waiter, 'Where are my pastries? Where are the pastries he said would be mine?'"

Jin Guangshan rolled his eyes at the boy's naivete.

Similarly, Xue Yang gave a sharp grin as he concluded, "The store was in a mess and the waiter was feeling quite cross, so he slapped the child a few times hard enough to make the kid's ears burn."

The simulation was only showing them Xue Yang telling the story rather than the actual event, and yet Lan Xichen couldn't help but look away regardless.

“The kid was chased out the door. He crawled up and forced himself to his feet, walking for a while. And guess what? Coincidentally, he ran into the man that told him to take the letter again!”

He paused here, and A-Qing, engrossed in the story, spurred him on: “And then? What happened next?”

“What do you think happened? Just a few more slaps and a few more kicks.”

The words were followed by a mocking laugh.

‘When I was young, I really liked candy, but I couldn’t get any no matter what,’ Xue Yang said, explaining his possession of it to A-Qing. ‘...I always told myself that if I became wealthier one day, I would always carry an infinite amount of candy with me to eat.’

The older Xue Yang had done so many inexcusable things. In fact, the candy being referred to there had been used to lure A-Qing over so he could point a sword at her chest. Lan Qiren, by all rights, shouldn’t feel even slightly glad that Xue Yang did indeed manage to have access to some.

‘Shouldn’t’ wasn’t doing much to change how he did feel, though.

Having remembered the same moment, A-Qing cut off Xue Yang’s laugh with a giggle of her own: “That boy you’re telling us about was you, right? He liked sweets — it was definitely you! Why were you like this when you were young? If I were you, I would have been like ptew, ptew, and spat in his food! And then I’d hit him! I’d hit him and I’d hit him-”

How could this have possibly been the girl who, as a ghost, felt a need to steer all travelers away from the city where Xue Yang resided?

(What was Xue Yang going to do that they hadn’t seen yet?)

But the A-Qing before them didn’t know any of that. She just kept dancing around the room, singing out a constant repeat of ‘I’d hit him!’ and nearly smacking Xiao Xingchen in the process.

“Alright, alright. You’ve finished listening to his story. It’s time to sleep.”

‘Wow. He’s such a dad,’ Nie Huaisang thought with a laugh.

Further proven when Xiao Xingchen tucked the still-fuming A-Qing in, laughing softly at her continued complaints. Once he had ensured that she was all set up, he silently exited the room, returning to where Xue Yang was.

“What happened after that?” Xiao Xingchen asked.

“There is no ‘afterward,’” Xue Yang responded. “You didn’t continue telling your story either, did you?”

After considering that for a moment, Xiao Xingchen spoke again: "No matter what happened afterward, your life is fairly adequate right now. You don't need to dwell on the past."

Although that was certainly the right advice to give Xue Yang, Lan Wangji couldn't help but think there was such a thing as too much of that. After all, all four of the great sects had rallied against Wei Wuxian, and yet the man himself hadn't shown even the slightest bit of animosity towards them after coming back to life.

Then again, the second jade had to admit that Wei Wuxian's ability to move on was something he certainly admired about the man. If Wei Ying could be happy without looking for revenge, then Lan Wangji would do everything he could to support that.

Unfortunately, although he would deny it, Xue Yang was far from the same.

"I'm not dwelling on the past," he told the white-robed cultivator. "It's just that Little Blind keeps stealing my candy and finishing it all. I can't help but remember the days in which I had none."

From the other room, A-Qing kicked her coffin a few times, protesting, "Daozhong, don't listen to him! I didn't eat that much!"

Xiao Xingchen laughed softly, suggesting, "Let's all rest."

The sky darkened, and Xiao Xingchen went out to Night Hunt again. When he returned in the early morning light, he silently passed by his two seemingly-sleeping companions, placing something next to them. Once Xiao Xingchen had left, A-Qing allowed her eyes to creep open, and she turned to see what Xiao Xingchen had dropped inside her casket.

A small piece of candy lay waiting for her at the edge.

'Foolish man,' Madam Yu thought, looking on with an expression that, for once, couldn't actually be described as scorn. 'You end up dead because of this. You and Wei Wuxian both! You help people who just cause trouble for you later, and then-'

Wen Qing gave a small sigh, and Madam Yu froze.

She had shouted at Wei Wuxian for hours over him saving Luo Qingyang and 'making the Wens attack.' The earlier attack on the Lan Sect had made it clear (even to her) that there was very little truth in that, but she had said it all anyways.

And then, after the attack, the only reason her son had managed to survive ended up being the Wen boy who Wei Wuxian had offered his help to during the archery competition. Not even she was blind enough to say that offering kindness without any other goal in mind was stupid.

(The voice whispering at her that just a few days ago she would probably have said it anyways was easily ignored.)

Meanwhile, A-Qing had gone to investigate. She had silently crept out of her coffin and was now watching as Xue Yang stood frozen. On the table before him, another piece of candy laid still.

The near-countless emotions on his face were impossible to distinguish.

But they quite clearly weren't scorn or maliciousness either.

Nie Mingjue stood still, watching just as silently as A-Qing was. On one hand, this was the man who had destroyed Song Lan's eyes and had tricked Xiao Xingchen into murdering innocents just a short time ago. If Xiao Xingchen knew who he was, he would never have considered giving him anything.

On the other hand, to the kid who had grown up deprived of even the slightest treats, a gesture like this would mean the world.

'It's too bad Da-ge isn't still alive. The only reason Xue Yang wasn't executed to begin with is because of that, right?'

No matter what the circumstances were, this clearly meant something to Xue Yang. Why couldn't he simply leave it at that? Why did he have to kill A-Qing — cut out her tongue — and leave Xiao Xingchen's corpse in this coffin house they spent years inside?

(If Nie Mingjue had been alive, these events, which were looking closer and closer to a tragedy on all fronts, might not have happened.)

"After that day, Xiao Xingchen would give the two of them a piece of candy every night," Jin Ling revealed, sounding fairly lost in regards to how a line like that could be important. "...Anyways, A-Qing was quite pleased, but Xue Yang expressed neither gratitude nor rejection towards this act, which made A-Qing angry for some time."

Said scene played out before their eyes.

"Xiao Xingchen was responsible for their meals. However, since he was blind, he wouldn't be able to measure the quality of the vegetables the vendors were trying to sell him. If the vendor was nice, then it would all work out, but for the ones who wanted to take advantage of his blindness — dirty, money grubbing vultures that they are-"

"Jin Ling," Sizhui said warningly, perhaps feeling that it was a bit tone-deaf for the leader of the Jin sect to complain about it, even if he didn't disagree.

Understanding, Jin Ling hurriedly cleared his throat and continued: "The vegetables Xiao Xingchen brought back were often of lacking quality or quantity. Xiao Xingchen himself didn't care much, but A-Qing was often infuriated. Seething, she had demanded to join him when he shopped for ingredients, but given that she was still pretending to be blind, there wasn't much she could do. That's when the rat-"

"Call him Xue Yang, Jin Ling," Sizhui cut in. "We'll confuse them if we don't use names."

Ouyang Zizhen made a hum of agreement and added, "Besides, that's pretty offensive to rats! You don't need to compare them to him."

Jiang Cheng snorted and had to cough a few times in a vain attempt to cover it up before his mother noticed. Luckily, occupied in her own thoughts, Madam Yu didn't bother to scold him right then.

"Anyways," Jin Ling continued, "in those situations, Xue Yang was useful."

Madam Jin couldn't help but notice how well her grandson could make even just the man's name sound like a curse. The boy must have inherited that from her and Yu Ziyuan.

"With keen eyes and a sharp tongue that came with his delinquent self, he'd be able to bargain anything down — or, if that failed, glare at the vendor until they caved in. A-Qing even praised him a few times, and with the daily candies on top of that, a delicate peace was established between her and Xue Yang."

In the background, Ouyang Zizhen made an annoyed 'hmph' sound.

Some part of Lan Qiren deeply dreaded the day those four would wind up in his classroom. He made a mental note to never ask them to read a text aloud once that day came.

(Lan Wangji, once again, sneezed.)

"Luckily, even through all this, A-Qing never let her guard down around Xue Yang," Jin Ling concluded, and the simulation displayed said girl playing in the streets. She was once again pretending to be blind, knocking her bamboo pole against the ground.

No matter how long he thought about it, Nie Mingjue couldn't help but be amazed. He still disliked cowardly, cheap tactics — still valued honorable victories above all else — but for this girl to manage to fool Xue Yang into thinking she was genuinely blind for years?

It went beyond his wildest imagination.

And could he truly say she was wrong to do so? No, of course not. As a young, blind girl, this was the best option she had.

Another fake-stumble tripped A-Qing up as she pretended to not have seen a large rock on the ground. The amusing act didn't generate even the slightest smile on the girl's face; she had been playing this game her whole life, and wouldn't crack now. Suddenly, a cold voice came from behind:

"Young maiden, if you can't see, it would be best for you to not run so fast."

Everyone's eyes turned towards the man who had just spoken, and they widened a moment later.

'Song Lan,' Wei Wuxian realized, his blue, wispy form jerking at the revelation.

A-Qing tilted her head at him, but Song Lan had already walked over. Putting his whisk over A-Qing's shoulder, he gently led her to the side of the road.

"There are less people over here," he explained.

Despite the cold tone of voice he used, there was a genuine kindness to his actions. Smiling at the scene, Lan Xichen couldn't help but compare the man's eyes to those of the future Hanguang-jun. Xiao Xingchen's eyes in Song Lan's body — not an especially large jump, all things considered.

Having gotten a similar impression, Wei Wuxian smiled: 'Xiao Xingchen and Song Lan really are good friends, aren't they? Good friends have to be similar in character.'

There was a quiet giggle from a corner of the room, and Nie Huaisang leaned closer to his brother to whisper, "No wonder Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong get along so well. They're just destined to be!"

Having been brought to safety, A-Qing tittered, "A-Qing is very thankful of Daozhang!"

Nodding once in acceptance, Song Lan retracted his whisk and added, "Don't play around too much. The dark energy here is quite strong. In the future, be careful to not linger outside too long."

"Okay~"

Having received her agreement, Song Lan continued walking. Under A-Qing's watchful eye, he approached another passerby and stopped him.

"Excuse me, have you seen a blind cultivator who wears a sword in this area?"

All at once, the tension in the room tripled. They knew they couldn't change anything, and they knew some of what was going to happen, but Song Lan's arrival was a trail of gunpowder being lit on one end. It wouldn't be long before the spark reached the fireworks on the other end and the world lit up in a destructive glow.

Under A-Qing's deceptively clear gaze, the passerby responded, "I'm… not sure. Daozhang, you can try asking the people over there."

"Thank you."

At once, A-Qing tapped her way over, asking, "Daozhang, why are you searching for the other Daozhang?"

"Have you seen him?!" Song Lan demanded at once, turning to face her.

"Say 'yes!' Say yes!" Jiang Cheng encouraged.

"Maybe I have, maybe I haven't," she responded.

Madam Jin quickly moved to cover up her snort with an elegant cough.

Undeterred by the non-answer, Song Lan straightforwardly asked, "How can I make it so that you've seen him?"

“If you answer a few questions for me, then maybe I’ll remember I have,” A-Qing responded. “Are you Daozhang’s friend?”

‘Clever, protective, brilliant girl,’ Wen Qing thought, feeling her hands clench together in anticipation. ‘But… it won’t be enough.’.

Luckily, the question she had asked was one with a clear answer.

However, to the surprise of many of the watchers, Song Lan hesitated. He frowned deeply, and it him took several additional moments to respond:

“...Yes.”

‘Why did he hesitate?’ Wei Wuxian wondered.

Most of the watchers tilted their heads, wondering the same.

Sensing the hesitation as well, A-Qing demanded, “Do you really know him? How tall is he? Is he pretty or ugly? What’s his sword like?”

“His height is similar to mine. His appearance is rather fine. His sword is carved with a pattern of frost,” Song Lan answered without pause. At those correct answers, A-Qing fell silent once more, analyzing him closely.

“Please believe him,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “Please believe him. Please believe him.”

Luckily, A-Qing had always had a good intuition when it came to other peoples’ characters. She had trusted Xiao Xingchen instantly and had known to be wary of Xue Yang just as fast. After staring at Song Lan for a few more seconds, recalling the help she had been so unhesitantly offered, she made her decision.

“I know where he is. Daozhang, follow me!”

A grin broke out across Jin Zixuan’s face, and he and Jiang Yanli turned to each other, equally delighted. Madam Yu simply sighed, quite certain that their hope wouldn’t last much longer.

A-Qing led him to the coffin home, but, once the door was in sight, Song Lan stopped in his tracks. Like an early frost had engulfed his face, all the blood rushed out, leaving him white as a sheet.

“What’s wrong?” A-Qing asked. “Aren’t you gonna go over?”

Far too many things could be seen in Song Lan’s expression. It was obvious that, more than anything, he wanted to rush over, but a steadily-increasing fear held him back. The aloof look he had before was completely gone.

Upon seeing that, Lan Xichen (who had connected the man’s general demeanor to Wangji some time ago) and Nie Mingjue (for obvious reasons) had to fight the urge to surge forward and push him along. They understood his hesitation — the transfer of eyes was a debt that could never be repaid — but if he didn't move now everything would be-

Right as it looked like Song Lan might have made up his mind to go in, another figure strolled inside, lackadaisical and casual as can be. Seeing that, Song Lan's face immediately went from pale to ashen.

It was Xue Yang.

"Damn it!" Nie Mingjue growled, nearly breaking his chair with the force of his rage. They had been so, so close, but now-

A series of laughter came from inside the coffin home, and A-Qing snorted: "The annoying one is back."

"Who is he?" Song Lan asked at once. "Why is he here?"

"He's a bastard. He never told us his name, so who knows who he is? He was saved by Daozhang, so now he sticks to Daozhang all the time! He's such a pain!"

A tumble of emotions passed through Song Lan's face, but he only responded, "Be quiet."

Startled by his expression, A-Qing obeyed.

The two of them approached the coffin home, and soon got close enough to hear Xiao Xingchen's voice ask, "Whose turn is it today?"

As soon as he heard Xiao Xingchen speak, Song Lan's hands began to tremble.

Just as Hanguang-jun's hands had when he first heard 'Mo Xuanyu' play his song on Dafan Mountain, Lan Xichen noticed.

"What if, from now on, we don't take turns anymore?" Xue Yang suggested. "Let's change it up!"

"You're only saying that because it's your turn today, aren't you?" Xiao Xingchen laughed. "How do you want to change it?"

As the scene played out, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but think the damage caused by watching this would give Song Lan far more pain than even the most cruel of torture would. And it was unintentional on all sides.

Fascinating.

"Here, there are two sticks," Xue Yang continued, ignorant to the rapidly-deteriorating Song Lan waiting just outside. "If you pick the longer one, you don't have to go. If you pick the shorter one, then you'll have to go. What do you think?"

There was a beat of silence.

Then, Xue Yang laughed.

“You picked the short one! There, I win!”

‘I win,’ he had said. How would Song Lan, whose eyes had been gouged out by Xue Yang — who had gotten new ones from Xiao Xingchen, only for said friend to disappear — feel upon hearing those words?

“You’re going!” Xue Yang insisted.

With reluctance, Xiao Xingchen sighed in acknowledgement, “Alright. I’ll go.”

‘Yes!’ Wei Wuxian thought with a grin. ‘This is perfect. Come outside, quick. If Song Lan grabs him and runs as soon as he’s out, everything will be fine.’

And once again, Lan Xichen couldn’t help but see his future-brother, who had grabbed onto ‘Mo Xuanyu’ and had dragged him back to the Cloud Recesses, away from the future Jiang Wanyin, who would have tried to torture him without remorse if he had caught him. As more and more parallels formed before his eyes, he felt the tension in his body rise.

However, right before Xiao Xingchen reached the door, the other voice in the room laughed.

“Come back, I’ll go.”

“Why are you willing to go now?”

“Are you an idiot? I tricked you. I picked the shorter one; I just had the longer stick hidden behind me. Whichever one you picked, I would be able to take out a longer one. I’m just exploiting the fact that you can’t see.”

“...I can’t believe he came clean about that,” Jin Zixuan commented, then clicked his tongue angrily. “Of all times for him to tell the truth!”

As Xue Yang walked out, A-Qing turned to Song Lan. She saw him shake in barely-contained rage at the sight of the man, but, seeing him gesture to her to stay quiet, refrained from speaking until the other man was quite a distance away.

Finally:

“This man… when did Xing… when did that Daozhang of yours save him?” Song Lan asked.

Seeing how serious his face was, A-Qing wasted no time before answering, “It’s been a long time. A couple of years.”

“Daozhang never found out who he was?”

“No.”

“What a mess,” Lan Qiren muttered. After yet another sneeze wracked his illusionary body, Lan Wangji nodded in agreement.

“...What has he done during his stay with Daozhang?”

“Joke around, bully me, scare me… Oh, he also night hunts with Daozhang!”

A shudder went through Jiang Yanli’s body as she recalled the civilian villagers — a majority of whom were innocent — that ended up being the victims of Xue Yang’s twisted revenge.

Perhaps feeling a hint of the truth, Song Lan inquired further: “Night hunt? Night hunt what things? Do you know?”

“...They used to hunt walking corpses pretty regularly. Now it’s usually ghosts, animals that behave weirdly, and so on.”

“Hm. So he stopped,” Wen Ruohan observed.

“That doesn’t erase what he’s already done,” Nie Mingjue snapped back. “Especially so long as he doesn’t regret it.”

“I wasn’t saying it did.”

But to Nie Mingjue, whose stress was quickly reaching a breaking point, the easy acceptance was little help.

Although he couldn’t find anything strange about what had occurred with just A-Qing’s description, Song Lan’s suspicions remained potent.

“...Is the Daozhang close to him?”

“Idiot,” Madam Yu muttered. “Asking a question you don’t want the answer to is just going to mess you up later.”

“Still, I… don’t think he can help it, A-Niang,” Jiang Yanli spoke up. She tensed immediately after, having only been able to speak so openly against her mother due to the reassuring presence of her fiance, but, to her surprise, Madam Yu just gave a small sigh of agreement.

She knew her daughter was right, and was slowly learning better than to refuse the truth.

At long last, A-Qing reluctantly answered the question: “I think Daozhang is really unhappy when he’s alone…”

Song Lan flinched.

“...He finally got someone who cultivates as well,” she continued. “...I think he sorta likes listening to the bastard tell jokes.”

Now, the cultivator’s face was clouded by both rage and devastation. Amid the confusion, he could only be certain about one thing:

‘I can’t tell Xingchen about this.’

“Fool,” Wen Qing muttered, her hands clenched into tight fists. “Idiots, all of you. Always trying to shoulder everything alone.”

And now-

“Don’t tell Daozhang anything unnecessary,” he cautioned, before standing up and moving in the direction Xue Yang had just departed in.

“Daozhang, are you going to beat up that bastard?” A-Qing asked.

‘Way more than beat up,’ Wei Wuxian thought as Song Lan got farther and farther away. ‘He’s going to chop Xue Yang into pieces!’

“I wish he did,” Jiang Cheng muttered, remembering once again the danger Jin Ling had been put into.

Knowing which path Xue Yang had taken, A-Qing sped off as well. Taking a shortcut through the forest, she soon spotted Xue Yang’s figure before her. He had a basket filled with food in one hand and was yawning lazily.

A-Qing hid, and saw Song Lan approached the man.

“Xue Yang,” he said, voice colder than ever before. In an instant, the lackadaisical expression that had been on Xue Yang’s face vanished, replaced by a terrifying rage.

‘Be careful, Daozhang,’ Lan Wangji thought, wishing there was a way for him to offer his own assistance. A moment later, he sneezed once again.

Song Lan’s sword was already unsheathed, and held firmly in his hands. After a moment, a look of mock-surprise crossed Xue Yang’s face.

“Oh, isn’t this Song Daozhang? What a rare guest? You here to get a free meal-”

Before he could finish speaking, Song Lan was already a mere meter away, his sword approaching the flesh of Xue Yang’s neck. It didn’t reach — blocked by Jiangzai a half-second before impact.

Nie Mingjue cursed.

Xue Yang backed up at once and set his basket down, muttering, “You damn cultivator. For once, I actually offered to shop for food, and yet here you are, spoiling my mood.”

He probably would have continued even after that, but he had to stop and defend himself from the following barrage of lethal attacks Song Lan dished out.

Not hesitating for even a second, Song Lan continued to srike as he shouted, “Just what in the world are you scheming?! Why have you spent so long near Xiao Xingchen?!”

Xue Yang just laughed: "And I was wondering why Song Daozhang still had business with me! So you want to ask about thi-"

"Tell me! Why would a piece of scum like you be so nice as to help him night hunt?!"

Song Lan's sword just barely missed grazing Xue Yang's cheek, but the resulting wind pressure was sharp enough to make a small cut form. Despite that, Xue Yang's maniacal smirk never faltered.

"Tell me!" Song Lan shouted again, this time managing to pierce through Xue Yang's arm due to his superior abilities.

"You really want to hear it? I'm afraid you might go mad if you do!" Xue Yang cackled, expression unchanged despite his wounds. "Some things shouldn't be made known."

So Xue Yang said. And yet, despite all the terrible things they had been shown, every watcher was grateful for the knowledge the simulation had granted them.

"Xue Yang, my patience is running out!" Song Lan growled, voice colder than ever before.

With a clang, Xue Yang blocked a strike that was aimed at his eye, only to then reply, "Fine. If you're so keen on hearing it, I'll tell you. Do you know what that bestest friend of yours did? How he killed a lot of walking corpses? How he exorcised them for the greater good without asking for anything in return? It's quite touching, really. Although he dug his eyes out for you and became blind, Shuanghua points towards resentful energy, allowing him to keep fighting. Wanna know what's even better? I learned that if you cut off the tongues of people under corpse poisoning and render them incapable of speaking, Shuanghua, who can't distinguish between living and dead corpses-"

He had already said more than enough for Song Lan to understand.

"You monster… you vile monster…" Song Lan whispered, arm trembling.

No one could disagree. The sheer scale of the cruelty Xue Yang was capable of had impressed even Wen Ruohan. Jin Guangshan made a mental note to secure influence over the child Xue Yang in the real world.

Then, before ~~Xiao Xingchen's~~ Song Lan's horrified eyes, Xue Yang snorted in amusement.

"Ah, Song Daozhang, polite people like you really are at a disadvantage when it comes to cursing others. You always say the same words over and over again. There's absolutely no power or creativity at all. I haven't used 'vile' or 'monster' when insulting other people since I was seven."

Enraged, Song Lan's next attack was aimed towards Xue Yang's throat. It was dodged by a hair's breadth, which only increased the anger surging through the cultivator's body:

“You imposed upon his blindness and fooled him so terribly!”

The blade cut through Xue Yang’s shoulder, but the man himself didn’t react.

“Imposed on his blindness?” he repeated instead. “Song Daozhang, have you forgotten who he dug out his own eyes and became blind for?”

Nie Huaisang and Wen Qing flinched at the accusation, their eyes flashing towards Jiang Cheng. There was no reaction from the boy (after all, Jiang Cheng didn’t know), but-

‘He was thusly despised by the public, his home destroyed by his beloved shidi, and he died miserably.’

If they were right about Wei Wuxian’s core — and they couldn’t be right but as more and more information was revealed it began to seem like they had to be — then the accusations against Song Lan could be hurled even more harshly towards the simulated Jiang heir.

The two then turned to each other, making eye contact and having a wordless conversation as the simulation carried on. The only person who noticed their strange reactions was Lan Wangji, who frowned as he tried to decipher what had upset them so much.

(A moment later, he sneezed.)

Unlike those three, who were stuck on the previous words, the rest of the watchers managed to continue to focus on the simulation. A now-frozen Song Lan listened in horror as Xue Yang’s grin took on an even more malicious tint:

“Do you really think you’re in any sort of position to blame me? Do you think you’re still a friend of his? Are you really shameless enough to call yourself his ally? Song Daozhang, do I really need to remind you what you said to Xiao Xingchen after I wiped out Baixue Temple? When he ran towards you, worried and concerned, and tried to reach out to you, what sort of an expression did you have?”

“I-” Song Lan cut himself off, his mind deteriorating before their eyes. “At the time, I-”

“‘At the time,’ you were upset? Pained? Grieving? You didn’t know where to vent your anger? Is that why you took it out on him? To be fair, the reason I wiped out your temple was precisely because of him. It’s quite understandable that you took it out on him. In fact, that was exactly what I wanted.”

As he continued to speak, Xue Yang’s attacks became fiercer and cleaner, giving him an edge over the now-crumbling cultivator going against him. And yet, even as the tide of the battle began to obviously turn, Song Lan didn’t have the mental capacity to notice at all.

“Well, who was it that said ‘from now on, we won’t need to meet again?’ Wasn’t it you?” Xue Yang viciously continued, attacking deeper and deeper with every sign of weakness. “He listened to your request and disappeared after he dug his eyes out for you, and yet you’ve come to search for him now? Isn’t that a bit too difficult for him?”

This time, Nie Huaisang and Wen Qing weren't the only ones able to make the connection.

'Why? Why? Just why?' Jiang Cheng shouted, staggering towards Wei Wuxian. 'Are you happy now? Are you satisfied? Why did you have to save Lan Wangji? Why did you do that? I don't care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die! What's their deaths got to do with us? With our sect? Why did this have to happen?!'

"But… I-" Jiang Cheng stuttered. "Back then, I was-"

'At the time, you were upset? Pained Grieving? You didn't know where to vent your anger?' Xue Yang had just asked.

And the truth to the poisonous words made them sting all the more.

Suddenly, creating an opening on the faltering Song Lan, Xue Yang smirked and released a cloud of corpse poisoning powder. It filled Song Lan's lungs, and he immediately began to cough-

In that half second, he ended up with Jiangzi poking straight through his mouth.

Jiang Yanli screamed.

Song Lan's tongue had been cut off.

The resulting sounds were terrifying.

With the tension that had already been in Nie Huaisang's body multiplied six-fold, and he quickly moved closer to his uncharacteristically-speechless brother.

Meanwhile, the watching A-Qing clenched her teeth together tightly, refusing to make even a single sound. She could only stare in horror as Song Lan staggered forward, mind corrupted by an unbearable agony, and tried to attack once again.

This time, Xue Yang didn't even bother trying to dodge. After all, before Song Lan's sloppy attack could make contact with him, Shuanghua's silver glare pierced through Song Lan's chest, killing him at once.

Wen Qing felt her blood freeze.

'Second question then: who killed him?' Wei Wuxian had asked.

After asking the question through inquiry, Lan Sizhui had to disbelievingly report, 'He said… Xiao Xingchen.'

Song Lan looked down at Shuanghua, which had pierced his heart, then slowly looked up again. At the other end of the blade, he saw Xiao Xingchen, who calmly held the sword.

"Are you okay?" Xiao Xingchen asked, completely ignorant of what had just occurred.

Song Lan moved his lips soundlessly.

A corpse — a sentient fierce corpse, so much like A-Ning — was being created right before her eyes. Had something like this happened to Wen Qing's brother? How had he died?

(If it had been even a hundredth as cruel as what happened to Song Lan, she had a feeling she would snap.)

Meanwhile, Nie Mingjue watched the horrors unfolding before him, and, with an anger spurred on by a righteous spirit even Wei Wuxian had acknowledged, felt one ~~untrue~~ phrase play on repeat in his mind.

'My fault. My fault. My fault.'

"I'm okay," Xue Yang said at last, grinning easily as Song Lan attempted to gasp out a word. "Why are you here, Daozhang?"

Casually as ever, Xiao Xingchen returned Shuanghua to its sheath.

"Shuanghua was behaving strangely," he explained. "I followed its guidance and came to see. There haven't been any walking corpses here in quite a while — much less a single one roaming alone. Did it come here from somewhere else?"

Song Lan fell to his knees, the life beginning to leave his eyes.

"Probably," Xue Yang said, gazing down disdainfully at Song Lan. "It's making awful noises."

A strangled laugh escaped Nie Mingjue's throat.

"'Awful noises?'" he repeated. "You… how can you have the audacity to watch this all happen and not feel even the slightest bit of — and you dare call yourself human?!"

He cut off for a moment, then began swearing harshly enough to make a thief cry. Normally, a young master such as himself would never have known those words, but Nie Mingjue accepted people of all walks of life into his sect; some of the lower-born people he had welcomed in had given him a few lessons.

Meanwhile, Lan Xichen watched from the sidelines, frozen where he stood. Nie Mingjue had half expected him to frown at the cursing, but nothing came. The first jade of Lan was too distracted to comment.

(Song Lan's story had many parallels to what they had seen so far. He had received help from Baoshan Sanren at the cost of someone he had blamed, just like Jiang Cheng. However, he had also looked desperately for Xiao Xingchen to make up and apologize for what he had done, just like Lan Wangji.)

(And now he was bleeding out, stabbed by Xiao Xingchen himself.)

Suddenly light-headed, Lan Xichen collapsed into his seat, unable to speak a word.

‘I see,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Right now, if Song Lan passed his sword to Xiao Xingchen, he’d be able to wordlessly prove his identity. Xiao Xingchen would recognize the sword, and would understand how dangerous Xue Yang was. How could he not recognize the sword of his closest friend with just a touch.’

And yet Song Lan didn’t move.

“Oh,” Lan Qiren muttered, realization creeping in.

‘He’s physically capable of doing that, but he can’t,’ Wei Wuxian concluded. ‘No matter the warning it would give Xiao Xingchen about Xue Yang, it’s impossible now. How could Song Lan possibly tell Xiao Xingchen who he’d just killed with his own hands?’

And so-

“Let’s go,” Xue Yang suggested. “It’s time to cook dinner. I’m hungry already.”

And not a trace of guilt could be found in that cheerful tone.

“Monster,” Jiang Yanli whispered.

Madam Yu huffed once, “This is what you get for pitying a street rat, A-Li. It doesn’t matter how sad their pasts seem, they can’t deny their nature-”

“Ziyuan!” Madam Jin suddenly shouted, making her son flinch at the tone. Madam Yu fell silent at once.

And yet, after what they had just seen, it didn’t matter whether they disagreed with her classist words or not; no one wanted to defend Xue Yang.

Meanwhile, Xiao Xingchen and Xue Yang had continued talking cheerfully, the former asking if Xue Yang had finished buying all the necessary vegetables. They walked off into the distance, leaving behind the terrified A-Qing.

Slowly, carefully, she stood straighter, walking on shaky legs towards the corpse laying on the floor. ~~Xiao Xingchen’s~~ Song Lan’s now-dead eyes stared blankly at the sky.

With a trembling hand, A-Qing forced herself to close his eyes, setting him to rest.

“I’m going to kill him,” Jin Zixuan mumbled.

Although he didn’t necessarily disagree, Lan Wangji neutrally asked, “I thought we agreed to not punish people for things they had not done yet?”

“I — he-”

“He destroys everything he touches!” Jiang Cheng growled back. “So what if he ‘hasn’t done anything yet?’ A street rat like him could never be anything more than this! We should get rid of him as soon as possible.”

Lan Wangji frowned and looked about to protest once again, only for a sudden sneeze to come over him before he could.

Movement from the simulation attracted everyone else's attention a moment after.

"Daozhang, please don't blame me or other Daozhang," A-Qing whispered, pressing her palms together tightly. "If I came out, I'd die anyways; even if I tried, I wouldn't be able to help you. The other Daozhang was fooled by that bastard as well. He didn't do it on purpose. He didn't even realize you were the one he killed!"

Her voice trembled slightly, but she said every word without hesitation. A-Qing had always been tough as steel and cleverer than anyone else she came across. Her resolve shown through even now.

After letting out a faltering exhale, A-Qing sobbed and continued, "I'm going back! Please, let your deceased spirit bless me so that I can get Daozhang Xiao Xingchen out of there! Bless us so we can escape the demon's control. I must not let that monster Xue Yang die in peace! I must cut him into pieces so that he never reincarnates again!"

Following her speech, she kowtowed on the ground three times, then stood. She wiped her face harshly, features set in determination, and walked toward Yi City.

Anyone in her circumstances would have wanted to run. Xue Yang didn't know what she had seen; if she fled now she would be safe. However, despite being a young girl lacking any cultivation, she refused to abandon Xiao Xingchen.

And then she had ended up an eye-less, tongueless ghost. They knew she had ended up like that, and yet Wen Qing couldn't help but clench her fists and pray that she would be safe. Before Madam Yu's eyes, a large fraction of the watchers began to copy Wen Qing one after another. She might not have cultivation, but the spirit within A-Qing was a million times stronger than that of most cultivators.

'San-niang, putting Xue Yang aside, A-Qing is a 'street rat' too, isn't she?' a voice that sounded a lot like Jiang Fengmian's asked in Madam Yu's head. 'I've asked you not to speak about homeless children like that, especially around A-Xian.'

'Shut up,' she thought back, gritting her teeth together. 'That's not what I meant. And A-Qing is-'

'Not someone who got the entirety of her own sect killed by picking a fight with the Wen Sect immediately after whipping A-Xian at their maid's request, right?'

By now, the sky had darkened into a faded, foggy dark grey, and as A-Qing stepped inside the coffin home, the dim light just barely managed to illuminate Xue Yang. The scoundrel was peeling apples, cutting them into little rabbit-shaped pieces, and swaying to a song he heard in his head. He seemed to be in a good mood.

Jin Zixuan felt sick just looking at him.

Having heard her enter, Xiao Xingchen turned to face her and asked, "A-Qing, where did you go today? It's already so late."

Glancing at her, something dangerous flashed in Xue Yang's eyes: "What's wrong? Your eyes are so swollen."

Nie Huaisang eeped.

"What happened?" Xiao Xingchen asked. "Did someone bully you?"

Xue Yang laughed, "Bully her? Who would be able to bully her?"

Jiang Yanli's heart stopped-

Suddenly, A-Qing's bamboo pole fell to the ground and she started wailing.

"Am I ugly?" A-Qing cried out, throwing herself into Xiao Xingchen's arms. "Am I really ugly? Daozhang, you have to tell me: am I truly that ugly?!"

"Huh?" Nie Mingjue gaped.

"Clever, clever girl," Wen Ruohan acknowledged, raising an eyebrow somewhat disbelievingly.

"Of course not," Xiao Xingchen responded, stroking her hair. "A-Qing is such a pretty girl. Who said you're ugly?"

Xue Yang, on the other hand, offered no such comfort: "You are ugly. You're even uglier when you cry."

"Don't say that," Xiao Xingchen chided.

'Even if she had been ugly, it would be nowhere near as unbearable as your corrupted soul is,' Lan Qiren thought, scathingly.

At that moment, A-Qing began to cry even harder, stomping her foot and proclaiming, "Well, Daozhang, it's not like you can see! What good is it if you say I'm pretty?! He can see. He said I'm ugly, so I must be ugly! Both ugly and blind!"

'Casually reminding him of her blindness,' Wen Ruohan observed. 'Really, if she had any interest in being a cultivator, I might have considered making her a spy.'

Truly unfortunate.

However, it seemed to have done its job. Xue Yang relaxed, clearly having believed the silly story A-Qing came up with, and allowed his suspicions to ease. Frustration took over instead:

"You came back here crying just because someone said you're ugly? Where did your usual unreasonable rudeness go?"

“I’m not rude!” A-Qing snapped back rudely. “Daozhang, do you have any money left?”

After pausing for an embarrassing moment, Xiao Xingchen responded, “Um… I think so?”

Rolling his eyes, Xue Yang interrupted, “I can lend you some.”

Lan Wangji sneezed.

Without wasting a second, A-Qing glared at him and spat, “You’ve been living and eating with us for so long, and yet you still call it ‘lending.’ What a miser! You have no shame! Daozhang, I want to buy pretty clothes and pretty jewelry! Can you come with me?”

‘I see, she’s trying to lead Xiao Xingchen out of here,’ Wei Wuxian realized. ‘But, if Xue Yang insists on following, what else can she do?’

“She’ll think of something, right, Da-ge?” Nie Huaisang found himself asking. He did a double take a moment later, unable to believe he had asked such a question when they already knew what was going to happen.

And, going by the broken look on his brother’s face, Nie Mingjue knew that as well.

“Of course I can go with you,” Xiao Xingchen agreed. “But I won’t be able to tell you if they’re pretty or not.”

“I could tell her,” Xue Yang volunteered again. But-

“I don’t care!” A-Qing jumped up and down, nearly banging her head into Xiao Xingchen’s. “I don’t care, I don’t care! I only want you! I don’t want him to come! All he says is that I’m ugly! And he’ll call me Little Blind!”

She was using her young age to the fullest, commencing a tantrum that Xue Yang, an adult, wouldn’t be able to match without raising suspicion. Though-

‘Really, what on earth is that Xue Yang talking about?’ Jin Guangshan wondered absent-mindedly. ‘I may find her personality quite unattractive, but her face is more than pleasant. How could you call a cute doll like that ‘ugly?’’

Finally, Xiao Xingchen nodded, “Alright. How about tomorrow?”

“Tonight!” she insisted.

“Good,” Wen Qing nodded once. “Run!”

“If you go now, all the market stalls will be closed already,” Xue Yang pointed out. “There won’t be anyone selling anything. Where would you even go?”

“Fine,” A-Qing at last gave in. “Tomorrow, then. It’s a promise!”

With the constant rise and fall of tension the simulation was giving them, even Madam Jin was starting to feel a little faint. She breathed out slowly, her gaze falling to her even more stressed son and to-be daughter in law.

(They were already exhausted by something focusing on people they had no connections to; if something happened to Jin Ling, Madam Jin had no doubt they would be far worse off.)

"They grouped around to have dinner, A-Qing disguising her fear as a fervent anger towards the non-existent person who had insulted her earlier that day," Ouyang Zizhen revealed, unable to keep the awe out of his voice as he did. "Looking at it from the outside, she truly did seem to be an infuriated, blind girl. For a time, it kept Xue Yang from discovering the truth."

Once dinner ended, A-Qing moved to scurry away, not wanting to spend any more time with Xue Yang. However, before she could leave, he suddenly called out to her:

"A-Qing."

Nie Huaisang eeped, and Lan Wangji sneezed.

And A-Qing's heart skipped a beat.

"Why did you suddenly call my name?" she demanded.

Xue Yang gave a malicious grin, "Aren't you the one who said you don't want to be called 'Little Blind?'"

A-Qing humphed, "People don't just suddenly act nice to others. Not unless they're hiding other intentions! Just what do you want?"

Lan Xichen frowned slightly at the girl's jaded outlook, wishing he could show her that wasn't always true. Just look at Jin Guangyao; Lan Xichen's to-be sworn brother was putting up supervisory offices to protect the civilians without expecting anything in return. Even as Chief Cultivator he hadn't allowed power to get to his head.

Sadly, there was no way for him to do that.

And even more unfortunately, the one who could continue to speak to her was Xue Yang.

"I don't particularly want anything. I just wanted to teach you what to do next time someone curses you like that."

"Huh. Tell me then: what should I do?"

An ugly grin broke out across Xue Yang's face as he answered, "If someone calls you ugly, then make them even uglier. Cut their face a few dozen times so that they'll never have the guts to go outside again. If someone calls you blind, then carve one end of your pole sharp. Stab both their eyes so that they'll also end up blind. See if they dare to bad-mouth you again."

“Stop scaring me!” A-Qing exclaimed.

All three Lans went pale.

“How can he say that?” Lan Xichen asked. “As a child, he experienced first-hand what it’s like for people to be cruel. How can he desire to — how can he go and massacre villages over the insults of three people?”

And then go on to gouge out A-Qing’s eyes, despite having spent years living side-by-side with her.

“The next day,” Lan Sizhui reported.

As a continuation of the day before, A-Qing was impatiently waiting for Xiao Xingchen so that she could go buy some pretty dresses and makeup. As her excited babbling continued, Xue Yang grew annoyed:

“If you two are gone, won’t I have to buy today’s food again?”

“Hmph. Why can’t you buy it? Just think about how many times Daozhang has gone out and bought us food without a word of complaint? You just bully and trick Daozhang all the time!”

Rolling his eyes, Xue Yang finally agreed: “Okay, okay, I’ll buy it. I’ll go right now.”

‘Really, it’s quite a surprise she ended up dead,’ Wen Ruohan thought, not for the first time. ‘She’s doing everything as well as she possibly could. No mistakes at all.’

And yet-

Xue Yang walked out, leaving the other two behind. Having just sent Xue Yang off, Xiao Xingchen at last glanced over at A-Qing, waiting for her to join him. However, when she continued to hesitate, he began to frown.

“A-Qing, are you still not ready yet? Can we go?”

A-Qing walked towards him, but, instead of leaving, paused for another moment, then closed the door.

“A-Qing?”

“Daozhang,” she responded back, her voice trembling. “...Do you happen to know someone named Xue Yang?”

Xiao Xingchen’s smile froze.

Jiang Yanli tensed at the name, and saw the simulated blue shadow of her shidi do the same. On her left, Lan Wangji looked as though he was preparing to attack in case Xue Yang somehow managed to re-enter through the now-closed door.

Finally-

"...Xue Yang?" Xiao Xingchen repeated, all the blood drained from his face. "A-Qing, how did you learn of that name?"

"Xue Yang is the person who's been living with us! He's that bastard!"

"The-the person with us?" Xiao Xingchen shook his head. "The person with us… how do you know?"

"I heard him kill someone!"

"You saw it happen," Nie Mingjue muttered. "Just tell him the full truth — he needs to know!"

"He killed someone? Who did he kill?"

Without hesitating for even a second, A-Qing answered, "A woman! She was very young! I think she had a sword with her!"

Complete and utter bafflement covered most of the watcher's faces for several seconds. Then, they heard Lan Wangji's voice ring out:

"She doesn't want to tell him who he killed," he observed. "She understands the delicacy of the current situation."

(Then, among the increasingly grim looks of the other watchers, Lan Wangji sneezed yet again.)

Meanwhile, A-Qing continued without rest: "Xue Yang… I think he had a sword with him too! I heard them fighting. They were really loud. The woman kept calling him 'Xue Yang,' and saying that he 'wiped out a temple' and 'killed countless people.' She demanded that he be 'rightly punished' — oh, heavens, he's out of his mind! He's been hiding beside us all along, and I don't even know what he's trying to do!"

And not once in any of that did she mention that the 'walking corpses' Xiao Xingchen had been killing were, in fact, living humans all along. Once again, Lan Qiren found himself awed by the seemingly-uncharacteristic tact and kindness A-Qing was showing (and realizing that, despite the girl's outward lack of formality, the generosity and maturity had been there the whole time).

However, Xiao Xingchen still had difficulty accepting such an unbelievable story, muttering, "But… his voice is different. And…"

Frustrated, A-Qing slammed her pole against the ground and shouted, "He purposefully changed his voice so you wouldn't notice that! He was afraid you'd recognize him!"

But Xiao Xingchen had spent years living with him. Even without knowing the worst Xue Yang had done, Xiao Xingchen wouldn't be able to believe such an accusation so easily, no matter who it was from. But-

“Oh, right!” A-Qing straightened up. “He has nine fingers! Daozhang, do you know? Did Xue Yang also have nine fingers? You’ve definitely seen him before, right?”

But there was no arguing with that.

Realization crept in and Xiao Xingchen stumbled back, almost falling to the ground.

‘See? You’re such an idiot. This is what happens when you try to play the hero,’ Madam Yu thought, the words resounding in a broken, despairing manner completely at ends with the vicious, mocking way they had been used earlier. ‘You shouldn't have helped him. If you had just walked away….’

But that wasn’t quite right, was it? None of this was his fault, just like the Wens weren’t Wei Wuxian’s.

~~If anything, the massacre of Lotus Pier had been her-~~

“But… A-Qing,” he finally spoke up. “How… how did you know he has nine fingers? Have you touched his hand before? If he really is Xue Yang, would he have let you touch his hand and discover it?”

The tension in A-Qing’s body seemed seconds away from bursting out of her as she shouted, “...Daozhang! Let me tell you the truth! I’m not blind! I can see! I didn’t touch his hands, I saw them!”

“What did you say?” Xiao Xingchen gaped, even more speechless than before. “You… you can see?”

Although terror was completely filling her expression, A-Qing forced herself to answer, “I’m sorry, Daozhang! I didn’t lie to you on purpose! I was scared that if you knew I wasn’t blind, you’d chase me away! Please don’t blame me now! Let’s run away together. He’ll be back as soon as he finishes shopping for food!”

“Yes!” Jiang Yanli whispered. “Please… just run!”

Suddenly, A-Qing closed her mouth. The pure-white bandages that had always been wrapped around Xiao Xingchen’s eyes were being stained red. The blood became thicker and thicker, and soon began trickling down from the bandages where his eyes had once been.

The closest thing to tears he could make at the current time.

“Daozhang, you’re bleeding!” A-Qing pointed out, allowing Xiao Xingchen to realize that for himself. Going by the abject surprise on his face, it was clear that this hadn’t happened in a long time.

“But…” he continued to hold doubts. “But if he really is Xue Yang, why would it be like this? Why didn’t he kill me in the beginning? Why stay by my side for so many years?

Why would this be Xue Yang?!"

His world was collapsing around him, and there was nothing he could do to stop it.

"...I'm sorry," Nie Mingjue muttered, and Nie Huaisang flinched at the sheer grief. "I'm sorry, I should've… I'm sorry."

But A-Qing pressed on: "Of course he wanted to kill you in the beginning! I've seen his eyes. They were meaner than mean and scarier than scary! But since he was injured and couldn't move, he needed someone to take care of him! I didn't know who he was. If I had, I would have stabbed him to death when we found him in that bush! Daozhang, let's run! Alright?"

"Yes!" Wen Qing insisted, and Nie Mingjue's desperation said just the same. However-

'It won't work,' Wei Wuxian thought, frowning deeply. 'If A-Qing hadn't told him just now, Xiao Xingchen would have gone on believing that Xue Yang was someone else and continued living with him. Now that she's told Xiao Xingchen, he can't simply run away. He'll definitely feel he needs to ask Xue Yang directly. There's… no solution to this.'

"And if Wei Wuxian is saying that…" Madam Jin mumbled, then cursed under her breath.

After thinking the situation over for a moment longer, Xiao Xingchen's expression set into a grim line and he instructed, "A-Qing, run away."

"Me?! Daozhang, let's run away together!" A-Qing shouted, her voice growing hoarse from the strain. However-

"I can't go," Xiao Xingchen disagreed, shaking his head. "I need to find out what he's trying to do. He definitely has a goal, and he's tried to reach that goal over the past few years by staying patiently by my side."

At that moment, a sudden image flashed into Nie Mingjue's mind: Xue Yang, staring down at the piece of candy he had been given with a look of wide-eyed wonder. A moment later, however, he shook that thought away.

Someone like Xue Yang indeed must have some sort of ulterior motive. Xiao Xingchen would need to prepare for that.

In agreement with Nie Mingjue's assessment, Xiao Xingchen continued, "If I leave him alone, I fear that the people of Yi City would fall to him. Xue Yang has always been this way. You need to go."

Suddenly, A-Qing's bamboo pole crashed onto the ground as she ran forward to clutch his leg, sobbing "Me? Daozhang, how can I go by myself? I wanna stay with you! If you're not leaving, then I'm not leaving either!"

Wen Qing swallowed, choking down a sob of her own.

“If worst comes to worst, we’ll just be murdered by him!” A-Qing continued, her cries not even remotely faked anymore. “I’ll be so lonely I’ll want to die if I try roaming around by myself! I know you don’t want that to happen to me, so let’s run away together!”

’I spend money really quickly,’ the past A-Qing had said. ‘If you refuse to take me with you, the money will be gone at once, and I’ll have to go steal from and trick people again! And- and if that happens, someone will slap me hard and I’ll fall down and I won’t be able to get up again so I’ll be lost, I won’t be able to find my way after that! Poor me!’

“If you leave me alone, I might as well just become a ghost now!”

And that strategy had worked so well before, but now….

Lan Xichen looked away.

“A-Qing, you just told me you aren’t actually blind,” Xiao Xingchen spoke softly. “You can see, and you’re quite clever. I trust that you’ll live a good life.”

“Her ghost-form begs to differ!” Jin Zixuan snapped. “This won’t work! You need to run-”

But Xiao Xingchen didn’t know it wouldn’t work and so continued, “You don’t know how scary Xue Yang is. You can’t stay. You mustn’t go near him again either.”

‘I do know! I know how scary he is!’ the still-crying A-Qing mentally wailed.

But before she couldn’t open her mouth and speak the truth, there was a creak from outside.

Xue Yang was back.

At that moment, Jiang Yanli went so pale she turned nearly translucent. Watching that, Madam Yu felt her own concern for the simulated A-Qing multiply a hundred fold.

‘Street rat or not, you’re the smartest person in this whole city,’ she mentally hissed. ‘You’ll figure something out, right? Those things we saw in the future were meant to mislead us, right? You… you’re a brilliant girl. I made everything worse for Wei Wuxian, but surely you can-’

She cut that thought process off at once, staring in horror as Xiao Xingchen quickly pushed A-Qing out of sight.

“When he comes in, I’ll handle him. Use this chance to escape,” he whispered. “Listen to me!”

Terrified, A-Qing could only nod through her tears.

Breathing heavily, Nie Mingjue clenched his fists even tighter and-

The door was kicked open.

“What are you guys doing?” Xue Yang asked. “I’m already back, and two still haven’t left? If you’re still in there then open the hatch and let me inside. I’m tired!”

The sheer scale to which Xue Yang could make himself sound innocent was truly staggering. Moving closer to his brother, Nie Huaisang reminded himself to not let his guard down around the real version of the delinquent before them, if they ever met.

A laugh abruptly cut through the silence.

“How are you already tired?” A-Qing asked, wiping her face and ignoring the ‘do-not-make-another-sound’ look Xiao Xingchen was sending her. “It’s only a small distance from here to the market, and yet you’re already exhausted? I’m just a bit slow because I’m trying to decide which of my outfits would be the best to wear. How does this concern you?”

Rolling his eyes, Xue Yang mocked, “How many outfits do you have? It doesn’t matter what you wear, you’ll keep looking the same. Come, come, open the door.”

Even now, A-Qing was managing to maintain her act. Although Madam Jin laughed at her own foolishness for it, even she couldn’t help but become the slightest bit hopeful. If they kept his guard down — if they made it out-

Suddenly, a rumble went through the house as the impatient Xue Yang kicked the door down, having finally decided that A-Qing was indeed not going to let him in. Calling out an apology to Xiao Xingchen, he stepped forward and took a bite out of an apple-

Then looked down to see Shuanghua sticking into his gut.

“Yes!” Jiang Cheng cheered.

The basket dropped to the ground, and the potatoes, carrots, apples, and steamed buns rolled onto the floor. Slowly, as disbelievingly as Song Lan just the day before, he looked up at Xiao Xingchen.

“A-Qing, run!” the cultivator shouted. Without wasting a second, A-Qing moved as fast as she could to barge through the door of the coffin home and raced out into the streets.

“Hey — wait!” Nie Mingjue shouted in protests as the watchers (viewing this through Wei Wuxian’s empathy) were dragged along with her rather than being allowed to watch the fight.

But then, to Nie Mingjue’s great surprise, the powerless, young, untrained A-Qing took a path that brought her back around so she could creep back in. She slipped into a hiding spot she was clearly quite familiar with and watched.

“Was it fun?” Xiao Xingchen asked coldly.

Slowly and meanderingly, Xue Yang took another bite of the fruit in his hand, seemingly ignoring the wound left in his stomach. He chewed and swallowed at an overly-casual pace before finally deciding to answer:

“Yes. Of course it was fun.”

He was no longer bothering to disguise his voice.

As he watched, Jin Guangshan had to admit he was once again impressed. Xue Yang’s ability to regain power in the conversation — making Xiao Xingchen wait for him, and allowing only glee into his tone — were shockingly effective, especially considering the disadvantageous situation the wound in his stomach left him in.

“Just what are you trying to do, having stayed with me all these years?”

“Who knows?” Xue Yang shrugged. “Maybe I’m bored?”

‘I should have gutted him the second I saw him all those years ago, regardless of whether that would make me an enemy of the Jin,’ Nie Mingjue swore, forgetting, for a moment, that it had been the simulated version of him who met Xue Yang, rather than the real one.

As Xiao Xingchen raised his sword again to attack, Xue Yang slipped into a much more talkative mood, asking, “Xiao Xingchen Daozhang, do you want to hear the second half of the story I started all that time ago?”

“No,” Xiao Xingchen responded easily.

However, he didn’t attack immediately after either.

“Ah, you idiot!” Nie Huaisang whined pitifully, the stress truly getting to him. “It’s gonna be some sort of trap! You shouldn't let a guy like that keep talking!”

“Well, I’m still gonna tell you anyways,” Xue Yang decided, as if determined to prove Nie Huaisang right. “After you hear it, if you still think this is all my fault, you can do whatever you want.”

“Liar!” Jin Zixuan hissed furiously.

“Later that day, the child happened to see the man who fooled him into taking the letter,” Xue Yang explained, casually putting pressure on his stomach wound to slow the bleeding. “Upon spotting him, he was both frustrated and happy. He threw himself at the man with tears in his eyes, crying ‘I brought the letter there, but the pastries are gone and I was beat up! Can you give me another plate?’”

Breathing shakily (fighting off another sneeze), Lan Wangji frowned, already guessing the basics of how this was going to end.

“The man’s face was all beaten up as well. He’d probably been caught by the brawny receiver of the letter. Seeing a dirty little child clinging to his leg, he couldn’t help but be annoyed and kicked him away at once.”

And with a crack, the simulation shifted to show that memory, and the body of the child skidded across the ground.

Jiang Yanli gasped and stood at once, unable to believe the sheer cruelty of that action.

“The man climbed up an ox cart and told the driver to leave at once. Unwilling to give up, the child picked himself off the ground and chased after the cart. He really wanted a plate of sugary pastries.

Having finally caught up to it, he waved his arms in front of the cart to get it to stop. The man grew irritated by his crying, so he snatched the driver’s whip and lashed at the boy’s head.”

The child Xue Yang was knocked to the ground.

Nie Mingjue faltered, his mind unable to comprehend the idea of righteous anger for Xue Yang’s sake, child or not.

“And then,” Xue Yang continued, emphasizing each word one at a time. “The wheels of the cart ground over the child’s hand, one finger at a time.”

A sickening crunch filled the air as that same scene played before their eyes.

With a disturbing clarity, Wen Qing found her earlier confusion at the strange injury on Xue Yang’s hand answered in far more detail than she would like it to be.

The young Xue Yang’s screams filled the air.

Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang both fell back into their seats, unable to stand before the horrifying imagery.

“The child was seven at the time,” Xue Yang confessed. “The bones of his left hand were crushed, while one finger was ground into battered flesh on the spot! This man was Chang Ping’s father.”

And yet, once again, the reminder that he had wiped out a clan for the sin of an already-dead father — that dozens of lives were what he considered an equal trade for his hand — turned the sympathy they had felt into a sour acid.

‘And on the other hand, we have Wei Wuxian,’ Wen Qing thought. ‘I still can’t believe he would have willingly let Madam Yu cut off his hand if it meant protecting the sect for just a few days longer.’

“Xiao Xingchen Daozhang, you were just so stern when you brought me to Koi Tower! You condemned me and asked why I wiped out the entire sect just because of some suspicion! Is it that, since the fingers weren't yours, you were incapable of feeling the pain?! You guys don’t know how those horrifying screams feel coming out of your own mouths?! Why didn’t you ask him why he decided to amuse himself with me for no reason? The current Xue Yang was bestowed upon you by the past Chang CiAn! The Yueyang Chang clan was only reaping what it had sown!”

But Xiao Xingchen stared in bafflement, disbelievingly responding, “CiAn Chang broke one of your fingers in the past. If you sought revenge, you could have simply broken one of his fingers as well. If it truly had scared you, you could have broken two of his fingers, or even all ten! Even if you had cut off an entire arm of his…. Why did you have to kill his entire clan?! Don't tell me that a single finger of yours was equal to more than fifty human lives!"

Nie Mingjue nodded in fierce agreement, hearing a little voice in his head wondering what had happened to make the simulated Wei Wuxian kill Jin Zixuan.

Meanwhile, Xue Yang appeared to be genuinely thinking Xiao Xingchen's question over, hesitating for quite a while before responding, "Of course they were equal. The finger was my own, but those lives were other peoples'."

Jiang Yanli froze for a moment, not comprehending those words.

"...What?"

"Why, they're not even equal. They wouldn't be equal no matter how many of them I killed. It was only around fifty. How could that be equal to one of my fingers?"

Paler than ivory, Lan Xichen turned to his uncle and asked, "He's not… serious, right?"

Rather than answer, Lan Qiren was simply openly gaping.

"Then what about the others?!" the equally pale Xiao Xingchen demanded. "Why did you wipe out Baixue temple?! Why did you blind Song Zichen Daozhang's eyes?!"

"Why did you stop me?" Xue Yang fired back. "Why did you try to prevent me from doing what I wanted to do? Why did you stand up for those dregs of the Chang Clan? You wanted to help Chang CiAn? Chang Ping?"

A sudden uneasiness came over Madam Yu, and she suddenly realized who Xue Yang was sounding like right at that moment.

A mocking laugh left Xue Yang's throat: "Didn't Chang Ping first cry tears of gratitude? And yet, didn't he later beg you not to help him? Xiao Xingchen Daozhang, this matter has been your fault since the beginning. You shouldn't have meddled in the business of other people. Who was right, and who was wrong; how would an outsider be able to understand that?"

'Wei Ying, he really can't go a day without stirring up some trouble, can he?' Madam Yu had asked. 'Would Wen Chao really have dared to do anything?'

But-

'Even if he did, that'd just mean they ran out of luck! Since when was it his turn to play hero?!'

But that wasn't it. That wasn't what she meant. She was nothing like this disgusting, dishonorable street rat ~~in that she'd never been treated so cruelly as a child~~. Unlike him, she had at least raised her children to be better-

'Why did you save Lan Wangji?! Why did you have to speak up?!' Jiang Cheng had shouted. 'How many times have I told you to not stir up trouble? To not strike? Did you really want to play the hero that badly? Well, have you seen the results of you playing the hero? Are you happy now?!'

(Going by the expression on her son's face, Madam Yu had no doubt he was hearing the same words as her.)

And Xue Yang was far from finished:

"Maybe you shouldn't have left that mountain in the first place! Your teacher, Baoshan Sanren, was indeed smart. Why didn't you listen to her and obediently cultivate in the mountains?! If you couldn't understand this world, then you shouldn't have come!"

Those words were too much for anyone to bear.

"...Xue Yang," Xiao Xingchen whispered. "You really are… too disgusting."

And at that, killing intent flashed into Xue Yang's eyes yet again.

Before he had even realized what he was doing, Lan Wangji found himself standing between Xue Yang and Xiao Xingchen. It occurred to him in the next moment that he was ~~as always~~ powerless to change the situation. Powerless to stop Wei Wuxian's fall; powerless to catch him before he crashed; powerless to help Xiao Xingchen in his time of need.

Powerless to tell the real Wei Wuxian the words he most wanted to say.

However, the following laugh that left Xue Yang was bitter, rather than maniacal.

"Xiao Xingchen, this is why I hate you," he revealed. "The people I hate the most are ones like you: people who say they're righteous, who think they're virtuous… precisely naive, dumb idiots like you who think the world's better just because you did something good!"

"What?"

Lan Qiren couldn't stand this any longer, standing up and declaring, "He's insane-"

"You think I'm disgusting?! Very well! Why would I care if anyone thinks I'm disgusting? But, on the other hand, are you in any position to be disgusted by me?"

"Oh, no," Nie Huaisang whispered, and, upon hearing that, the dread in Nie Mingjue's chest multiplied a hundred-fold.

"What do you mean?" Xiao Xingchen asked.

Nie Huaisang's face fell, and, just a moment after, Wen Ruohan realized the same thing he had.

"Ah," he muttered. "No wonder things ended up this way."

Xue Yang knew just the words to say:

“We haven’t been night hunting walking corpses recently, have we?” Xue Yang mused affectionately. “But, a few years ago, didn’t we go out and kill a bunch every couple of days.”

One by one, other people were beginning to catch on as well.

“...Why are you bringing this up now?”

“It’s nothing, really. I just feel it’s truly unfortunate that you’re blind. You dug out both your eyes, so you couldn’t see those ‘walking corpses’ you killed. They were so scared, so pained as you pierced them through their hearts. Some kneeled down and cried — kowtowing, even, as they begged you to spare the children and elderly in their families. If not for the fact that I’d cut out their tongues, I bet they would have been wailing, ‘Daozhang, spare us!’”

Xiao Xingchen began to tremble.

“It’s not your fault!” Wen Qing insisted. “Don’t lose focus. Xiao Xingchen!”

“You deceived me,” he whispered. “You-”

“Yes, I deceived you,” Xue Yang admitted freely. “I’ve been deceiving you all along. Who would have known that you’d believe me so easily while I was deceiving you, but refuse to accept it when it’s the truth?”

“Be quiet!” Xiao Xingchen shouted, staggering and raising his sword in Xue Yang’s general direction, but unable to muster up a genuine attack.

Xue Yang’s poisonous words had struck true, just like they had for Song Lan.

Pressing even harder on his abdominal wound, Xue Yang slowly backed away, a monstrous glint in his eyes: “Alright! I’ll be quiet! If you still don’t believe me, then exchange a few blows with the one standing behind you!”

The watchers spun almost as one to face the direction he indicated.

“Have him tell you whether or not I’m deceiving you!”

And the indicated ‘him’ stood in plain sight before them.

“Oh, no,” Nie Huaisang breathed.

The battle began, Xiao Xingchen and the corpse exchanging blows one by one. As this cycle continued, the former gradually realized whose sword he was making contact with. Only one person felt like this.

“...Is that you, Zichen?”

There was no answer to give. Xue Yang wasn't Wei Wuxian (a fact that had never been more obvious than now); his corpses couldn't talk. And yet, the connection brought back everything Wen Qing could remember feeling when she first found out that 'the Yiling Patriarch' had turned her brother into the Ghost General. The hate she had felt; the fear.

And what she now saw before her was a million times more cruel than a scenario she had concocted in her wildest nightmares.

"...Zichen… Song Daozhang… is that you?"

Song Lan looked at him, but did not make a sound.

The red that had bled through Xiao Xingchen's bandages began all over again, two parallel streams of blood flowing down his cheeks and trickling onto the cold floor. Both he and A-Qing felt their breaths stutter, the pain in their chests making it hard to breathe.

"...What's wrong?" Xiao Xingchen asked, voice cracking on the second word. "Say something."

Still nothing.

"I wonder, do I still need to tell you who exactly that walking corpse you killed yesterday was?"

"He…" Nie Mingjue shook his head. "He can't do that. He-"

A clang resounded as Shuanghua fell to the ground, and Xue Yang burst into laughter.

"Shut up," Madam Yu whispered, an unperceivable voice amid the fierce roars of protest given off by the other watchers. "It wasn't… shut up. He was just trying to…."

She wasn't the kind of weak woman who would get emotional over the suffering of strangers. She was better than this — or so she told herself. It didn't matter how many connections she could make to the day her son was made an orphan — the day he had watched as her body was ridiculed by that disgusting maid — it didn't matter. But-

'Xiao Xingchen didn't deserve this,' her mind asserted nonetheless. 'He hadn't… done anything wrong.'

Unfortunately, none of that would change what happened next.

"What's wrong?!" Xue Yang's laughter shook the town, and the dark clouds gathering above filled the district with shadow. "How sweet! You're so touched to see your old friend again that you're even crying! Do you want to give him a hug?!"

A-Qing covered her mouth, trying desperately to avoid letting out even a whimper.

"Saving the world! What a joke — you can't even save yourself!"

The blue shade of Wei Wuxian twitched at those words, and his hands came up to clutch his head as though pained. The movement attracted everyone's attention to him, and they watched out of the corners of their eyes even as Xiao Xingchen fell to his knees before Song Lan.

"You couldn't do anything! You've failed miserably! You're the only one to blame — you asked for all of this!"

'Are you happy now?!' Jiang Cheng had demanded.

And then, at that moment, the image shifted. Right where Xiao Xingchen knelt on the ground, they saw another person overlaid on top of him. It was the Yiling Patriarch as they'd never seen him before.

"A failure, drenched in blood," Lan Sizhui's voice narrated out loud to them. "One who couldn't do anything except silently accept the criticism and scorn of others. Someone wholly beyond hope, who could only cry in despair."

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji whispered.

'I knew it,' a vicious voice in Wen Ruohan's mind said. 'I knew the other clans couldn't be trusted with a talent like his. I'd already seen enough evidence in just the Jiang Clan, but now…. If this is what they drive him to, I can't let him stay with them.'

A bit of bloodlust began to slip out of his control, and those unfortunate enough to be standing next to him felt shivers run down their spines.

Rain began to pour, obscuring their view of the chaotic scene even more. Xiao Xingchen's white bandages had been entirely stained red, and, with no eyes to cry with, he could only bleed tears.

"Please. Let me go," he whispered, barely able to be heard over the pouring rain.

Then suddenly, before anyone could react, Xiao Xingchen reached out and snatched Shuanghua, bringing the blade to his own neck. With a quick slice, he cut clear through his own throat, and red gushed out in droves.

"No!" Wen Qing shouted, and Nie Mingjue stood up beside her, a haunted, terrified, stunned expression on his face.

And Xue Yang's movement and laughter halted. After a while of silence, he walked toward the new corpse which laid on the ground. He looked down with bloodshot eyes, the rims of which contained a reddish tint. Then-

"You forced me to do this!" Xue Yang shouted, then laughed. "A dead one is better. Only dead people listen!"

"Forced you?" Nie Mingjue repeated disbelievingly. "No you… you-"

Following that, Xue Yang moved swiftly. He cleaned Xiao Xingchen's face, then painted an array on the ground, finally placing Xiao Xingchen's body inside. It was only after he had done all of that that he remembered to take care of his own abdominal wound. That done, he sat and waited for Xiao Xingchen to get up again.

And waited. And waited.

But nothing happened.

"Did… he do it wrong?"

"No… no, remember?" Lan Qiren asked. "Even Wei Wuxian couldn't help. In his grief. Xiao Xingchen Daozhang...."

Had shattered his own soul.

The rain continued to pour, and even though Xue Yang's protections kept the array he had drawn safe, the water began soaking into Xiao Xingchen's bandages and robes as time went on. Frustrated, Xue Yang inspected and re-inspected the array he drew, and, even after finding nothing wrong with it, impatiently redrew it.

Yet still nothing happened.

With an annoyed crackle of resentful energy, he reached forward and tried to force the soul back in. There was a light turquoise glow as a soul was gathered together-

And a moment later, it dissipated, already too shattered to form.

"Huh?" Xue Yang asked.

The blood spilling out of Xiao Xingchen's neck stained the floor.

"No," Xue Yang muttered. "No, no-"

He reached forward, wrapping his hands around the neck as if trying to choke the cultivator, but the blood continued to spill out. A short while later, all the blood that had been in Xiao Xingchen's head was drained, and the flow stopped.

"...Huh?" Xue Yang asked again, looking every bit the child that had appeared in his own story.

And Xiao Xingchen's corpse lay on the ground before him, as dead as it possibly could be.

Lan Wangji lowered his eyes, sending a prayer towards the heroic cultivator who had faced such a pitiful end.

The simulation cut away, and the watchers were racing through the woods, getting as far from the coffin home as possible. When it finally stopped, they were in the presence of a coughing, gasping A-Qing. Yi City was far behind her, only a small speck in the distance, and she was finally allowing herself a moment to breathe.

She had run away as fast as possible.

'But that won't be enough,' Wen Qing recalled. 'She'll still end up….'

Now that A-Qing had finally managed to get a moment to breathe, the despair she had kept locked down for a time finally rose up. She collapsed to her knees, finally letting out the cries she had buried within herself.

"Daozhang! Daozhang!" she sobbed against the dry ground. "Daozhang!"

Tears fell on the ground, her white eyes shining like stars through the sorrow she was experiencing. However, even as she cried out in pain, she knew she was not safe.

Slowly, trembling in grief, she picked herself off the ground.

"Several days later!" Lan Jingyi proclaimed.

By now her tears had faded, but her determination was just as strong as ever. She walked with her bamboo pole, stumbling slightly every few steps to keep up the act of blindness.

"Excuse me, are there any big sects around here?" she asked as a couple approached her. "Are there any really powerful people in this area? People who can cultivate?"

"She hasn't given up," Madam Jin observed. "Really, the way she's handled this… there isn't a single thing she's done wrong."

A-Qing was doing everything in her power to solve this issue. Even if they had wanted to, there was no way for the watchers to blame what had happened on any foolishness on her part.

Which meant the biggest issue was-

"We need to find out how Xue Yang escaped his execution," Lan Xichen declared, making eye contact with an equally determined Nie Mingjue. "Whoever betrayed A-Yao will need to be watched carefully."

Nie Mingjue nodded in agreement.

"I… don't think so," the man she had asked said, and with another awkward glance at his wife, nodded once to A-Qing and took off. It seemed that no one was willing to take her question seriously, walking away after just a few sentences. However, A-Qing wasn't discouraged. Exhausted and trembling, she took a quick break by a nearby brook so that she could continue her attempts. She cupped her hands in the water to take a drink, then, seeing the wooden hairpin in her hair, reached up to it.

‘Adjusting her hairpin by a river… this is almost exactly like the first time we saw her,’ Wen Qing recalled, then, feeling her mouth dip into a frown, added, ‘Though now… the context is very different.’

Reaching into her lapel, she pulled out a small, white money pouch. It was the first thing she had stolen from Xiao Xingchen. Upon laying her eyes on it, tears began welling up again.

With shaking fingers, she reached inside and pulled out a small piece of candy. She licked it carefully, smiling brokenly at the now-familiar sweetness, and put it away again. Then, she noticed another person’s reflection in the water.

Xue Yang was looming over her.

“Ah!” Jin Zixuan yelped as he and the other watchers who hadn’t noticed Xue Yang felt their heart rates multiply at once.

The smile on Xue Yang’s face was the furthest thing from reassuring.

“Oh,”Jiang Yanli breathed out, the last of her hope vanishing before her eyes. “Oh.”

With Shuanghua in hand, Xue Yang opened his arms in a warped imitation of a hug, asking, “A-Qing, why are you running away? We haven’t seen each other in such a long time. Didn’t you miss m-”

“Help me!” A-Qing shrieked, “Help! Is anyone here?!”

But she was too far away; no help came.

‘I’m sorry,’ Lan Wangji thought, watching the scene with gritted teeth. ‘I’m sorry, I wish I could help, but I can’t. I always, always-’

“After I finished my business in Yueyang, I decided to go walking around the city. I just happened to run into you while you were asking around. What a wonderful turn of fate! Speaking of which, your acting is superb. You even fooled me for such a long time. Well done.”

“Oh, spare your compliments,” Nie Mingjue growled. “You don’t deserve to look at her much less-”

But A-Qing didn’t need anyone else’s help when it came to spitting out insults:

“You animal!” she shouted. “Thankless wretch! Lower than low bastard! Your parents must have made love in a pigpen for a son of a bitch like you to come out! You’re just a germ polluting anything you touch with your filth!”

As Xue Yang listened to her insults grow more and more colorful, he gave an amused smirk: “You’re quite good at this, aren’t you? Why haven’t I seen you act so rude in front of Xiao Xingchen? You got more coming?”

“Die in a ditch you shameless flee! And you still dare to mention Daozhang and hold Daozhang’s sword? Do you deserve to hold it? You’re dirtying his belonging!”

“Oh, you mean this?” Xue Yang asked, holding the sword up. “It’s mine now. Do you really think your Daozhang is any cleaner? After this, he’ll also be my-”

“You bastard! Dream on! You don’t deserve to call Daozhang unclean! You’re just a piece of rot! Daozhang must be the unluckiest man in the world to have met you!”

No one could disagree.

But, at those words, the sliver of light that had been left in Xue Yang’s eyes darkened completely. Realizing she had finally pushed him over the edge, A-Qing relaxed; if there was no changing what was going to happen to her, at least she didn’t have to wait any longer.

But then-

“If you like pretending to be blind so much, why don’t you go all the way?” Xue Yang asked, then, with a wave of his hand, sent a tsunami of powder into her eyes. Everything turned red for a moment, then went black.

Shouts resounded.

However, although the darkness came, the figures of the other watchers were just as bright as ever. Nie Huaisang nearly wept in gratitude for that, moving closer to his brother at once for even the slightest bit of reassurance.

Then, A-Qing let out a blood-curdling scream.

Several people flinched at the agonized noise, while others, such as Wen Qing, merely felt their anger grow.

“You’re too loud,” Xue Yang continued. “I don’t think you need that tongue of yours anymore either.”

“No-”

The crisp ringing of a silver bell resounded, and the simulated Wei Wuxian was suddenly pulled in two directions at once, the agony A-Qing was experiencing battling against the calming effects of the Jiang Clan’s silver bell.

The juniors were trying to wake Wei Wuxian up. However, before the watchers could see the situation outside of the world within empathy, the simulation faded away.

The watchers sat in silence for a while, a heavy cloud of hopelessness looming over them. What exactly could be said after something like that? Xiao Xingchen was now dead, and A-Qing would follow soon after.

“How could he?” Jiang Yanli whispered at last. “Even-even Wen-er-gongzi had never spent years living with any of the people he-”

Madam Yu tensed at once, her eyes flashing to Wen Ruohan, ready to defend her daughter if need-be. Luckily, it seemed that Wen Chao had already embarrassed him so much throughout the simulation that he no longer cared about such a minor insult.

(She tried to ignore the part of her brain wondering if the ‘army of dogs’ Jiang Fengmian had reported played any part in Wen Ruohan’s new disdain for his own son.)

Finally-

“What a monster,” Jin Zixuan muttered. “How could he do that to her? And to think, I actually felt a little sorry for him when I heard about his past!”

“I-I don’t understand,” Lan Xichen admitted. “What he experienced as a child… it was just needless, senseless cruelty. How does he think it’s okay for him give out that same needless, senseless cruelty now that he’s grown up?”

“Perhaps he simply views that as the way the world works,” Wen Ruohan suggested, making all other conversation halt at once. “His short speech on ‘his fingers’ versus ‘other people’s lives’ carried quite a few childish elements to it. I wouldn’t be surprised if he viewed that as the way of the world.”

‘Do you really think you have any room to talk when it comes to childish mindsets?’ Wen Qing thought, but knew better than to say. Her position in the Wen Sect was tenuous at best right now, given her simulated-self’s betrayal and the real Wen Ning’s current position under Wen Xu’s direct influence. While she wouldn’t stand for injustice, she wouldn’t forget that either.

On the other hand, Nie Mingjue was left in disagreement.

“What? You think he views everyone as the same?” the Nie Sect Leader demanded. “He lived with Xiao Xingchen for years! Is anyone further than him from that sort of mindset?! And A-Qing had never even done anything against him!”

“That sort of a childhood can warp a person quite heavily.”

“I know that! I saw what happened to him as a kid. It was horrible and cruel — the scream he let out was hard to forget,” Nie Mingjue acknowledged, flashing back through that memory before shaking his head. “What happened to him was wrong, but that doesn’t make his actions okay!”

“It doesn’t have to,” Lan Wangji said calmly.

Every head turned toward him, but Lan Wangji merely made steady eye contact with Nie Mingjue, his golden eyes layered with sincerity. Even without raising his voice, he projected it through the room.

“Nothing Xue Yang did can be excused,” Lan Wangji acknowledged. “We should still know about this and take it into account. Now is not the time to decide what to do with the real Xue Yang, but, when that time comes, we should consider everything.”

“...Going by the relative ages, I believe the story of how he lost his finger has already happened in our world,” Lan Qiren revealed. “But he hasn’t yet massacred the Chang Clan.”

“It’s not as though he regrets what he did to the Chang Clan,” Wen Qing pointed out. “He hunted them down, rather than reacting to something they were doing in the moment. If we don’t change that mindset of his, he’ll simply do it again.”

“Do you think we will be able to alter his mind?” Nie Huaisang asked. “He’s what? Nine, now? Ten?”

“Something like that,” Wen Qing agreed but, after thinking over the first question for a while, could only shake her head. “I don’t know. I have no idea how deeply-ingrained that mindset of his is, at this time.”

No one knew; they didn’t have enough information yet.

“...Poor A-Qing,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “She-she did everything so well, and yet-”

Jin Zixuan rested his hand on hers. The two body parts phased through each other thanks to the ‘no-touch’ rule, but Jiang Yanli managed to feel the warmth he was trying to offer nonetheless.

“Well, regardless of what we end up doing to the child version of Xue Yang, I hope the adult one has a painful death,” Nie Mingjue growled, sighing heavily as he did.

(Then, for the last time that day, Lan Wangji gave one final sneeze.)

Chapter End Notes

I honestly thought we’d be finished with Yi City this chapter. It’s so much longer than I remember it being! I considered skipping certain parts, but, on the other hand, it’s not like I’m under any time constraints. If I can make it as long as I want, I might as well, right? Hope you enjoyed!

My Heart Being Stolen by A-Qing — Part 3

Chapter Notes

> My copy of MDZS volume 1 came!!!! So happy! Though it sucks that volume 2 was taken down online. That's the section we're on right now, but my volume 2 hasn't come yet! 🤣🤣🤣

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Nie Huaisang faded into the background as Wei Wuxian spoke with the past's Jiang Fengmian and the fifteen-year-old version of himself. At Wei Wuxian's request, Jiang Fengmian had updated them on what was happening inside the simulation, very noticeably neglecting to mention that the 'Mo Xuanyu' appearing in all these stories was, in actuality, Wei Wuxian. Although he didn't entirely agree with the decision, Nie Huaisang supposed he could understand the logic. People were undoubtedly already panicking about what the fifteen year old 'son of a servant' had accomplished. If they knew the true extent of Wei Wuxian's potential before the boy was ready to defend himself, it could very easily turn dangerous.

(Though the notable silence on the extent of the Wen Clan's crimes was obvious as well. Nie Huaisang wondered how delicate the political situation was in this alternate universe, to cause a reaction like that.)

Regardless: keeping secrets from the Baby Patriarch! How exciting! Really, Nie Huaisang hadn't had this much fun since he'd plotted the systemic downfall of the former Chief Cultivator.

"And what did the others think about Xue Yang's actions?" Wei Wuxian inquired, causing Sect Leader Nie to zone back into the conversation. "You said you had agreed to not punish anyone prematurely, right?"

"We did. As far as I can tell, no one intends to break that," Jiang Fengmian agreed.

"Eh? Are you sure about that?" Nie Huaisang asked, tilting his head as the embodiment of innocent curiosity. "You haven't seen anything these 'villains' have done yet, right? Maybe the sect leaders will change their minds after."

"I saw the Wen Clan's crimes," Jiang Fengmian informed him, voice colder than ice at the memories those words invoked. He opened his mouth again, about to add more, only to hesitate and glance back at the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian. After all, for all that it might help Wei Ying be wary of the Wen Clan, it would put everyone in colossal danger should Wen Ruohan hear that Jiang Fengmian voiced his honest thoughts about them.

Falling silent, Jiang Fengmian clenched his jaw until his teeth began to ache.

"...A-Xian, promise me you'll be careful of the Wens," he requested at last.

Having gotten the same request from him quite a number of times already, Wei Wuxian raised an eyebrow as he answered "I know, Uncle Jiang. I will be."

Jiang Fengmian breathed a sigh of relief, and managed to relax completely when Wei Wuxian didn't inquire further, trusting Jiang Fengmian's judgment on the matter.

(If you asked Nie Huaisang, it seemed more likely that the teenage Wei Wuxian knew he wouldn't get an actual answer and thus was simply going to figure it out himself. Not at all the same thing, but Huaisang also saw no reason to correct Jiang Fengmian's understanding of the situation.)

"...Anyways," Jiang Fengmian cleared his throat, then straightened up calmly. "Due to the prerequisite set by our decision regarding the Wen family, it seems fairly unlikely the other clan leaders would be able to punish the child-forms of any future criminals. To do so without punishing the Wens would be blatantly hypocritical."

"...I see," the future Wei Wuxian said, barely bothering to hide the heavy layer of doubt in his tone.

"What if the Wen Clan wants to punish someone, Uncle Jiang?" the younger Wei Wuxian asked. "Would the other clans really be willing to stop them?"

"I think that isn't a problem," Jiang Fengmian explained. "If you remember, when we contacted San-niang and the others yesterday, we found out more about what they had seen. San-niang claimed that Xue Yang was 'even worse than we had expected him to be,' but they said nothing about any changes to the plan."

"They've seen more of Xue Yang?" Nie Huaisang asked. "And you're all still willing to let the child version go, Sect Leader Jiang?"

"I… I believe so," Jiang Fengmian answered.

"Hmm," Nie Huaisang hummed. Well, that might change things.

Initially, his plan had been to slowly convince the people present to side against Meng Yao. He might have promised Wei Wuxian to leave the boy alive, but that didn't mean he would roll over and allow the same things to happen again. If Nie Huaisang had to put pressure on the sects to prevent that, then he would, regardless of who became his enemy as a result. Unfortunately, as far as Jiang Fengmian knew, Jin Guangyao was an idyllic Chief Cultivator. It would be nearly impossible to convince the Jiang Sect to do anything against him if he brought it up now.

When Jiang Fengmian had first revealed what he had learned about Xue Yang, Nie Huaisang had decided to start with that. If they could set a precedent with the treatment of Xue Yang, then, once Meng Yao's crimes were revealed, it would be simple to push him into the same position. However, if the sects were truly determined to not do anything to them, then that would need to be changed at once. A devious light flashed in the Nie Sect Leader's eyes.

He glanced back at his Wei Wuxian for a moment, and saw the other already facing him, a knowing smile on his face. It appeared Nie Huaisang's plan was already obvious to the other man.

But, no objection had been made. The Yiling Patriarch was still on Huaisang's side.

"Is there something wrong?" Wei Wuxian asked, having noticed the long pause. "Ah, Mo-gongzi, you fought with Xue Yang, didn't you? Do you have anything to add?"

'Ah, poor Wei-xiong!' Nie Huaisang thought. 'Little-you is already suspicious of you even though he likes you! I'd hate to be on the receiving end of that!'

But, without faltering, the future Wei Wuxian just grinned and explained, "We do indeed have things to add. Actually, a large part of the reason Sect Leader Nie and I are here is to help you figure out how to deal with people like Xue Yang. It works out quite well that you left after meeting him. We have some suggestions, if you don't mind hearing them."

"Ooooh, insight from the future," the past Wei Wuxian grinned. "Is this also going to be a product of the 'Dream Book' Nie-xiong found? Or is this from the demonic cultivator side of things?"

"From both of us actually," the future one stepped back. "Now then, drum roll please… ta da!"

Lights flashed behind them, and Nie Huaisang watched the list of pros and cons he and Wei Wuxian had made earlier fade into existence. Wei Wuxian had scanned it with resentful energy before they entered the simulation, allowing him to replicate his memory of it now.

(Like all of Wei Wuxian's inventions, the simulation was being improved at an alarming rate.)

"Please, direct your attention to the top of the page," the Yiling Patriarch instructed with a dramatic gesture. "This is the proposal our sects have put together: the best way to minimize both any danger and any unjust punishment is to save the criminals as soon as possible, sparing their childhoods, but refuse to teach them any cultivation."

"Restricting them from cultivation?" the younger Wei Wuxian asked. "I understand that cultivation is a weapon, but it's far from the only way to cause harm. Wouldn't it be better to let them join our sects so we can keep a close eye on them?"

'Well, Xue Yang aside, the 'dangerous without cultivation' thing is certainly true for Jin Guangyao,' Nie Huaisang supposed. 'Which is why I suggested we simply kill them. Don't look at me like that, little Wei-xiong! It's your older-self that said I wasn't allowed to do that! And er-ge, I suppose.'

Wei Wuxian opened his mouth to speak again, so Nie Huaisang acted fast:

"I hate to cut you off, Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang began (unapologetically). "But I'm afraid that's not an option. Indeed, there are other ways they could become dangerous, but, based on the way things went in our world, this is one thing our sects cannot budge on."

After all, Nie Huaisang might not be allowed to kill Meng Yao, but that didn't mean he would give up entirely. After the foolish stories his mother had given him, Meng Yao had grown desperate to join a cultivation sect and earn his father's approval.

Squashing even the slightest chance of that was a paltry substitute for murder, but one Huaisang would accept nonetheless.

He took in a deep breath, and allowed his eyes to glisten with tears.

"I-I know it seems cruel to prevent them from joining any sect, but, Wei-xiong, it's not my idea!" Nie Huaisang called out. "I may have agreed to be the spokesperson, but this is something the Great Sect's Leaders from our time decided already. The other Great Sects, I mean. I… didn't really contribute much to the discussion…."

He trailed off, allowing his nervous tone to take on a more genuine atmosphere, and gave a mental cheer when the future Wei Wuxian didn't so much as twitch at the endless stream of improvised lies. Of course, no matter how old he was, Wei Wuxian was Wei Wuxian. Even with the older one's help, the teenage version wouldn't be easy to trick:

"The other sect leaders insisted on this? Then why didn't they come to discuss it? My other self has… he's been dead for years, you said. I doubt the fact that you're talking to me would have been much of a disincentive."

Nie Huaisang had somewhat hoped his Wei Wuxian would answer that, but it appeared that the reminder of his own death had stalled the Yiling Patriarch momentarily.

Which, unfortunately, meant Nie Huaisang would have to dig himself out of the hole he'd fallen into. Luckily, if there was one thing his brother had (unintentionally) taught him how to do, it was that.

"Dis-incentive?! Wei-xiong, it's not like that at all!" he protested. "I wanted to come! I wanted to see you again! Ugh, this is why I hate popular kids! You know, just because you have endless friends, doesn't mean everyone does! Does it really surprise you that I missed you?!"

"Well… no, I just-"

"And besides, what's the big deal about being forbidden from joining sects anyways?! All cultivating means is long hours of awful work so that you get the 'privilege' of risking your life fighting big, scary monsters! Who would pick that?! I'd choose to be a civilian over this any day!"

Jiang Fengmian blinked and stepped forward, beginning, "Sect Leader Nie-"

"Ah! You're all crazy! Especially you!" Nie Huaisang cried out, turning to glare at 'Mo Xuanyu.'

"Me?" the other man asked.

“Yes, you! I mean really, what were you thinking, going to fight Xue Yang like that?! He had both normal cultivation and demonic cultivation, while you just had the latter. If Hanguang-jun hadn’t been with you, who knows what would have happened!”

(Everyone in the future knew what would have happened: Xue Yang would have died, just like what had actually occurred. Luckily, the past Wei Wuxian didn’t yet know that.)

“Ah, you’re right Wei-xiong. I shouldn’t have been the one to explain all this to you!” Nie Huaisang sobbed. “I really don’t know anything about it! I’m sorry! I just — I wanted to see you again!”

“...Sect Leader Nie,” the future Wei Wuxian finally cut in. “Would you like me to take over?”

“Ah, thank you, thank you,” Nie Huaisang sniffed. “Please, just… give me a moment to compose myself.”

(Sure, Nie Huaisang could try to argue the past Wei Wuxian into this, but when it came to dealing with a Wei Wuxian, the best option was to use your own! So long as Wei Wuxian didn’t deviate from Nie Huaisang’s plan, it would be perfect. Why would Huaisang bother to waste energy when he could just use his trump card?)

“Well?” the past Wei Wuxian asks, giving his older self a taunting grin.

Said older-Wei Wuxian sent an identical one back.

“You have to understand how difficult it was to come to a consensus,” the Yiling Patriarch began, gesturing toward some of the notes on the pros and cons chart behind him. “The Lan Clan was more in favor of trying to focus our energy on reforming these criminals. Your Jiang Clan was more in favor of removing the threats before they became an issue. Sect Leader Nie… received quite a bit of pressure from his head disciple to lead towards the removal of the threats. This was already a compromise.”

“And what about the Jin Clan?” Jiang Fengmian asked. “What did the Chief Cultivator say about this? Jin Guangyao seemed to be a fair and just man.”

It was only years of practice that kept Nie Huaisang from bursting into laughter at that.

Wei Wuxian cleared his throat: “Ah, Jin Guangyao is-”

“A more complicated issue that we’ll get into later,” Nie Huaisang interrupted, not wanting to get to the important one until he’d successfully dealt with the fodder. “S-sorry, it’s just that there’s a lot that happened with him and the Sect Leaders wanted to not give the wrong impression so they’re waiting for the watchers to see it in the simulation and it probably doesn’t matter but I really wouldn’t know about something like this!”

“Ah… right,” Jiang Fengmian said, looking as though he was vividly recalling why Nie Huaisang was not-so-affectionately referred to as ‘the Headshaker.’

“...Anyways,” the future Wei Wuxian continued. “Quite a few people advocated for giving Xue Yang a harsher punishment than this. We agree that keeping surveillance on him would be preferable however, so the main suggestion ended up being the creation of an entirely new organization!"

With a dramatic flourish, Wei Wuxian added in a memory of a visual diagram he had created of this proposal. His younger self 'Oooh'-ed and 'Ahhhh'-ed in delight as it formed.

"See, we were thinking that your ability to keep track of them might be a problem, so we brainstormed this as a solution. You create an organization working toward just about anything — the specifics don't really matter — and use that as an excuse to come into contact with them. Let's say the Jiang Sect sponsors a group working on the documentation of famous poems-"

"That was my suggestion, by the way!" Nie Huaisang piped in.

"Right. So we have a goal in place. If the sponsored group happens to search for unknown talent in the form of civilian children, who would really be able to object?"

"And how do you expect us to find the specific children you're looking for?" the younger Wei Wuxian asked. "Putting aside the money and manpower this would require, the whole project seems-"

"You'll just have to scan through the files on the applicants," the future one answered. "No one else has to know what your goal is. So long as you document them accurately-"

"There's still a matter of numbers, especially if we use the obvious incentive-"

"Thin them out."

"On?"

"Obviously-"

"Ah, merit…. Demonic?"

"Only for Xue Yang."

"True, true."

Seeing the blank expression on Jiang Fengmian's face, Nie Huaisang quickly realized that it would be his job to remind the two that not everyone present was a soul identical to theirs.

"Mo-gongzi~" Nie Huaisang whined. "I-I don't understand! What are you talking about?!"

"....Could you explain, A-Xian?" Jiang Fengmian requested.

"Ah, sorry, Uncle Jiang," Wei Wuxian laughed. "Basically, the only way to find a street kid like Xue Yang is to widely offer admission to our program. However, if we use an incentive as appealing as money or food, we'll be swarmed by more applicants than we can really handle. Mo-gongzi thinks we should use a test to thin the applicants out before accepting them so that I'll have fewer files to go through when looking for Xue Yang. I suggested using a beginning lesson into demonic cultivation as the test, but Mo-gongzi pointed out that not everyone we're looking for will be skilled in that. So, obviously, we'll need to make a more standard intelligence test."

"...Ah," Jiang Fengmian said at last.

"Still a issue of manpower, though," Wei Wuxian admitted. "If you want to find Xue Yang and the other targets, you'll need to recruit over a lot of land. Even with the Jiang Sect's support, I don't think you have the wealth or the manpower to do that over every town."

"So we start small and wait for the other sect leaders to come out before going beyond the Jiang Clan's territory?" Jiang Fengmian asked.

He got two nods in exchange.

After thinking it over for a moment, Jiang Fengmian nodded once and added, "Given what Xue Yang became capable of as an adult, I agree with not allowing him to have cultivation. In addition, keeping him nearby will allow us to respond at once should he start to show signs of becoming the same."

"Not punishment, but not enabling them either," Wei Wuxian mumbled to himself. "Alright then. Seems like we have a plan. We'll just have to speak with the other sect leaders about this first."

"Of course, Wei-xiong!" Nie Huaisang agreed instantly. "Thank you for being so understanding! Really…. I don't know what I would have done if I had to report back to the others that I'd failed! You're a life-saver!"

"Anything for you, Nie-xiong!"

The future Wei Wuxian laughed at the interaction, but found his attention pulled away a moment later as Jiang Fengmian stepped forward.

"Sect Leader Jiang?" he asked.

Jiang Fengmian had to suppress a flinch at the distant use of his title, even if he understood the reason why. However, it also made what he was able to say that much harder to get out.

Before coming in, asking 'Mo Xuanyu' for parenting advise seemed like the obvious next step. Now, with the past Wei Wuxian watching intently, it was impossible to ask the future Wei Wuxian how he was supposed to parent the boy's past self. Putting aside the awkwardness and strangeness of the request, Jiang Fengmian now knew exactly what it would do. Asking would simply be pushing everything on him again. It would seem like Wei Wuxian's responsibility to fix Jiang Fengmian's mistakes. It would make the future one responsible for something he had been a victim of, and-

'A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.'

And so Wei Wuxian had. And, as a result, he was thrown into the Burial Mounds half-alive.

"...Sect Leader?" Wei Wuxian asked again.

"Ah, I…" Jiang Fengmian paused, then cleared his throat. "Thank you for… everything you have done. The Jiang Clan… can never repay you."

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened.

"I mean it," Jiang Fengmian insisted, shaking his head to stop the protest he knew would leave his former ward's throat.

How many times since being brought back to life had Wei Wuxian saved Jin Ling? How many times had he helped Jiang Cheng, even after being choked and blamed for the Wens? How many times had he given everything for them, and all after Jiang Fengmian done the bare minimum to stop Madam Yu's unjust punishments?

How much would be different, if he had listened to Wei Wuxian's warnings about the Wens?

"Ah… right," Wei Wuxian smiled. "Thank you for saying so."

"Thank you," Jiang Fengmian said back at once, bowing respectfully.

A sigh came from the distance.

"This is just sad, Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang observed. "It's weird how such a competent Sect Leader can turn into this in Mo Xuanyu's presence. No wonder you and Jiang-xiong ended up the way you did."

"On the other hand, I'm sure your brother has no idea how you ended up like this," Wei Wuxian mercilessly pointed out, miming reading the 'dream book' Nie Huaisang had bought, a devious grin on his face.

"Hey, now. No need to say that!" Nie Huaisang protested. "We may have had our differences, but I can assure you my brother was very proud of me!"

"Huaisang, if you do not stop right this instant, I will flay you alive!" Nie Mingjue shouted across the room.

"But Da-ge, they look so cute together!"

"I don't care how you think they look! Trying to play matchmaker between Lan-er-gongzi and Wei Wuxian is unacceptable. Especially if they haven't asked you for help!"

Trying (and failing) to suppress a laugh, Lan Xichen commented, "Now, now, Da-ge. Huaisang is only trying to help. No need to be so harsh."

"Xiongzhang?!"

"You too, Xichen?!" Nie Mingjue gaped. He had been trying to speak up in defense of the obviously-embarrassed Lan Wangji. However, for an attack to come from the boy's own brother-

Luckily, before this could become too big of an issue, the world darkened into an ebony void. In the distance, they heard the ringing of a bell get louder and louder.

Two eyes blinked open.

"Ah!" Wei Wuxian gasped, and A-Qing's soul exited his body.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji breathed out in relief, glad to see that the other hadn't been lost in empathy (and maybe, possibly, trying to distract himself from the lies and slander his traitorous brother had engaged in).

"Ah, he's awake!" Jin Ling realized, his eyes lighting up in relief. A moment later, he cleared his throat and put on a not-very-convincing act of never having been worried.

Madam Jin chuckled softly, feeling it had been far too long since she had last gotten to see her grandson.

"He seems fine," one junior observed. "It's good that he hasn't become an idiot."

"Hasn't he always been an idiot?"

With a groan, Wei Wuxian requested, "Please stop arguing, my head hurts."

"Perhaps you and Wei-xiong should have thought it through a bit more before adopting so many children," Nie Huaisang mumbled, leaning close to Lan Wangji. The second jade nodded, accepting those words of advise without a second thought. A few seconds passed, and they finally began to sink in.

He did a double-take.

"I see. A-Qing, all these years, you've been scaring and warning away the living from this town, haven't you?" Wei Wuxian realized, turning to the young ghost girl with a sorrowful smile. "Thank you for all your hard work."

She bowed back silently.

'Sacrificing herself to help the random passer-bys who might want to enter the town? What foolish levels of dedication,' Madam Yu huffed. 'Though it does show she knows how to be serious, despite her ridiculous behavior.'

It also showed that she was worth far more than the fate Madam Yu had initially condemned her to on account of her being a 'thieving street rat,' but that thought was quickly suppressed before it could be acknowledged.

Then, A-Qing stood up and began swinging her bamboo pole around wildly. 'Kill, kill, kill!' she acted out, the charades getting the message across easily enough.

"We'll handle it," Wei Wuxian promised.

"Wait," Sizhui called out. "What exactly did you see during empathy?"

"What didn't we see?" Jiang Cheng responded, still stunned by how long the memories were.

Unfortunately for the juniors, Wei Wuxian was in agreement: "I'll tell you later. There's too much to say at the moment."

"Huh? Can't you just summarize it quickly?" Jin Ling whined. "You can't just leave us hanging like that."

"That's easy: in short, Xue Yang needs to die," Wei Wuxian declared, his narrowed eyes flashing red.

Suddenly, a tremendous rumble shook the thin walls of the building they were inside, and the juniors nervously pulled out their swords.

"Senior Mo!" Sizhui called out. "Xue Yang is-"

Before he could finish, the protective talismans Wei Wuxian had put up fizzled away and the juniors eeped, turning their attention towards the threat. On the contrary, calm as can be, Wei Wuxian stepped outside.

"I see," Wen Ruohan muttered to himself as he gazed out at the enormous emerald array floating above the house. He had been wondering how Xue Yang could be a threat to the juniors while also engaging in combat with Hanguang-jun, but that was the wrong way to think about it. Although spiritual cultivation would typically require your opponent to be in front of you for them to pose a danger, demonic cultivation was capable of setting up many delayed attacks or long distance traps. It didn't matter how strong Hanguang-jun was; demonic cultivation allowed Xue Yang to fight on multiple fronts regardless.

A stream of resentful energy surged forward from Wei Wuxian's hand, and quickly spread around the building's perimeter. A half second before the green array struck down with lightning-fast attacks, a burning red barrier was set up above the building. The energy slammed into it, dissipating immediately after.

Jiang Yanli breathed out a sigh of relief.

Jin Ling moved toward the door, trying to see outside as well, only to be violently shoved aside by Wei Wuxian.

A second later, the roof collapsed in where Jin Ling had been just a moment ago.

It was Song Zichen. He had been fighting Wen Ning, but, with the appearance of the emerald array up top, had gotten new orders to go after the juniors instead.

‘Xue Yang does indeed need to die,’ Madam Jin thought, a fierce irritation brewing within her. Jin Guangshan, who was still hoping to obtain the boy for himself, nervously took a few steps back.

Luckily, a moment later, another fierce corpse appeared.

Wen Ning had chased after his opponent, maintaining a level of sentience no other corpse had, and thus being capable of making his own judgements in battle. However, Song Zichen was not so single-minded as to ignore the dangerous opponent. The corpse turned towards Wen Ning.

Wen Qing tensed in worry.

Then Wen Ning kicked Song Lan through the building.

‘Ah, right,’ Wen Qing thought. ‘He’s the Ghost General now. I may not be happy about that, but….’

Truly, it was a much less big deal than she had thought it was upon seeing her brother as a corpse for the first time. Wei Wuxian had outdone himself in this.

“Hold him down!” Wei Wuxian ordered, and the command rang out with a surge of resentment. Before he had even finished speaking, Wen Ning complied. With a vice-like grip on Song Lan’s neck, he slammed the other man against the ground.

The watchers shivered as Wei Wuxian’s orders sank into their brains, and felt a subsequent burst of energy as Wei Wuxian’s power congratulated Wen Ning on a job well done.

“Hey, look!” one of the juniors gasped. When the watchers glanced over, they saw brief flashes of light flickering in the fog. It was too far away to see clearly, but the clangs that accompanied each light identified the luminescence as products of the collisions between Xue Yang and his adversary.

“Hanguang-jun!”

“Hanguang-jun!”

“Hanguang-jun!” the juniors cried out.

Nie Huaisang made a large, sweeping motion at them, making eye contact with Lan Wangji as if to say ‘See? Adopted!’

“Don’t wander too far!” Wei Wuxian called out to them, only proving Nie Huaisang’s point further. “Now then….”

With a unusually solemn expression of his face, Wei Wuxian walked over to the two struggling fierce corpses on the ground. Despite Song Zichen’s attempts to escape, the grip Wen Ning had on his neck remained unfaltering. The other corpse was continuously crushed against the ground.

"...Is that seriously Wen Ning?" Jin Zixuan asked. He had seen the Ghost General's prowess before, but this was the first time he had seen him use such intentional, brutal violence after having regained his own consciousness. It was still that nervous, stuttering boy within the body, but now, more than just becoming physically capable of fighting, Wen Ning was-

'Seriously, what happened after the war?' Jin Zixuan wondered, not for the first time.

The thrashing Song Lan tried to escape again, so Wen Ning slammed him against the ground harder than ever before, creating cracks that extended from one end of the street to the other.

Watching this display of power, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but smile.

It had served its purpose. Following that attack, Song Lan's thrashing lowered to a more manageable level, and Wei Wuxian was able to truly investigate. The Yiling Patriarch reached forward, resting his fingers on Song Zichen's head and combing through until he found what he was looking for.

'The two nails used here are much thinner than the ones Wen Ning had,' Wei Wuxian observed. 'It shouldn't be too hard for Song Lan to regain his consciousness afterward.'

A vicious grin appeared on Nie Mingjue's face as he considered what would happen if it was Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, Wen Ning, and Song Zichen against Xue Yang. Just one of them would probably be more than enough, but now-

(He would help the kid version. He would try to save him — Nie Mingjue would give him a chance. But the adult one had to die.)

The simulated Wei Wuxian gently pulled out the two nails that had been embedded into Song Lan, extracting them with a subtle beckoning of resentment. In the background, they could hear something resembling a flute.

Wei Wuxian was manipulating resentful energy, and it was responding accordingly.

They flashed over to where Xue Yang and Hanguang-jun were fighting. The difference in skill was clear; where Xue Yang dodged narrowly and fought frantically, Lan Wangji stood straight, keeping one hand resting calmly on his back as they dueled. It was the complete opposite of the emotions in place when Xue Yang had fought Song Lan, but there was nothing Xue Yang could say to falter Hanguang-jun's composure.

Golden sparks flew into the air.

"Okay, now you're just showing off," Nie Huaisang complained. With the years of practice under his disposal, the real Lan Wangji luckily managed to refrain from responding to that.

Even though it was taking nearly all his mental focus to survive against Hanguang-jun, Xue Yang was still aware of what was happening to Song Lan through their connection. He gritted his teeth together as Wen Ning slammed Song Lan against the ground — not out of pain, but from anger.

“I hate things are too loyal. What a pain,” he muttered. It was a repeated rendition of a phrase he had uttered not too long before.

But the anger it filled Wen Qing with more than equalled that of the first time she had heard him say that. Although Jiang Yanli sent her a concerned, compassionate look, that wasn’t enough to stop Wen Qing cursing Xue Yang with the most scathing words she could muster.

(Even Nie Mingjue was impressed.)

In the blink of an eye, they had flashed back to where Wei Wuxian was. An enormous tidal wave of resentful energy exploded out as the last nail was removed, making Song Lan jerk up for a moment of awareness before he collapsed back onto the ground.

But he would be fine, now.

As Wen Qing stared at the man, so similar to her brother in so many horrible ways, she couldn’t help the relief that filled her chest.

‘Lan Zhan is fighting Xue Yang throughout all this fog in unfamiliar territory,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘He’s at a disadvantage. I need to figure out a way for him to locate Xue Yang more easily.’

Of course, for Hanguang-jun, ‘at a disadvantage’ just meant ‘wasn’t able to instantly deal with him.’ Nonetheless, if they didn’t want Xue Yang to escape, it would indeed be best to find a solution to this.

As Lan Xichen saw a small, light blush overtake Lan Wangji’s ears at Wei Wuxian’s concern, he gave a short, mental cheer.

Then-

Tap, tap, tap.

“A-Qing!” Jiang Yanli lit up, Jin Zixuan’s expression changing into a grin just as fast.

‘The sound of A-Qing’s bamboo? Ah!’

He spun on his heel.

“Lan Zhan! Aim toward the sound of the bamboo stick’s tapping!”

“Oh!” Madam Jin gasped.

At this, Lan Qiren finally relaxed. Although he had complete faith in his nephew, this help was greatly appreciated. After all, both Xiao Xingchen and Song Zichen had been superior to Xue Yang in cultivation, and yet they had still….

But now, he was certain Wangji would be okay.

And the simulation seemed determined to prove that to him. The watchers were pulled along to Xue Yang again, and observed as he retreated into the trees. A determined A-Qing followed after, and taps of her pole were accompanied by the gleam of Bichen's attacks.

Tap.

A slice through Xue Yang's sleeve.

Tap.

A nick on his shoulder.

Tap.

A slice down his chest that left the scoundrel gasping out in pain.

"Yes! Get him!" Jiang Cheng shouted. Recently, things had gotten slightly awkward between him and Lan Wangji, the relationship they had formed throughout the situation fracturing oddly. After all, although he appreciated the support Lan Wangji offered Wei Wuxian, he still couldn't simply tolerate what was happening. Hanguang-jun's disgusting interest in Wei Wuxian, coupled with the way he was taking Wei Wuxian farther and farther from the future Jiang Cheng instead of trying to figure out how to fix what had gone wrong between them, couldn't be considered acceptable to the Jiang heir.

But Xue Yang had tried to kill Jin Ling over and over again, and now Hanguang-jun was solving the problem. Jiang Cheng could set aside his feelings for now.

Tap.

This time, it was Wei Wuxian that attacked. As he played a single note on his flute, an arrow of resentful energy shot forward. Xue Yang dodged, but the resentment followed, circling around a tree after him and bouncing back each time he tried to throw it off. At first his defense was solid, but, with the quickly-approaching Hanguang-jun on his tail, he began to rush.

Eventually, he messed up.

Tap.

A bit of the resentment had gotten past his sword, cutting across his chest and tearing open his robe. He slammed into a tree behind him, the pain rendering him unable to keep two items from slipping out of his clothes. Lingering resentment wrapped around them and brought the two objects to its waiting master, Wei Wuxian.

There was a beat of silence. Xue Yang was struggling to catch his breath, while Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were staring at the items in Wei Wuxian's hand.

And now that Wei Wuxian was relaxing his control on the surrounding resentful energy, the watchers' minds were beginning to clear up. This allowed them to focus on the items as well.

It was a spirit trapping pouch and a sword, both once upon a time having belonged to Xiao Xingchen.

"It's his soul," Lan Qiren pointed out, remembering the body Xue Yang had demanded Wei Wuxian revive. That was quite a valuable thing to obtain.

And Xue Yang realized the same a moment after. He reached down, feeling at the empty pocket on his chest, before his irises shrunk into a bloodshot desperation.

"Give it back!" he demanded.

The attack he launched forward was easily countered by Hanguang-jun, who flashed before Wei Wuxian and continued his battle with Xue Yang at once. The Lan cultivator remained in complete control, barely moving from his spot as Xue Yang jumped around ferociously and attacked from as many angles as possible. The adult form of the second jade was a true embodiment of the Lan technique.

Tap.

Lan Wangji parried Xue Yang's attack, then kicked him back into another tree.

Heedless of the proud smiles Lan Qiren and Lan Xichen directed his way, Lan Wangji focused on the technique being shown. This was far from the first time it had been displayed, but every time the younger second jade watched his older self fight, he couldn't help but be awestruck by the excellence before him.

This was the ideal he would strive to match. Although his face remained impassive to any outside viewer, a powerful motivation began swirling within him.

On the other hand, Xue Yang became more frantic than ever.

"Give it back to me!" he shouted again, his attacks becoming increasingly sporadic. "Give it back!"

"Which?" Wei Wuxian asked from where he watched on the side, protecting the juniors from any wayward attacks. "Xiao Xingchen's sword? Or his soul?"

The Yiling Patriarch gazed down at Xue Yang, his expression turning colder and colder as time went on.

"You don't deserve either one."

'Nice job, Wei-xiong,' Nie Huaisang thought, watching the growing triumph on his brother's face. 'I'm pretty sure, with this, you've gotten Da-ge completely on your side.'

He had felt a little regretful for having blamed Xue Yang's actions on Nie Mingjue's death, but, with this, Huaisang couldn't help but think it had all worked out.

‘Nice job, me. Barely any work, but great rewards!’

As Nie Huaisang was congratulating himself, Xue Yang glared at Wei Wuxian, the panting combined with his deranged hate making him more closely resemble a wild beast than a human. Even as he continued to fight Hanguang-jun (the helpful taps of A-Qing aiding in his defeat), the rage he was directing at the Yiling Patriarch was undeniable.

An amused smirk crossed Wen Ruohan’s face, and he tilted his head, wondering what Xue Yang would do next.

With Hanguang-jun fighting him, Xue Yang’s options were quite limited.

Tap,* A-Qing’s sounds repeated. *Tap!

Xue Yang just barely dodged out of the way, his injured arm hindering him significantly.

Tap, tap!

A thoughtful expression crossed Wei Wuxian’s face, and he observed Xue Yang’s impeccable dodging ability with amusement. Then-

“Why bother, Xue Yang?” he taunted. “So what if you get the spirit trapping pouch back? You can’t bring back someone who no longer has the will to live!”

“Ooh,” Jin Zixuan winced reflexively at the harsh words, forgetting for a moment who they were directed at.

“You don’t get to decide that!” Xue Yang hissed back. However, at that moment, an ironic reversal of his fight with Song Lan occurred. This time, he was the one who had gotten distracted by the words.

Lan Wangji, who hadn’t needed Wei Wuxian’s help to begin with, became all the more dangerous.

Now Xue Yang was scrambling to survive, struggling and only escaping by a hair’s breadth.

Tap.

Tap tap.

“Come on Xue Yang. Why are you so desperate to bring Xiao Xingchen back to life?” Wei Wuxian asked as Xue Yang ducked around a tree. The only advantage he had over Hanguang-jun was his understanding of the terrain, and he would use that to his full advantage.

Tap.

“Xiao Xingchen despises you.”

Enraged, Xue Yang growled, “Who wants to go back to the past? I want to turn him into a fierce corpse. An evil spirit! He wanted to be someone virtuous, didn’t he? Then I’ll make it so that he never stops killing! So that he can never be at peace!”

A growl escaped Nie Mingjue’s throat.

“Eh? Do you really hate him that much?” Wei Wuxian wondered, tapping his own shoulder with his flute. “Then why did you kill Chang Ping?”

“They took my finger,” Xue Yang responded. “So I wiped out the entire Chang Clan! Every single one of them!”

“Oh, I see. For revenge, huh?”

Tap, tap.

“But then, why did you use Shuanghua instead of your Jiangzai?” Wei Wuxian wondered with faux-casualness, then laughed. “Xue Yang, you did get revenge. But for whose sake was it for?”

“What?” Lan Xichen asked.

“If you really wanted to avenge Xiao Xingchen, the one you should have executed… was yourself.”

And just like that, the fleeing Xue Yang froze.

At that moment, a new memory filled the simulation. One they had already seen:

With a crackle of resentful energy, Xue Yang reached forward. Xiao Xingchen’s corpse was beneath him, but the blue glow of said cultivator’s soul floated on top. Xue Yang was trying to forcefully gather the soul and shove it back in.

A moment later, the soul dissipated.

‘Huh?’ Xue Yang asked.

The blood spilling out of Xiao Xingchen’s neck stained the floor.

‘No,’ Xue Yang muttered. ‘No, no-’

Just as they had seen before, the emotions Xue Yang felt for Xiao Xingchen were far more complicated than just hate.

“Ah, no wonder Xue Yang froze,” Nie Huaisang muttered, noticing his brother’s complicated expression.

‘Wei Wuxian really has a way with words,’ Jin Guangshan supposed, quite grateful that Wei Wuxian had been born the son of a servant, rather than a sect heir. He would have been much more trouble, otherwise.

But, just because Xue Yang had stopped, didn’t mean everyone else did.

Tap, tap,* came A-Qing’s call, as she tried desperately to guide Lan Wangji to where the fleeing Xue Yang had paused. Mad laughter broke out of the man, and he turned his glare on A-Qing.

“Little blind brat!” he cursed. “Aren’t you afraid I’ll tear your soul into pieces?!”

Tap, tap, tap-

A yellow light flashed into the air, and the tapping stopped. Xue Yang had thrown a talisman at her, and it had met its mark.

Her mouth opened in a soundless scream.

“A-Qing!” Jiang Yanli shouted, running forward.

But it was too late.

With a sad smile on her face, A-Qing dissipated before their eyes.

“A-Qing!” Jiang Yanli screamed again.

And Madam Yu froze.

‘She’s gone?’ the Jiang Matriarch gaped. ‘No. No, she-’

“A-Qing!” Wei Wuxian cried out as well, snapping open a spirit trapping pouch and gathering the leftover fragments before they could all disappear for good. Then, while Xue Yang’s gaze was still directed toward where A-Qing had just been, Lan Wangji attacked.

An enormous gash appeared across Xue Yang’s chest.

“With that… he won’t make it long,” Wen Qing muttered, coldly cynical as ever. “But now….”

Now, with no real chance of survival, Xue Yang became more erratic than ever. He jumped toward Wei Wuxian, reaching for the spirit trapping pouch-

A half-second later, blood splurted from his arm.

Lan Wangji had cut his hand off.

A cheer erupted from a good portion of the watchers, only matched by that given off by the simulated juniors. With no shortage of delight, they observed as Xue Yang fell to his knees.

Shivering, the young man reached into his robes again, grabbing something.

The watchers tensed.

But, before anything could happen, a bright light appeared beneath him.

"A teleportation array?" Wei Wuxian realized. Lan Wangji raised his hand at once, sending Bichen flying forward toward the near-blinding light.

A silhouette appeared. It was the grave digger.

The array activated beneath them and both he and Xue Yang disappeared, Bichen uselessly hitting the trees behind them instead. The object Xue Yang had grabbed fell to the ground.

The real Lan Wangji stepped forward to take a look at it, and found not a handful of corpse poisoning powder, but rather a single, old piece of candy.

The frown on the second jade's face deepened and he looked away.

"The grave digger was wounded, yet he still returned to take Xue Yang away," Wei Wuxian commented. "That would have taken a great amount of his spiritual power."

"The Stygian Tiger Seal," Hanguang-jun pointed out. "Relying on that would have been the only way Xue Yang could have controlled so many corpses."

"I see. So that was a glimpse of its power," Jin Guangshan mumbled, turning a contemplative look on the simulated Wei Wuxian.

"The gravedigger taking away his body is the same as taking away the seal," Wei Wuxian agreed thoughtfully.

"Wait, so… it's over?" Jiang Yanli wondered.

"For now," Wen Qing agreed. "There's no way Xue Yang could survive that. We still don't know who the gravedigger is, but this part, at least, has come to an end."

"Heavens," Madam Jin muttered to herself. "We didn't even do anything, and yet I'm still exhausted from just watching."

There were quite a few nods of agreement.

Wen Ning, who had been staying back to watch over Song Lan and the juniors, stood up and began walking over to the pair. At that moment, Lan Wangji tossed Wei Wuxian a light blue pouch.

"What's this?" he asked, catching it easily. "Our dear friend's right hand?"

"Mn."

“Hanguang-jun!” Wei Wuxian lit up, his eyes shining with joy. “Only you would find the time to find our dear friend’s right hand despite everything that was going on! You never fail to impress!”

As an identical blush overtook the ears of both the real and virtual Lan Wangji, Lan Xichen fought to hold in an excited squeal.

“What a shame it’s not the head,” Wei Wuxian continued. “I wanted to see who he looks like. Soon, we’ll be able to — wait, where’s Song Lan?”

Wen Ning glanced back to where he had left the other corpse, and jolted in surprise when he found it empty.

“How is a corpse so expressive?” Lan Qiren muttered disbelievingly, expertly ignoring the glare Wen Qing sent him by turning up his nose and focusing even closer on the simulation before him.

Panicked, the juniors scattered in search of the wayward former cultivator, all unable to believe he had slipped away without them noticing. On the other hand, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji didn’t seem anywhere near as panicked. They turned calmly, and walked in a straight line toward where they knew he would be.

He was at the mausoleum, staring down at Xiao Xingchen’s corpse.

“Oh,” Nie Huaisang wilted. It wasn’t as though he was a stranger to death — unwilling though he may be, no cultivator could avoid encountering the concept for long — but the meaning grief had for him had completely changed after hearing about his brother’s foretold death.

(Had he looked down on Nie Mingjue’s corpse in the same way? What had he felt when it was buried in the saber tomb?)

He prayed it would be a long time before he had to find out.

If asked to guess, however, Huaisang imagined it would have been something like how Song Lan looked now. The Nie heir was obviously a much more expressive person, but, even with Song Zichen’s general blankness, the sheer grief in his low hanging head was unspeakably heavy.

The juniors disagreed.

Jin Zixuan balked at the use of his sword, shouting “No, wait you stupid kid-”

“Everyone get ready!”

Lan Qiren frowned.

“Now-”

“You don’t need to worry,” Wei Wuxian interrupted. “He’s regained his consciousness.”

And just like that, the juniors relaxed at once.

“Huh…” Jiang Cheng blinked. “Does anyone else think they have a little too much faith in Wei Wuxian?”

After thinking it over for a moment, Lan Wangji pointed out, “He is their senior, and has saved their lives several times.”

“Still! This is a corpse that was trying to kill them just a few minutes ago. But no, Wei Wuxian said it’s okay, so it must be,” Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes. “And this is after he pulled the whole ‘come look at this pretty ghost out here. Don’t worry, it’s not scary at all.’”

No one had a response for that, though quite a few had to admit they had the same amount of trust in Wei Wuxian as the juniors did — if not more.

“This is Song Lan, Song Zichen Daozhang,” Wei Wuxian explained, gesturing toward the man for Lan Wangji. A silence overtook Hanguang-jun, and he watched the corpse carefully. Despite the limited facial expressions allowed in a dead body, the pained grimace on the former cultivator was still clear as day.

Lan Wangji nodded his head once in a short bow.

The movement, having attracted Song Lan’s attention, caused the other to glance back at last. He bowed as well, just as outwardly-unreadable as Hanguang-jun had been.

Seeing that, Lan Xichen couldn’t help but wonder if that future Wangji had also noticed the many similarities between him and Song Zichen. The realizations Lan Xichen had come to became more and more apparent with each new piece of evidence he found.

He could only hope that things did not end as tragically for his brother as it had for these two.

Then, Wei Wuxian reached into his robes and pulled out two pouches, holding them out to the corpse: “These are the souls of Xiao Xingchen Daozhang and A-Qing. They’re both very weak. I did what I could.”

Slowly, Song Zichen reached forward and took them.

“Song Daozhang, what do you plan to do with Xiao Xingchen Daozhang’s body?”

In response, the man grabbed a nearby bamboo pole off the ground and scribbled out an answer:

“...Cremate the corpse, so the soul may rest in peace,” Lan Qiren read aloud, before nodding in approval at the man’s choice. Wei Wuxian agreed:

“That’s good. If you keep the soul pure and slowly nurse it, then maybe one day it will be whole again.”

‘And yet he claimed that there was ‘nothing he could do’ to help a soul that damaged,’ Wen Ruohan thought, unsurprised by the lie, but amused nonetheless. ‘I really will have to keep careful watch over the things he says. Ah, well; that will just make it all the more interesting.’

Next, Lan Wangji stepped forward, holding a sword out to him.

“Xiao Xingchen was your closest friend,” he said. “You should be the one to take care of Shuanghua.”

If he hadn’t been a corpse, Song Lan’s eyes would have surely widened. He reached forward tentatively to take the blade, slowly unsheathing it and staring at his own reflection in the metal. There were several more seconds of quiet contemplation. Then, closing his eyes solemnly, he allowed the sword to slide back into the sheath.

Xiao Xingchen’s blade was slipped onto his back, joining Song Zichen’s own, and the man bowed lowly to Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji in thanks.

“And now?” Wei Wuxian asked. “What will you do?”

What could be done? Jiang Cheng recalled his own helplessness after the Massacre of Lotus Pier. Even then, he’d still had Jiang Yanli and Wei Wuxian ~~for a few more years~~. Song Zichen was dead — he truly had nothing now.

But the man did not succumb to despair.

He bowed once more to the living cultivators, before turning away and beginning the walk out of Yi City.

“From then on, Song Zichen Daozhang roamed the world with Shuanghua, exorcizing evil alongside Xiao Xingchen,” Ouyang Zizhen explained. “He will continue until the day comes that Xiao Xingchen wakes up, and Song Zichen can tell him ‘It wasn’t your fault. I’m sorry.’”

Jiang Cheng gritted his teeth together. Despite his best efforts, he couldn't stop certain memories from resurfacing at those words:

‘Why did you have to save Lan Wangji?... Why did you have to speak up? How many times have I told you not to stir up trouble? Not to strike?... Are you happy now?!’

‘You really have the audacity to tell me to ‘watch my language?!” Jiang Cheng — Sect Leader Jiang Wanyin — had snarled. ‘Back on Dafan Mountain, which one of us didn’t watch what they said while talking to Jin Ling? ‘I suppose you didn’t have a mother to teach you?’ Hitting where it hurts the most, huh? Have you forgotten who’s the reason Jin Ling had to face so many whispers behind his back? You’re quite the forgetful old man. You’ve forgotten the things you’ve said, the promise you made… but don’t you dare forget how his parents died!’

And on the other side-

‘It wasn’t your fault. I’m sorry.’

But that was different. The deaths of Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli were Wei Wuxian's fault — his response of 'I haven't forgotten' proved that well enough. Unlike Xiao Xingchen, Wei Wuxian wasn't just a victim in all this. Wei Wuxian was-

Wei Wuxian was…

(Remembering the way the future Jiang Wanyin's disciples had blocked the inn's exits without needing orders, how they'd refrained from coming up no matter how loudly he and Wei Wuxian screamed, how Jin Ling had been the one to save Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng decided to not finish that thought.)

"The process required to repair a soul is a slow one," Sizhui continued. "However, it is not without hope. Although far from fully complete, I'm pleased to report that both A-Qing and Xiao Xingchen's souls have recovered enough to supply some of the memories you have been shown so far. Song Zichen came by and offered his help at our request, which was greatly appreciated."

A little round of applause broke out among the simulated-future juniors, and Ouyang Zizhen even gave a loud cheer.

And bright smiles broke across many of the watcher's faces as the implications sank in.

Excitedly, Nie Huaisang turned to his brother and bounced: "He did it! He's really doing it! Xiao Xingchen Daozhang and A-Qing might be okay, in the end. Not alive, but still-"

"Their souls can be saved," Nie Mingjue whispered, disbelieving and unspeakably hopeful all in one. "They… they're okay."

Jin Zixuan gave a loud cheer, and Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli joined him a second later. Although they didn't join in, the pleased smiles on Wen Qing's and Lan Xichen's faces (and the exuberant grin on Nie Mingjue's) showed that they felt the same.

"Xiao Xingchen the bright moon; Song Zichen, the bitter snow and frost."

For one final time, Lan Wangji bowed at the future's cultivators, making a mental reminder to get to know them in his world. The injuries on his other self's back had apparently kep his future-self from meeting them.

That would have to be corrected.

"Several… hours? Minutes? A short while later!" Lan Jingyi declared.

Fog rose up and vanished, transitioning the scene to a port town some ways away. This was made all the more obvious by the large number of people in the shopping district, as well as the abundance of noise in the area (a far cry from Yi City's eerie silence split by the mangled groans of corpses). The female sellers called out to passing travelers, and the male ones advertised with abundant enthusiasm. Meanwhile, the Yiling Patriarch stood with a far more morose atmosphere.

"Such honorable and virtuous men," he commented. "What a pity… what a shame."

Below the swaying red lanterns, Lan Wangji stepped forward and reassured him: "No matter how long it takes, they will meet again."

At those words, Wei Wuxian's eyes widened, and his grim expression shifted into a soft smile a moment after.

And once again, Lan Xichen couldn't help but wonder how much Hanguang-jun had connected his own story with that of the 'bright moon' and the 'bitter snow.' After the Yiling Patriarch's death, the simulated Lan Wangji would have had no way of knowing he'd see Wei Wuxian again, but…

The parallels were easy to see.

"Lan Zhan," the Yiling Patriarch spoke up. "I-"

Before he could say more, he suddenly broke off into heavy coughs. Smoke was rising from below, filling Wei Wuxian's lungs.

Having spent the last hour or so sneezing nearly non-stop, Lan Wangji offered Wei Wuxian his sympathies.

The source of the fire was revealed soon enough: as the simulation brought them down to the street below the platform Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were on, the figures of the future's juniors became clear. They were tending to a roaring fire, dejection clear across their faces. The one at the center of the mess was Lan Jingyi, whose attempt at maintaining a strong face lasted a total of two seconds before he began bawling.

"How could such a terrible thing happen?!" he cried out, wiping his eyes. Tears were streaming down his face, and showed no signs of stopping anytime soon.

A long, drawn out sigh left Lan Qiren, but, having steadily grown used to this, he (for once) refrained from commenting.

Meanwhile, Jin Ling was furious:

"Xue Yang! That trash! Scum! Death was too good for him! If Fairy was here I'd let it loose to maul him to death!"

Watching the stomping, shouting Jin Ling, Wei Wuxian muttered, "Just calm down and say what you want to. There's no need to unleash Fairy."

Below, walking slowly in an attempt to maintain some degree of poise, the 'romantic' Ouyang Zizhen dropped a candle in the river, watching it drift away solemnly. That mask of grace could only last so long however.

"Miss A-Qing… Miss A-Qing!"

Now, he and many of the other juniors were crying out openly, and Ouyang Zizhen was banging his hand on the ground in protest as he sobbed into his sleeve. If the bun holding his hair back hadn't been tied so tightly, it would surely have come loose ages ago with all the dramatic crying he was doing.

"She was such a nice girl," one Lan baby pointed out.

Another agreed, "What a pity… such a cruel fate for such a good person."

"Hopefully she get reborn into a good family!" Ouyang Zizhen continued, by this point crying even more than Lan Jingyi was. The incense he was burning for her wasn't something the watchers could smell, but, judging by the grimace on Wei Wuxian's face, they had a feeling he may have gone a bit overboard with the amount.

'Well, it's a good thing everyone's too caught up in this to remember the Ghost General's presence,' Wei Wuxian supposed. 'After Xue Yang's death, I lightly whistled, and Wen Ning quietly retreated. Despite seeing it all, Lan Zhan had no objections to the matter.'

Wen Qing breathed out a sigh of relief. She hadn't been overly worried — if nothing else, Yi City had made it quite clear that both Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning were likely to be fine no matter who their opponents were — but it was reassuring nonetheless.

On the other hand, her sect leader had other thoughts: 'Given that Wen Ning's consciousness has been returned, I doubt that whistle was a command so much as instructions. A light whistle is enough for a resentful being to receive such a specific message… perhaps it could be used as some form of a secret code, so long as no other demonic cultivators were in the area.'

Unfortunately, that would require a conscious corpse, and killing Wen Ning to get that would simply put the Yiling Patriarch, the Ghost General, and Wen Ruohan's own doctor against him.

He sighed, shelving the idea for the time being.

As the smoke from the juniors' fire continued to rise into the air, images began to appear. The dark ash warped into grey figures — Wei Wuxian's current thoughts given visual form through his memories.

'When we were preparing to leave, I saw something sad and lonely.'

The simulation's smoke-based memory of Wei Wuxian turned around, staring at the spot where Xue Yang's body had been just a few minutes before and mouthing out a silent 'wait' to Lan Wangji.

'A decapitated left hand: Xue Yang's hand,' Wei Wuxian mentally continued. 'It had been clenched into a tight fist, but what he'd been holding had fallen out.'

Having already seen what that object was, Lan Wangji lowered his eyes in a solemn silence.

'The thing that had fallen out was a small piece of candy. It was blackened even before it had fallen, and couldn't be consumed anymore. It had been held in a too-tight grip, and had cracked as a result.'

Nie Mingjue pursed his lips together unhappily.

“On one hand, he disgusted Xiao Xingchen so much the man committed suicide,” Wei Wuxian muttered. “On the other, he cherished the candy Xiao Xingchen gave him and even asked for help in repairing his soul.”

The armrests on Nie Mingjue’s chair trembled as his hands began to unconsciously clench into fists on them. However, even through all that, he remained silent, listening to Wei Wuxian’s words.

“Xue Yang, he’s… lonely. And pathetic.”

Another silence followed that, and Hanguang-jun allowed it to continue.

‘Wrong,’ Nie Mingjue thought to himself. ‘It was all wrong. Everything about what happened in Yi City was wrong. There was no victor. I can’t even say that evil won — everyone lost! What kind of a mess is that?’

Deflating at once, Nie Mingjue buried his face in one hand, his previous emotions returning full-force. Upon seeing that, the watching Lan Wangji finally spoke up:

“What will we do about Sect Leader Chang?”

All at once, every previously-downcast eye swung in his direction, equally mystified by the sudden change in subject.

Withholding a sigh, Lan Wangji elaborated: “We agreed to not punish for events that have not yet occurred, but the Chang Clan leader has already acted against Xue Yang. So?”

“I… I don’t-”

What sort of a punishment would be suitable for this?

~~Especially since they had already been pressured into not punishing the Wen for their transgressions.~~

Before anyone could come up with an answer to that, the simulated juniors spoke up once more:

“Wait, Senior Mo, what did you mean about Xue Yang using Shuanghua against the Chang?” Ouyang Zizhen asked, continuing to wipe away his own tears. “It really upset Xue Yang, but I didn’t really….”

“But then, why did you use Shuanghua instead of your Jiangzai?” Wei Wuxian wondered. “Xue Yang, you did get revenge. But for whose sake was it for?”

“It’s Xue Yang!” another one of the juniors popped in. “I bet he took Xiao Xingchen’s Shuanghua to kill Chang Ping’s family as part of his revenge!”

“He’s worst than a beast!” another piped up. “He wouldn’t even let a dead person rest in peace.”

Lan Qiren nodded in agreement, then paused, wondering how Wei Wuxian, the inventor of demonic cultivation, felt about disturbing the dead.

“But… but-”

Not understanding the objection, Jiang Cheng tilted his head in confusion.

“Why did he kill them with lingchi?” Sizhui asked. “And why did he wait so long to do it?”

“Why use Shuanghua and not his Jiangzai?” another asked.

“Why did he bother to dig out Chang Ping’s eyes?”

Giving a short ‘humph,’ Lan Qiren supposed that although the children seemed world apart in terms of maturity from Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji at eighteen, they were still able to ask appropriate questions when the situation called for it. He couldn’t necessarily say their education had been ruined.

(And besides, maybe it was a good thing that they hadn’t had to grow up preparing for a war started by their forefathers.)

As part of ensuring that transition, there was ‘Senior Mo’ — someone who, as always, had all the answers.

“It happened many years after because he only did it after Xiao Xingchen had died. The brutal lingchi punishment was used because Chang Ping had been indirectly involved in Xiao Xingchen’s tragedy. By using Shuanghua, he was executing the sentence in Xiao Xingchen’s place. He dug out his eyes so that Chang Ping would become just like Xiao Xingchen.”

’If you really wanted to avenge Xiao Xingchen, the one you should have executed… was yourself.’

The juniors felt much the same:

“Huh? Then he’s the one who should have experienced the lingchi!”

“How laughable,” Jin Ling agreed.

“That’s right. Xue Yang was simply unleashing his regret,” Wei Wuxian agreed. “That’s why he’s lonely and pathetic. That’s why he had to die.”

And this was the sort of person the clan leaders had promised to try to change. Putting aside what they would do to the Chang Sect Leader, leading Xue Yang towards a more righteous future would require completely restructuring the boy’s mindset, worldviews, and goals.

Were they even capable of such a thing?

Luckily, as though aware they needed some time to think about this, the simulation paused on that scene. They were shown filler background images of the town Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were in, the sounds dulled to give them a chance to think.

For a while, no one spoke.

But then-

"Revenge," Nie Huaisang muttered, then turned to his brother, eyes shining. "What if we let the child Xue Yang get revenge on the Chang Clan while he was young?"

"The revenge he wanted was the annihilation of everyone in the Chang Sect," Wen Ruohan calmly pointed out. Where normally the mere gaze of the Chief Cultivator would have been enough to wilt Nie Huaisang, his current enthusiasm carried him forward.

"No, no — that's what he wanted as an adult. That's what he wanted after getting years and years to let his resentment grow and fester. I'd have to check on the child version of him to be sure, but given how naive he was in those flashbacks, that might be the key to shaping him as an adult."

"Especially if he knows the Great Sects support this," Lan Xichen added on, growing in enthusiasm as he listened. "That would help him feel as though such an act won't go unpunished in the world."

"So long as we keep to that philosophy even on situations which do not involve Xue Yang," Lan Wangji calmly pointed out. His half-warning did nothing to disturb most of the watchers' enthusiasm, however.

"Surely you can't be serious," Madam Yu protested. "No matter what he did, Chang CiAn is a Sect Leader. If this happens once, it could happen again. People won't simply accept any sort of punishment being given out for a crime against-"

'A street rat' she would have continued, but, before the words could leave her mouth, A-Qing flashed into her mind, and she found the insult impossible to continue.

"But… A-Niang, we have to do something," Jiang Yanli pointed out, growing in confidence with every word. "This strategy Nie-gongzi suggested might actually work!"

"Will it?" Wen Ruohan voiced calmly, making the girl flinch back and wilt slightly (only refraining from paling completely due to Jin Zixuan's protective presence in front of her).

All other conversation paused.

Then, glancing over at the (annoyingly clever) Nie heir, Wen Ruohan asked, "And how much chance do you think this plan of yours has of working?"

(From what Wen Ruohan had seen throughout the simulation, there was a bit more to Nie Huaisang than there seemed to be on first glance. This was not a terrible idea; he was curious to see what the sixteen year old would have to say when pressed. It might provide further insight into what he was capable of.)

"Hmm," Nie Huaisang hummed, gaining confidence as Nie Mingjue stepped between him and Wen Ruohan, glaring at the Chief Cultivator with all his might. "W-well… to put it in generous terms, if we don't have significantly more safeguards in this plan, then I'd put it at about a seventy percent chance it causes a worse Xue Yang than there was in the simulation."

"Huh?!" a dozen voices asked at once, having not seen any problems with it.

"That said, if we do figure out ways to keep it under control, then it might work!" Nie Huasiang beamed, then deflated. "Or maybe not. Providing him revenge and resources could raise a lot of problems. It honestly depends on a bunch of things… I don't really know."

The boundless confidence many of the watchers had previously had in Nie Huaisang's idea evaporated like mist under a blinding desert sun. There was an increasingly awkward silence as the watchers made eye contact with each other, many wondering why they had been so excited about an idea from that Nie Huaisang in the first place.

(Wen Ruohan watched it all with a calculating eye.)

After a bit more time had passed, the simulation began anew. Considering it was starting right where they left off, it was easy for the watchers to be pulled back in. Ouyang Zizhen was crying out for 'poor Lady A-Qing' while a handful of Lans comforted him. Lan Jingyi was sobbing uncontrollably, Jin Ling was ranting and raving at the sky, and Lan Sizhui was trying desperately to keep them all together.

Then as more paper was burned, the fire became even bigger, and Wei Wuxian began to grow concerned.

"Hey, Hanguang-jun, aren't you going to stop them?"

Rather than raising his voice at the kids, Hanguang-jun simply offered, "You do it."

"Ah, Wangji-xiong, you're too indulgent!" Nie Huaisang whined.

Rolling her eyes, Wen Qing muttered, "I can't believe the Lan is the easy parent between the two of them."

Jolting at the mention of the word 'parent,' Lan Wangji didn't notice the bitter look that crossed Jiang Cheng's face at those words. Jiang Yanli, on the other hand, did, and her heart ached for her brother at that. After all, if Wei Wuxian got together with Lan Wangji, then it wouldn't matter whether or not he was cast out by the cultivation world; the planned future of Wei Wuxian being Jiang Cheng's second in command would not come to be.

'But A-Xian might be happier then,' she couldn't help but mentally add.

And, as if to prove her right, Wei Wuxian decided to play along with Hanguang-jun's request.

“Alright,” he accepted after a bit of thought. “Sure, I’ll help you teach them a lesson. Hey, kids! You’re disciples from cultivation clans! What’s the use in burning joss paper? They’re dead. They won’t be able to receive them. There are people living nearby. You’ll bother them if you keep-”

“It’s not like you’ve ever been dead! How would you know if the dead were able to receive joss paper or not!” Lan Jingyi demanded, tears still running down his face at a breakneck pace.

Lan Qiren, once again, withheld a sigh.

“Wha-I — how would I know?” Wei Wuxian repeated. “Well, I….”

“I suppose he can’t exactly say that he has died, now can he?” Madam Jin commend, and Madam Yu gave a ~~disgustingly~~ fond sigh.

Then, Jin Ling gave a proud humph: “If a dead soul doesn’t receive any joss paper, it must be because no one bothered to send them anyway.”

Wei Wuxian jerked back as if wounded.

“No way. Was I such a failure in life that no one bothered to send me any joss paper?” he whimpered.

“Wei Wuxian, you were almost universally hated by everyone who knew your name,” Wen Qing pointed out. “How is this a surprise? And even if it is, how is that your biggest concern?!”

But Wei Wuxian appeared genuinely distraught.

“Ah, Lan Zhan, at least you must have…” he trailed off as Hanguang-jun stopped smoothing out his sleeve to turn to Wei Wuxian, gazing calmly. That was answer enough, it seemed.

Wei Wuxian took a staggering step back.

“No way… we were classmates for at least three months…. We even shared a near-death encounter in the Xuanwu cave.”

“You were a lot more than that,” Lan Xichen desperately pointed out, giving Lan Wangji a very telling look.

“How did Wei Wuxian perceive time while he were dead, anyways?” Jin Zixuan wondered. “He certainly weren’t a ghost like A-Qing.”

But no answer came, for Wei Wuxian was preoccupied with far more important matters:

“You never once thought of me? No joss paper either?”

Lan Wangji gave an amused smile at his dramatic act — one of the most obvious shows of emotion most of the watchers had ever seen on him. The sheer, simple delight he got from seeing Wei Wuxian act casually was incomparable.

(And, considering the frequent arguments between them that had occurred in the last two flashbacks to the past, the watchers couldn't blame him.)

'No, no, that can't be it!' Wei Wuxian declared in his thoughts. 'It must have been the strange way that I'd died. That must have thrown my joss-paper-sensor off! After all, at that time, everything was so chaotic and confusing-'

The watchers straightened up, listening in closely.

'I wasn't quite conscious, but I wasn't unable to feel anything either.'

Then, so quietly that the thought was most likely just subconscious:

'It was like being stuck in an unending nightmare.'

The silence that followed those words was deadly in its intensity.

"...What?" Jiang Yanli asked, her voice breaking as the last syllable cut off unexpectedly.

"That's what it felt like to him?" Wen Qing asked. "He… when he found out what had happened to the corpse they're collecting, all he said was 'at least my soul wasn't destroyed.' If this is what it felt like to him… how could he say that?!"

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered, before looking down, unable to stare any longer at the peaceful smile on Wei Wuxian's face. The Yiling Patriarch hadn't even consciously registered that thought, remaining just as outwardly chipper as ever.

That didn't make it any less true.

Feeling a sudden dizziness overtake him, the second jade swiftly moved to sit down again.

With a rush of wind, flower petals swooped through the air and fluttered before the watchers, blocking off Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji momentarily. When the obstructions cleared, they had changed locations. Now, the watchers were standing in a busy market square, the river they had seen earlier now nowhere in sight. Birds tweeted merrily, and the sun was shining brightly up ahead — a far cry from the fog of Yi City. Then-

A frantic neigh broke through the tranquility.

Startled, Jin Zixuan burst out of his seat, demanding, "What the-"

Pausing mid-bite through an apple, Wei Wuxian glanced back at the source of the noise. The simulation revealed it to the watchers piece by piece. First, the dust being thrown into the air. Then, an illusion of hooves slamming against the ground. Finally, a full image of the culprit was revealed:

“Little Apple!” Wei Wuxian beamed.

Madam Yu sighed ~~with unusual fondness~~, once again unable to believe Wei Wuxian had named his donkey something so ridiculous.

“I thought you’d be harder to find! Guess the juniors did a good job with you!” Wei Wuxian beamed, hearts in his eyes, as Little Apple ran close, the donkey nearly crying in joy. “I missed you so much! You missed me too, huh?”

He stretched his arms wide, ready to give the donkey a hug.

Little Apple blew past him, snatching the apple out of his hand on the way.

Not entirely sure what had just happened, the watchers blinked blankly several times, then turned to stare at the now-distant donkey.

“Eh? Huh?” Wei Wuxian asked, looking down at his now-empty hand. “Wha — you heartless donkey!”

But Little Apple paid the complaint no mind, happily devouring the apple in what looked to be a single bite.

Nie Huaisang snorted:

“Of course! Wei-xiong’s one of the most capable humans out there, but even he pales in comparison to the might of the Little Apple!” the boy exclaimed, nearly rolling on the floor in laughter. “Ah, if only the Wen Clan had known that the Yiling Patriarch’s weakness was a donkey. Well, a donkey and-”

Before that sentence could be finished, the simulation filled in the answer for him.

A growl. Two barks.

Wei Wuxian paled.

A dog came running up.

“Wah — ah! Ah! Lan Zhan, save me!” he cried out, running as fast as he could to get behind the protective wall that was Hanguang-jun. Meanwhile, Jin Ling ran forward, excitedly meeting the newcomer.

“Fairy!” he called out.

However, before he could reach his dog, a challenge was issued, and a duel came into being. Fairy (formerly ‘Little Fairy’) stood opposite the newly-titled Little Apple, growling in challenge. The donkey responded in kind, lowering its head to loom meanicingly — using its superior height to its advantage — while kicking up dust in preparation. The two challengers approached each other, slowly getting into combat distance.

As Nie Huaisang's hysteria reached its peak, Jiang Cheng just gave a heavy~~, dejected~~ roll of his eyes.

(Once upon a time, it had been him who protected Wei Wuxian from dogs. Now, his older self was using them against him, and Lan Wangji was the defender.)

Whimpering in fright, Wei Wuxian clenched tightly onto Hanguang-jun, bringing himself closer to Lan Wangji's back.

"Oh, Wangji," Lan Xichen moved closer, a deceptively-kind smile on his face. "How nice. When scared, you're the one he trusts the most. Don't just stand there; you should offer him some comfort. Your older self looks quite-"

"Xiongzhang!"

Then, however, Hanguang-jun did as Lan Xichen suggested. He reached a hand up and patted Wei Wuxian's arms several times. It was reassurance, and nothing more.

'Foolish boy,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'You had a prime opportunity. If you keep restraining yourself to such an extent, you'll never get what you truly want.'

(Not once did it occur to him that perhaps Hanguang-jun valued Wei Wuxian's happiness and comfort more than his body.)

Although the presence of Hanguang-jun did help Wei Wuxian somewhat, it was far from enough. Every time Fairy's growls grew in volume, Wei Wuxian clenched his eyes shut and hid further behind the second jade.

After several seconds of that, Lan Wangji acknowledged the situation with a small sigh. He cleared his throat once, then narrowed his eyes. The two animals both flinched and backed up guiltily under Lan Wangji's stern stare.

"How are you even doing that?" Wen Qing asked, raising her eyebrows in disbelief. Glancing back momentarily, Lan Wangji just shook his head, not having an answer to give her.

Watching this transpire, Wen Ruohan finally felt the tension in his body ease. It was truly concerning how completely Wei Wuxian changed whenever he was in the presence of a dog. Gone were his quick quips, his inventive solutions, and his unmatched charisma; all of the power, potential, and use Wei Wuxian had completely vanished. It would be child's play for even a non-cultivator to kill him if they had a dog.

'I do feel a need to mention that Wen Chao has gained a new hobby of training dogs in the Qishan dungeons,' Jiang Fengmian had mentioned.

(And just like that, the tension in Wen Ruohan's body returned full-force.)

Due to Hanguang-jun having resolved the situation without words, it took Wei Wuxian a while to realize what had happened. Slowly, however, as Fairy got quieter and quieter, it became obvious that the dog was moving farther away. Wei Wuxian's eyes blinked open — shock obvious in those silver orbs.

He breathed out a sigh of relief.

And Lan Wangji relaxed as well, grateful that his other-self had managed to help, even if in just a small way.

Now that the danger was gone, Wei Wuxian's mind was returning to him. With an awkward laugh, he got off Lan Wangji, smoothing down the other's robes in silent apology.

After a single nod of acknowledgement towards Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji glanced back at the juniors and instructed, "Tie it up. And then we'll eat."

"Sorry, dad," came a sarcastic reply.

It was only when the real Lan Wangji and Lan Qiren turned towards him that Jin Zixuan realized he had spoken out loud. He flinched, blushing from his head to his toes (and only growing reder as Jiang Yanli gave a few light chuckles). But it wasn't his fault! Everyone was saying these sorts of things. He couldn't help it. He was loyal to his own dad, but anyone would make an observation like that. He might have spoken out somewhat against his dad a short while ago, but he certainly wasn't trying to replace Jin Guangshan with Hanguang-jun and Wei Wuxian. It was just that watching them take care of Jin Ling had sparked-

It was just that-

Jin Zixuan was loyal to his sect. Nothing would change that. It had its flaws, but Jin Zixuan loved his home.

It was just….

"Please head inside, esteemed guests," an elderly innkeeper said, gesturing for Hanguang-jun and the others to come in. Although there was no flaw in his welcome, the nearby presence of Fairy kept Wei Wuxian clutching tightly around Hanguang-jun's waist, burying his face into the other's back.

The juniors moved to follow their seniors up the stairs, but Lan Wangji slowly turned toward them, his golden eyes conveying a message to his main ally.

'Understood!' Lan Sizhui thought, nodding at Hanguang-jun and beaming brightly enough to blind any unsuspecting passer-bys. Then he turned to the confused Jin Ling and Lan Jinyi:

"The juniors and seniors should split up now. Why don't we stay on the first floor?" he suggested persuasively. He got a pair of synchronous nods from Jin Ling and Lan Jingyi, and Ouyang Zizhen gave a happy smile as well.

'Ah, I see. Well played Hanguang-jun,' Jin Guangshan thought, nodding in approval. 'Using the most responsible junior to convince the others to stay behind was wise; there is very little chance of anyone suspecting anything. Though I really don't understand why you insisted my grandson keep his dog down there. Taking proper care of Wei Wuxian would be much easier if Fairy was in the same room.'

Shrugging to himself, Jin Guangshan supposed that Hanguang-jun's inexperience with such pleasures was the most likely reason behind his lack of foresight.

As the pair climbed up the stairs, they got farther and farther from the dog below. Eventually Wei Wuxian was, at last, able to detach himself slightly from Lan Wangji. He glanced down at the juniors (a majority of whom were watching their departing seniors with wide-eyed curiosity). Unable to help himself, Wei Wuxian grinned:

"The adults are going now. There are some things that would be best left unseen by children like you."

"Who would want to see?!" Jin Ling responded, blushing heavily and not at all doubting the largely-faked implication Wei Wuxian's words had.

With a deep frown, Madam Jin couldn't help but respond to her grandson with, 'My husband might, for one.'

She shook herself out of that thought a moment later. After all, for all of Wei Wuxian's good looks and charisma, he was still a man; Jin Guangshan had only ever shown interest in women. And besides, Wei Wuxian was currently in Mo Xuanyu's body — Jin Guangshan's son's.

'But,' a little voice inside her whispered, 'None of the women Jin Guangshan has ever slept with have been anywhere near as valuable as Wei Wuxian. If there's anything he lusts after more than women, it's power.'

She shuddered in disgust.

In the time Madam Jin had been thinking, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had already entered the room and ordered. Now, the innkeeper was setting down plates full of delicious looking food.

(Very bright red food, at that.)

Lan Qiren paled slightly at the sight.

"Esteemed guests, all your dishes have arrived," the innkeeper announced, setting down the last one. "Is there anything else I can do for you?"

"No, we're fine," Wei Wuxian said. However, his gaze was directed elsewhere. Staring intently at the burning red plates, Wei Wuxian recalled what Sizhui had said after trying Wei Wuxian's spicy congee.

'Not at all, senior. Hanguang-jun never has spicy food.'

The memory faded, and Wei Wuxian's confused face took its place.

‘If what Lan Sizhui said is true…’ Wei Wuxian continued. ‘Then why did he order so many spicy dishes?’

“Three guesses as to why! Er-ge, go!” Nie Huaisang ordered, privately relishing in getting to use the new title.

“Hm, I don’t know,” Lan Xichen smiled, a little too wide for Lan Wangji’s comfort. “Any suggestions? I don’t suppose you have an idea, Jiang-guniang?”

“No, certainly not,” Jiang Yanli responded, unable to keep a similar grin off her face. “I can’t think of a single reason why Lan-er-gongzi would want to eat spicy food while with A-Xian. It’s hard to say. Any thoughts, Madam Jin?”

Before the Jin matriarch could even speak a word, Lan Wangji cleared his throat rather sharply, gesturing towards the simulation in a (vain) attempt to distract people from the current discussion.

Then, tranquil as ever, the simulated Lan Wangji picked up a piece of cucumber which had spent the last hour or so bathing in chili powder. Under Wei Wuxian’s watchful gaze, he lifted it up, then took a bite.

The Yiling Patriarch continued to gaze intently.

Finally noticing the concentration Wei Wuxian was directing towards him, Lan Wangji asked, “What’s wrong?”

“Ah, nothing,” Wei Wuxian denied, smoothly turning his gaze towards his own food. “It’s been so long since I had authentic Yunmeng cuisine. I miss drinking with people.”

The soft, nostalgic smile he gave matched perfectly with the atmosphere created by the dim candlelight. A sense of longing enveloped the room.

‘I miss drinking with you too, Wei-xiong!’ Nie Huaisang cried out. ‘I know it technically hasn’t happened yet, but the parties we had at the Cloud Recesses looked great! I wish you had gotten to see. Don’t worry, I promise to make it up to you and have the biggest party ever once we get out!’

After all, it wasn’t like he’d be able to drink with-

Lan Wangji picked up the pot of liquor, pouring himself a cup to match Wei Wuxian’s.

“Wait… what?”

“Wangji!” Lan Qiren squawked at once. “What are you doing?!”

Humming to himself, Lan Xichen acknowledged, “He did drink with Wei-gongzi once already. Perhaps this shouldn’t be a surprise.”

“But he — he-”

Lan Wangji's face remained impassive, but, if you knew where to look, you would be able to see his aura wilting slightly under his uncle's disapproval.

"Wangji, you-"

“I guess this makes sense. After all, Hanguang-jun wouldn’t have been able to join Wei-xiong for a drink while ‘the Yiling Patriarch’ was dead. Of course he’d jump at that chance to do it now,” Nie Huaisang supposed, shrugging to himself. At those words, all the anger and outrage that had been storming within Lan Qiren deflated at once, and he looked away.

“Hanguang-jun, are you really going to drink with me?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Isn’t that a little too much special treatment for just me?”

Despite his words, he looked delighted by the prospect.

‘No,’ Lan Wangji thought. ‘It’s not too much; it could never be too much.’

His other-self was surely going to embarrass him beyond all belief while drunk, but if it brought a smile like that to Wei Wuxian’s face, then Lan Wangji would be willing to live with those consequences.

And so, with a light blush, Wei Wuxian watched excitedly as the simulated Lan Wangji emptied his cup in a single gulp. As Wei Wuxian examined the other, he rested his head on his hand, an even more loving expression forming on his face. Softly, he began to whisper:

“One… two… three….”

Lan Wangji’s gaze drooped.

“Four… five… six….”

He rested his head on his hand as well.

“Seven… eight… nine….”

His eyelids fluttered closed.

“Ten.”

Lan Wangji was asleep.

“...You are the strangest drunk ever,” Jiang Cheng decided, trying to stamp down the part of him that whispered that he used to be the one who would drink with Wei Wuxian.

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian was overjoyed. He jumped out of his chair and scampered over, watching the sleeping Lan Wangji with wide, excited eyes.

‘As I thought, he always falls asleep before he gets drunk! Impressive!’

It took all of Lan Xichen's mental strength to not coo at the sight of Wei Wuxian excitedly analyzing Lan Xichen's brother. They were truly the most adorable pair in existence.

(Xichen's only consolation was that Jiang Yanli had already lost that battle, and her 'aww' sound was more than enough to turn the real Lan Wangji's ears a scarlet pink.)

Then, Wei Wuxian got almost impossibly close.

"Lan Zhan?" he whispered in the other's ear, the warm breath making a few strands of hair flutter delicately.

Before the simulation, Lan Xichen had thought he knew the limits of how red his brothers ears could get. Apparently, he hadn't even scratched the surface.

But Wei Wuxian was far from done.

"Lan Zhan?" he asked again. "Wangji-xiong?"

But Lan Wangji remained asleep.

'What is this smell?' Wei Wuxian wondered.

"Huh?"

"Oh," Nie Huaisang. "Oh. Oh."

"What?" Jiang Cheng asked, but Nie Huaisang didn't respond.

Luckily for the ignorant members of the audience, Wei Wuxian explained for them:

'It's… his cold sandalwood scent intertwined with the alcohol,' chasing it down, Wei Wuxian moved his blushing face even closer. 'It's slightly intoxicating, as if it's been mixed with a hint of sweetness.'

And then-

'Strange. Why is it starting to feel a bit hot in here?'

The blush on Wei Wuxian's face deepened.

"Oh, Heavens," Lan Qiren buried his face in his hands unable to believe he was watching this. His nephew's future self loved Wei Wuxian, that much was clear. The fact that the feelings were so obviously mutual was wonderful; miraculous, even. Lan Qiren was truly, honestly happy for them.

He still didn't want to watch!

"Lan… er-gege…"

"Young master!" a voice called from outside, making Wei Wuxian flinch hard enough to nearly bang his elbow on a nearby table.

“No! Go away! You’re ruining it!” Nie Huaisang screeched. Although she didn’t say the same, the death-glare Madam Jin was directing towards the window carried the exact same sentiment.

“Who is it?!” Wei Wuxian snapped, also annoyed that the moment had been ruined. Then, through the open window, a head dropped down from above.

“A-Ning?!” Wen Qing gaped. “What are you — get down from there!”

“Wen Ning?” Wei Wuxian asked, his anger vanishing at once.

‘I know he’s still a fierce corpse — and not just any corpse, but ‘the Ghost General’ — but…’ Jiang Yanli quickly covered her smiling mouth. ‘How is it possible for him to be just as cute now as when he was alive?’

Truly, that was a question that not even Wei Wuxian would be able to answer.

Unaware of that specific scientific impossibility he represented, Wen Ning continued to blink at Wei Wuxian from where he was hanging upside down outside the window. The staring continued for several seconds. Finally-“Come down,” Wei Wuxian requested. As though experiencing a sudden loss of balance, Wen Ning dropped to the ground at once, landing inside the room in a kneeling position. Despite the power he had shown in Yi City, his head was now lowered respectfully — a perfect soldier. In fact, that wasn’t a terrible description of him.

‘An undying beast. Capable of his own thought, but impervious to pain and injury,’ Wen Ruohan thought, a grin beginning to form. ‘Given how strong he was against Song Zichen… and to think that Wei Wuxian has earned his complete loyalty on top of that. I had never seen much potential in him before. Clearly, that was an error on my part.’

However, Wei Wuxian’s response couldn’t have been more different:

“What are you doing?” he asked.

Head lowered in submission, Wen Ning bowed and spoke: “My apologies, young master.”

“A-Ning, you don’t… you shouldn’t need to….” Wen Qing couldn’t finish. Then-

“Do you have to speak to me from down there?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Why not?” Jin Guangshan quietly wondered. This wasn’t even a sect leader and a servant; it was a fierce corpse and its master. What could be a more subservient relationship than that?

Wei Wuxian sighed, then shrugged to himself: “I guess it’s alright.”

Hearing that, Wen Qing frowned and opened her mouth to protest when-

There was a soft pat on the ground. When Wen Ning looked up, he saw that Wei Wuxian had gotten on his knees as well.

"Huh?!"

"Young master, you mustn't!" Wen Ning protested at once, panicking completely at the sight. Moving quickly, Wen Ning bent forward and began to kowtow him, determined to show what he believed to be a proper amount of respect. Mere moments later, Wei Wuxian returned the kowtow as well.

Startled, Wen Ning jumped up.

Laughter burst out of the teenage watchers, and even a few of the adults joined in. Watching this unfold, Wen Ruohan stared at Wei Wuxian with nothing sort of fascination.

'Is he not aware of his worth?' the Chief Cultivator wondered. 'No… he knows what he's capable of better than anyone. So why… I don't understand….'

No matter how much he saw, Wei Wuxian continued to be an unequalled mystery to him.

Seeing that Wen Ning had finally stopped, Wei Wuxian got up as well. Dusting off his robes, he looked over at Wen Ning and gave a fond yet undeniably amused smile:

"Wouldn't it have been better if you just stood up to talk to me from the beginning?"

Wen Ning wilted further, looking at the ground without saying anything.

Wen Qing, on the other hand, relaxed at once. It wasn't that she had forgotten Wei Wuxian's relationship with her brother — their positive interactions in the real world made that especially hard to forget — but to see it so plainly left her speechless. That wasn't just a token protest from Wei Wuxian to make himself feel better. He genuinely did not want Wen Ning to bow so lowly to him, and he knew exactly what steps to take to make that clear.

Right now, as she looked back on her past self (and the initial hate she had felt towards Wei Wuxian upon hearing what he had done to her brother), she couldn't help but feel silly. She might not know what had prompted Wei Wuxian to resurrect Wen Ning, but the most important circumstances were now clear.

Now, she could confidently entrust her brother's safety to Wei Wuxian.

(A debt she promised she would pay back as soon as the simulation was over.)

Seeing that Wen Ning had no intention of responding to what he had said, Wei Wuxian began to get to work. He set Lan Wangji down on the bed, even going so far as to tuck him in. Careful hands smoothed Lan Wangji's hair out, and the sleeping second jade relaxed further under their care.

By now, Lan Xichen was beaming so brightly that he was practically glowing where he stood.

Then, leaning towards Lan Wangji's ears, Wei Wuxian whispered, "Lan Zhan, oh Lan Zhan. Please sleep for a while longer. I'll be back before you know it. Won't you be a good boy?"

Overcome by a sudden urge, Wei Wuxian couldn't help but brush the tip of his finger against Lan Wangji's eyelashes.

As though those words had jolted something within him, Lan Wangji sat up even straighter. A low chuckle left Jin Guangshan's throat at that, making the second jade's ears turn even redder.

(Not that everyone else was much better. Apple-red faces were more than plentiful among the dozen or so most flustered watchers.)

Following that, Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning sneaked outside. Seeing that Wen Ning was hesitant to speak, Wei Wuxian was the one who began:

"When did you begin to regain consciousness?" he asked.

"Just a short while ago."

And the watchers had seen that happen first-hand. Wei Wuxian had been fighting the Goddess Statue, and his call for powerful resentful beings had been heard by the Ghost General, even as far away as he was. The cave he had been chained up in flashed into Wen Qing's mind, and she felt her hands clench tightly into fists as the thought.

Sympathetic, Jiang Yanli moved closer to the other woman and rested a hand next to hers.

"You said all that you remembered while the skullpiercers were in your head was being chained in a dark place, right? With a few people occasionally coming to check on you?"

Remembering the Lan cultivator that had been included in that lot, the three Lan Clan members frowned.

"Do you remember anything else?"

"Only that someone nailed something into my head."

Flinching at the mental image, Wen Qing promised that she would repay that crime ten fold-

"That was probably Xue Yang. He also used those nails to control Song Lan."

-and then promptly remembered that they had promised to not punish for events that had yet to occur. Although a sour taste rose up in her mouth at the thought, she forced herself to acknowledge that revenge had already been carried out. Wei Wuxian had taken care of that himself.

"Why?" Wen Ning asked.

“I would imagine on the behalf of the Jin Sect,” Wei Wuxian answered. “He was once a guest cultivator there, after all. And the LanlingJin Sect reported that you had been completely annihilated.”

Images of Jin Guangyao and Xue Yang appeared, centered so that they were standing back to back.

Jin Guangshan jumped as everyone turned their attention towards him, glares on quite a number of faces. Laughing nervously, he rushed to defend himself:

“It’s certainly lucky that we have received the simulation. It will keep us from making the same mistakes in our future,” he pointed out. “I will know better than to trust the innocent act Xue Yang has mastered, and you will all know better than to vilify Wei Wuxian for his unique cultivation methods.”

At the reminder of their own ‘mistakes,’ many of the glares the watchers had directed his way vanished, the thoughts turning inward instead. Jin Guangshan breathed out a sigh of relief.

And on the side, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen frowned, praying that their trust in their to-be sworn brother wasn’t misplaced.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian continued, “Yes, if the LanlingJin Sect hadn’t contributed, then it would have been impossible to keep you hidden. And then… you said you woke up when you heard my voice, right?”

‘Still sleeping?’ Wei Wuxian had asked, his eyes flashing red.

“Right. You said ‘wake up,’ so I struggled out of the chains and rushed outside.”

‘Things that are too loyal are also troublesome,’ Xue Yang had said.

The two might have had similar pasts, but, with every detail revealed, Wen Qing became more and more relieved that it had been Wei Wuxian who had turned Wen Ning, rather than Xue Yang.

“I see. The Jin Clan wouldn’t be able to make it public that you’d escaped, or there would be mass panic. Even if they want to, they won’t be able to pursue you with any sort of fanfare. And then, after a mess of a journey, you finally reached me,” Wei Wuxian sighed. “You mentioned you don’t know how much time has passed. It’s already been more than ten years. Well, it’s fair to say that I don’t know much more than you do. Do you want me to tell you some of-”

“I’ve heard some,” Wen Ning interrupted.

And the fact that Wen Ning had interrupted Wei Wuxian was enough to set most of the watchers on high alert.

“Young master.”

“Yes?"

“I heard… that the Burial Mounds are gone. That everyone is gone.”

A silence followed.

Upon hearing that first sentence, the initial feelings of the watchers — even the most kind, gentle ones of the bunch — were nothing short of relief.

“Good riddance,” Jiang Cheng grinned.

“Oh, thank the heavens,” Jiang Yanli agreed.

The Lans and Nie all nodded in agreement. After all, no matter how much had happened since then, none of them would be able to forget what the Burial Mounds had done to Wei Wuxian.

‘Two days later-’

‘And four days after that-’

‘And six days after that-’

And they were grabbing, tearing, teething, ripping, eating and-

“Wei Ying?” Lan Wangji asked, noticing the less-than-relieved expression on his ~~soulmate’s~~ face.

After frowning in thought for a moment, the answer revealed itself to Wen Ruohan: “At the beginning, when the villagers were talking about Wei Wuxian’s fall… didn’t they say the sects had burned the Burial Mounds to the ground?”

‘But it’s suicide to go there,’ Lan Xichen had protested disbelievingly.

And then Wei Wuxian had been thrown in, and gotten out. Maybe not entirely whole, but alive nonetheless.

“Wait, A-Ning said ‘everyone’ is gone,” Wen Qing pointed out. “Who is ‘everyone?’”

No one knew.

‘I’d wanted to tell him some trivial gossip,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘That the Lan Sect rules had increased from three thousand to four thousand, and that Nie Huaisang is now called ‘the Headshaker.’ But now…’

He could only stay silent.

‘A-Ning… he doesn’t even sound sad,’ Wen Qing thought. ‘It’s like he had already known this would happen even before he found out about it. Like he’d already come to expect the worst case scenario.’

“Well, let’s not talk about this anymore. Have you heard of anything else?”

'The siege,' Wen Ning thought. 'And Sect Leader Jiang….'

He trailed off. He had already tried speaking to Wei Wuxian about his former shidi the last time Lan Wangji had gotten drunk (and had been cut off quite thoroughly by Wei Wuxian). It was fairly clear that the topic of Jiang Wanyin was off limits for the current time. And yet Wen Ning couldn't let this go.

"Young Master Wei… you died such an awful death-"

Lan Wangji couldn't hold in the flinch that broke through his body at that. For all his widely-acclaimed self control, there was nothing he could do to stop it. Especially when-

'He was torn to a fine powder by his own ghost soldiers.'

Within the Burial Mounds, a corpse pulled itself up Wei Wuxian's body-

'Serves him right!'

'It was just, my destiny… to die like that.'

The corpse's mouth opened wide.

'It was like being stuck in an unending nightmare.'

Nausea welled up within Lan Wangji, and he suspected that if he wasn't inside the simulation, his physical reaction would have been much worse than a mere flinch.

A sigh.

"...So you haven't heard any good news?" Wei Wuxian asked, reacting remarkably well for someone who had just been reminded of one of the worst days of their life.

"That's right," Wen Ning confirmed. "None at all."

Wei Wuxian gaped at that response.

Although she knew the real Wen Ning hadn't experienced the same as his simulated self, Wen Qing promised herself she would take her brother out on a nice vacation as soon as this was over.

Suddenly, a loud shattering noise came from the main hall on the first floor. Something glass had just broken.

And the peace vanished with it.

"What's that supposed to mean?!" Jin Ling demanded. Frowning, both Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning ventured closer to the downstairs room where the juniors resided.

"Were we not talking about Xue Yang?" Lan Sizhui asked with somewhat-forced calmness. "Why are we now arguing over this?"

The Jin heir didn't hesitate to respond, "We are talking about Xue Yang! Was what I said wrong? Think about everything Xue Yang did! He's even worse than scum, and Wei Wuxian was even more disgusting than him!"

"A-Ling!" Jiang Yanli cried out scoldingly, then paused and flinched back, remembering that her son had no way of knowing the truth. After all, everyone in the future was more than willing to speak however they pleased about her martial brother, and with the numerous unknowns regarding how she had died-

She certainly didn't blame Wei Wuxian, but she couldn't formulate an argument to defend him either.

And it seemed all the other juniors were in the same situation. As Jin Ling breathed in deeply, the juniors all frowned or looked toward the ground, unable to speak to someone so directly harmed by Wei Wuxian's actions.

"You…" Jin Ling growled, his voice lowering in pitch to a hateful roar. "What do you mean 'we shouldn't generalize them?!' These monsters are vermin to our world! We should kill, murder, and slaughter every single one of them!"

Wen Ning flinched.

"A-Ning!" Wen Qing cried out worriedly, and Jiang Yanli wilted at the same moment. Seeing that, both Jiang Cheng and Madam Yu were overcome with worry for her, and anger towards the one who had caused this.

But the one who had caused this was Jin Ling, whose parents were ~~allegedly~~ killed by Wei Wuxian. They couldn't really blame him for his opinion, especially since he was only fifteen. Why, if there was anyone to blame-

'Break his legs?' the future Sect Leader Jiang asked. 'Haven't I told you? When dealing with those without honor, just kill them and feed them to your dog.'

"Hey, why are you being so angry about it?" Lan Jingyi spoke up, the first of the juniors to oppose Jin Ling. "Sizhui didn't say that Wei Wuxian shouldn't have been killed. All he said was that not everyone who cultivates the ghost path is the same kind of person as Xue Yang!"

'Ah, to think a teenage junior would already understand what it took half the simulation to teach me,' Lan Qiren thought, frowning deeply. 'He's… truly a remarkable young boy.'

There was some hope for the future after all.

And another sign of hope for the future, Lan Jingyi's unrepentant casualness, continued full force:

"Honestly, did you have to start throwing things?" the Lan boy continued. "I didn't get to eat that one yet."

Sneering, Jin Ling scoffed: "And what about when he said 'the founder of this path may have not intended to use it for evil?!' Who was 'the founder of demonic cultivation?' Go on, tell me! Who could it be except Wei Ying?!"

"I'm not trying to absolve Wei Wuxian of his deeds," Sizhui countered. "I'm merely suggesting that we should not jump to conclusions before we learn the entire picture."

"Hm. Good kid," Nie Mingjue commented, sending Lan Xichen an approving nod. "We… probably needed to be told that at the beginning of the simulation."

Although Madam Yu huffed at the comment, she also couldn't dispute it.

But Jin Ling was far from done: "I just can't understand you. Your Gusu Lan Sect is also a prominent sect. Back then, you also lost many people to Wei Wuxian's crimes!"

And there was part of the problem. If Wei Wuxian had truly remained a good person — and as more and more was revealed, that became more and more likely — then why had the Great Sects become his enemy? Why had they become his enemy?

If they had been asked that at the beginning of the simulation, then "because he's a demonic cultivator" might have felt like more than enough reason. Now, they were desperately praying that there was something more.

"...You know, before we came to Yi City, a lot of people also claimed that the Yueyang Chang Clan's Chang Ping was killed by Xiao Xingchen Daozhang's hands. But was that the truth?"

"Nobody actually saw whether or not Chang Ping Daozhang was killed by Xiao Xingchen. All they had were guesses, so why are you calling them claims? But just try to count how many cultivators lost their lives to Wei Ying, Wen Ning — to the Stygian Tiger Seal! These are truths that everyone accepts, that no one can deny!"

"Oh? So, those aren't just 'claims,' are they?" Wen Ruohan muttered. At that, Lan Wangji couldn't help but remember the first scene the simulation had shown them.

'I heard he has another evil weapon. The Stygian Tiger Seal.'

'Yes, don't forget he has that. Or how he killed three thousand cultivators overnight.'

'Five thousand, if I'm not mistaken.'

Apparently most people had only heard hear-say on the event. But 'everyone accepts' those claims, so Jin Ling had never questioned their truth.

"But-"

"And what can't be forgotten is that he ordered Wen Ning to kill my mother and father!"

"...Maiden Jiang's son?" Wen Ning whispered from where he watched outside.

There was guilt in their expressions. And neither denied their involvement.

"Oh, A-Ning, Wei Wuxian… what happened?" Wen Qing asked, looking back and forth between them. Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli scooted closer to each other, sorrowful over the despairing hate they saw on their son's face.

'Wei Wuxian's not like that, A-Ling,' Jin Zixuan thought, then, glancing at his father, couldn't help but recall what Jin Guangshan had been "tricked into" doing for Xue Yang.

With some of the comments he'd heard his father make… could he really continue to pretend he was just a victim?

'If Wei Wuxian did do something to me… I can't help but think I must have somehow deserved it.'

(However, Jiang Yanli had been killed by Wei Wuxian too. It was that and that alone that left Jin Zixuan somewhat hopeful that there might indeed be more to the story than simply one of them being at fault.)

"You know, my uncle grew up with him," Jin Ling pointed out. "My grandfather saw him as his own child, and my grandmother wasn't horrible to him either."

A loud, ungraceful snort echoed through the simulation. Madam Yu wanted to spin and unleash a tsunami of fury on whoever was responsible, but, after a few seconds, she came to realize that the person who had made that sound was herself.

(And why wouldn't she? Wasn't it just hilarious? Jiang Fengmian's actions during the Massacre of Lotus Pier had proven that he didn't see Wei Wuxian as his own child, and even next to that lie, the best her grandson could say about her was that she 'wasn't horrible to him.' Of course her son would show filial piety toward his dead mother and speak positively of her, but….)

('Wasn't horrible to him.' That was the best anyone could say. And now that she looked back on everything, she knew herself that it wasn't even true.)

Meanwhile, Jin Ling's tirade had continued without end. And, with each sentence spoken, the number of lies he had been fed became more and more obvious.

"Wei Wuxian… he made Lotus Pier the liar of the Wen Sect! He wrecked the entire Yunmeng Jiang Sect, and caused the deaths of both my parents and grandparents! Now my uncle is the only one left! Lan Yuan, how can you excuse this?! He brought about his death through the havoc he created, and ended up not even leaving behind a whole corpse! Just what part of the situation do you not understand?!"

'The part where you accept his responsibility in my death as a fact,' Madam Yu thought. However, with that feeling, came another question: where did those lies come from?

Unfortunately, the answer was more than clear.

'You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!'

And there Jin Ling was, proof of all of Madam Yu's mistakes throughout the years, and evidence of how much damage she could cause even decades down the line.

"Just what excuses do you think you can make up for him?!"

He argued forcefully, but Lan Sizhui didn't reply at all.

After some time, Ouyang Zizhen spoke up: "Why are we suddenly getting heated over such a thing? Let's just drop the subject, alright? We haven't finished eating yet. The food's gonna get cold."

"Ah, good work Zizhen," Nie Huaisang laughed, but the forced joy came out especially awkward when no one joined in.

Shaking his head, Nie Mingjue muttered, "How does Wei Wuxian not hate us? He comes back to life, and all he wants to do is get away. Not even to-"

No revenge, no resentment, nothing. He had even stepped in time and time again to help the juniors, no matter which sect they were from. In this way, he was the complete and total opposite of Xue Yang.

(And, arguably, Nie Mingjue himself.)

Meanwhile, the rest of the juniors were all in agreement with Zizhen about their desire to stop the argument. One after another, they all supported his proposition to return to their food.

"Yes, we should really stop arguing. Sizhui simply forgot to choose his words carefully. It was only an offhand comment — how could he have put much thought into it?"

"Sit down, young master Jin. Let us continue to eat."

"That's right, all of us just left Yi City, so we've technically been through life and death together…. We really shouldn't argue over such a careless mistake."

A 'careless mistake' that the watchers happened to 100% agree with. Lan Qiren sighed to himself, wondering what to do with the information that had just been discussed.

(Madam Yu remained silent, lost in her own thoughts.)

"...I am sorry," Sizhui said at last. "I should have put more thought into my wording. Young Master Jin, please sit back down. We don't want to continue and bring Hanguang-jun down as well."

At the mention of Hanguang-jun, Jin Ling immediately stopped and sat down. After a short amount of time, the hall quickly regained its previous jovial tone.

"...At least it's over now," Jin Zixuan supposed, not knowing how to feel about the situation. He now really, truly wanted nothing more than to know what had happened to his and Jiang Yanli's future selves.

But, given the past actions of the simulation, he had a feeling that was still a while away.

At that moment, Wen Ning silently got to his knees, bending his head low as he stared blankly at the clamoring juniors. Two memories flashed by in the blink of an eye, too quickly for the watchers to get a good look. One had four people, a woman in wedding-red handing a grey body, Wen Ning, a bowl of something. The second showed that same grey figure kneeling down beside a child who wore dirty, ragged robes.

Unfortunately, the images didn't linger long enough for the watchers to make out the people present.

Seeing the despair in Wen Ning's posture, Wei Wuxian waved his hand carelessly and told him, "It wasn't your fault."

The Ghost general looked over at him, then looked down again, hopeless.

"'Not his fault?' Then who's fault was it?" Lan Qiren wondered.

'Wei Ying,' Lan Wangji thought. 'What happened?'

"Oh," Wen Ruohan said at once.

Everyone glanced toward him, wondering why he had made such a noise, and therefore were caught unprepared when the subject of Wen Ruohan's attention slammed a white-robbed foot into Wen Ning's shoulder, kicking him at least ten yards away where he slammed into a tree.

"Hanguang-jun!" Wen Qing shouted in an amused-protest (now quite aware of just how durable her brother's body was).

"I… apologize," Lan Wangji forced himself to say, watching as his (very drunk) future self looked down on the collapsed Wen Ning. It was becoming increasingly clear that despite Lan Wangji's (naive) hopes, this incident would be just as embarrassing as the last one.

He sighed.

Wen Ning's body had created another man-sized dent in the ground on the way to the tree, permanently scaring the territory. That said, it was quite clearly not his fault, so Wei Wuxian turned his attention towards the actual culprit.

"Hanguang-jun! Hanguang-jun, calm down!" he shouted, wrapping his arms around the others' chest. The second jade glanced back, eyes hazy with alcohol, and saw an unusually careful and timid Wei Wuxian staring up at him. The two made eye contact for several seconds.

Slowly, Wen Ning stood up.

In an instant, Hanguang-jun was before him, reaching back to deliver a powerful palm strike-

Wen Qing tensed.

It connected, making the Ghost General stumble back a mere foot. Lan Wangji had not put any power into the attack. Slowly, Wen Ning opened his eyes, relaxing from the reflective wince he had fallen into.

“Eh?” the corpse asked.

With a dramatic sway of his arm, Lan Wangji made a ‘hmph’ noise, staring down condescendingly at the Ghost General. The look was not due to the crimes attributed to him, nor due to his status as a corpse.

“Wangji, are you… jealous?” Lan Xichen asked.

“...I would have no right to be,” Lan Wangji responded, refusing to let any inflection into his tone. “Wei Ying and I are not in a relationship. It-”

“Well, that’s a ‘yes’ if I’ve ever heard one,” Nie Mingjue muttered, making the second jade’s jaw snap shut at once, a crimson blush quickly spreading across his ears.

“Wen Ning, are you alright?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“I’m fine.”

“If you’re fine then stand up! What are you kneeling for?”

But Wen Ning remained hesitant, crawling towards Lan Wangji with a muttered, “Lan-er-gongzi, I-”

Frowning at the audacity Wen Ning had to speak to him, Lan Wangji closed his eyes, covered his ears, and turned to face Wei Wuxian instead. From his new position, he was blocking Wei Wuxian’s ability to make eye contact with Wen Ning, effectively cutting them off.

A silence persisted.

“...Are you serious?” Jiang Cheng asked. “Are you… hold on-”

“...Wow.”

“That’s adorable!” Nie Huaisang shouted.

Disagreeing completely, Lan Wangji turned to Wen Qing and bowed lowly, explaining, “I apologise again for my actions. Your brother did not agree to take part in this. I assure you, I will apologise to the future version once this is over, and-”

“Calm down, Lan-er-gongzi,” the doctor disagreed. “You saw some of what the other kids got up to while they were drunk in the Cloud Recesses. Trust me, this is nowhere near as bad as it could be. Save your apologies for when they’re actually necessary.”

Besides, the amusement she got from seeing the second jade’s growing embarrassment was more than enough to make up for this.

Finally-

“It’s best if you don’t stand there,” Wei Wuxian called out to the corpse. “Lan Zhan, ah… doesn’t really like seeing you.”

After a beat, Wen Ning asked, “What happened to Young Master Lan?”

“Nothing, nothing. He’s just drunk.”

“What?”

Withholding a snort, Jin Zixuan commented, “That’s a sentence I never thought would be uttered.”

Although his posture remained as straight as ever, the second jade’s aura visibly wilted at that. As the only one who could read such emotions on him, Lan Xichen felt it was his duty to reassure his brother that what he had done was perfectly normal.

(Though significantly cuter than most people were while they were drunk.)

Going by the extra-blank face Wen Ning made, it was clear how much trouble he was having accepting that.

Finally, he asked, “Then… what are you going to do?”

Wei Wuxian shrugged: “Well, what else can I do? I’m gonna carry him inside and tuck him in.”

“Okay,” Lan Wangji said.

“Someone’s excited,” Madam Jin commented, making Jiang Yanli and Lan Xichen give small, suppressed squeals.

“Hmm? Weren’t you covering your ears? How come you were suddenly able to hear again?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Lan Wangji refused to answer.

This time, even Wen Ruohan couldn’t resist chuckling slightly at the interaction. Lan Wangji silently wondered what sort of crime he had committed in a past life to deserve this fate.

Seeing how busy they were, Wen Ning turned to leave-

“Ah, Wen Ning. Be careful. Why don’t you… find somewhere to hide,” Wei Wuxian commented, then, upon seeing Wen Ning’s confusion, continued, “One can say that you’ve already died twice already. Get some rest.”

The Ghost General’s eyes widened at that.

‘Thank you,’ Wen Qing thought, gazing warmly at her younger brother. ‘A-Ning, the person you saved all the way back then was… truly worth it. I’m glad you at least have each other, now.’

Wen Ning vanished into the night.

“Alright, he’s gone,” Wei Wuxian declared. “You can’t hear or see him anymore.”

Having received that confirmation, Lan Wangji finally uncovered his ears. His light, golden eyes stared at Wei Wuxian, nearly hypnotizing in their intensity.

‘Ah, his eyes are so clear and honest,’ Wei Wuxian observed, staring back just as deeply. ‘The urge to do something wicked is overwhelming.’

If Lan Wangji was anyone else, he would have ‘eeped’ in fear. As it was, that honor fell to Lan Qiren, who once again was overwhelmed by the feeling that they shouldn’t be watching this. It wasn’t even anything especially explicit, but-

The sheer level of emotion they felt for each other was staggering.

As if trying to prove that, Wei Wuxian’s next thought was, ‘I feel as if something has been ignited within me.’

A high-pitched, excited scream left Nie Huaisang’s throat.

And it all faded to black.

“What?!”

“What?!” Nie Huaisang repeated.

“Oh, come on! They’re ending it there?!” Jin Zixuan protested.

Laughing at his outrage, Jiang Yanli pointed out, “It’s already been a fairly long segment.”

“Still! This is inexcusable,” Madam Jin huffed. “Honestly… just when we were getting to the good part.”

There were nods of agreement from all around, making the flush on Lan Wangji’s ears darken considerably. He was the only one even remotely happy about the abrupt end, grateful that it would give him some time to prepare himself for the upcoming embarrassment.

(It was fine to show something like this to Wei Ying, but for others-)

(And then, once again, it occurred to him that he had still not had a single spoken conversation with the head disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect.)

(His impatience towards the end of the simulation grew immensely.)

Luckily, there was at least one person whose mind could focus on more than watching Hanguang-jun be drunk. With a small sigh, Jiang Yanli leaned closer to Jin Zixuan and allowed her smile to drop slightly:

"Poor Miss A-Qing. She was such a sweet girl."

"Everything that happened in that city was a mess," Madam Yu scowled. "Xue Yang… what a dirty, disgusting-"

She cut herself off, the words 'street rat' on the tip of her tongue, but the newfound feeling of wrongness that evoked keeping them down once again. It was a silly thing to pause over (it wasn't an inaccurate description, after all) and yet somehow it felt completely wrong.

'I'm not talking about that girl,' she thought, laughing at her own foolishness. 'I'm only talking about Xue Yang. A-Qing was… impressive. I can admit that much, but that doesn't mean I can't insult Xue Yang. Everyone is shouting at him. The simulation has truly ruined me if I'm losing my nerve over something like this!'

But insulting Xue Yang by calling him a 'street rat' still felt wrong.

"...Delinquent," she finally decided on, glaring fiercely enough to keep others from commenting on the ridiculously long pause in her sentence. From their spots on the sidelines, several people had to quickly hide amused grins.

(Apparently the simulation's focus on Yi City was quite useful when it came to the maturity of certain members of the audience.)

'Ah, it's a good thing I haven't mentioned what actually happened to Wei-xiong's core yet,' Nie Huaisang thought. 'Putting aside the lack of evidence, directly pointing that out would probably just make Madam Yu and Jiang-xiong defensive. She'd start snapping back again, and all this great progress she's starting to have wouldn't have happened. I love it when not doing any work is the best way to resolve a situation! Go me!'

On the other hand, Nie Huaisang's brother was in a far more morose mood. Things had gone wrong one after another, and even with this (debatably) happy ending, the circumstances surrounding Yi City were tragic at best. If Nie Mingjue's older-self had managed to execute Xue Yang, or if Xue Yang had just learned how to let go of his desire for revenge-

'Do you really have any right to say that? If Wen Qing hadn't been shown helping, you would have thought exterminating the entirety of the Wen Clan was just revenge.'

But the life of Nie Mingjue's father — the lives of everyone in Lotus Pier and the countless clans that had been wiped out by the Wen — were worth far more than a single finger. The Wen Clan had wiped out other sects, so the Great Clans had-

‘What the Wen Sect does has nothing to do with us,’ Wen Qing had declared. ‘We don’t need to pay for their sins!’

Even before Wen Qing had put her life on the line to help Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng, she hadn’t done anything wrong. The countless Wens who hadn’t taken part in Wen Ruohan’s actions were the same.

Nie Mingjue had been certain he had understood that when he saw Wen Qing take Wei Wuxian’s side that first time, but now he wasn’t so sure.

(How, exactly, had Wen Ning died?)

Turning to Wen Qing, Sect Leader Nie attracted her attention and opened his mouth to speak-

“Hi, everyone~” Wei Wuxian’s voice rang out.

“Eh?! A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli blinked, staring up at the ceiling.

“Uncle Jiang and I just finished a talk with Mo Xuanyu and the future’s sect leader Nie,” Wei Wuxian revealed, making both the real Nie Huaisang and Nie Mingjue spin to face each other.

“I-I’m here too, A-Jie,” Wen Ning called out.

A small crossed Wen Qing’s lips.

“A-Cheng, A-Li, San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian greeted. “Is everyone alright?”

With an exhausted huff, Madam Yu bit out, “We’re wonderful. We’ve reached the end of Yi City, and all we can really say about it is that most things that could have gone wrong, did.”

“Though Mo Xuanyu and Hanguang-jun are alright,” Wen Ruohan pointed out. “The juniors, as well.”

A laugh came from the other side, and Jiang Fengmian added, “I’m glad. Though, considering who was looking after them, I suppose I shouldn’t be surprised.”

After all, with the Yiling Patriarch and Gusu Lan’s Second Jade as your adoptive parents, there were very few things that could endanger you.

“Xue Yang was dealt with, then?”

“Ah… yes.”

Memories of the dismembered corpse flashed into people’s minds, and the old candy that had been clutched tightly in Xue Yang’s palm dampened much of the enthusiasm they felt.

Xue Yang deserved to die after what he had done. That didn’t make the result any less tragic. However-

“Wonderful!” Wei Wuxian declared, his knowledge of Xue Yang basically amounting to ‘evil demonic cultivator who wiped out several clans.’ “Actually, we were just talking about him with the future’s Sect Leader Nie.”

“Oh?”

“Nie-xiong was elected as their spokesperson when it came to interacting with us, the present/their pasts. On the subject of how to deal with the child version, the clans in the future decided they wanted to forbid him and the others from joining cultivation clans.”

Nie Mingjue hummed at those words, commenting, “While we were discussing with each other, we mentioned possibly having the Nie Clan take him in and keeping an eye on them. Did Huaisang’s future-self mention why that wasn’t their plan?”

“He said there were many calls for harsher punishments, so this was the one thing the future clans wouldn’t budge on. They recommended we sponsor a new organization that will exist for keeping watch on them without introducing them to cultivation in any way. Presumably the great sects will be heavily involved, so your plan on having members of the Nie Clan keep track of him is still more than possible.”

“It would just be without teaching him cultivation,” Lan Qiren concluded. He could certainly see the logic in that. Cultivation, demonic or otherwise, was a weapon Xue Yang had more than proven himself to be untrustworthy with. When taking into account how few people in the world used cultivation, forbidding them from it couldn’t even really be considered a punishment.

It was certainly not the worst idea he had ever heard.

But Lan Wangji frowned further at that, and Lan Xichen read his brother’s expression instantly.

“What about the adults involved?” Lan Xichen asked, speaking both to the watchers around him and to the trio outside the simulation. “The Chang Clan’s leader has already taken part in certain actions we believe they need to answer for.”

“The Chang Clan?” Wen Ning repeated, confusion obvious in his tone. “But… A-Jie, Sect Leader Jiang said they were the ones who Xue Yang wiped out? A-aren’t they the victims? What could they have done that… um-”

“What did they do to provoke Xue Yang’s response?” Wei Wuxian asked, understanding at once.

With a frustrated growl, Nie Mingjue explained, “They took part in needless cruelty towards the child Xue Yang that debatably started everything. It didn’t even remotely justify Xue Yang’s response, but it still needs to be dealt with.”

“I don’t disagree, but dealing with a sect leader is very different from dealing with children,” Wen Ruohan pointed out, smirking as if to remind the others of their inability to punish him, the one who had arguably done the most wrong. “How do you exect Wei Wuxian to act as a judge while only having the support of the Yunmeng Jiang Clan?”

Right now the sect was doing amazingly, but the other great sects were swiftly recovering. If it seemed like the Yunmeng Jiang Sect was going to start stepping beyond its rights (and become like the Wen Sect), the others would quickly hurl accusations at it and force it to stop. Especially if it was the son of a servant leading the charge, and especially now, when tensions were so high. Although Wen Xu would know better than to let Wei Wuxian die, it would most likely mean starting an inner-sect war even sooner than it had happened in the simulation.

An excuse of ‘the other sect leaders told us to do this and I don’t have any proof but you just need to believe me’ would go over about as well as trying to make them believe people could come back to life.

(The fact that both were true was a fascinating sort of irony.)

And besides, even if the other sects were convinced that this was their decision, many of them (read: Jin Zixun) wouldn't cooperate anyways. Acting before the sect leaders had left the simulation would be completely illogical.

“But does that mean that there’s nothing we can do against Sect Leader Chang right now?” Jiang Yanli asked. “Even if they can’t directly punish them, our Yungmeng Jiang Sect could still put pressure on Sect Leader Chang CiAn, right? Maybe we can refuse to speak with them, or we could try convincing the merchants to tax them heavily!"

“That wouldn’t exactly be much of a punishment,” Madam Yu pointed out. “Especially if we don’t explain why we’re doing it. Fengmian, just wait for us to come out before we worry about them. Focus on the kids for now.”

“And how many others will get hurt in the meantime?” Lan Qiren asked. “The Lan Sect cannot simply stand by as this occurs.”

A thoughtful hum came from Wei Wuxian, and there were a few odd scratches that indicated he was writing something out on a piece of paper. Jiang Fengmian remained silent as well, allowing his ward to work.

“Wen Ning, could you grab me those charts?” he muttered. There was a scurrying of footsteps.

Some of the watchers made eye contact, staring blankly at each other. Then:

“Okay, you’ve all been in the simulation about two weeks. I’m about 80% sure the rest will take maybe another week and a half, so whatever choice you make will be over that timeline.”

Lan Qiren faltered, thrown off by the specific report of time. Everything moved slower inside the simulation, so it had only been a few days for the watchers, rather than a few weeks.

Wei Wuxian was still quite impressed by the mechanic. It had been done so that the signals would be able to transfer and they'd all be able to talk to each other, but it had far more applications than just that. He couldn't wait until he had more time to try all that out.

On the other hand, they had been watching years pass within the simulation, so that also gave them a feeling that a significant amount of time had passed. The set values of 'a week and a half' left for them to watch was quite different than what Lan Qiren had feared.

And, going by how horribly Xue Yang's trial at the Jins went in the simulation, this was not something he was willing to rush.

"Alright then," Wen Ruohan spoke up, seeing that no one else knew what to say. "Wei Wuxian, Sect Leader Jiang, I suggest you begin preparing for dealing with both Xue Yang and Sect Leader Chang. We can wait to take action, but it will go much smoother if you have already set the foundations. Tell A-Xu he is to provide you with whatever resources you need for this."

"Of course, Sect Leader Wen," Wei Wuxian agreed, once again surprised by the Chief Cultivators generosity. Meanwhile, Jiang Fengmian frowned, uncomfortable with the growing closeness between his disciple and Wen Ruohan, but unsure of what to add now that he'd already told Wei Wuxian to not trust the Wen Sect.

(And, in all honesty, if anyone was safe in Wen Ruohan's presence, it was starting to look like it was Wei Wuxian most of all.)

"Is there anything specific you need?" Wei Wuxian continued.

"Well, if we want this to make sense as justice, then we should probably get Xue Yang involved with the punishment of Chang CiAn," Madam Jin pointed out, recalling the previous conversations the watchers had had on the subject. "We obviously can't let him go as far as he did in the simulation, but we also shouldn't exclude him from the trial, at the very least."

"Sounds good. Then I'll start gathering evidence for a trial while I also look for the kid version of Xue Yang? Oh, and don't worry about that. Mo Xuanyu and I are working out something that'll let me find him."

Nodding absentmindedly, Madam Yu commented, "If you're the ones working on it, I'm sure whatever you make will operate perfectly."

There was a long, telling pause as Wei Wuxian tried and failed to process that sentence. Half of him wondered if he had just misheard Jiang Yanli's voice as Madam Yu's, but, as he saw Jiang Fengmian's similarly-wide eyes, he knew that wasn't the case. The pause persisted.

Clearing his throat, Lan Qiren concluded the conversation with, "Any objections?"

No one said a word, whether that be to disagree with Wen Ruohan's initial suggestion or to try and alter the agreed-upon plan.

"Alright then. Great! I'll start working on that," Wei Wuxian agreed.

"Bye, A-Jie," Wen Ning said.

"Take care," Jiang Fengmian told them.

There was a click, and the three voices vanished once more.

Chapter End Notes

For the bit on what Wei Wuxian's death was like, I got it from here! It's an interview with MXTX. It's pretty neat, so I recommend checking it out!

Chapter Notes

A-Yue took in a deep breath, reminding herself that too much was at stake to risk failing now. The preteen YunmengJiang cultivator glanced back at her two companions, doing one final check to ensure they were all prepared. Her brother A-Lu stood to her right, while Mo Yu, the new boy their Da-shixiong had brought to the sect, stood on her left. Not the set of teammates she would have necessarily preferred, but she would make due. After all, she was the Head Captain of Squishable Squadron One (of one), and a disciple who trained under Wei Wuxian! It didn't matter how incompetent her brother was or how A-Yu was too young to be a cultivator yet; she would get through this, no matter what it cost!

She sucked in a deep breath, holding it so that no one would be able to notice her from the sounds of her breathing. Looking around one more time to ensure that no one was in sight, A-Yue tentatively stepped into the sect's walkway. Standing on her very tip-toes, she sneaked forward to slide behind another wall. If she could just remain undetected long enough to get to past this, then-

"Can I go back now? I'm bored," A-Lu said at a not-a-all-quiet volume.

"Shhhhhhhhhhh!" A-Yue hissed back at once, quickly darting back into the alley she had come from to cover her brother's mouth. "Do you not understand that this is a stealth mission?! If any of our Shixiong or Shijies find us skipping out on our studying like this, we'll be running laps for weeks as punishment."

"Then why are we doing this at all?" A-Lu fired back, the sound muffled due to A-Yue's hands still covering his mouth. "It's going to be lunch time soon, and we still haven't finished even half of the scrolls we were assigned. Of course we're gonna get punished if our seniors find us!"

"Be quiet," A-Yue reminded him with a fierce glare. "Some things are more important than the scrolls."

"I'm gonna tell San-shijie you said that-"

"You wouldn't dare-"

"Um…" a small noise was squeaked out, and the siblings turned to face the source. It was A-Yu (a boy who would one day grow up to be called "Mo Xuanyu"), staring up at them with eyes wide in fear.

"What is it?" A-Yue asked at once, kneeling down before him. When her brother saw the complete change in tone and politeness she had when interacting with him versus A-Yu, he gave an indignant 'hmph.' Luckily, A-Yue was well-trained in ignoring her brother when she wanted to.

A-Yu glanced back and forth between the siblings nervously.

“You… you don’t have to do this,” he confessed at last. “I’m… fine?”

“Nonsense!” A-Yue insisted at once, momentarily forgetting her own orders to stay quiet. “Of course this is necessary. Why, I can’t imagine a single thing more important! You’re a disciple of the YunmengJiang Sect — or you will be, at least. You have to meet the Sect Leader at least once, and you have to make a good impression on him when you do!”

Growing nervous at the warning, A-Yu leaned in back, eyes wide.

(To the side, A-Lu gave a dramatic groan.)

“Sect Leader Jiang has been super busy lately because of the Great Sleep, so your only option will be to catch him now, when he comes back from a meeting with the Lans. I took a peak at Da-shixiong’s desk; Sect Leader Jiang will be back in twenty minutes. As your Shijie, I can’t allow you two to have a bad first meeting. Do you understand?”

A-Yu nodded frantically, finally realizing the importance of their mission.

(A-Lu wanted to point out that he and his sister had been the youngest disciples until now, so this was A-Yue’s first time being a Shijie — she had no clue what responsibilities the title required. However, he had a feeling bringing that up would not go over well, and so remained silent.)

A-Yu tensed, now fully-aware of the gravity of the situation. He had to make a good first impression on the Sect Leader, or even knowing the Da-shixiong of Yunmeng wouldn’t be able to save him. Would the Sect Leader send him back if angered? Would he put him though something even worse?

A-Yu quickly put his arm behind his back, hiding the dirty bandages wrapped around it. They had been applied shortly after he arrived at Yunmeng, but had blackened during the extensive exploring A-Yu had taken part in. If Sect Leader Jiang was upset by how he'd wasted them-

“What? Do you wanna grab some new bandages?” A-Lu asked. This was not the first time the boy had asked that question, and, like all the previous times, A-Yu shook his head ‘no’ in response.

A-Yue sighed. Really, she had no idea why A-Yu wouldn’t simply go and ask the head healer for new bandages. It seemed once again obvious to her that boys (even cute, adorable ones like A-Yu), were rather stupid sometimes.

“Whatever. Now then, if we’re all ready,” A-Yue began, clapping her hands together, “then, off we-“

“Is this really the best reception YunmengJiang has to offer?” a rough, nasally voice demanded.

All three children froze.

“I apologize, Jin-gongzi,” Wei Wuxian’s voice responded. “If we had known you were going to arrive-“

“This is an outrage! Where’s your Sect Leader?! I could do a lot better speaking to him than bothering with you. I demand to be brought to him at once!”

As Wei Wuxian tried explaining their Sect Leader’s absence, A-Yue peaked around a corner to get a good look. Her Da-shixiong stood tall, wearing his father’s purple robes as he always did when someone from another sect visited. To the sides of the room, the sect’s servants frowned at each other and whispered.

“Can you believe him?”

“Honestly, the nerve.”

“As if Jin Zixun-gongzi didn’t visit only because he knew the sect leader was going to be gone. The audacity… and all just so he can talk to Wei-gongzi privately.”

“Can you believe he’s the one leading the Jin Sect? Our Madam’s poor martial sister will be furious when she sees what he’s done. She won’t let him get away with this.”

Unfortunately, those promises of future punishment did nothing to change the fact that, right now, Jin Zixun was the highest ranking person in the room.

“I heard you’re claiming that little project you’re starting to gather manpower for was supported by the sect leaders,” Jin Zixun continued, barely stopping in his rant to breathe. “Really? An ‘organization’ with no defined purpose so far? Why would my uncle support that?”

An organization? A-Yue hadn’t heard anything about that. And, looking back at her brother, she could see that he hadn’t either.

“How does he know about that?” one servant whispered to another. “Do the Jin have spies in Yunmeng?”

“Couldn’t be,” another responded. “Our sects are on good terms. We may have gotten a bunch of new members recently, but I’m sure that-“

“And let’s not forget the fact that your new ‘organization’ would take from districts even outside of Yunmeng! Don’t you think you’re overstepping your welcome-“

“Not particularly, no,” Wei Wuxian responded, smiling confidently (and ignoring the trembling Wen Ning to his right). “As I told you, if you really doubt me, you’re welcome to speak to the people inside the simulation yourself. You can ask your uncle about this if you really want to.”

A loud ‘ha!’ left Jin Zixun’s mouth and he asked, “What? You want me to put my faith in that demonic array you’ve created? Yunmeng may be an honored sect, but Sect Leader Jiang is so sentimental over his old love. Who knows how closely he’s watching her son’s actions. They do say affection can blind even the best of men.”

The cultivators and servants behind Jin Zixun all laughed.

"…What did that mean?" A-Lu whispered. "Who's he talking about?"

However, with no knowledge of demonic cultivation or Cangse Sanren or Wei Changze or the history between them and Yu Zixuan, A-Yue had no way of knowing that Jin Zixun had just implied that Wei Wuxian was using demonic cultivation to fake the calls to the Sect Leaders. For Jiang Fengmian to be so biased towards Wei Wuxian was a thought that would never once occur to her — especially with all the respect she offered her Da-shixiong. She could only shake her head at her brother, equally mystified.

Scoffing amid the laughter of his entourage, Jin Zixun leaned close to his second in command and concluded, "I guess the rumors are true. Cangse must have been quite an enjoyable night to get this much leeway for her son."

The Jin disciples cackled.

Wen Ning, on the other hand, paled at those words.

And Wei Wuxian's eyes went colder than ice.

Less than twenty minutes later, the Jin's were packing themselves up and returning to the carriages they had come over from. They certainly could have flown over, but with the long distance and late hour, some of the poorer cultivators had feared the difficulty of the journey, and had vouched for other modes of transport. It helped that the highest ranking member of the bunch was one such person.

In hindsight, that ended up being quite a good decision. With the way they were still shaking, at least half of them would have fallen off if they had tried to fly. As it was, quite a few tripped as they tried to enter the carts, flinching at the heavy gazes weighing them down.

To add insult to injury, the sources of those gazes, the awestruck Yunmeng servants, gossiped loudly enough for the Jins to hear:

"Wow… Da-shixiong destroyed them!"

Gaping openly, another admitted, "I… almost feel a bit bad. Da-shixiong didn't even raise his voice, he just…"

'Come now, Jin-gongzi. There's no need to joke like that. Of course you understood how the array contacting the sect leaders works. Someone with a main clan member's education would never be confused by something like that.'

'Well, I just… Of course I know what it's saying, I just worry about the accuracy of the report-'

'The accuracy?' Wei Wuxian asked. 'Oh, you mean the precision of the layered arrays.'

‘What?”

‘Yes, I can completely understand why you would be concerned about that. The combination of the Wéifǎn and the Liánjiē segments do initially seem to contradict each other in a way that would throw off the Shōucáng process, but, as I’m sure a temporary sect leader such as yourself knows, writing an inverted Yánqí symbol between them allows for the Jiēshōu Zhě reader to still work. The Fēnpèi and Chéngfǎ segments cancel out — though, of course, I don’t have to explain that to you.’

Jin Zixun had just blinked twice, staring blankly.

‘Ah, that’s right. Jin-gongzi, since we’re in agreement that the array described in the report I gave you works, we really should contact the sect leaders. You’ll be able to confirm that the array I use is the same as the one in the report, and you’ll be able to tell your uncle about how the Jin Sect is currently fairing.’

‘No, there’s no need for-’

‘But of course there is! Jin Guangshan has put so much effort into strengthening his alliance with the Sae and Chin clan leaders. I’m sure he’d love to get an update from you on how that’s going.’

(Judging by Jin Zixun’s following flinch, not very well.)

‘And Jin Zixun-gongzi has been really working on his swordsmanship. It’s truly unfortunate that Jin Zixuan-gongzi has been unable to practice while being in the simulation, isn’t it?”

‘I… of course-’

‘Perhaps the two of you should have a duel once he gets out. At the very least, it would give Jin Zixuan-gongzi a good idea of how much he’ll need to catch up on. If we contact them now, we can arrange it with plenty of time to spare-’

‘No, no, I’m fine-’

‘Oh? Then would you like to fight me, instead?’

And, with the numerous affronts to his pride, Jin Zixun obviously couldn’t let that go.

‘I-if you use one of your tricks-’

‘Well of course I wouldn’t. Only spiritual cultivation, I assure you. Everyone here will be able to tell right away if I use it. In fact, just to be sure, why don’t we have all of you fight me at once? It’ll be hard to use demonic cultivation then.’

‘Are you really suggesting that you can take us all on by yourself*?!’*

Wei Wuxian had just smiled.

Needless to say, it hadn’t gone very well for the Jins.

And then, right when Jin Zixun was about to accuse Wei Wuxian of cheating, Wei Wuxian brought up Jin Guangshan's own words:

'A-Xun?'

"Yes, Uncle?'

'We're all trusting Wei-gongzi to help us with any problems that might occur. I expect you to give him the Jin Sect's full support, am I understood?'

No matter how much he might want to be, Jin Zixun wasn't the heir of the Jin Sect. His current high standing in it was fairly heavily influenced by how much of Jin Guangshan's favor he held. But, if Jin Guangshan valued Wei Wuxian's talent more, then what would he say if he found out what Jin Zixun and his cohort had tried to do?

Even without Wei Wuxian saying it directly, the meaning was clear: depending on how mad Jin Guangshan was, Jin Zixun might not be able to back up his threats in the near future. In fact, if Wei Wuxian was truly favored (and it had to be an unbelievable amount, for Jin Guangshan would have never given such an order in front of the other sect leaders otherwise), Jin Zixun could even be considered a traitor of sorts, if he wasn't careful.

(This was an argument that never would have worked if it was merely the son of a servant saying it, no matter how talented. However, with Jin Guangshan's words, and Jiang Fengmian's unquestioning support, and Wen Ruohan, the Chief Cultivator, ordering Wen Xu to help him…

Even the Jin Sect couldn't claim he was just the son of a servant any longer.)

In all honesty, neither A-Yue nor A-Lu had really understood all that much of the conversation, so they were just glad the weird yellow men were gone. And just in time too, for, only a minute after the Jin had left, Jiang Fengmian returned to the Cloud Recesses.

"Ready, A-Yu?" A-Yue asked.

After a moment of hesitation, A-Yu nodded resolutely. A-Yue grinned, and (dragging her brother along by his ear), brought the new member of the YunmengJiang Sect to meet his Sect Leader.

Due to the abrupt ending of the previous segment, a significant portion of the watchers were still on the edges of their seats, waiting impatiently for it to begin again. Therefore, when the world around them darkened as the simulation resumed, there was a collective sigh of relief.

A feeling that only amplified when the simulation picked up right where it had left off: Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji standing outside, nearby the inn.

Taking in deep breaths, Lan Wangji tried to mentally prepare himself for the disaster he was sure would follow.

The pair was staring into each others eyes, one drunk on alcohol, the other lost in wonder. The Yiling Patriarch looked at Lan Wangji with an incomparable level of awe, and a warm smile soon formed on his face.

"Lan Zhan, you're drunk," Wei Wuxian laughed, still unable to believe it despite this being the second time it had happened.

"I'm not," Lan Wangji responded stubbornly, summoning Bichen off the ground with a wave of his hand.

"Wangji, you absolutely-"

"Definitely-"

"Completely-"

"And totally-"

""""""Are drunk,""""""" Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, Jiang Cheng, and Wen Qing concluded as one. Deciding to take the high route, Lan Wangji refused to respond to their obvious provocation.

'I can do this,' he thought. 'If I just stay calm, I'll be able to get through these scenes without further incident. They will only be embarrassing if I allow them to be.'

(Or so he hoped.)

By now, the simulated Hanguang-jun had gotten so close to Wei Wuxian that their noses were only a centimeter apart. The glare the second jade was sending his partner quite clearly showed how strongly he believed in his side of the argument.

Wei Wuxian just blinked back, amused.

Seemingly coming to a decision, Lan Wangji then grabbed onto Wei Wuxian's wrist, spinning on his heel and dragging both of them away.

"Huh? Where are you going?" the Yiling Patriarch asked.

"Back to Gusu."

A synchronous flinch broke out among a good fraction of the watchers at those words, the memories they evoked pouring forth.

'Wei Ying. Come back to Gusu with me.'

'To Gusu? I see. After all, your uncle despises people who cultivate on the dark path! You're his most beloved disciple; of course you're the same as him!'

Lan Qiren clenched his fists together, suddenly feeling sick to his stomach.

But, contrary to what had happened in the past, the simulated Wei Wuxian in Mo Xuanyu's body just laughed.

"Wait!" he called out. "You don't want the kids to see us like this, do you?"

To emphasize the 'this' he was referring to, he held up his hand, waving it back and forth to show the way Lan Wangji was still grabbing on.

Nodding once, Lan Wangji let go-

The real version breathed out a sigh of relief-

Only to immediately thrust forward a bamboo flute he had taken from his robes.

"Eh?"

In response to Wei Wuxian's confusion, Lan Wangji furrowed his brows in determination and reached into his sleeve, pulling out a rattle drum, a bell, and a dried flower. He held all four objects out, waiting for Wei Wuxian to take them.

Looking back and forth between the offerings, Wei Wuxian muttered "Hanguang-jun… you sure have a lot of interesting things in your sleeves, huh?"

"He's like a bird displaying mating gifts," Madam Jin couldn't help but comment, sending a fierce blush rising up Lan Wangji's ears (which he only managed to temper after a few dozen deep breaths).

"Though it is nice how personal all those trinkets are."

Certainly much better than her husband, who would use his wealth to cover up how little he knew about whichever girl he was targeting at that specific time.

And, just as that difference implied, Lan Wangji's attention was focused entirely on Wei Wuxian. The refusal to take any of the offerings was immediately noticed.

"Do you not like any of them?" Lan Wangji asked, deflating at once. "Would you prefer joss paper?"

"Oh dear," Jiang Yanli gasped out breathlessly, turning away to burry her head in her fiance's simulated body.

"A-Li?" Jin Zixuan asked.

Trembling slightly, Jiang Yanli struggled to answer, "I — they're just… so cute."

(If Lan Wangji just looked straight forward and refused to acknowledge the comment, then it would be as if it didn't exist at all — or so he told himself.)

Determination rising, Lan Wangji grabbed onto Wei Wuxian's arm again, continuing to drag him towards the inn. Wei Wuxian laughed at the act, but tried to stop him nonetheless:

“I’m serious, Lan Zhan. If the kids see us like this-” he twisted his wrist, breaking the grip and dancing around to the other side of Lan Wangji with a wink. “Your reputation will be ruined!”

Hanguang-jun reached out to grab again.

So Wei Wuxian twirled away.

The watchers jolted at once, feeling a sudden jump in energy. This wasn’t a command being sent out to spirits, but rather to resentment itself. The energy pooled under the simulated Wei Wuxian’s feet.

A half-second later, he had leapt 20 meters into the air, practically flying over the inn’s roof.

Hanguang-jun followed shortly after.

The pair raced across the slanted roof, the former only stopping when Lan Wangji managed to slip far enough in front to use Bichen as a blockade. Unable to help himself, Wei Wuxian grinned again.

“Ha. Look,” he said, tilting his head teasingly to the side. “Doesn’t this remind you of our days studying in the Cloud Recesses?”

Their fights across the roof over the fate of a jar of Emperor’s Smile. That was a much nicer memory than the one from before.

Lan Xichen smiled, and noticed that Wangji’s attempts at remaining unaffected by what he saw were proving futile. That was no surprise; the second jade had been ready for embarrassment, not this.

A small, soft smile momentarily slipped past Lan Wangji’s defenses and was now lighting his face up in a warm glow.

“Back then, I would have been holding a jar of Emperor’s Smile,” Wei Wuxian recalled. “And you would be trying to capture and punish me-”

Before he had fully finished that last sentence, he noticed Lan Wangji shifting to attack. With another laugh, Wei Wuxian twisted around the other’s motion, twirling behind Lan Wangji in a way that made his robes flare out on all sides. He tapped Hanguang-jun’s back with a grin, then quickly had to flee Lan Wangji’s response.

As the second jade’s hand reached out to grab onto Wei Wuxian, there was a sudden change in the simulation. Images layered on top of each other into something new, and, in a single smooth transition, the world shifted.

They were in the Cloud Recesses. Wei Wuxian stood in his original body, dodging Lan Wangji through the rain.

'To Gusu?' Wei Wuxian had asked.

And then:

'Who do you think you are?! I'm not afraid of you or the Gusu Lan Clan!'

Everything had been ruined. The stress of the war — Wei Wuxian's ~~justified~~ fear that his demonic cultivation would turn the world against him — had torn them apart.

And after that-

'It was like being stuck in an unending nightmare.'

And after that, Wei Wuxian had died.

But now….

The past Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji molded back into their twenty-years-later versions, laughter in the air and a notable smile on Hanguang-jun's lips (a far cry from the annoyance that had been on his past self's). They sprinted along the rooftops and frolicked about, so light-footed it seemed as though they were barely touching the ground.

'Fairies Dancing in the Wind,' Nie Huaisang thought, inspiration for a painting surging within him. 'No, no; Wind Spirits Under the Moon would be a better name. No, wait-'

New ideas continued to overwhelm Huaisang, but, in the simulation, one thing remained constant: Wei Wuxian had been brought back to life, and now he and Lan Wangji were refusing to let this second chance go to waste.

"Woah," Wei Wuxian called out, just barely dodging another one of Lan Wangji's attempts to grab him. Their duel had taken them across the rooftops of five different buildings, and yet they continued to dance around each other without showing even the slightest traces of exhaustion. Wei Ying ducked under Lan Wangji's arm, slipping behind the other man with a teasing spin. By the time Lan Wangji had turned to face him, Wei Wuxian had already jumped off the roof, flipping over mid-air and landing on the opposite side.

Lan Wangji followed soon after.

By now, even the watchers who hadn't known Lan Wangji before the simulation could read the expression on his face. It would be hard not to, given their context of what was being shown.

It made Jiang Cheng feel sick.

'What do they think they're doing?' he wondered. 'Are they seriously just-I mean, I would have expected better of the Lan Clan's second jade. Madam Jin was right: they're like birds in a mating dance. Animals, who just-'

(Animals, who were playing around with each other happily. As equals in skill. As he and Wei Wuxian had never managed to be.)

'I won't be like my other self,' he thought. 'I'm not going to torture Wei Wuxian — I would never. I'm not-ever. But… if I can't give him something like this then….'

Was he going to leave, no matter what Jiang Cheng did? Was he really going to abandon the people who had raised him — who took him in, when no one else would? Was he really going to go?

~~Would it be because the future's Sect Leader Jiang had gained a new hobby of torturing people on the off-chance that they might be Wei Wuxian, or was that just one drop in an ocean of reasons?~~

With a tricky bit of maneuvering, Wei Wuxian blocked Lan Wangji's attack and slipped out of his grip once again. He landed solidly on another roof, waiting for his airborne partner to land as well.

In a flutter of white silk, the second jade joined him. They made eye contact for a moment, then both turned to look over the garden below. As if coming to some sort of conclusion from that, the drunk Lan Wangji reached inside his robes once again.

"Huh? More?" Wei Wuxian laughed, disbelieving and delighted all at once.

Jiang Yanli squealed.

And several others joined her when Hanguang-jun pulled out a jar of wine, saved within a qiankun pouch some time earlier. Wei Wuxian's eyes widened, and even louder laughter followed soon after.

That sound had played on repeat for quite some time that night. The volume didn't quite suit the tranquility of the otherwise-peaceful night, but Lan Wangji found that he didn't really mind.

In fact, he really wasn't opposed at all.

"Ah, Lan Zhan," Wei Wuxian said at last. "You're amazing when you're drunk."

(And just like that, Lan Wangji's earlier promise to never drink received its strongest opposition yet.)

The simulated Hanguang-jun tilted his head, confused by Wei Wuxian's reaction. Nonetheless, Wei Wuxian walked forward and took the jar from him, tearing the cloth covering off with his mouth as he sat down.

'Ah, I've got it! I'll call it A Jar of True Love… no, that sounds stupid,' Nie Huaisang sighed, frustrated at his own lack of progress. 'If only I was as good at coming up with names as Wei-xiong is.'

Oh, well. He would think of something.

There was a slight movement from the side, and Wei Wuxian's eyes were drawn to it instantly.

As were Wen Ruohan's. He turned to face the source of the motion, narrowing his eyes at the shadowy figure. It was too far to see clearly, but the way the man was watching them was obvious nonetheless.

Wei Wuxian thought for a bit, then looked over his shoulder at Hanguang-jun.

"Lan Zhan, when we settle matters here, I'll go back to Gusu with you, all right?" he asked.

And Jiang Cheng couldn't quite contain the flinch those words caused in him.

Gleeful, Wei Wuxian took a big gulp of the alcohol, savoring the taste, then held the jar out for Lan Wangji to take back.

"Trust me," he said.

'I will. I do,' the younger Lan Wangji thought, only to flush deeper in embarrassment at how quickly he had responded.

In his own answer, the older Lan Wangji took the offered jar and brought it up to his mouth. Wind swept by, sending his hair flying gracefully as he drank from the same jar as Wei Wuxian had.

And for once, not even Lan Qiren had any complaints.

'They're not in the Cloud Recesses. I… suppose it's fine,' he thought. 'It's certainly greatly preferable to what happened when Wei Wuxian first returned from the Burial Mounds.'

Yes, if those were his only options, then he would pick this any day.

"Now then," Wei Wuxian's smile faded away, and he reached a hand out, two fingers raised. "*I su*mmo*n t*he *spi*r*its of t*he *dea*d."

The watchers jolted as the surrounding resentment snapped to attention, rising up at once on Wei Wuxian's command. Truly, their sensitivity to resentment had just grown and grown with each segment that passed.

(Wen Qing hoped it wouldn't pose a problem for them after the simulation was over.)

Following the shockwave of resentment that had bursted out from the ground near Wei Wuxian, green light began to whisp up and take form. An old man; a young girl; the spirits of those who had died full of resentment nearby.

However, a moment later, the energy fizzled out.

An uncomfortable flip jolted in Lan Qiren's stomach at that forceful dispellment. It made him feel like he was a sack full of sand that had been flipped upside-down, allowing all of its contents to pour out. For a moment, he almost thought his own insides had been sucked out of his body, falling into a pile on the floor.

Something was preventing resentment from taking form.

(And since when had that ever felt like a bad thing?)

“Huh. Even that wasn’t enough to summon them?” Wei Wuxian wondered. Frown deepening, Lan Wangji turned and leapt to the roof of a nearby building, an additional ten meters higher than before.

“An array,” he observed.

Hearing that, Wen Ruohan frowned. How had he never heard of an array that would keep resentment from forming? Given that cultivators were still in business in the future, he was sure the conditions required meant the array could only work for a short time, but still. Surely, in his research, he would have heard about something like-

“As expected,” Wei Wuxian smirked. “This array was also taken from my manuel on demonic cultivation.”

A brief silence passed.

“...Is he serious?” Jin Zixuan asked, somewhat unable to believe this was yet another thing Wei Wuxian had created. “Spirit attraction flags, compass of evil, demonic cultivation in general, and now-”

“That is so unfair!” Nie Huaisang whined. “Why did he get all the intelligence of our generation! Hoarder! Thief!”

“This may be why the culprit behind the cat corpses tried leading us to Yi City,” Wei Wuxian speculated, proving Nie Huaisang’s point further. If someone led the juniors specifically to Yi City, then it would need to be someone who knew why that city was important.

Someone with knowledge of its connection to demonic cultivation.

The techniques the nearby spy had trained in were notably different than that of the grave robber’s goons. This was most likely an additional group, who probably had a different goal than the grave robber did (especially given that they had led the juniors to another piece of the corpse). Unless it was an organization Wei Wuxian hadn’t encountered yet, this person being involved with the cat corpse’s perpetrator was the most likely outcome.

Which meant-

The person hiding in the shadows vanished, retreating now that his targets had realized they were being watched. The Yiling Patriarch smirked.

“The array may be complicated, but, with the right derivation, one can still find its crux. Lan Zhan, do you have a piece of paper?”

Hanguang-jun stared back blankly. After several seconds, he tilted his head in confusion.

As Lan Xichen joined Jiang Yanli in cooing at the scene, the real Lan Wangji had to remind himself of his earlier plan several times to remain calm.

He was a disciple of Gusu Lan. He could remain composed. It didn't matter that his own brother had turned traitor and abandoned him; he could get through this.

On the complete opposite end of the spectrum, the simulated Lan Wangji quite clearly had no idea what was going on, and was perfectly happy to just stand still, further embarrassing his younger self.

Wei Wuxian sighed.

Then, without an ounce of hesitation, Wei Wuxian grabbed onto Lan Wangji's sleeve and slipped his own hand inside. Feeling around for what he was looking for.

'Oh, my. Molestation already?' Jin Guangshan wondered. 'Well, that was certainly a good excuse Wei Wuxian found. I couldn't have come up with something better myself. And I can't blame him either. Hanguang-jun usually isn't my type, but this defenseless version is much more attractive than I would have expected. Really, both of them together are just… perfect.'

Those last few words weren't too different from the thoughts his wife had at that same scene. However, as you switched from one to the other, the feeling conveyed by that sentence changed completely.

(For a reason he couldn't quite describe, the real Lan Wangji felt a sudden chill run down his back.)

Soon enough, Wei Wuxian found what he had been looking for. He pulled out the paper and brush, sitting down on the roof to get to work. Meanwhile, the drunk Lan Wangji stared blankly at the moon.

For a brief moment, Nie Huaisang's curiosity overwhelmed him and he leaned over Wei Wuxian's shoulder to take a peak at the writing. He regretted it instantly.

Squiggles and symbols and equations were being transcribed onto the paper at record speed. It undoubtedly meant something to Wei Wuxian, but the level of talisman knowledge needed to decipher it was not something Nie Huaisang possessed.

'I thought being in the simulation meant I could escape homework for a while! I better not let Da-ge see this, or he'll ask Wei-xiong to tutor me when this is all over!'

Nie Huaisang would do anything to avoid that.

"All done," Wei Wuxian declared at last. Before him, two and a half dozen pieces of paper covered in writing laid still, the work spread out for Wei Wuxian to see. At that moment, however, an enormous gust of wind swept by, scattering the papers at once. In the cover caused by the wildly spinning mess, someone made their attack.

A quintet of small blades shot through the air, approaching Wei Wuxian. A second after they were thrown, they instead smashed into a clay pot; Lan Wangji had thrown the jar of alcohol in the way. The remaining attacks were swiftly knocked to the side by Bichen, which was held firmly in Lan Wangji's hand. Apparently, being drunk was far from enough to reduce Lan Wangji's skill.

"You are really just… the weirdest drunk ever," Jin Zixuan commented.

Then, from the dark, two figures emerged, flinging another half dozen knives towards the pair.

Lan Wangji knocked them away easily, however the last one wasn't a knife at all. Rather, it was a gray orb the size of a walnut, which, upon coming into contact with Bichen, sparked briefly.

Then exploded.

Jiang Yanli yelped, jumping back, and Jin Zixuan unconsciously tensed before her.

However, both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had reaction speeds that were more than capable of avoiding the explosion, and they landed steadily on the grass below. When they looked up, they saw one of the perpetrators carrying the abandoned papers Wei Wuxian had been working on, smirking as he vanished into the darkness.

"Damn it!" Jiang Cheng cursed. "Ah, Wei Wuxian, you idiot. Why do that all outside?! If you hadn't been fooling around with Lan-er-gongzi you-"

He cut off, realizing that no one in present company would approve of the words he had been about to say.

"Oh my, he sure got away fast," Wei Wuxian observed, the picture of casualness. "He stole something of mine. Aren't you going to go after him?"

"It was an act. I will not go after him."

Several people stared blankly, and Jiang Cheng scowled: "...What?"

"Oh. Not bad, Lan Zhan," Wei Wuxian complimented. "Even like this, you could still tell I was pretending."

"...Pretending?" Jiang Yanli asked.

Wei Wuxian glanced back to where the corpse of one of their attackers laid, adding on, "These people want to use me to find the crux of the array, but the person who set up the array is also highly skilled. It'll take more than a day or two to find the crux. However… while the crux I marked was fake, this linking spell is not."

And with that, he pulled out a compass of evil, inscribing a red array of resentful energy on top.

“I suppose this is what they call ‘casting a long line to lure in a big catch,’” the Yiling Patriarch smirked.

For some strange reason, Nie Huaisang felt a little uneasy at that.

At a distant grotto near a river, a man sat elegantly on an expensive chair, a servant standing to his left. On the table before him was a set of tea, as well as the papers he had apparently stolen from Wei Wuxian. Unfortunately for the watchers, his face and clothes were obscured in shadow.

“That… can’t be natural,” Wen Ruohan said. “There’s nothing blocking the light there.”

“What? You think the spirits who created the simulation are intentionally disguising his identity?” Madam Yu asked, looking disgusted by the very thought. “What would be the point of that?”

After thinking for a moment, Lan Qiren commented, “They do seem to enjoy keeping secrets from us.”

“Isn’t the whole point of this simulation to teach us?” Madam Jin asked. “Keeping secrets seems illogical.”

Humming lightly, Wen Qing pointed out, “And yet, the impact of learning why Wei Wuxian did demonic cultivation was much stronger than it might have been if we hadn’t already accused him of so many things.”

No one had an argument against that.

As the unknown man set his tea cup down, the watchers were brought back to Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji. Footsteps pounded against the ground, and they raced through the trees at breakneck speeds.

Lan Wangji’s eyes widened slightly at the skill his future self and Wei Wuxian displayed. He watched carefully, committing their movement patterns to memory.

With an enormous jump, Wei Wuxian leapt high above the trees, landing with a thud on the ground next to the table. It was abandoned — recently, judging by the still-steaming cup.

“Hm, that person sure was careful,” Wei Wuxian supposed, picking his papers back up. They had been left behind, so it seemed likely that the array wasn’t a priority to the perpetrator. If it had been urgent, they would have taken the risk of bringing the pages (incorrect though they may be) to see if they could gleam anything from the data. They hadn’t, so....

'This was probably more a test for me than it was a genuine attempt to get information,' he hummed softly. ‘Does someone know I was brought back? Was this meant to be some kind of confirmation?’

“Cowardly rats,” Nie Mingjue muttered. “Hiding in the dark like that.”

He was quite confident that, if their intentions had been righteous, there would have been no need to hide from Hanguang-jun like that. His gaze darkened with anger.

“There isn’t anyone here,” Lan Wangji observed, landing beside Wei Wuxian.

“Ah, Hanguang-jun. You don’t often read these sorts of novels, so you wouldn’t know, but you can’t catch these sorts of characters that easily.”

Nie Huaisang beamed, knowing that he had personally introduced Wei Wuxian to many novels of that variety.

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian blinked a few times. “Your headband is askew!”

And, unlike the first time Wei Wuxian had said that at the archery competition, it indeed was. Lan Wangji clumsily reached up, attempting to fix it but only making it look worse in the process.

“Oh, look at you fumbling,” Wei Wuxian giggled, for what seemed to be the hundredth time that night.

(Not that Lan Wangji was complaining.)

He stepped closer, standing right before Lan Wangji and staring into his eyes. The fondness in that gaze turned even warmer than before, its intensity nearly suffocating those who witnessed it.

“Lan Zhan, are you still going to do whatever I ask?” Wei Wuxian wondered breathlessly. “Do whatever I tell you?”

‘Yes,’ a tiny voice in Lan Wangji whispered as several people around him began to squeal.

Similarly, the virtual Hanguang-jun gave a soft: “Mn.”

Wei Wuxian’s eyes flicked up and down, disbelief quickly forming into a near-frantic scanning for something he could ask for. It had to be something perfect (after all, who knew if he would ever get a chance like this again), but it couldn’t be anything too far out there either, or even the drunk Lan Wangji would refuse him. Then, his gaze shifted higher and higher, finally landing on something just above Lan Wangji’s eyes.

Lan Qiren frowned, wondering what Wei Wuxian could be looking at. The only thing up there was-

“Lan Zhan, can you… take off your forehead ribbon?”

Obediently, Hanguang-jun reached up.

And Lan Qiren coughed, choking at once.

“Uncle? Are you alright?” Lan Xichen asked, rushing close.

“He-” the usually-composed Lan gaped openly. “They — he can’t-”

But, with a firm tug, Hanguang-jun finally allowed the ribbon to fall from his head.

“Well, it’s not… the end of the world?” Jin Zixuan pointed out, trying (and failing) to help. “I mean no disrespect, but… it’s just a forehead ribbon.”

Jiang Cheng nodded in agreement.

(On the other hand, Nie Huaisang, the only foreign junior to have already spent a year at the cloud recesses, knew exactly what the ribbon meant, and chuckled deviously.)

The low laughter coming from the Nie heir only became louder as the ribbon was deposited into Wei Wuxian’s waiting hands. Holding the ribbon carefully, Wei Wuxian turned it over a few times, examining the cloud-patterned fabric intricately. Despite his searching, he couldn’t find anything of note.

“So there really isn’t anything special about it,” Wei Wuxian wondered, his memory of the archery competition, when he had accidentally undone the ribbon, flashing into his mind. “Huh. And here I thought it would be hiding some sort of big secret. But then, back then, why did you get so mad when I took it off?”

The real Lan Wangji was incomparably grateful that neither the simulated Wei Wuxian nor the real juniors knew the reason why.

(Except for one Nie Huaisang, whose laughter had steadily grown into a maniacal, uproarious cackle as time went on.)

But then-

‘Or maybe it’s just that the past Lan Wangji simply hated me, alongside everything I did.’

Feeling as though he had been dunked into the cold spring, the flush running up Lan Wangji’s ears vanished at once. No matter how much had happened since then, the argument that had transpired between him and Wei Wuxian upon the Yiling Patriarch’s return from the Burial Mounds was not something he could forget.

It wasn’t entirely his fault — there was a near-countless number of factors in play — and yet the reminder steeled his conviction to avoid such a fate with the real Wei Wuxian even further than before.

Suddenly, a loud gasp came from before him.

While Lan Wangji had been distracted, his older self had been hard at work. With deft hands, Hanguang-jun had taken the forehead ribbon back from Wei Wuxian and-

And-

And then he’d-

“I…” the real Lan Wangji spoke softly, staring at the simulation with steadily-growing horror. “What am I-”

An equally distracted Wei Wuxian finally looked down, feeling something tighten at his wrists.

Lan Wangji’s forehead ribbon had been used to bind Wei Wuxian’s hands together, and layers upon layers of knots kept it pulled tight.

A beat passed.

“WHAT?!” a loud screech echoed through the chamber, the high pitch resembling a pained ghost’s wail. Every eye turned toward the source of that sounds, and the watchers were only somewhat surprised to identify it as Lan Qiren. The man looked almost as distraught as he had been during the burning of the Cloud Recesses.

(And even his distress had nothing on the real Lan Wangji’s.)

“...What are you doing?” Wei Wuxian asked, finally realizing what was going on.

In response, Lan Wangji stared down assessingly at the ties he had made, before adding yet another knot to the pile.

“I… this is… this is-”

“Uncle, are you-”

“No. No. No. No. No. No-no-no-no-”

“Uncle,” Lan Xichen tried again, fully aware that his brother was in no place to offer help of his own.

“We are not watching this,” Lan Qiren declared, turning around. “I am happy for you, Wangji. I truly am. But I will not — I won’t-”

Once seven or eight knots had been tied, Wei Wuxian finally spoke up: “Hey, do you still want this ribbon of yours?”

As though in affirmative, Lan Wangji grabbed the other end of the ribbon, lifting it up and forcing Wei Wuxian’s hands above his head.

Several loud shouts broke out through the silence, and Jiang Cheng reared back in disgust:

“What are you doing?!” he demanded, practically spitting the words out. By this point, even he had no idea if he was directing the question towards the real Lan Wangji or rhetorically at the simulated Hanguang-jun, but he didn’t care. Jiang Cheng turned around, unable to face the scenario before him-

But, unconcerned, Hanguang-jun continued to hold the entwined hands in front of his own face, admiring the masterpiece he had created.

Putting aside how little Lan Qiren personally enjoyed watching intimacy, this was his nephew. Though he may not have Xichen's understanding of Wangji, he could tell perfectly well how proud those eyes were.

'If I let this keep going, we might have to watch… I can't do that do Wangji,' Lan Qiren thought, forcing himself to calm down and quickly noticing the growing distress in his nephew's reddening ears. 'I…. This, more than anything, belongs to just him.'

Hands suspended in air, Wei Wuxian thought to himself, 'Wow, I probably look a lot like a criminal right now…. Wait, why do I have to play along with him? Wasn't I supposed to be the one playing him?'

He looked back at Lan Wangji, his confusion increasing.

"Take it off," he finally said.

"Oh, they're going to stop," Lan Qiren breathed out a relieved sigh, smiling slightly when he saw his younger nephew relax as well. "I'm glad that-"

Except Lan Wangji's hands weren't undoing the knots.

They were removing Wei Wuxian's robes-

"Don't remove that!" Wei Wuxian protest at once, laughing at the ridiculousness of the situation and stepping back.

Watching that, Jin Guangshan smirked, mentally adding, 'It is always more fun when they try running away. Quite the catch you've found, Hanguang-jun.'

His gaze dropped down to the bound wrists, and the smirk on his face deepened.

'Not bad at all.'

Back in the outside world, the real Wei Wuxian felt a sudden, unexplainable shiver run up his spine.

And a very similar one went down Lan Qiren's. He, however, knew exactly why he felt what he did. In the years he had spent leading a sect at the same time as Jin Guangshan was, he had gotten to know the other man reasonably well. They had a fairly amicable relationship — their sects could work together just fine — but he was not ignorant to the hobbies Jin Guangshan had on the side.

(Nor was he ignorant to the various comments the man had made about Wei Wuxian and Lan Qiren's own nephew since the simulation had begun.)

He frowned: "Jin-xiong, you-"

“Remove this!” Wei Wuxian protested. “Take off this thing on my hands! Take it off! The thing you’re tying me with — the ribbon!”

Lan Wangji frowned at the request.

“You said that you’d listen to me, didn’t you? Be a good boy and take it off.”

‘Calling him a ‘good boy’ again?’ Madam Jin thought, slowly beginning to grin. ‘You seem to be enjoying this more than you’re pretending to, young man.’

As if agreeing, Lan Wangji just stared blankly. He turned his gaze away, as though puzzled by Wei Wuxian’s words and needing to ponder them for a while longer.

“Oh, I see now! You were in such high spirits when you tied me up, but suddenly you don’t understand when I want to be untied, huh?!”

“Ah… I never expected this from Hanguang-jun,” Jiang Yanli commented, sharing a soft laugh with Jin Zixuan. Upon hearing that, the real Lan Wangji just wilted further. His posture was still as straight as ever, but Lan Xichen felt as though he could see years of Lan Wangji’s lifespan vanishing before his eyes.

‘Sorry, Wangji, but… you are very cute.’

“The Lan Sect’s forehead ribbon was made from the same material as its uniform,” Lan Sizhui revealed. “Although it looked flimsy, it was actually quite sturdy. As Hanguang-jun had… as Hanguang-jun had… as, um-”

“What’s wrong Sizhui?” Lan Jingyi asked. “I don’t think I’ve ever seen you stutter over the words before.”

Faced with the realization that even Lan Sizhui couldn’t maintain his dignity in the face of what had happened, Lan Wangji began seriously considering joining his uncle in a state of cardiac arrest. It wouldn’t be entirely fair to make his brother take care of both of them, but, as Lan Xichen was a traitor to their family, Lan Wangji was starting to consider that an acceptable punishment.

Clearing his throat, Lan Sizhui forced out, “As Hanguang-jun had wrapped it tightly around and had tied a long strand of knots, Senior Wei couldn’t struggle out of it no matter how… no matter how hard he tried.”

“Nice one, Hanguang-jun,” Lan Jingyi cheered, and, judging from the sounds they heard, he and Ouyang Zizhen high-fived (easily ignoring a groaning Jin Ling).

‘Ah, I really did shoot myself in the foot, didn’t I?’ Wei Wuxian thought to himself, trying to escape as Hanguang-jun began bringing him back to the inn. ‘Good thing it’s just a forehead ribbon and not some weird magical rope, or else he would have really tied me up.’

“Weird magical…” Lan Qiren coughed out, heaving under the strain. “...Weird magical rope? Wei Wuxian, what ideas do you have in your head?! My nephew wouldn’t… he wouldn’t….”

Except he that clearly wasn't quite true.

As Lan Wangji traveled back to the inn, he stared into the distance, swinging the ends of the ribbon around contently. Struggling again and still failing to free himself, Wei Wuxian returned to his attempts to negotiate:

"Can you please take it off? Hanguang-jun, how can someone as graceful as you do something like this? What's the point in tying me up? It's going to reflect poorly on you if someone sees us like this, right?"

"Yes!" Lan Qiren agreed at once. "The simulation is supposed to activate the concealment zone when we say we want to stop watching, right? Well then, I-"

"Uncle, stop!" Lan Xichen shouted at once, cutting his uncle off in a very un-Lan-like manner. "We have no idea how much we'll miss if we activate the concealment zone now. We need to be here for Wangji-"

"Yeah!" Nie Huaisang added on. "And if you do that, we won't be able to watch the romance happen!"

Nie Mingjue sighed, sending the frozen Lan Wangji an apologetic look.

Unfortunately for the real Lan Wangji, despite Wei Wuxian's continuous protests and arguments, the future's Hanguang-jun made no move to stop in his journey back to the inn. Rather, at the words 'if someone sees us like this,' he almost seemed to become even more determined to get back.

'Stay calm,' Lan Wangji told himself. 'Be dignified. It will only be embarrassing if I allow it to be. I just need to stay calm and outlast this, and everyone will forget about it soon enough. And-'

With an abrupt jerk, Wei Wuxian was pulled forward even faster. He protested immediately:

"W-wait a sec! I said it would be bad if someone sees this, not that you should let them see it! Hey! You're just pretending to not understand me, aren't you? Are you doing this on purpose? So, you're only going to hear me when I say what you want to hear, huh? Lan Zhan! Lan Wangji!"

'It's only embarrassing if you let it be. It's only embarrassing if you let it be. It's only embarrassing if you let it be. It's only-'

Inside a dimly-lit building, a jar of alcohol fell to the floor, pouring out rapidly.

"This is more like it," Lan Jingyi's voice declared. "All of us just made it out from Yi City. We've shared a life and death experience! We shouldn't be arguing."

Silently, more morose than ever before, Lan Qiren wondered, 'How could I have possibly predicted that a day would come in which I was grateful the leaders of the sects were being shown a Lan disciple getting drunk?'

The simulation was responsible for a previously-untold number of impossibilities, wasn't it?

"Ah," Jingyi grinned, radiating satisfaction. "Come on! Drink up!"

Seeing the bright flush on Lan Jingyi's cheeks, Jin Ling scoffed: "Your alcohol tolerance is terrible."

A moment later, however, he hiccuped, his cheeks also turning red.

"You too?" Jiang Cheng whined, unable to believe his nephew.

Rolling his eyes, Nie Mingjue commented, "Considering what you and Wei Wuxian got up to in the Cloud Recesses with Huaisang, I don't think you have any room to talk, young master."

Jiang Cheng flushed.

Leaning close, Lan Xichen whispered, "Come now, Da-ge. The two of us don't have much room to talk either, now do we?"

"Xichen! You promised you wouldn't bring that up ever again! Besides, we were better than this!"

"Not that much better," the first jade responded, smiling tranquilly.

"Zizhen!" Jin Ling called out next, glaring at the person before him. "Come on! Let's keep drinking!"

"Zizhen is over there," Lan Sizhui responded, gesturing to behind Jin Ling. "I'm Lan Sizhui."

"Huh?" Jin Ling asked, narrowing his eyes to get a good look at the person before him.

"At least one of them is sober," Lan Qiren sighed, and saw Wen Ruohan nod in agreement.

"Perhaps he somehow managed to skip this part of the Lan gene," the Chief Cultivator commented. Though it was more likely that someone as responsible as Sizhui had simply decided to not drink at all.

Behind them, Lan Wangji found his ears finally returning to their normal color thanks to the lack of focus on his future self. If this continued, it might be possible for him to get through the segment without being overwhelmed by embarrassment.

He relaxed slightly, confident in his ability to succeed.

"Oh, Lan Sizhui," Jin Ling realized, recognizing the person before him at long-last. "That annoying guy who's a stickler for the rules."

"Rules? What rules!" Lan Jingyi shouted. "Sizhui, why don't you drink a little too? It's not like the seniors can see us from the second floor!"

“Oh, no. He’s jinxed it!” Nie Huaisang hissed.

“...I don’t think that’s a good idea,” Sizhui calmly refused. And then, just as he was about to say more, voices came from outside:

“So you are just pretending to not understand!” Wei Wuxian declared, his voice becoming somewhat-frantic. “Lan Zhan! Listen to me!”

And just like that, he was dragged inside for all of the juniors to see.

‘It. Is. Only. Embarrassing. If. You. Let. It. Be.’

Nearly choking on the bun in his mouth, Lan Jingyi rushed to throw himself over the food and alcohol, hiding the latter from his elders. Meanwhile, every other junior stood frozen, staring in shock at what was before them.

“H-hanguang-jun!” Sizhui stood up at once, hoping to distract from the very-obvious attempt at hiding alcohol Lan Jingyi was doing. “Why did you come through the entrance again? I… thought you were upstairs?”

Smiling bashfully, Wei Wuxian explained, “Haha. Your Hanguang-jun was feeling a bit too hot and decided to take a stroll outside so that he could catch all of you off guard. You see? Here you are, drinking when you’re not supposed to.”

Now, normally, Lan Qiren would be fuming at the audacity Wei Wuxian had to say that when he had done exactly the same at their age. Normally, he would need to be talked down by his nephews so that the simulation could continue.

Now, however, the sight of Lan Wangji’s forehead ribbon still tied around Wei Wuxian’s wrists had shorted out his mind past the point of no return. Even if he wanted to ignore what Lan Xichen had said and activate the concealment zone, he simply no longer had the mental capacity to do so.

The famed Lan-xiansheng was, for now, gone.

‘Lan Zhan, please just drag me upstairs,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘If we go now, maybe the juniors won’t notice.’

The real Lan Wangji nodded frantically.

“Well, we should just — ah!” Wei Wuxian yelped as he was suddenly dragged forward. Hanguang-jun had lifted up the ribbon, proudly displaying the bound Wei Wuxian for the juniors to see.

Jin Guangshan hummed in appreciation.

Meanwhile, Lan Sizhui gaped.

“H-Hanguang-jun! Your forehead ribbon!”

Lan Wangji held his arm even further out, and the ribbon binding Wei Wuxian's wrists together was presented for all to see.

Suddenly, the world tipped over. When Lan Qiren opened his eyes, he noticed that he was on the ground, staring up at the bleached-white roof of the simulation.

"Uncle?!" Lan Xichen called out.

The piece of chicken Ouyang Zizhen had picked up fell into the pot below. Every junior was staring at the pair of their seniors with gaping mouths, and the horror in the Lans' gazes was obviously apparent.

"I am so glad I'm not you right now," Jin Zixuan muttered, directing the comment at the real Lan Wangji. Despite what he expected, he didn't even get an annoyed glare back.

(The second jade had far more important things to worry about. The complete and utter destruction of his reputation, for example. As well as the fact that his older-self was apparently an incorrigible beast!)

'Ah, after Lan Zhan sobers up, he won't have the face to look at others ever again!' Wei Wuxian thought.

Judging by the deep, deep, red spreading across his face, the real Lan Wangji was already there.

Finally:

"...What is he doing?" Jin Ling wondered.

Clearing his throat, Wei Wuxian forced a grin and answered, "Showing you guys a special way to use your forehead ribbons!"

"A-a special way?" Lan Sizhui asked.

"Yup! When you find a really strange corpse and you feel that you need to take it back and examine it properly, you can take off your forehead ribbon and bring it back like this!"

Even in a situation like this, Wei Wuxian could lie without flinching. Unfortunately, not even he was able to excuse something like this in a natural way.

"What a disaster," Madam Yu muttered, unable to believe what she was watching.

"I-you can't do that!" Lan Jingyi protested. "Our forehead ribbons are-"

Lan Sizhui stuffed a chicken wing into his mouth, speedily interrupting, "Oh, I see! I had no idea it could be used in such a way! Thank you for your guidance, seniors!"

"Y-yes," Wei Wuxian laughed, only to cut off suddenly as Lan Wangji continued pulling him away.

As Jiang Yanli giggled at that, Jin Zixuan wondered "Wait, what had he been about to say?"

Lan Xichen coughed awkwardly, beginning, "To be honest-"

"Nothing," Lan Wangji insisted, forcing his mind to focus on the conversation around him so that he could stop his evil, evil older brother from saying too much. "Nothing… important."

Lan Qiren had thought he had been grateful for Lan Sizhui's presence before, but that was nothing in comparison to how he felt now. By this point, he would probably forgive just about anything Lan Sizhui could possibly do.

(The boy was certainly much better than Xichen! Although Lan Qiren appreciated his older nephew rushing to his side when he collapsed, that was nowhere near enough to redeem the way Xichen had somehow turned into a mischievous, teasing demon while Lan Qiren was looking away.)

If only he had activated the Concealment Zone-

Though it wasn't like he didn't understand why Lan Xichen had stopped that.

"Hey! Wait a minute!" Wei Wuxian protested as Lan Wangji pulled him up the stairs.

Jin Guangshan chuckled lightly.

And Lan Qiren's frown deeped. Yes, it was easy to understand why Xichen had stopped him from activating the concealment zone.

(The command they had already given the Concealment Zone had somehow missed this scene. They could activate it again, but Lan Qiren, Lan Xichen, and Nie Mingjue all knew they would rather embarrass Lan Wangji by having everyone watch than allow him to be stuck with just Jin Guangshan.)

Once they reached the top, Lan Wangji entered their room, turned around, and closed the doors. After some thought, he also pushed over a nearby table, blocking the exit. Both he and Wei Wuxian were now trapped inside.

On one hand, Lan Wangji was grateful for the increased privacy. On the other….

'What are you doing? How have I become such a vicious beast?! What went wrong? Why did I deviate from the rules so completely? No matter how nice it was to drink alcohol with Wei Ying… how… I don't-'

What on earth was his other-self planning?

After waiting for a moment, Wei Wuxian glanced over at the now-sealed exit and asked, "What? Are you gonna kill me here?"

Some of Jiang Cheng honestly wished that was the case. What sort of disgusting, deviant, unspeakable things could Lan Wangji be planning? He and Wei Wuxian had been looking at each other in that revolting way for the better part of an hour, and things just kept getting worse over time. If he was going to try to make a move, maybe killing Wei Wuxian would indeed be the better-

‘Really? Who killed him?’

‘Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, leader of the Jiang Clan.’

Jiang Cheng froze, his thoughts beginning to race.

‘It’s… probably not true,’ Jiang Cheng told himself. ‘It was just a rumor. Wei Wuxian never said anything to that effect. It’s probably-’

He paused.

It was probably not true.

But-

Within the room, there was a large paper screen, which separated the inside of the room into two halves. One half had a table and chairs for eating and chatting, while the other had a long bed. They were high quality for an inn, without being overly-extravagant or gaudy. However, Hanguang-jun was not one to get distracted by such things. Walking with determination, Lan Wangji dragged Wei Wuxian to the other side of the screen, then pushed him down, forcing him onto the bed.

And Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but recoil back at that. He spun at once, gritting his teeth and glaring at the real second jade with an unparalleled level of disgust.

“You-”

“A-Cheng,” he heard a voice whisper softly from his right. Freezing at once, he turned to face the source, and saw Jiang Yanli smiling softly at him.

"I… A-Jie, it-”

“A-Cheng, look at A-Xian,” she instructed. “He’s fine. If he really wanted to escape, he could. You don’t need to worry.”

“I’m not worried, I-”

He paused, looking back at the simulated Wei Wuxian once more.

“I-”

Although Wei Wuxian had given a quick ‘ow’ when his head knocked against the wood, he had recovered easily. Sitting back up, he gazed at Lan Wangji calmly, tilting his head in confusion.

'What? Is he trying to make me sleep already?' Wei Wuxian wondered. 'It's not even nine yet.'

Having heard the earlier exclamation of pain, Lan Wangji lifted the hems of his robes and sat down on the bed next to him, reaching out to feel Wei Wuxian's head. Although he remained expressionless, the care and gentleness in his motion was obvious to everyone who could see it.

"Did it hurt?" he asked.

Lan Wangji's hand felt around, and Wei Wuxian's lips twitched:

"It hurts!" he complained. "It hurts so much!"

'Where did it come from?' Lan Wangji asked, staring at the curse mark on Wei Wuxian's leg.

'It just… kind of randomly… I don't know how… it just came on its own.'

And then, with the Zidian scar:

'You met Jiang Wanyin,' Lan Wangji inferred.

Wei Wuxian shrugged carelessly.

And before that, all the way back in the Cloud Recesses, when Wei Wuxian had been the only one to get punished for bringing all of them alcohol:

'It's fine, it's fine,' Jiang Cheng said, not wanting Lan Xichen to ask any more questions. 'It's not that serious. He can walk! Right, Wei Wuxian?'

But now….

'Did it hurt?'

"It hurts so much," Wei Wuxian repeated. In response to the Yiling Patriarch's cries of pain, Lan Wangji's hand became even gentler as he patted Wei Wuxian's shoulder, the gesture an attempt to comfort.

"He's fine, okay?" Jiang Yanli told Jiang Cheng once more. And she was right, undoubtedly. And it was the fact that Wei Wuxian was admitting the pain that proved it.

But they were being embarrassing and dishonorable and humiliating and a shame on their families — they were acting like cut sleeves and-

But, as Wei Wuxian continued to whine, Lan Wangji continued to comfort him. Slowly, a smile formed on Wei Wuxian's face.

A smile which once again took Jiang Cheng completely by surprise. He fell silent once more, staring at the ground in quiet contemplation.

After some time, Wei Wuxian again raised his wrists for the other to see:

“Why don’t you let me go? Hanguang-jun, it’s so tight that my hands are almost bleeding. It hurts so much! Take off the ribbon and let me go, okay? Okay?”

Lan Wangji instead covered Wei Wuxian’s mouth.

Nie Huaisang snorted.

“Ah, Wangji-xiong, you’ve come so far!” he laughed. “Back at the beginning you could never tell when Wei Wuxian was being serious, but now… this is just-”

“So cute!” Lan Xichen cooed.

“Xiongzhang,” Lan Wangji complained, the whine still heard despite the evenness of his voice.

“Mmm! Mm nm mmmmfffmm,” Wei Wuxian said in an attempt to voice his complaints. “Mmmmnnnmmmmffff mmm!”

‘So you pretend to not understand when I ask you to do something you don’t want to do, and if you can’t pretend you’re just going to not let me say it?!’

“Seems that way,” Madam Jin commented, making Nie Huaisang squeal. The watching Nie Mingjue sighed at his brother’s enthusiasm, but couldn’t quite stop a smile from forming on his face as well.

‘How evil!’ Wei Wuxian huffed. ‘Now that you’ve gone this far, you can’t blame me for doing this!’

Abruptly, the simulation’s energy shifted. With their ever-growing sensitivity to resentful energy, the watchers could feel a shift in the process being used. At that moment, Lan Wangji’s hand (which was still firmly planted on Wei Wuxian’s mouth), mysteriously became transparent.

Wen Ruohan frowned, “What is-”

Then, from behind the now-clear hand, the watchers watched as Wei Wuxian grinned, smirked, then opened up his mouth and licked the hand in front of him.

Lan Wangji stood up at once, knocking his chair onto the ground with the force of the moment. He could distantly hear his brother calling out to him, but the ringing in his ears was so loud that it muffled all else.

‘Wei Ying, you… I don’t… what*?!*’

Similarly, the simulated Lan Wangji jumped back, his hand opaque again. Wei Wuxian’s attack had only been the dip of a dragonfly, barely noticeable at all, and yet Lan Wangji looked at his palm as if it had been singed by a flame. He spun around, turning away from Wei Wuxian to clutch his hand against his chest tightly enough to feel his own, beating heart.

‘Those… those embarrassing, disgusting-’ Jiang Cheng cut his thoughts off, breathing heavily as he did. What was he supposed to think, if not that? He didn't ask to be shown any of this! But if he asked the Concealment Zone to block him specifically off, then everyone would have questions.

But he couldn’t just watch as Wei Wuxian-

He spun around, not caring whether he was copying the simulated Hanguang-jun, and began to stare quite intently at the wall before him.

“What’s this?” Wei Wuxian asked, slipping closer. “What are you doing over here?”

As Wei Wuxian scooted closer on the bed towards Lan Wangji and leaned in (a teasing grin prominent on his face), Jin Guangshan couldn’t help but think, ‘Really, that boy is such a… vixen*, sometimes. I wish I could show this to A-Yin and A-Wu. They could take a few notes.*’

For some reason he couldn’t quite identify, Jin Zixuan suddenly felt a wave of discomfort come over him. Unconsciously, he scooted a bit closer to his fiance, moving farther from his father in the process.

Laughing to himself, Wei Wuxian thought, ‘He looks like he’s given up on life, having been tainted by a pervert and such. Anyone walking upon this scene might think I’d already done something to him.’

And yet the watchers, who had been there since the beginning, knew full well that wasn’t what was happening.

“Honestly, Lan-er-gongzi,” Madam Jin sighed. “He’s finally initiating the contact. This is no time to fall back.”

In Lan Wangji’s humble opinion, this was exactly the time to fall back.

Perhaps agreeing, the simulated Lan Wangji took on an even more defeated look than before. Many of the watchers were still struggling to read the second jade’s expressions, but, with the added context of the real Lan Wangji’s reactions, they were able to piece his emotions together fairly well.

Unlike Wei Wuxian:

“You didn’t like it? Well, you can’t blame me for that,” he argued. “You were the one who was being all pushy and didn’t let me speak. Why don’t you come here, and I’ll wipe it for you?”

His bound hands reached up, and he poked Hanguang-jun’s shoulder once.

In an instant, Lan Wangji was on the opposite side of the bed, nestling into a corner with a startled expression. His ears were now glowing with rouge.

“Ah, stupid, stupid, stupid-”

Nie Huaisang's annoyed complaint was cut off when Jiang Yanli advised, "Lan-er-gongzi, reacting like that is only going to make A-Xian even more determined."

"I… acknowledge your point, Maiden Jiang," Lan Wangji forced himself to say.

"Would you really mind it though?" she wondered, her soft, unjudging voice drawing Lan Wangji out in a way the teasing had never managed to. "Do you truly oppose this?"

"I-" he cut off, the red covering his ears surpassing even his other-self's in their intensity. "No, I… I wouldn't be-"

Kneeling on the bed, Wei Wuxian moved even closer to Lan Wangji and, in the most devilish tone he could manage, asked, "What? Scared?"

At once, Lan Wangji stood up and marched away from the bed.

This time, even Nie Mingjue couldn't offer Lan Wangji any help when Nie Huaisang groaned at Hanguang-jun's stupidity.

"I'm not…" Lan Wangji cleared his throat. "This isn't the time-"

"This is the perfect time, what are you talking about?!" Nie Huaisang demanded, furious that Lan Wangji was trying to defend his older self's unforgivable actions. "You're ruining everything!"

"Nothing is being ruined, now is simply not an appropriate time."

"Hm? Where are you going?" Wei Wuxian asked, allowing his bound hands to fall to his lap again. "My hands are still tied up because of you; you can't run away. Why are you scared when I'm not?"

Hanguang-jun jolted at the question.

"Yes, yes!" Lan Xichen smiled widely, barely able to contain his excitement. "Go back."

Then Wei Wuxian stood up, and Lan Wangji was startled into hiding behind the paper sheet in the middle of the room.

Although a significant portion of Lan Qiren wanted to be embarrassed about his nephew's childish behavior, he couldn't help a small smile from creeping up his face.

Even as a child, Wangji had been the picture of poise; how long had it been since Lan Qiren had seen his nephew act like this?

(And, considering how different the Lan juniors raised under Hanguang-jun were, how much of that loss was his fault?)

Those questions were never voiced aloud, and so never received an answer. Instead, Wei Wuxian continued show the world a version of Lan Wangji who couldn't be more different from the reputation Hanguang-jun had maintained.

Two soft, golden eyes peaked out from behind the paper sheet.

“Hey, hey, hey, come here,” Wei Wuxian called out, making Lan Wangji hide again.

Embarrassment flooding his brain, Lan Wangji stared quite intently at the ground, refusing to make eye contact with his far-too-widely grinning brother.

“Come on! Don’t run,” Wei Wuxian added on, giving chase. Like a skittish rabbit, Lan Wangji circled around the paper barrier, maintain a two meter distance from Wei Wuxian. And so Wei Wuxian followed. And thus Lan Wangji continued to flee.

Around and around and around they went, the two of them circling the obstruction between them like children. As time went on, the sound of laughter in the air neither dampened nor decreased in intensity, instead only growing more joyful with each second that passed.

And once again, Jiang Cheng felt an uncomfortable pit growing within his stomach. With every second that passed after he noticed it, he found himself growing angrier and angrier.

‘Seriously? What do I have to feel guilty about? I’m not the one who did those things the older version of me was doing. I don’t know what happened to that-me, but Wei Wuxian is happy in Lotus Pier.’

In Yunmeng, Wei Wuxian had droves of adoring shidis and shimeis. His little ducklings would follow him around everywhere, but even they wouldn’t go to Gusu with him. Wei Wuxian wouldn’t leave the Jiang Sect just for Lan Wangji. He wouldn’t leave them, both Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli, behind. It wouldn’t be fair of him to.

‘He can’t. We… we saw the proof ourselves. I ran in front of those Wen guards; I lost my core for him. I happened to manage to get it back by a lucky turn of fate, but I had no way of knowing that when I ran out in front of the guards. I nearly gave up everything for Wei Wuxian. There’s no way I don’t deserve to stand with him — for us to stay together.’

(Right? That had to be true.)

‘Jiang Cheng, listen up,’ Wei Wuxian had said. ‘When you become the leader, I’ll be your subordinate. I’ll follow your lead, just like my father followed your father-’

~~Just like Wei Changze, who had left the sect to follow the person he loved?~~

As Jiang Cheng’s thoughts went on, a never-ending cycle of emotions tumbling within him, the simulation continued unimpeded. The dim, golden light of the nearby candles filled the room with warmth that combated the brisk, earthly chill of the wind brushing through the open window. It was now a late enough hour that the only sounds present were those generated by the room’s inhabitants, and the childish joy rang clearly through the dusk.

In his earnest playfulness, a golden aura had practically encompassed Lan Wangji’s body, only matched by the delight in Wei Wuxian’s laughter-

‘Wait, what am I doing?’ Wei Wuxian suddenly asked himself, freezing mid-step. ‘Am I playing tag with him? What the… have I officially lost it? Lan Zhan has an excuse for being drunk, but why am I playing along?’

“Because you love him!” Nie Huaisang hissed, not quite quiet enough to escape the two, identical disapproving glares Lan Wangji and Nie Mingjue shot him. Nie Huaisang just shrugged, completely unrepentant.

Noticing that his chaser had stopped, Lan Wangji stopped as well, peeking out from behind the barrier. It would be quite strange to call a full-gown man ‘cute,’ but none of those present would be able to honestly say he was not. In addition to that, the still prim-and-proper state of his clothing created a strange sort of dissonance that only made the sight more appealing.

(Most especially to Wei Wuxian.)

“Do you want to continue?” he asked, tilting his head in a half-mocking, half-genuinely-curious way. If this was the normal Hanguang-jun he was speaking to, there was no way the other would say ‘yes.’ However-

Expressionless, Lan Wangji nodded.

Wei Wuxian coughed to cover up his sudden laughter.

Madam Jin was the matriarch of the Jin Sect. She was far too dignified to give a cheer or shout ‘yes’ at those words. Adorable or not, this scene did not contain any useful information. There was no reason for her to want it to go on longer.

(And yet, somehow, she could not stop herself from giving a slight squeak of joy at Lan Wangji’s adorable nod.)

Jin Zixuan sent Lan Wangji a pitying glance, feeling as though he had somehow gotten yet another half-brother, this time from his mom’s side.

Luckily, the real Lan Wangji was far too distracted by Wei Wuxian to notice.

The Yiling Patriarch’s smile grew wider and wider as he stared at the second jade, until finally he couldn’t take it anymore: ‘Hahaha! Oh, Heavens, drunk Lan Zhan seriously wants to play tag with me? Hahahahaha!’

The laughter he was trying to suppress was even greater than a tidal wave. Although he managed to hold it back this time, his entire body was shaking with joy.

‘The Gusu Lan Sect forbids noise, fooling around, and even walking quickly. Lan Zhan probably never got to play like this as a child. Hmph, how pitiful.’

“What do you think, Wangji?” Lan Xichen whispered, and Wangji shuddered at the conniving serpent tone. “That is indeed quite a problem young Wei-gongzi has raised. Perhaps we should amend it as well, once we leave the simulation. If we invite Wei-”

“No. Need.”

‘Ah, well,’ Wei Wuxian thought next. ‘Lan Zhan won’t remember a single thing when he sobers up. I might as well keep playing with him, then.’

He grinned.

Attacked on all sides, Lan Wangji could do nothing but stand frozen (ears as red as rubies) while the simulation continued.

With a shrug, Wei Wuxian resumed his chase. Lan Wangji turned and fled, continuing to maintain the same distance as before. They looped around and around and around, getting the playful, childish interactions they might have had as teenagers ~~if it weren’t for the war~~.

“Run, run! Go faster!” Wei Wuxian called out. “I’m gonna catch you!”

Jiang Cheng momentarily took a break from the mental debate he was having with himself to give a long, tired facepalm.

“You are so embarrassing,” he groaned.

“Go on! Be careful! I’m gonna catch you! If I catch you, I’m gonna lick you again!”

The words were clearly intended to be a joking threat. However, they instead made Lan Wangji freeze.

Wei Wuxian crashed into his waiting chest.

‘Ah, what innocence,’ Jin Guangshan thought, a smile working its way onto his face. ‘I’m sure I can think of quite a few ways Hanguang-jun would like to use that silly promise of yours.’

Another shudder ran up Lan Wangji’s back, and Wen Ruohan frowned in confusion. After a beat of silence, the chief cultivator’s gaze shifted rightward, landing coldly on the Jin Sect’s golden Sect Leader.

Wei Wuxian blinked in confusion several times, not entirely sure what had happened. Growing impatient, Lan Wangji reached forward, grabbed Wei Wuxian’s bound hands, and slipped them over his own head. Wei Wuxian eeped.

Their noses were now a mere centimeter apart, and their eyes took in each other’s greedily.

“...Wow,” Nie Mingjue muttered.

Lan Wangji stood up at once, turning to stare in horror at his once-ally.

“Sorry,” Sect Leader Nie rushed to say, coughing a few times. “I just — I only meant-”

“You’re so romantic, Wangji-xiong!” Nie Huaisang called out, overflowing with excitement. “Now kiss!”

“What are-” Lan Wangji’s protest was cut off as Lan Xichen stood up.

“No, no. We’re too early for kissing yet-”

“-Right now he needs to just embrace Wei-gongzi tightly!”

Standing up as well, Madam Jin chimed in, “They’ve known each other for twenty years. Kissing is fine now! Just wait for Wei Wuxian to give permission first!”

“No, no!” Jiang Yanli chimed in. “Confess first! Go, Hanguang-jun!”

‘Do we really have to watch this?’ Jiang Cheng wondered, turning away. He knew, however, that the others would most likely not appreciate those thoughts being spoken out loud. Besides, it was impossible for him to speak over the increasing volumes of the other watchers anyways.

"He should break into song!"

“No! That would ruin the moment!” Wen Qing insisted crossly.

“He might as well skip all that. Wei Wuxian obviously wants more!”

“ONLY KISS AFTER YOU’VE CONFESSED!”

“KISS AS A CONFESSION!”

“NO!”

Before the enthusiastic cheerleaders, the overwhelmed Lan Wangji, and the grumpy Jiang Cheng, the simulated Hanguang-jun camly reported, “You caught me.”

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Ah… yes. I caught you.”

There was a pause, and Hanguang-jun grew impatient.

“You caught me,” he repeated.

“Oh, lord,” Lan Qiren muttered, turning his head away in second-hand embarrassment. By this point, his nephew’s attempts at remaining calm no matter what was being shown had long since failed.

(Those two Lans had been completely and utterly defeated by the simulation.)

(The third Lan was having the time of his life.)

“...Yes, I caught you,” Wei Wuxian said again, still not understanding.

Lan Wangji's gaze intensified in his impatience.

'What was it I said I'd do if I caught him?' Wei Wuxian wondered.

…No.

"This time doesn't count," he protested. "You walked over yourself."

Although he was still too dignified to do so, the drunk Lan Wangji looked like he very much wanted to pout.

'I… this is unbelievable. Not only does the drunk Lan Wangji like to play hide-and-seek, but he also likes to be licked?'

"Only by you!" Nie Huaisang shouted at the top of his lungs. Nie Mingjue and Lan Wangji's glares — which, before the simulation, would have individually been more than enough to freeze the Nie heir in his tracks — had no effect on the boy.

Wei Wuxian shifted, lifting his arms up as if to take them away, only to be forcefully stopped by Lan Wangji resting his hand on Wei Wuxian's forearm. Hanguang-jun held it securely, refusing to let it move whatsoever. After thinking in silence for a moment, Wei Wuxian shifted closer.

And closer.

And closer.

Frozen, the real Lan Wangji could only watch in steadily-mounting ~~excitement~~ fear as Wei Wuxian's face approached his own.

And then Lan Wangji's hand, which had been holding Wei Wuxian's forearm against his own collarbone, felt the tip of a tongue tap lightly against it.

An enormous flinch shook Lan Wangji's body, and he would have fallen back onto the floor if it weren't for his phenomenal reflexes. All around him, there was a deafening cheer:

"YES! FINALLY!"

Even the simulated Lan Wangji flinched back slightly, and he removed his hand as fast as he could. He took away Wei Wuxian's arms, turned his back to him, and darted to the side. Silently facing a wall, he tightly clenched the hand Wei Wuxian had licked mere moments ago.

Watching, Wei Wuxian tilted his head: 'Does he like it, or is he scared of it? Or… maybe a little bit of both.'

'Definitely both,' Wen Ruohan thought, mentally sighing to himself. Although this was the sort of thing he had never had any interest in (he had made heirs because that was what was expected of the leader of a clan, not because he understood what Jin Guangshan had meant when the man had described the ‘appeal’), but Wen Ruohan could admit to seeing the importance of what the simulation was displaying.

Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian were the two most important figures in the simulation, and this night would change their relationship incomparably.

At that moment, Lan Wangji turned around, attracting Wei Wuxian’s attention, and calmly requested: “Again.”

“Again? Again what?”

Although there was no flush of embarrassment to be seen, Hanguang-jun hid behind the paper curtain, peeking out so that only half his face was visible.

There was a squeak.

“Oh, dear. Lan-gongzi,” Jiang Yanli gave a concerned gasp, turning towards Lan Xichen with a startled expression. “Are you quite all right?”

“Ah, yes. Thank you for the concern, Jiang-guniang,” the Lan heir managed to get out. “It’s just… it’s-”

Shrugging to himself, Wei Wuxian began the chase once again. They made one loop around the barrier, and then, before Wei Wuxian had turned a corner to start his second lap, he ran into Lan Wangji again.

“I knew it. You’re doing this on purpose, aren’t you?” he asked.

Once again, Lan Wangji brought Wei Wuxian’s arms around his neck.

“Too adorable?” Wen Qing suggested, filling in the gaps upon seeing how much trouble Lan Xichen had. Among the older siblings, she was by far the least affected by the scene (already highly-immune to adorableness thanks to Wen Ning’s constant presence in her life). By contrast, Lan Xichen was speechless, Jiang Yanli was barely resisting the urge to coo, and Nie Mingjue’s mind seemed to have shut down approximately ten minutes ago.

(He might be used to Nie Huaisang playing the ‘adorable younger brother’ card to get away with things, but never in his wildest dreams had he expected Hanguang-jun to be capable of the same.)

(Which of course meant the real Nie Huaisang was currently brainstorming ways he might be able to get the real Lan Wangji to distract Nie Mingjue after they left the simulation.)

Much like the watching older siblings, Wei Wuxian was far from immune to the cuteness of the person before him. He grinned, then, keeping his arms around Lan Wangji’s neck, leaned forward, tilting the other as well.

“You like this, don’t you?” he asked. “Don’t turn around. Speak. Do you like it or not? If you like it, we don’t have to run around every single time.”

Although the watchers were certain that the drunk Lan Wangji's emotions were running wildly, nothing could be seen on Hanguang-jun's jade-like face.

'I had never thought unreadable expressions could be an advantage, but… for Wei Wuxian, perhaps they are,' Madam Jin suddenly thought, her relationship-analysis abilities powering up to Level 2. 'The only reason Lan Wangji was ranked lower than Lan Xichen for most eligible bachelors was the fact that his expressions were always unreadable and cold. However, to someone as intelligent as Wei Wuxian, maybe the struggle of trying to figure that out is half the fun. How interesting.'

The fond smile on her face then fluctuated, dimming slightly as she turned her gaze upon her son and his fiance.

'No matter how well it's turned out… perhaps it was a mistake to try and force them together. But it's not as though arranged marriages are rare, and think of all the advantages. For one, it connected us to Yunmeng and Ziyuan-'

Those thoughts cut off abruptly, as Madam Jin recalled how strained her relationship with her once-friend had become.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian had guided them both to the bed and resumed observing Hanguang-jun intently. As always, Lan Wangji's expression revealed nothing (to everyone except Lan Xichen). However, when taking his actions into account, it was becoming increasingly clear how he felt.

"Confess!" Nie Huaisang whispered. "Confess, confess, confess, confess-"

The real Lan Wangji dutifully ignored him.

"Alright then," Wei Wuxian muttered. "Hey, Lan Zhan…. If that's what you like… then I'll make sure you're satisfied properly."

"Oh?" Jin Guangshan muttered quietly, mind racing at the possibilities.

Then, Wei Wuxian did something completely unexpected:

He held up one of Lan Wangji's hands, bent down, and kissed between two slender fingers.

Hanguang-jun jolted at the action, but Wei Wuxian held tight.

Deafening alarms began ringing in Lan Wangji's head, an endless signal of panic that neither logic nor courtesy could circumvent. The endless stream of 'Wei Ying. Wei Ying. Wei Ying.' got progressively louder until it was simply 'WEIYINGWEIYINGWEIYINGWEIYING!'

(If Lan Qiren wasn't mistaken, that was steam beginning to leave his nephew's flushed ears.)

But Wei Wuxian was far from done.

Next, he moved onto the knuckles. Between each knuckle, he set down another feather-light kiss.

The growing mix of excitement, arousal, and disbelief was growing clearer and clearer in Lan Wangji's expression.

"Oh, wow," Nie Huaisang muttered, covering his gasping mouth with his hand. "I can't believe it. I can't believe it, I can't-"

Wei Wuxian attacked the wrist next, flipping Lan Wangji's hand over to set his mouth against the unmarked skin just above the palm.

'We shouldn't be watching this,' Lan Qiren realized at once. 'This is private. We shouldn't be-'

And yet, how long had it been since he had last seen his nephew look so disbelievingly happy?

(And besides, would activating the concealment zone and leaving him alone with Jin Guangshan really be any better?)

At that last peck, Hanguang-jun had flinched again, feeling Wei Wuxian's warm breath dance across the top of his skin. The apprehension in his clenched fist was drowned out by the tentative but undeniable excitement behind his golden eyes.

"YES! YES! YES!"

Moving slightly higher, Wei Wuxian administered yet another kiss, just as devastating as all the ones before.

"Yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes," Nie Huaisang hissed out. "Yes!"

Raising his eyes, rather than his head, Wei Wuxian glanced up at the white-clad cultivator before him and whispered, "Have you had enough?"

"Say no say no say no say no-"

But Hanguang-jun just pursed his lips, refusing to say a word.

As Nie Huaisang groaned, Madam Jin instead smirked. Although that wasn't the response Nie Huaisang had wanted, it was the kind of answer Wei Wuxian would like best. A near-unreadable expression and a refusal to answer, forcing Wei Wuxian to go further to provoke answers out of him. It was a response only Lan Wangji would give.

And that was exactly who Wei Wuxian was falling in love with.

And indeed, unperturbed by Lan Wangji's lack of response, Wei Wuxian finally sat up and, unhurried, requested, "Tell me, did you ever burn joss paper for me?"

He leaned in close, practically draping himself over Lan Wangji's chest in the process.

And the real Lan Wangji stood frozen, his mind blanking out at the sight. No matter how much his subconscious screamed at him to look away, he, for some strange reason, simply couldn't bring himself to.

Laughing again at Hanguang-jun's refusal to answer, Wei Wuxian inched towards him. Then, through the layers of clothing which separated them, pressed his lips against where Lan Wangji heart was.

Nie Huaisang gasped, and the rest of the pro-ship squad became weak in their knees.

"If you don't talk, I'm not going to give you any more of these," Wei Wuxian threatened, leaning in again. "Tell me, how did you recognize me?"

Lan Wangji's lips quivered, as though he was on the verge of confessing.

'I doubt anything else would ever be able to weaken him like that,' Wen Ruohan chuckled.

The two of them stared at each other, Lan Wangji's resolve cracking by the second. Then, Wei Wuxian's eyes fell down to the soft pink lips before him, and impulse took over.

Before anyone had even realized what was happening, Wei Wuxian had tugged Lan Wangji close, kissing him on the lips.

And at that moment, 'WEIYING' just became a flatline beep as an endless string of error messages poured forth.

"Wha — did he — What the fu-"

"HE DID IT!" Nie Huaisang shrieked, cutting off Jiang Cheng's exclamation with his own. "He actually-did he actually — Da-ge, pinch me!"

The Nie Sect Leader's instinctive response of 'I can't, we're in the simulation' was completely silenced by his own shock at what had just happened. And he was far from alone.

Behind him, Lan Qiren abruptly fainted.

"Uncle?!

Unlike the utter chaos occurring between the watchers, the two within the simulation seemed frozen in time. Both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji stared at each other with wide eyes, a million emotions reflected in the usually unreadable orbs.

It was the pinnacle of romance, in Nie Huaisang's humble opinion.

Then, Hanguang-jun raised his hand. Wei Wuxian tensed, momentarily fearing that he would be smacked dead on the spot for his impudence, and quickly scrambled off the bed. However, that wasn't what happened at all.

SMACK!

Lan Wangji had hit himself, becoming unconscious in an instant. He fell back onto the bed, dead to the world.

Wei Wuxian blinked down at him in confusion.

"I…" Nie Mingjue frowned. "Wait, what?"

"What are you doing?!" Nie Huaisang shrieked, raising a voice to a volume no one in the room had ever heard him speak at before. "Wangji-xiong, you… you-you complete and utter buffoon! It's fine to say 'no' if you don't want it or aren't ready for it, but the future-you obviously totally and completely is! How could you ruin the perfect chance Wei-xiong gave you?!"

"I-" Lan Wangji cut himself off, unable to retort. Surprisingly, this hesitance was not because the image of Wei Wuxian kissing his older-self was seared into his mind (well, not entirely because of that). Nor was it because, as would be the case for the pre-simulation Lan Wangji, the second jade was too appalled by suggestion to offer a response.

No, worst of all, it was because as small part of himself agreed with Nie Huaisang.

'I spent thirteen years without him,' Lan Wangji thought. 'Was I really just not ready? But I… I was fine with paralyzing Wei Ying when he climbed into my bed. I even slept through the night with him in that position. Why would I back out — render myself unconscious? I-'

A large part of him still couldn't believe that he of all people had wanted to do more with Wei Wuxian. However, after the years they'd spent apart (and the misunderstandings and fights and Wei Wuxian's death) this had felt like the natural next step.

And yet-

Slowly, moving stiffly and clumsily, as though in a trance, Wei Wuxian began to put the room back in order. He moved the table away from the door, and opened the windows wider to let more of the chilly air in.

Then, he knelt down beside the table to burry his face in his hands.

'I had too much to drink,' he thought, the surge of emotion he had been swept up into earlier lingering noticeably.

"...I hate you, Wangji-xiong," Nie Huaisang grumbled.

Nie Mingjue whacked his brother over the head (the hand phasing through the simulated body), shouting "Huaisang! Don't pressure him into doing anything he doesn't want to do!"

Unable to resist, Wen Qing piped in, "I think the issue here is how clearly Hanguang-jun does want to-"

“Wen-guniang, I request you hold your silence,” Lan Qiren gasped out. Next to him, Lan Xichen knelt down, fretting worriedly over his recently-collapsed uncle. Even though he had managed to sit up again, Lan Qiren’s skin was quite pale.

(Jiang Cheng’s wasn’t much better, though it was caused by an entirely different set of emotions.)

Bringing his wrists up, Wei Wuxian used his teeth to untie the forehead ribbon which had bound his wrists. One by one, each knot was undone, the cloth slowly falling to the ground.

‘What a waste of a perfect opportunity,’ Jin Guangshan sighed. ‘Wei Ying was even the one to initiate everything. All Lan Wangji had to do was accept it… although I suppose even that was too much to ask of a Lan. Honestly, what a disappointment.’

(It was a good thing it appeared their illusionary bodies weren’t able to respond to the same extent their real ones were. Jin Guangshan wouldn’t be able to explain the physical response he would’ve undoubtedly had, and it would have made the sudden end to the scene feel even worse for him than it did. Small mercies, the Jin Leader supposed.)

After a short while, Wei Wuxian let out a small sigh.

‘I really had too much to drink today,’ he thought again. ‘Lan Zhan’s such a serious person… I shouldn’t be fooling around with him like this. I’m being disrespectful towards him.’

‘No,’ Lan Wangji thought. ‘No, Wei Ying, I do want it, it’s not-’

He cut off.

(How was his other-self always far too forward when Lan Wangji didn’t want him to be, and then suddenly turning hesitant and unwilling when the real-version was finally accepting it?! Where was the logic in that? Just when Lan Wangji felt like he was finally starting to understand his older self, he was proven wrong once again.)

Then, however, ever so slowly, Wei Wuxian raised his hand, pressing the tip of his finger against the lips which had touched Lan Wangji’s just a moment ago.

And the real second jade’s ears flamed bright red.

“The next morning,” Lan Sizhui’s disembodied voice revealed as the simulation transitioned.

Jiang Cheng let out a sigh of relief.

(He wanted Wei Wuxian to be happy — he definitely, truly did — but he would certainly not complain if he never had to see something like that again. Luckily, it seemed as though Wei Wuxian had realized the error of his ways right at the end there. Hopefully that would be the end of it.)

Noise picked up as the scene formed before them, and the cheerful figures of the future's juniors appeared. That said, it was notably only the Lans who were cheerful at the early hour.

(Jin Ling looked about ten seconds away from ordering Fairy to tear the loud early birds to shreds.)

Jiang Cheng sympathized.

The simulation then crept up, bringing them to the room where Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had spent the night. Apparently too embarrassed after the previous night, Wei Wuxian had neglected to join Lan Wangji on the bed. However, as the second jade awoke, the movement woke the Yiling Patriarch up as well.

"Hm? Is it five already?" Wei Wuxian wondered.

Seeing the conflicted expression Wangji made at the sight, Lan Xichen frowned slightly. On one hand, he didn't want to force his brother into a relationship the other didn't want. None of his teasing had been with that intention in mind, and, luckily, it seemed fairly clear that both the younger and older versions did desire Wei Wuxian.

(The drunk Hanguang-jun's repeated "you caught me" made that more than clear enough.)

So then, why had Hanguang-jun refused Wei Wuxian's advance? It was rare for Lan Xichen to not understand his brother, but he took some solace in the fact that the real Lan Wangji was obviously just as confused as Xichen was in regards to his older self's actions.

They thought and thought, and yet neither Lan brother could come to an answer.

Sitting up, the simulated Lan Wangji looked over and saw the red marks which had been left on Wei Wuxian's wrists. Silently, he got out of bed and retrieved a small turquoise bottle from within his sleeves, quickly applying the contents. As the ointment was spread over his wrists, the little tension left in Wei Wuxian's body vanished at once.

Pouting, Wei Wuxian whined, "It hurts! Hanguang-jun, you're so rude when you're drunk!"

"You've reaped what you've sown," Lan Wangji responded, not even looking up.

Madam Jin snorted, then quickly covered it up with a cough. The real Lan Wangji was already fairly overwhelmed by what had just happened. Pointing out how much more comfortable the two of them were with each other (Hanguang-jun responding in-kind to Wei Wuxian's teasing, rather than panicking like he had after the first night he had gotten drunk) would most likely be just a step too far.

Besides, it wasn't dignified to pick on the weak.

"...Lan Zhan, you really don't remember what you did while you were drunk, do you?"

Shaking his head once, Lan Wangji easily responded, "I do not."

'That's probably true,' Wei Wuxian supposed. 'Otherwise, he would have killed me out of embarrassment for what I did.'

'No, that's not-' Lan Wangji's thoughts cut off, and he found himself unable to articulate, even to himself, the feelings tumbling within him. 'That isn't… the impression I want you to have of me.'

And yet, as always, the simulation could not be changed.

Unconsciously, as Wei Wuxian stared at the other, lost in thought, he began biting his own lip. It was quite clear what he was thinking about.

"Oh, good," Nie Huaisang let out a sigh of relief. "Don't worry, Wangji-xiong, you haven't ruined your chances quite yet."

"I wasn't worried."

"Truly, it's fine," Jiang Yanli piped in. "A-Xian doesn't seem to mind."

"I'm not nervous."

"Mmhm," Wen Qing said.

Jin Zixuan could only stare in pity at Lan Wangji, somewhat-grateful that the attention was at least not on him.

'Oh dear,' Wei Wuxian's thoughts rang out. 'Gusu Lan is so strict, and Lan Zhan isn't romantic at all. He definitely hasn't kissed a girl before. What do I do now? I happened to receive the grand honor. Should I tell him? What if he gets so upset he starts crying once he knows? Or, well… he might have done so when we were younger, but not now.'

'I wouldn't either way,' Lan Wangji thought, trying to focus more on how he wouldn't because he was too dignified to, and less on the part of him that said he wouldn't because he would be happy over what had happened.

'Then again, it's sometimes like Lan Zhan's a monk made of wood. It's possible that he's never even had such thoughts before-'

Quite a few doubtful looks appeared on the watchers as Hanguang-jun's 'you caught me' replayed in their minds.

'Wait!' Wei Wuxian tensed up at once. 'The last time he was drunk, I asked him 'is there anyone you like?' and he said 'yes.' Maybe he's already kissed her? But judging by Lan Zhan's continuous self-restraint, he's probably really careful about not crossing any lines. They've probably never kissed or even held hands. Though, thinking of it now, maybe back then he didn't understandthe kind of 'like' I was talking about….'

As his thoughts continued to drift off, Lan Wangji continued applying ointment.

Wen Ruohan had a feeling that the future Hanguang-jun's reaction would be quite amusing if he knew what Wei Wuxian was thinking.

Suddenly, someone knocked three times on the door.

"Hanguang-jun, everyone is up. Will we be leaving?" Sizhui asked.

Lan Qiren relaxed at once. As furious as he was that the simulation had shown the watchers something so personal to his nephew, the existence of Lan Sizhui gave him renewed appreciation for the simulation.

(No matter how silly some of them could be, Lan Qiren could never be anything but grateful for getting to see the future's juniors.)

The scene transitioned them to outside, where said juniors were all gathered around each other, chatting cheerfully.

"Remember to come to my place sometime," Lan Jingyi insisted.

Sizhui smiled at his friend's enthusiasm, then added, "We'll be leaving now."

"See you next time!"

As this was going on, a separate discussion was happening on the side.

"When you go back, don't keep arguing with your uncle," Wei Wuxian scolded, making Jin Ling glare angrily at the ground. "Listen to him. Be careful from now on. Don't run around trying to night hunt alone again."

Both Madam Yu and Jiang Cheng gave simultaneous pleased smirks at that, having grown rather frustrated with the number of times Jin Ling was put in danger throughout the simulation.

However-

'...With what happened to his parents, I suppose it's only natural he would want to prove himself to others as soon as possible,' Wei Wuxian continued.

And many of the watchers frowned at the reminder of the still-prevalent mysteries surrounding Wei Wuxian's fall from grace, the Jiangs and Jins most of all. Unconsciously, Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli moved closer to each other, protective and seeking comfort in equal measure.

"What are you, fifteen? Most disciples around your age haven't hunted down any great beasts either! Why are you so eager to rush towards such an accomplishment?"

"My uncles were also fifteen-or-so when they became famous!" Jin Ling protested. "Even that dog Wei Wuxian was only around fifteen when he killed the Xuanwu of Slaughter! If he could do it, why can't I?!"

And Jiang Yanli's smile faltered again, and she found herself wishing her son hadn't inherited her brother's need to compare himself to Wei Wuxian. It was putting Jin Ling in danger, and it most certainly hadn't brought Jiang Cheng happiness either, when it was him who felt that way.

Then again, she supposed it was no wonder Jin Ling had become so stuck on that, considering who had helped raise him.

'If I had been there… if I had raised A-Ling….' she pursed her lips, looking away. 'A-Xian, what happened to me?'

But Wei Wuxian had no way of hearing that. Instead he had tensed up, a shiver running down his back at hearing his name come right after the word "dog." Slowly, he forced himself to relax, shaking the goosebumps off his arms. Then:

"Wei Wuxian was the one who killed it?" he asked. "Wasn't it killed by Hanguang-jun?"

"It was both of us," Lan Wangji insisted calmly.

Instead of responding to Wei Wuxian with the same assertion, Jin Ling did an awkward frown at that name. He looked at his 'uncle Mo Xuanyu,' then turned back to stare intently at Lan Wangji. He opened his mouth as if to speak, then closed it again, thinking some more. Then, he sighed.

"You and Hanguang-jun…. Nevermind, that's your own business," he huffed, crossing his arms and looking away. "Anyways, I don't care about you guys at all. Have fun being cut-sleeves. The disease is incurable."

"Hey, how is it a disease?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Jin Ling just scoffed, but a light blush crossed his cheeks as he said, "I already know the meaning behind Gusu Lan's forehead ribbon. Now that it's like this, stay by Hanguang-jun's side properly. Even if you're a cut-sleeve, you should be a modest one. Don't go about messing with other men, especially people from our sect! Or else… don't blame the results on me!"

"I… Is that…" Jin Zixuan stared intently at his son, uncertainty clear on his face. "That seemed… a little different from before."

'Damn cutsleeve,' Jin Ling had hissed.

But now: '...Nevermind, it's your own business.'

The words were similar, but the emotions and intent behind them were worlds apart.

Now, finally, Jiang Yanli's usual smile returned to her face, and she nodded once: "I think it is. Compared to how A-Ling treated A-Xian's interest earlier… I think A-Ling is starting to change."

They glanced at each other, sharing a warm smile at the thought.

However, Wei Wuxian was far more concerned with the previous thing that had been said.

“Forehead ribbon?” he repeated. “Is there a special meaning behind the Gusu Lan Sect’s forehead ribbon?”

“Oh, no,” Lan Qiren whispered.

“Come on! You know what it means! Stop getting so carried away! Don’t go bragging like that! I don’t want to talk about this anymore! Are you Wei Ying?!”

“Huh?” Nie Mingjue asked, not having expected the sudden yet straightforward question at the end there.

“Do you think we’re similar?” Wei Wuxian wondered, voice calm.

Based on who had been narrating the simulation for them, the watchers all knew Jin Ling would find out eventually. With this, they managed to be a little assured that the eventual reveal would go over well.

However, that reveal was not to come quite yet. After thinking in silence for a moment, Jin Ling whistled loudly, and Fairly came barking over.

“We were having a nice chat! What are you sending your dog loose on me for?!” Wei Wuxian yelled as he ran away. As expected, his fleeing brought him to hide behind Lan Wangji, trembling as he clutched the other man’s sleeve.

‘Don’t think about the kiss. Don’t think about the kiss. Don’t think about the kiss, don’tthinkaboutthekiss-’

Through great struggle and sacrifice, Lan Wangji finally managed to quiet his own thoughts.

“Hmph. Goodbye,” Jin Ling decided, stomping off.

‘That’s definitely the peacock in him,’ Jiang Cheng decided, unable to resist sending an amused glance a blushing Jin Zixuan’s way.

One by one, the disciples left. Jin Ling walked towards Lanling, unwilling to face Jiang Cheng just yet, and every other disciple returned towards their own sect. Despite that, the tearful farewells the more emotional disciples gave made one thing quite clear: the life-or-death struggles they had gone through had formed a bond between them that nothing could break.

(A fact further proven by the obvious reluctance on Lan Jingyi’s face as he watched the others leave.)

Lan Qiren sighed briefly, but couldn’t help the small tinge of amusement he felt within him as well. After watching the drunk Wangji run around as the child he had never truly gotten to be ~~because war was coming and they had to be prepared, but they hadn't done enough and their children suffered because of it~~, he had grown a new appreciation for the strange innocence the future's juniors had.

Hanguang-jun and the future Lan Xichen had been phenomenal guardians for the next generation. Lan Qiren couldn't be prouder.

Finally, only Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and the Lan juniors were left.

"Where are we going next?" Lan Jingyi wondered, still pouting at being left behind.

Smiling in amusement at his friend's reaction, Lan Sizhui added, "Zewu-jun is currently night-hunting in the Tanzhou area. Are we going directly back to the Cloud Recesses, or will we meet up with him?"

"We will go to Tanzhou," Lan Wangji decided.

Wei Wuxian grinned, beginning the walk forward, and said "Great! Maybe we can even lend a hand. We don't know where to go to look for our dear friend's head anyways."

Once again, Nie Mingjue couldn't help but sigh at the unusually troublesome corpse Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had to deal with.

By now, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji's lead over the juniors had lengthened considerably. The teenagers trailed behind respectfully, engaged in their own conversations.

'A pack of ducklings, following after their parents,' Madam Yu observed disbelievingly.

Thanks to both that and the lack of other people on the road, Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian had a chance to speak unheard.

After a bit of silence, Lan Wangji calmly stated, "Jiang Wanyin knows who you are."

Said boy flinched.

Swaying slightly from his seat on Little Apple, Wei Wuxian agreed, "Yeah, he knows. What can he do, though? He doesn't have any evidence."

And he had accused so many people of being Wei Wuxian that people would need evidence for anyone to consider the claim. He had tortured — brutalized — who knew how many demonic cultivators, to the point where even his own nephew didn't believe the accusations.

'I lost my core for him,' Jiang Cheng reminded himself, clenching his fists tightly and barely noticing his sister's attempts at comforting him. 'I lost my core for him. I gave up everything for him — the version of me that did that is only a few years older than I am now. I'm much closer to him than I am to my adult-self. There's no way I wouldn't deserve to be with Wei Wuxian. There's no way he would leave! There's no way Gusu Lan is a better fit for him than Yunmeng!'

But-

“Jiang Cheng’s only evidence is that he saw my reaction to dogs, but if he actually went around saying that the Yiling Patriarch was terrified of dogs, everyone would probably think SanDu Shengshou had just become crazy after how many times he’d failed.”

And, like always, Wei Wuxian was right.

“So, I’m actually really curious,” the Yiling Patriarch continued. “How did you recognize me?”

“I’m more curious as to why you have such a bad memory.”

Collective grins broke across the more excited watchers’ faces as they recalled the song that had tied the two souls together, even across multiple lives.

‘I can’t believe I ended up being less romantic than Lan Wangji. That really is pathetic,’ Jin Zixuan thought, sighing to himself.

Then again, having witnessed the tension between the two in the previous scene, Jin Zixuan knew full-well how difficult that standard would be to match.

Sensing that Lan Wangji wasn’t going to actually answer, Wei Wuxian gave up on his interrogation quickly enough. He was undiscouraged, however, and continued the journey to Tanzhou with an easy smile on his face.

There was a flash forward, and the city was within their sights. On the way, however, they passed by a garden which neared the size of a large estate, and contained enough greenery to feed a pack of rabbits for a hundred years.

Lan Xichen gave a surprised hum, examining the layout closely.

The greenery was not carefully-cultivated plants, but rather dried-out natural growing ones, which had been allowed to spread freely over the land. There was a pavilion, a few fences, and a few stools, but they had been worn down and knocked over by time. It had been abandoned long ago.

Nevertheless, the juniors were excited.

“The garden we passed was big and majestic, but there was clearly no one caring for it,” the disembodied voice of the far-future Lan Jingyi explained, teary at the cruel fate that had befallen the once-beautiful garden. “All of us rushed in at once, knowing that Hanguang-jun wouldn’t object so long as it wasn’t against the rules.”

“Seriously?! How unfair!” Ouyang Zizhen protested. “I can’t believe we didn’t get to see it!”

“Speak for yourself!” Jin Ling snapped. “The gardens at Koi Tower are probably a hundred times bigger and grander. I didn’t need to see it!”

The watchers could hear the smirk on Lan Jingyi's face when he said, "Well, if that's what princess thinks. Alright then, since you're not interested, how about Sizhui and I take just Zizhen to see the garden?"

"Wha-"

Madam Jin coughed into her sleeve, hiding a laugh at her grandson's antics. Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan buried his bright red face in his hands, hating the knowing looks everyone was sending him.

"We'll all go together," Lan Sizhui decided. "We can ask Senior Wei and Hanguang-jun to take the four of us next time they have a night-hunt near there."

"Ah, no fair!" Nie Huaisang protested. "I want to go on a garden field trip with Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong too!"

Huffing ~~fondly~~, Nie Mingjue commented, "We have gardens at Qinghe. Why would you want to go to this place?"

"I bet its special," Nie Huaisang declared, confident that the simulation wouldn't be showing them otherwise.

And indeed:

"This is the garden of the Damsel of Annual Blossoms, isn't it?" Lan Sizhui commented after a while.

"Oh?" Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes in interest.

"The Damsel of Annual Blossoms? Who is that?" Lan Jingyi asked. "Does the garden have an owner? Why does it look so worn-down? It's seems like its been left uncared-for for a long time."

'Let Sizhui answer your first question before bringing up another one,' Lan Qiren scolded, hiding an amused smile with a cough.

Luckily for the watchers, all of Lan Jingyi's questions were answered soon enough.

"Annual blossoms are flowers that have a short flowering period, only blooming during certain seasons. There is a large variety in types and colors, filling the garden with a unmistakable fragrance when they bloom."

As the kids chatted, Wei Wuxian glanced over, a nostalgic look on his face.

Lann Sizhui placed his hand over one of the pavilion's pillars, he felt along the wood, thinking for a while, before saying, "If I remember correctly, this probably is it. This garden used to be rather famous. I read a book about it once, and it was mentioned in the chapter 'The Blossoming Spirit of the Forest Damsel.' In Tanzhou there is a garden, and in that garden there is a damsel. Under the moonlight, if one recites poetry she deems fine, she grants them an annual blossom, the fragrance of which persists for three years. If she deems it poor, she casts a blossom at their face, then fades away."

Lan Jingyi yelped, "So if you recite the poetry wrong she throws a flower at your face? Hopefully they were flowers without thorns, or, if I were to try, my face would probably have started bleeding."

Seeing his uncle's scowl, Lan Xichen laughed and whispered, "At least he appears aware of his strengths."

"If he knows his poetry would fail, he should practice it more," Lan Qiren hissed back. "I'm glad that child had a happy upbringing, but still."

Trying his best to not seem patronizing, Lan Xichen nodded along to his uncle's complaints, pretending to listen seriously.

Stretching his arms over his head, Lan Jingyi thought to ask, "What sort of fae was she?"

"I would not call her a fae… she is more of a spirit. The legends have it that the earliest owner of the garden was a poet. He planted these flowers himself and treated them as friends, reciting poetry to them every day."

'What a ridiculous waste of time,' Madam Yu couldn't help but think.

Unable to hear her, Sizhui continued, "Affected by the emotions of the poetry, a spirit crystalized from the flora of the garden and became the Damsel of Annual Blossoms. When someone came, if their poetry was decent and allowed her to remember the one who planted her, she would be happy to give them a flower. If the poetry was wrong or didn't sound pleasing, she would emerge from the bushes and hurl a flower in that person's face. The one who was attacked would faint, and, upon waking up, realize they had been thrown out of the garden. Ten years ago, and endless number of people would come here."

"What a wonderful tradition," Lan Xichen beamed.

Feeling that Wen Ning might enjoy making an attempt, Wen Qing suggested, "Perhaps some of us should try together, when the season is right."

"That sounds wonderful," Jiang Yanli agreed, sneaking a glance at Jin Zixuan. Seeing it, he nodded back at her, blushing heavily. It appeared they had a date.

'Would Wei Ying like to go?' Lan Wangji wondered.

As if knowing he was being thought of, the simulated Wei Wuxian spoke next, laughing, "Romantic. Romantic. But I know for sure the Gusu Lan Sect's Library Pavillion would never hold a book saying such things. Sizhui, be honest; what book were you reading, and who gave it to you?"

Lan Sizhui blushed, sneaking a glance at Lan Wangji, but remaining silent as if worrying he would be punished.

"Why are you such a cool guardian, Wangji-xiong?" Nie Huaisang cried out.

Nie Mingjue jolted, "Huaisang?! What's that supposed to mean?!"

Glaring angrily at Nie Mingjue (who had, several times today, sided with Lan Wangji instead of his own brother), Nie Huaisang jokingly whined, "I can't believe you're asking that. Not only do you try to make me train-"

"As I should!"

"You also refuse to join our 'Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong' club! I bet San-ge would be on my side."

"Well, you should be happy then! He was there for you when I-"

Nie Mingjue cut off abruptly.

'When I died,' he finished in his head, realizing at once how much those words would ruin the playful teasing that had been going back and forth between them. It wasn't that he had forgotten the seriousness of what had happened to him, but the fact that they had simply been told about it, combined with how much else was going on, made it a little hard to keep in mind.

An awkward silence stretched out.

Luckily for Nie Mingjue, the simulation continued soon enough.

"Is the Damsel really pretty or something?" Lan Jingyi asked. "She has to be, right? Why else would so many people come?"

Glancing back at Lan Wangji one more time to make sure he wasn't about to be scolded, Lan Sizhui smiled and explained, "She probably was. She crystalized from such pleasant things, and was such a romantic spirit…. However, no one has ever seen the Damsel's face. There were many people who received her flowers, and plenty who were immediately knocked out, but no one ever saw her. Well, there was one exception."

"Hm?"

"Who?"

"The Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian."

If Jiang Cheng had been drinking, he would have choked at those words.

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked.

On the side, Wei Wuxian looked rather embarrassed, grumbling, "Ugh, why is it him again? Can't we talk about something else?"

Everyone ignored him.

Despite himself, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but chuckle at that.

"So? What did Wei Wuxian do?" Lan Jingyi asked, excited. "He was such a big villain. What did he do this time? Did he snatch the Damsel away and take her outside?!"

And if 'The Yiling Patriarch' was truly how the rumors described, that may have been right. It, however, was not.

'I remember that,' Wei Wuxian thought, a small smile forming on his face despite his earlier reluctance. He glanced back at Lan Wangji, and saw the other already meeting his eyes.

Then, there was a transition.

"Oh?"

Large lotus flowers bloomed above a clear lake, signaling that they had been brought near Yunmeng. In the busy streets, store owners gossiped with each other freely.

"Hey, did you hear?" one of them asked. "A demon's been causing trouble in Tanzhou."

"What? What kind of a demon is it?"

"I have no idea. Even Wei-gongzi can't do anything about it."

Lan Wangji, who was coincidentally passing by on his way back from a nighthunt, paused and turned around at those words, facing the speakers.

Although he didn't say anything, the words 'worried about your Wei Ying?' were clear on Lan Xichen's face. Unfortunately for Lan Wangji, that look spurred on thoughts he couldn't ignore. Because, just a short while ago, he had watched as Wei Wuxian had….

As Wei Wuxian….

Wei Ying-

'WEIYINGKISSEDMEWEIYINGKISSEDMEWEIYINGKISSEDME-'

(It would be a while before he was capable of having other thoughts again.)

Meanwhile, his simulated self was left to frown deeply, repeating 'Tanzhou?'

Leaping through the trees, the simulated Lan Wangji raced towards the origin of that rumor. The leaves were bright, and the flowers were in full bloom. That was more than enough to indicate that this was a different time, but, when Lan Wangji paused to look around, the watchers were finally able to see him clearly.

"Oh, it's a little Lan-er-gongzi," Wen Qing observed.

Lan Wangji jumped at that, not having expected teasing from her of all people. Though, truly, he should have known better. Despite often acting distant and cold, she was an older sibling as well.

(And, throughout the simulation, it had become clear to Lan Wangji that Nie Mingjue was the only one among them who could be trusted.)

The young Lan Wangji frowned at that moment, commenting, 'The resentful energy is so thick around here.'

"It's nothing compared to the Burial Mounds," Lan Qiren sighed, not liking the memories those words evoked.

Then, laughter came from below.

"Wei Wuxian?" Jin Zixuan realized at once.

And it was. Wei Wuxian sped across the path below Lan Wangji, dodging the various vines that came his way. And that wasn't even the most impressive thing. Behind him, a tsunami of flowers were tumbling down, threatening to suffocate him if he didn't flee fast enough.

He looked as though he was having the time of his life.

"For Heaven's sake, what did he do this time?" Madam Yu sighed, ignoring the tinge of fondness that came with that.

From behind one of the nearby trees, Nie Huaisang watched nervously. Nevertheless, Wei Wuxian's excited laughter continued.

"Haha — ah!" he suddenly stopped, tripping as some pebbles in the stone path came loose under his feet. He made contact with the ground-

"Wei-xiong, watch out!"

"Eh?" he glanced back.

'He's being a little too casual about this,' Wen Ruohan thought.

Only a second before the vines made whip-like contact with Wei Wuxian's vulnerable form, they were cut in two by Bichen. Lan Wangji landed on the ground between them and Wei Wuxian, stopping the avalanche of flowers with a well-timed barrier talisman.

"Show up, demon," he commanded, sending another talisman forth.

It sent up a cloud of dust upon contact.

And revealed an upset maiden instead.

"Oh dear," Wen Qing sighed, seeing the displeased pout on the Flower Damsel's face. The current lack of aggression made it quite clear that her intent had never been to truly harm.

Which meant Wei Wuxian probably provoked her into this.

"Flower Damsel, I've finally seen your face!" Wei Wuxian laughed, running forward. He gave her an assessing look, taking in her delicate pink makeup, her elaborately done hair, and the blooming flower resting atop her head.

Jin Guangshan was very, very appreciative.

Lan Wangji was less so.

He stared disturbingly blankly at Wei Wuxian and the flower spirit, neither voicing nor showing his annoyance. Finally, however, Nie Huaisang peaked out from behind the trees and made his way to Lan Wangji.

"Ah, well… you see-"

Instead of allowing Huaisang to explain, the simulation brought them into yet another flashback.

The sixteen year old Nie Huaisang stood within the garden they had all just seen. It was far more lush than the one 19 years later, and full of unbloomed flowers across every bush.

"Last night, I dreamed that falling flowers would not stay," the Nie heir recited. "Alas! I couldn't go home, although half of Spring is gone."

And, to his left, a flower opened into full bloom.

"Wow! She gave me a flower! She really did it!" the Nie heir realized, lighting up.

Part of Nie Mingjue was tempted to complain about the way his brother was spending his time, but, upon recalling the words he had almost said just a short while ago, refrained.

(Besides, it was somewhat nice to see his brother be happy. The future one they had seen after Wei Wuxian's resurrection looked more than a little stressed by his position of Sect Leader.)

The flower was released from the tree it was on, floating delicately into Nie Huaisang's waiting hand. He stared at it, both mesmerized by its beauty and proud of what it represented.

"Oh? Reciting poetry?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli all jumped, not having seen him approach.

“What the — where did he come from?!”

“I hate how good he is at hiding his presence!” Jiang Cheng growled.

Wei Wuxian stared at the flower in Nie Huaisang’s hand a moment longer before a mischievous grin crossed his face.

“I can do that too!” he declared.

“Hm?”

“Those who know me say I’m worried, but outsiders complain about the nonsense I talk!”

He grinned.

The flowers before him wilted.

Laughter broke out among the watchers.

“Wei Wuxian, I know you can do better than that!” Lan Qiren snapped.

But Wei Wuxian wasn’t done.

Running over to another flower, he recited, “Let me hold your hand. Let’s be friends.”

It wilted as well.

“Eh?” Wei Wuxian asked, pouting in the most adorably disappointed way possible.

(Lan Wangji could admit he might be a bit biased regarding that description.)

Undeterred, Wei Wuxian ran and dramatically knelt before another bush, saying “The young shoots of reeds are gray; the white dew looks like frost. That person whom I am thinking of, do you dare remove your makeup?”

An angry puff of pollen was released from the blooms.

‘Oh, I see what he’s doing,’ Wen Ruohan thought.

And Sizhui’s explanation to Jingyi was relayed on top:

“Supposedly, in order to see the Damsel’s face, Wei Wuxian went out of his way to come to Tanzhou all the way from Yunmeng. He would come to the garden, recite poetry wrong on purpose, intentionally anger the Damsel into hitting him with flowers, and get thrown out.”

And that exact scene played out before their eyes.

“When he woke up, he would crawl back inside and continue to recite incorrectly-”

As proven by what the simulation was showing them.

“-and she would throw him out again. After he repeated this more than 20 times, he was finally truly attacked-”

And that brought them to what they had seen earlier: Wei Wuxian seemingly running for his life as flowers and vines alike chased after him, intent on throwing him out.

“-And, during that, he saw the Damsel’s face.”

Partly because Lan Wangji, thinking that Wei Wuxian might be in genuine danger, had intervened.

‘I shouldn’t have saved him,’ Lan Wangji thought grumpily, watching Wei Wuxian continue to flirt with the spirit as they were brought back to what had happened after the young second jade had intervened.

(However, remembering the sheer and utter helplessness he felt as Wen Chao threw Wei Wuxian into the Burial Mounds completely washed away the little anger he felt.)

Unfortunately, the simulated version of him didn’t have that same luxury.

“Hehe, Lan Zhan,” Wei Wuxian rushed over, leaning on his shoulder. “Lan Zhan, it’s all thanks to you that I finally managed to see the flower maiden’s face clearly. Hey, as thanks-”

He reached into a Qiankun pouch in his sleeve.

“Have some super nice fruit milk with a scent of flowers and fresh fruit!”

“Huh?!” about half the watchers said.

“That’s… random,” Wen Qing observed.

“Speaking of which, right now you came to rescue me so hurriedly,” Wei Wuxian observed. “What? Were you worried about me?”

Lan Wangji turned away at once, his ears turning bright red, and stormed off.

Wei Wuxian chased after.

“Hey, answer me!” he requested. “Were you or not?”

The second jade looked away.

“Come on, answer me-”

As the pair got farther and farther away, the watchers were finally able to notice the sounds of crying.

“Ah!” Nie Huaisang wailed as the upset Flower Damsel swung him back and forth through the air with her vines. “Ah! Waah!”

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were already out of hearing range.

“Aren’t you forgetting someone?!” Nie Huaisang protested, but the two were lost in their own world.

“I… I apologize,” Lan Wangji coughed.

Humphing, Nie Huaisang responded, “Absolutely not forgiven! How could you leave me like that, Wangji-xiong? I take it back — yours and Wei-xiong’s older selves might be ideal parents, but I’ll stay with my Da-ge for now!”

Lan Xichen quickly hid a laugh as he saw Nie Mingjue practically begin to glow at those words.

And with that, the flashback faded away. The watchers returned to where they had been previously: that same garden, but nineteen years later. Right now, Lan Sizhui was finishing his story:

“Following that, Wei Wuxian would go around everywhere praising how beautiful the Flower Damsel had looked.”

Lan Wangji was ~~not~~ pouting.

“The Damsel was rather irritated as well. She did not show up for quite a while, and, whenever he came, she would pound him with a storm of flowers. The scene was allegedly more wondrous than anything else.”

The boys were all laughing so hard they couldn’t breathe.

“What an annoying person!” one of them said.

“Was he really that bored?”

Bringing his hand to his chin, Wei Wuxian wondered, “It’s not that ridiculous. Who hasn’t done a few things like that when they’re young? Speaking of which, why do people even know about something like this? And it’s even seriously recorded in a book? The book’s the ridiculous one.”

Lan Wangji was looking at him. Although Hanguang-jun was just as expressionless as always, there was an unusual glint in his eyes as though he was laughing at Wei Wuxian.

‘Oh, Lan Zhan, don’t you dare make fun of me,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘I know at least eight — if not ten — embarrassing stories from when you were young too! I’ll tell the boys sooner or later and destroy the invoilitile, irreproachable reputation they have of their Hanguang-jun.’

At that last line, Lan Wangji couldn't help but recall the previous night, which would surely have destroyed the 'inviolable, irreproachable reputation' his older-self had if it were to be found out.

Getting drunk.

Trying Wei Wuxian up with his forehead ribbon.

Playing tag around the room.

The kiss.

At that last thought, his ears flared red once again, and a strange ringing blocked out any other thoughts he could possibly have.

"You children are all so hyper all the time," Wei Wuxian finally said. "You've definitely been reading idle books instead of focusing on cultivation. When you get back, make sure Hanguang-jun punishes you by making you copy the Sect Rules. Ten times."

The boys wailed, "Ten times even while doing a handstand?!"

"A handstand?!" Jin Zixuan repeated.

Wei Wuxian blinked in shock, then did a double take towards Lan Wangji to ask, "Your sect makes disciples do handstands while copying? That's awful."

Calmly, Lan Wangji replied, "There was someone who did not learn their lesson by simply copying sect rules. Handstands not only guaranteed better behavior in the future, they also improved cultivation."

Wei Wuxian looked away bashfully at the roundabout referral to him.

'Added another thousand rules to the wall and changed the Lan's style of punishment,' Jiang Cheng thought. 'I don't know whether to be surprised Wei Wuxian impacted the Lans so much, or disappointed I had expected anything less.'

Night fell, and it became clear the juniors had decided to set up camp in the dried-out garden. A fire had been started, and Wei Wuxian and the Lan Juniors were sitting around it.

"Did Hanguang-jun leave?" Wei Wuxian asked, glancing around.

Nodding, Sizhui explained, "Hanguang-jun went out on patrol in order to ensure the safety of the camp."

"That's good, that's good," Wei Wuxian nodded, gesturing to the few still-standing Lans to sit with him. "Oh, that's right. I have a question. What meaning does your sect's forehead ribbon hold?"

The juniors all flinched.

And Lan Wangji's face paled and heated up in equal measure.

(And yet he wanted Wei Wuxian to know; wanted him to think about it. It was a feeling he wanted to stamp down, but the curiosity remained nonetheless.)

Unable to understand the quickly-stammering juniors, Wei Wuxian raised a hand calmly, getting them to stop. In the silence, the watchers could hear a sound from the pulses of resentful energy jumping in tune with Wei Wuxian's emotions.

Ba-dum. Ba-dum.

His heartbeat was getting faster and faster.

The red on Lan Wangji's ears darkened to the color of a fresh-picked apple.

Hesitantly, Sizhui glanced up and asked, "Senior… do you not know?"

"If I knew would I have asked? Do I seem that bored to you?"

"...Yes," Lan Jingyi mumbled. "After all, you even had us line up one by one and tricked us into looking at that sort of thing…."

"Wasn't that to get you out of your comfort zones? It really is effective. If you listen to what I say, you'll definitely benefit in the future. So: the ribbon?"

To the real juniors who hadn't yet attended Gusu, the importance of the forehead ribbon was still a mystery. They all leaned forward in anticipation.

Lan Qiren tried (and failed) to withhold an apprehensive groan.

A long while of hesitation transpired before Sizhui finally began to explain: "Okay, the forehead ribbon of the Gusu Lan Sect means to 'regulate oneself,' correct?"

"Right. And?"

"The founder of the Gusu Lan Sect, Lan An, once said one can only let go of all their regulations when they are with the one they love an cherish."

That deep, sinking feeling began to form once again in Jiang Cheng's stomach.

"As a result, the message that has been passed down to our generation is that, um, our sect's forehead ribbon is a very special object and very, very personal and sensitive. One cannot easily give another permission to touch it, one cannot take it off as they please, and once absolutely cannot tie it on anyone else."

Simultaneously, Nie Huaisang and Madam Jin sucked in breaths of air, their anticipation rising.

"It is prohibited," Lan Sizhui emphasized. "That is… unless… unless-"

The bright, flushed faces of the Lans were more than answer enough.

'Only in front of their destined beloved can they let go of their self control.'

Wei Wuxian stood up at once.

And Lan Wangji flinched back. How would Wei Wuxian respond? Excitement? Regret?

But he had kissed-

No, Lan Wangji would not allow himself to have any foolish expectations.

But-

A bright red blush spread across Wei Wuxian's cheeks, and he turned around and fled.

"Huh?!"

"What-"

"Wei Ying?!" Lan Wangji asked, nervously standing up as well. He could feel his heart fighting to escape his ribcage — banging against it at a rapid pace.

He needed to see Wei Wuxian's face.

Luckily, the simulation followed after the Yiling Patriarch at once. When it stopped, they saw Wei Wuxian leaning against a tree, breathing heavily. His cheeks were flushed, his pupils were dilated, and there was a slight shake in his body as he rested his hand on the trunk.

'What have I done?' he thought. 'Then… then-'

In a quick flash, images from the archery competition flew through the air. Wen Chao shooting an arrow, then Lan Wangji shooting said arrow down, then the conversation, then Wangji's departure, and then….

In crystal-clear clarity, they watched as the forehead ribbon was pulled off.

And now….

All the blood in Wei Wuxian's body rushed to his head.

And the segment drew to a close.

For a moment, there was silence. Then, a chuckle; a giggle; a snort.

"YES!" Nie Huaisang suddenly shouted, bursting out of his seat. Gone were the days at the beginning of the simulation where he would cower silently before all the adults. After watching everything that had happened (and watching them be wrong about Wei Wuxian time and time again), Nie Huaisang's hesitance had all but vanished. Besides, so long as the no-touch zone was in effect, he would be fine.

Which meant even Lan Wangji's embarrassed glare wasn't enough for Huaisang to hold back his excitement.

"Did you see that? Did you see that?!"

Rolling his eyes, Nie Mingjue pointed out, "We're all here; of course we all saw it."

"Yeah yeah yeah," Nie Huaisang responded, his words coming out at three times their usual speed. "Still: can you believe it?! It'll all coming together now. And they… and they kissed!!!"

Jiang Yanli laughed as well, "Yes, though, perhaps I should talk to A-Xian about that. A bit more communication before moving to that would have been nice. At least he appeared to realize his mistake immediately."

"You can talk after the simulation," Wen Ruohan interjected, making Jiang Yanli flinch slightly. "The simulation enjoys pulling tricks on us and leading us in the wrong direction at first. We should see everything before we inform him of what happened."

"And as soon as we do that, we can plan the wedding!"

"Wedding?!" Lan Qiren squawked out, turning to stare intently at Nie Huaisang. "Young Master Nie, I suggest you slow down a little. Wangji doesn't want…"

He trailed off, uncertain of the accuracy his response.

"Wangji isn't ready for that," he coughed. "Yet."

The word 'yet' made Lan Wangji jump minutely, and, for the 138th time that hour, Lan Wangji's memories replayed the kiss for him in slow motion.

And he was far from the only one to pick up on that.

"Does the 'yet' indicate they have your blessing?" Madam Jin asked.

"H-hey!" Jiang Cheng interrupted. "The Lans aren't the only sect involved. You need our blessing too, and-"

'And Wei Wuxian's my shixiong.'

'And A-Jie is his shijie.'

But martial siblings were very different from a real family.

'And I won't let you do something as disgusting as that' would never be accepted.

'And he's like a real brother to me,' might be more accurate. But-

‘He looks so much happier with you’ was the truth. 'And I don't think I have a right to ask for more than that.'

The wind left Jiang Wanyin’s sails, and he deflated on the spot.

Seeing that her son had no intention of finishing his sentence, Madam Yu quickly moved to preserve their dignity and concluded, “And there are several other matters to consider first.”

“Oh?” Wen Ruohan grinned. “And what would you be referring to when you say that?”

The warmth that had been present before now instantly left the watcher’s gazes.

“I wonder whom I could possibly have meant,” Madam Yu snarled, her voice dripping with venom. The simulation having moved on from the past made it hard to keep it at the forefronts of their minds, but no one had forgotten what the Wens had done.

And Wen Ruohan, on the other hand, had not forgotten what the Jiangs had done either: “You say he needs your blessings? I’d argue that all evidence seems to prove both he and the Yunmeng Jiang Clan are happier when they’re apart.”

Pursing his lips together, Lan Qiren stepped forward: “Is now really the time to discuss this?”

“I don’t see why not,” Nie Mingjue growled, glaring at the Chief Cultivator.

“I agree,” Wen Ruohan said. “If Yu-furen would like us to settle our differences as soon as we leave the simulation, that’s fine with me.”

“You sick-”

“No! Wedding first!”

Everyone froze, the tension in the room vanishing at once as they turned to face the source of the words: Nie Huaisang. He stared at them all unflinchingly, eyes shining.

“Think about it; in the world of the simulation, the war was the reason Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong couldn’t get together earlier. You all can have your fights and conflicts and battles if you want to, but we gotta do a wedding first,” he declared, then, turning an unnervingly smug grin on Wen Ruohan, concluded, “You shouldn’t have any problems with prioritizing that, right?”

“Huh?” his brother said.

And yet, after a moment of silence, Wen Ruohan tilted his head in acknowledgement.

‘The Nie heir really is observant, to try to stall the war using this of all things,’ he thought. ‘If the simulation doesn’t reveal more about him, I should send a group of spies into Qinghe focused specifically on watching him.’

Unfortunately, although Wen Ruohan had gained a deeper understanding, almost everyone else had just become more confused.

"...I'm sorry, you want us to focus on the wedding first?" Lan Xichen asked, not believing his own ears.

"Well," Wen Ruohan began, turning his eyes upon the coldly glaring Lan Wangji. "I suppose I can see the value in prioritizing that. However, the time we have between segments is limited; let us save this discussion for later."

"Brilliant idea, Your Excellency," Jin Guangshan said at once, eager to get back into Wen Ruohan's good graces. "On that note, regarding the actions of the Blossom Damsel…."

As Sect Leader Jin continued speaking, moving the conversation along, Lan Wangji turned his attention away from the people around him. Not much new information had been learned about the future's world in this segment, but his future self's relationship with Wei Wuxian had been altered irreversibly.

'Wei Ying kissed me. And I tied my forehead ribbon around him. And Wei Ying kissed me. And I wanted to bring him back to Gusu. And Wei Ying kissed me. And I knocked myself out in response.'

Honestly, his future-self made no sense whatsoever.

And yet, Hanguang-jun was communicating much better with Wei Wuxian than the teenage Lan Wangji had been, so perhaps he still had things to learn.

'And Wei Ying kissed me.'

And they had still never actually met, but-

'I think I might lo-'

"-ve got someone to introduce to you, Uncle Jiang," Wei Wuxian said cheerily, showing not a trace of the cold, knife-like anger that had reared its head around Jin Zixun.

"Oh? Who is it?"

"One of the other disciples said he'd mentioned this kid to you, but I wanted to introduce him in person," Wei Wuxian waved an arm behind himself, gesturing at the youngest of the children standing there. "Uncle, this is Mo Xuanyu."

Jiang Fengmian froze.

Jiang Fengmian stood frozen.

“Mo Xuanyu?” he repeated, turning to stare down at the child. A pair of wide, bright silver orbs looked back at him, blinking back tears as the boy trembled.

(In fear.)

Just like a young Wei Wuxian had looked, when he found out Jiang Cheng had dogs at the pier. So Jiang Fengmian had tried to fix that — alienating his son from him in the process. So then Sect Leader Jiang had tried to fix that, ordering Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng to stay together, hoping that getting his first human friend would help with his son’s loneliness.

And then Wei Wuxian had been chased off, climbed up a tree, jumped down onto Jiang Yanli, and gotten injured in the process. Not once through any of that had any of his children (blood related or not) thought to approach him for help.

And here Mo Xuanyu stood.

Terrified.

Because of Jiang Fengmian.

And, as per usual, a voice he recognized as his wife’s completely drowned out any other thought he could have:

‘You said you would do better, so do it! Don’t just stand on the side like before! You’ve taken care of hundreds of young disciples throughout your life! Why is this any different?!’

It wasn’t different. He knew it wasn’t. In this case, the right thing to do would be to kneel down in front of him and-

Mo Xuanyu flinched back as Jiang Fengmian approached, frightened by the fast movement.

“I… Are you okay?”

“Sorry!” the boy cried out, eye watering more and more by the second. “Sorry! I didn’t — I’m sorry!”

Mo Xuanyu knew he wasn't supposed to flinch back. He knew showing fear in front of ~~Madam Mo~~ the highest power in the area would only end in disaster. And now even his mom was gone. She was back with the Mos and Mo Xuanyu was here, alone, abandoned and left to survive by himself. And these were cultivators. Mo Xuanyu's father was a cultivator too, but Jiang Fengmian wasn't his father and what if he… and what if he….

"I-I'm sorry!" Mo Xuanyu bawled out, sobbing even more heavily despite his attempts to stop. "Sorry!"

"Shhh. It's fine. Nothing's wrong," Jiang Fengmian tried to help, but his protests went unheard.

"I'm sorry! I'm sorry! I'm sorry!"

Suddenly, Mo Xuanyu felt a hand on his back, rubbing slow, soothing circles. He paused.

"It's alright," Wei Wuxian — Mo Xuanyu's new Da-shixiong — whispered. "Uncle Jiang won't hurt you, I promise. I'll keep you safe."

The boy's eyes widened, a few traces of hope sneaking in. Jiang Fengmian forced himself to keep smiling.

This was ridiculous. Wei Wuxian had always been good with kids, but Jiang Fengmian had never been bad, per say. He should be better than this; he should know what to do.

But he had thought he was doing well with Wei Wuxian, and that was the opposite of true.

"Feeling better?" Wei Wuxian asked, noticing Mo Xuanyu's sniffles start to dissipate. A small nod came in return, and Wei Wuxian smiled. Absent-mindedly, Jiang Fengmian noticed that his head disciple was still wearing his father's old robes, as he had taken to doing so whenever he represented the sect. It was strange to see those old robes being used again.

'Changze,' he thought. 'What would you think, if you had been allowed to see the simulation?'

He would never know, but he could guess. After all, Wei Wuxian and Mo Xuanyu now stood before Jiang Fengmian, a memorial to all of his failures.

(He had never met Mo Xuanyu, but it had been this body that Jiang Fengmian's son attacked 'just in case' it might be Wei Wuxian. Even with everything that had happened since, Sect Leader Jiang had never forgotten that.)

Seeing that Jiang Fengmian hadn't moved in a while, A-Lu stepped closer and asked, "Sect Leader Jiang?"

Hearing that, Wei ~~Changze~~ Wuxian glanced up as well, still rubbing circles onto ~~Wei Wuxian's~~ Mo Xuanyu's back. Jiang Fengmian quickly forced himself to calm down. That may be the body Wei Wuxian would one day reside in, but it was still the child Mo Xuanyu before him. It wasn't Wei Wuxian; there was no reason for Jiang Fengmian to hesitate.

(But hesitate he did.)

He continued hesitating in the way that had caused everything around him — the children before him, the walls of the pier, the simple comfort in Wei Wuxian's gaze — to be destroyed by the Wens, in a future not-yet seen.

'That's right! I want revenge!' Jiang Fengmian's simulated son had shouted, burning with hate. 'Revenge' had become his driving motivation, rather than the ideals of the sect. And that continued, years down the line.

Until the older one was known for torturing demonic cultivators on the off chance that they might be Wei Wuxian.

All because Jiang Fengmian had messed up with his son, and messed up with Wei Wuxian, and failed against the Wens, and now-

'He's still my head disciple-'

'He's wasted on you!' Wen Ruohan had shouted back.

And now Wei ~~Changze~~ Wuxian stood before him with ~~his son~~ Mo Xuanyu and Jiang Fengmian was just going to mess up and lose everything all over again-

"Uncle Jiang?" Wei Wuxian asked, and the trembling Mo Xuanyu's eyes widened in apprehension.

'Don't you dare hesitate now,' Madam Yu hissed.

"Ah… yes," Jiang Fengmian cleared his throat, making sure his expression was as gentle as possible. "I'm sorry for startling you, A-Yu. Are you okay?"

The boy nodded frantically, hiding his arm behind his back. The sudden motion caught Jiang Fengmian's eye, and his attention was instantly drawn to the blackened bandages wrapped around it.

"Oh, Cha — A-Xian," he quickly corrected himself. "It seems A-Yu needs some new bandages. Could you bring him to the healer?"

"Hm?" Wei Wuxian glanced over. "Oh, would you look at that. Seems like someone's been having fun around here."

Mo Xuanyu blushed, burying his face in Wei Wuxian's chest.

"No worries, my young disciple. Allow me to aid you!" with a dramatic swing, Wei Wuxian picked Mo Xuanyu off the ground and held him up. "Uncle Jiang has given us a mission, A-Yu. Do you think we can manage?"

At that question, Mo Xuanyu peeked out from Wei Wuxian's chest, glancing over at Jiang Fengmian. Whatever he saw there allowed him to relax a little more, and he nodded once.

“Fantastic!” Wei Wuxian declared. “Come along, A-Yue, A-Lu. We’ve got a job to do!”

“On it!” the siblings shouted, running after and leaving Jiang Fengmian behind. As he watched them go, a discomforting sense of uncertainty overcame him.

‘Fengmian, meet A-Ying,’ Wei Changze had told him, proudly displaying the brightly-smiling boy in his arms. ‘A-Ying, say ‘hello’ to your Uncle Jiang.’

‘Hi, Uncle Jiang!’ the silver-eyed child giggled, and, on the side, Cangse Sanren joined her son in his laughter.

Jiang Fengmian could remember having smiled back.

Then Cangse’s grin turned mischievous and she asked, ‘A-Ying, don’t you have something to show your Uncle Jiang?’

The then-two-year-old boy’s eyes had widened, and he quickly scampered out of Wei Changze’s arms to stand in front of Jiang Fengmian, motioning for the man to kneel down. A bemused smile on his face, Jiang Fengmian had done just that.

Practically bouncing off the floor in his excitement, Wei Wuxian had held his hands out to his father, who calmly deposited a lilac pouch into Wei Wuxian’s waiting hands. The boy then spun around, holding the bundle out to Jiang Fengmian.

‘Open it, open it, open it!’ he requested.

And so Jiang Fengmian had. Reaching forward slowly, he had grabbed onto the string tying the bag together and undone the bow. Instantly, there was a flash of blinding light, and then, when it faded….

‘Tada!’ Wei Wuxian declared, holding out a miniature lotus flower with great pride. It had been made out of the bag, a talisman written on the inside of the pouch activating to reform and reshape its seams until the final product resembled one of the plants that gave Jiang Fengmian’s home its name.

‘Changze and I wrote the talisman out, but it was A-Ying’s idea,’ Cangse revealed. ‘I bet he’s going to be quite a little inventor when he grows up!’

Flabbergasted, Jiang Fengmian had only been able to laugh in response.

That was the only time he had met Wei Wuxian while the boy’s parents were still alive, and it was the last time he had seen them. He had never once mentioned the event to the boy, and Wei Wuxian had been too young at the time to remember anything.

Why had Jiang Fengmian never brought it up?

(Because Ziyuan would have gotten mad. Jiang Fengmian had just wanted to spare everyone the conflict.)

Somehow, it almost seemed like he had suppressed those thoughts so much he had forgotten about them entirely. At least, until he had seen Wei Wuxian, dressed in Wei Changze's robes, pick up the boy whose body the future Wei Wuxian would one day inhabit. At that, he paused. Jiang Fengmian really didn't know how to feel. Logically, he knew he should have done better just then — that Mo Xuanyu wasn't Wei Wuxian, and even if he had been, that wasn't an excuse.

But-

He closed his eyes, and an image of the burning pier flooded his mind.

(Even after a few days of being awake, standing in Yunmeng and not seeing the destruction that had overcome the simulated one felt strange to him.)

(Having left the simulation so soon after the war meant Jiang Fengmian hadn't fully gotten to see its recovery from what happened. However, after recalling what his children and Wei Wuxian had been forced to go through right after the massacre of Lotus Pier, he knew he had no right to complain.)

The child Mo Xuanyu peeked out from Wei Wuxian's hold, speaking timidly to A-Yue and A-Lu, a small smile on his face.

'Still, that was pathetic,' Madam Yu's voice sighed. 'Do better. Don't you dare ruin another kid.'

After all, hadn't Wen Ruohan made it very clear what he thought of Jiang Fengmian's performance? And the Chief Cultivator might be an insane, homicidal sadist, but that didn't mean he was wrong about everything.

'I'll do better,' Jiang Fengmian promised. 'I will.'

"...So," Nie Huaisang began.

"So?" Lan Wangji inquired, outwardly calm but privately dreading whatever the Nie heir's next words would end up being.

Tilting back and forth nervously, Nie Huaisang spoke double-speed as he inquired, "Do you have any plans for when we get out?"

After a pause, Lan Wangji answered, "We agreed to only discuss that after we have been given all the information the simulation has to offer. I will wait."

"No, no, not about the sects' politics!" Nie Huaisang protested at once. "About Wei-xiong! What are you gonna do with him?!"

"I-" Lan Wangji began, only to cut off, ears flaming. "I will… I hope to meet him properly."

"And then?"

There was a beat of silence, and the flush on Lan Wangji's ears darkened.

Then slowly, hesitantly, Jin Zixuan raised his hand and offered, "A-Li and I thought maybe you two could join us on our first date. She'll be able to bring him easily, if the disciple exchange has been canceled."

Despite his best efforts, Lan Wangji couldn't stop himself from perking up at the suggestion.

"Great idea," Lan Xichen agreed at once. "I know; Wangji, I saw you and Jin Zixuan-gongzi looking at that ice cream shop in Caiyi town during the abyss segment. Why don't we-"

"No, no, we can't have their first meeting be there!" Nie Huaisang protested at once. "A simple ice cream shop isn't nearly romantic enough! This has to be perfect!"

Rolling his eyes, Nie Mingjue muttered, "Huaisang, don't you think you're taking this a bit too far? We have bigger things to worry about dealing with than their relationship."

Lan Wangji nodded frantically in agreement.

Meanwhile, Nie Huaisang gave a scandalized gasp.

"Da-ge, you can't mean that!" he protested. "It's clearly the most important thing going on in the simulation right now. I mean, we finished Yi City, we've gotten most of the past out of the way, and just need to finish collecting all the pieces of that annoying corpse. I've had enough focus on tragedy; we're on the happy times now!"

Nie Mingjue supposed he didn't have a response to that. It certainly did seem to be the direction the simulation was going, after all. He was grateful for that; he wasn't sure Huaisang would have been able to take much more tragedy, even if the people involved were strangers to them.

Just as Nie Mingjue had finished that thought, he noticed the world around him darken as the simulation began anew. It was a little difficult to tell what was going on at first, mostly because Wei Wuxian's thoughts were a rather uncharacteristic frenzy of sheer, undisputed panic.

'I took off his ribbon, I took off his ribbon, I took off — the ribbon, it means-'

The memory of that fateful moment replayed over and over again before their eyes. The archery competition, Wen Chao's actions, and then Wei Wuxian's ignorant attempt to help and-

'I wish they would stop showing this,' Lan Wangji thought, glaring at the ground in embarrassment. Whether that embarrassment was in regards to Wei Wuxian's forward action or his other-self's infuriated response was hard to tell, but, regardless, he was the only one upset to see this scene played again.

Jiang Yanli gave a happy little cheer.

‘All these years… I never really gave that incident much thought,’ the overwhelmed Wei Wuxian realized. ‘At first I did wonder if the forehead ribbon had a special meaning to the Lan clan, but, afterward, I completely forgot about it. Though, in hindsight, the way the other Lan disciples had glared at me….’

“As they well should have,” Lan Qiren grumbled. His slightly-growing approval of Wei Wuxian did not mean he had forgiven everything the boy had done — and this was undeniably at the top of his list of sins.

~~Which, considering they had started the simulation with ‘he’s a monster who invented demonic cultivation and murdered thousands,’ was quite telling.~~

“Now, uncle,” Lan Xichen gave a sunny smile, keeping his voice low so that Wangji wouldn’t be able to hear. “It’s only inappropriate if Wangji and Wei-gongzi remain ‘just friends.’ I believe there’s an easy solution to this-”

“Xichen, honestly! You — you’ve taken on all of your mother’s worst traits!”

It was only after he had finished saying those words that Lan Qiren realized that he had touched upon a subject that was never spoken of at Gusu Lan. He pursed his lips together, looking away from his nephews at once.

‘Like… A-Niang?’ Lan Xichen mentally repeated, eyes going wide at the revelation.

However, try as he might, he couldn’t bring himself to inquire further.

And that was lucky for the Nie heir, as that meant that Nie Huaisang had a front row seat to watch as Wei Wuxian’s panic reached never before seen heights.

‘No wonder Lan Zhan got so mad! His forehead ribbon was yanked off by a brat without his consent in front of everyone’s eyes! To think that Lan Zhan didn’t shoot me on the spot! His self-control is frightening.’

A panicked sweat covered Wei Wuxian’s face, and his eyes became wide in horror.

‘People with good manners are so scary! He is indeed worthy of the name ‘Hanguang-jun!”

Having worked himself up into a tizzy, Wei Wuxian then began to pace back and forth, circling around the tree he had leaned against at a breakneck pace.

“He is indeed worthy of the name Hanguang-jun,” Jin Zixuan quietly repeated, not noticing how his words made the nearby Lan Wangji jump as if burned by his own embarrassment. The Jin heir was far more preoccupied with his own thoughts.

The last segment had made one thing indisputably clear: Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were the most romantic people on the face of the planet. And that was coming from Jin Zixuan, who had seen his father masterfully flirt with….

Who had watched as his father….

With women who weren't his mother….

Anyways, despite his own lack of experience, Jin Zixuan did feel as though he knew romance when he saw it, so he was confident when he said Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were the undisputed best. After the soup incident and the many, many, many things his other self had said, Jin Zixuan knew he would have his work cut out for him to make it up to Jiang Yanli.

The most obvious solution, in this case, was to observe the masters. He wouldn't miss a single thing.

'Wait a minute,' Wei Wuxian's thoughts abruptly veered off. 'Since coming back to life, I've continued touching his forehead ribbon, haven't I? Quite a few times at that! And just now-'

An image of Hanguang-jun proudly presenting the tied-up Wei Wuxian covered the screen.

Lan Wangji flinched.

In the real world, the Lan healers began to panic as their second young master once again began to heat up unnaturally.

"Lao-shi! It's another fever on Lan-er-gongzi!"

"Again?!" the main doctor cried out. "Hurry! Bring me a wet cloth!"

The incident would not be so concerning normally, but for it to happen to a young man with the cultivation level Lan Wangji had sparked many concerns. In addition, no identifiable pattern could be found. Sometimes he would heat up for only a few seconds, while other times his heart rate would double for hours on end! It had not yet reached a level at which it would be considered dangerous, but the lack of an explanation as to why this was happening necessitated the current alertness.

"Stay strong, Lan-er-gongzi," one of the healers whispered, clutching his hand tightly. "You're the second jade of Gusu Lan. I truly believe you can make it through this."

Despite being unaware of their concerns, Lan Wangji worked desperately to calm his racing heart.

Just like the simulated Wei Wuxian, who was still pacing back and forth endlessly.

"What's he doing, walking around there like that?" Lan Jingyi wondered, watching Wei Wuxian lap the tree repeatedly. "...Did he eat something bad?"

"Maybe," another boy agreed. "Look at that, his face is switching back and forth between red and white."

After considering that for a moment, yet another boy said, "We didn't eat anything particular there though. Could it be… is it because of the meaning behind the forehead ribbon?"

"Got it in one!" Nie Huaisang cheered.

(Subsequently, Lan Wangji's attempt to calm himself down was rendered moot.)

Wei Wuxian made another frenzied lap around the tree.

"Huh. It seems he really is obsessed with Hanguang-jun. Look at how happy he is."

'Happy?' Lan Wangji repeated, straightening himself out of his embarrassment to focus on the simulation. He watched, speechless, as Wei Wuxian made another loop.

That same word repeated in Jiang Wanyin's head as well, though it was greeted by a completely different set of emotions.

By approximately the fiftieth loop, Wei Wuxian had finally managed to start calming himself down. He paused in his stride, taking in several deep breaths.

Lan Wangji had… with his forehead ribbon….

Hanguang-jun had just….

A deep, deep flush overwhelmed Lan Wangji's ears, and blood rushed to his head so quickly he felt faint.

Suddenly, there was a crunch of dry leaves from behind.

Wei Wuxian and spun around. There was a figure before him bathed in shadow. Tall; straight; dignified.

And missing a head.

"Oh, no," Wen Qing sighed, and Nie Mingjue gave a nod of agreement.

Wei Wuxian's smile froze, and he turned to face the corpse head on. Slowly, the Lan juniors also began to notice its presence, turning away from the fire to stare at the unmoving creature. Their eyes widened.

"Shh," Wei Wuxian softly whispered, putting his pointer finger in front of his lips. The juniors froze.

It really was amazing to Wen Ruohan how, in such little time, these juniors had gone from viewing Mo Xuanyu as a 'cutsleeve lunatic' to trusting him enough to not defend themselves when a fierce corpse was standing directly in front of them. And to think that Wei Wuxian had ended up in the Burial Mounds at the end of his last life rather than training the next generation of Jiangs to match his skills. Not for the first time, Wen Ruohan sighed.

‘What a waste,’ he concluded yet again.

~~Especially because, if he, Wen Qing, and now Nie Huaisang were right, Wei Wuxian hadn’t been physically capable of cultivating with the Jiangs towards the end there.~~

The headless figure reached out to the side, and, upon coming into contact with a tree trunk, began feeling it out, as though trying to figure out what it was. He walked a small step forward, finally stepping into the light.

‘Woah, he’s huge,’ Nie Huaisang realized at once. ‘He almost looks like-’

That thought cut off as Nie Huaisang’s gaze landed on his older brother. Because yes, they did look similar, but it couldn’t be him. After all, Nie Huaisang had gone through a whole emotional whirlwind not too long ago upon figuring out the truth behind the Nie Sects burial grounds. There was nothing more to discover.

(Nie Mingjue couldn’t be this corpse that had been destroyed so thoroughly it was completely unrecognizable.)

‘Oh dear,’ Wei Wuxian thought, gazing down at the rags on the floor. ‘Those must be the Qiankun pouches. Lan Zhan and I were so busy following Yi City that we didn’t have much time to play rest, and the attractive force between the parts has grown stronger now that more pieces are together.’

“The body parts aren’t the only things whose ‘attractive forces’ have grown stronger,” Lan Xichen teased, nearly causing a squeak of steam to escape Lan Wangji’s burning ears.

The headless man put his hands to his neck, feeling around again. Its hands brushed over the clean, crimson cut on its throat, and checked and rechecked for his missing head. After some time had passed without success, rage suddenly overtook the corpse and it slammed its palm into the tree beside it.

With a bone-shattering crack, the trunk broke in two.

‘What a temper!’ Wei Wuxian observed.

Although Lan Wangji had complete faith in Wei Wuxian’s abilities, the large number of juniors surrounding him (all of whom Wei Wuxian would have to protect) caused him to tense slightly in preparation.

At long last, the terrified Lan juniors finally managed to speak:

“W-what sort of monster is this?” Lan Jingyi stuttered, trembling as he held his sword firmly before him.

Seeing the way Wen Qing frowned at the ‘monster’ comment, Nie Mingjue unconsciously did so as well. The Wen doctor was an extremely smart woman who had ~~proven him wrong about the Wens and~~ saved Jiang Wanyin’s life despite the risk to herself and her family. Her brother had proven time and time again that his title of ‘the Ghost General’ was not at all indicative of his moral character.

But the fear Lan Jingyi had of the unknown being in front of him made it all too easy to understand why the sects would have become so scared of Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation.

However, casual as can be, Wei Wuxian just said, “You haven’t been reviewing the basics, have you? This is obviously a corpse, categorized as a ghoul type. How could you refer to it as a ‘monster?’ That’s a completely different category!”

"Shut up!" Jiang Cheng hissed, watching the corpse warily.

Similarly, Lan Sizhui whispered, “Senior, you… you’re talking so loudly. What if he hears you?”

Carrying the same sentiment as Jiang Cheng's words, just being much more polite.

“It’s alright; it’ll be fine no matter how loudly we talk. He doesn’t have a head, so he doesn’t have eyes or ears, which means he can’t see or hear anything. If you don’t believe me, give it a shout.”

Perking up in curiosity, Lan Jingyi asked, “Really? Let me try!”

A loud yell broke through the night as Lan Jingyi tried his hardest to make a loud noise.

A dark cloud formed around Lan Qiren.

‘He’s just a boy,’ Lan Qiren told himself. ‘Just a child. Hasn’t Wei Wuxian shown you that righteousness does not inherently connect with acting proper? And, in the first place, Lan Jingyi is a simulation. You can’t do anything-’

The yelling got louder and louder.

’Can’t… do-’

And louder-

‘It doesn’t… it’s-’

His voice went up eight pitches and the volume increased tenfold.

“Would you be quiet!” Lan Qiren shouted back.

Luckily, and by complete coincidence, Lan Jingyi decided he was done shortly after.

“U-uncle,” Lan Xichen approached cautiously. “Are you… alright?”

Huffing loudly, Lan Qiren grumbled, “We must thank our ancestors that we have Lan Sizhui. We would all be doomed otherwise.”

However, at that moment, the corpse turned to face the Lan juniors and began to approach.

Lan Qiren’s anger vanished at once.

“Move!” he shouted.

“But you said it would be alright!!!” Lan Jingyi wailed.

Cupping his hands around his mouth, Wei Wuxian shouted, “It really is alright! Look: I’m shouting at it, but it’s not coming over, right? It's not going to you because you were loud, but because of the fire! It’s hot! There’s a lot of live humans, and they’re all male! The yang energy is too heavy! He can’t see or hear, but he can walk in your direction! Why aren’t you putting the fire out already? Scatter!”

“Ah,” Jin Zixuan breathed out, and he saw Jiang Yanli relax immensely at her martial brother’s words. Although Jin Ling was (thankfully) not present anymore, seeing their son face death alongside these juniors had made the couple quite attached to them as well.

(Which was especially weird, given how some of the ‘juniors’ were technically older than them.)

By now, the fire had been put out by a wave of Sizhui’s hand, and the boys had all quickly scattered around the deserted garden. One second passed, then two, and the headless corpse continued to not move. It had indeed lost its sense of direction.

Along with the simulated juniors, Madam Jin, Jiang Yanli, and Jin Zixuan breathed out sighs of relief.

Then, the corpse began to move towards one of the boys.

“Wei Wuxian!” Madam Yu called out at once as the simulated juniors began to scream.

Jiang Yanli frowned and tensed up, hoping that her mother wouldn’t start blaming Wei Wuxian yet again. However, to Jiang Yanli’s great surprise, she noticed that Madam Yu’s always-expressive face was not flushed in rage nor scrunched up in scorn. That was concern.

Madam Yu was worried for ~~her grandson’s friends~~ the juniors and was relying on Wei Wuxian to protect them.

“But you said it would be fine if we scattered!” Lan Jingyi screeched (causing the real Lan Qiren to wince).

“Don’t move!” Wei Wuxian ordered in response. Just like before, the juniors followed Wei Wuxian’s commands without even pausing to think about it.

Wei Wuxian knelt down and picked up a pebble that laid beside his feet. With a flick of his wrist, he threw it towards the corpse, and it bounced against the man's back.

The corpse instantly froze.

After another two seconds had passed, it turned around and began to walk towards Wei Wuxian.

Madam Yu finally relaxed. Although it was carefully suppressed, Jiang Yanli could still see a bit of gratitude in her mother's gaze.

And that was the main difference, wasn't it? There had always been an unspoken expectation in their family that Wei Wuxian would put his life on the line to defend them — her parents had proven that well enough by their last words to him and Jiang Cheng. But now, after everything Madam Yu had seen from him….

Wei Wuxian didn't have to do anything for the juniors. Putting aside keeping them alive, he didn't need to teach them or take care of them or to try and teach Jin Ling to be more accepting; he was doing that because of who he was.

Perhaps Madam Yu was finally starting to understand that.

With loud thumps that shook the earth, the corpse stepped closer and closer to Wei Wuxian. Breathing softly, the Yiling Patriarch merely shifted slightly to the side (two steps, maybe less), and the corpse walked right by.

"I told you to scatter, not to run around," Wei Wuxian said, undisturbed as ever. "Don't run too quickly. The ghoul has a high level of cultivation. If you move too fast, he'll notice the shifts in the air."

Backing up slowly, Sizhui observed, "It seems like he's searching for something. Is it… his head?"

'Clever boy,' Wen Ruohan thought, not for the first time. Having a teacher like Wei Wuxian work with a student like Lan Sizhui really was a sight to behold. The Chief Cultivator still wanted Wei Wuxian to be taken in by the Wen Sect when this was all over, but….

His eyes drifted towards Lan Wangji.

'The Lan Sect is a good second option,' he thought.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian nodded in confirmation: "That's right, he's searching for his head. There are quite a few heads here, so, since he doesn't know which one is his, he'll pull off each person's head one by one and place it on top of his own neck to see if it fits or not."

Nie Huaisang squeaked, and Nie Mingjue moved protectively in front of him.

"If it does fit, he'll make-do and wear it for some time; if it doesn't, he'll just throw it away. You should walk slowly. You don't want to be caught by him."

Although Nie Mingjue understood Wen Qing's complicated feelings on the matter due to what had happened to the simulated Wen Ning, he couldn't shut down the instincts that told him to watch the corpse carefully, continuing to guard his brother without rest.

The juniors, equally scared, moved their hands defensively around their necks and backed off. It almost looked like they were playing hide-and-seek with the ghoul, given the delicate way they moved. Every time it seemed like the ghoul had caught on to the presence of one of the boys, Wei Wuxian would throw a rock at it and attract its attention again.

Although Lan Wangji didn't have any particular objections with Wei Wuxian's way of handling the situation, he couldn't help but frown: 'This is similar to how Wei Ying needed to distract the Xuanwu of Slaughter all those years ago. It is quite admirable, but… I do wish there was another way.'

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian appeared as casual as could be. Hands behind his back, he began circling the corpse, observing it closely and thinking, 'Our dear friend's posture seems a bit strange, doesn't it?' he thought. 'He keeps waving his arm with a loose fist.'

Now that Wei Wuxian had mentioned it, the watchers could see it as well. And, even before Wei Wuxian's thoughts reached their conclusion, the Nie brothers froze, eyes widening.

"Are we just going to continue walking like this?! How long do we have to continue?!" Lan Jingyi complained.

"Da-ge?" Lan Xichen asked, noticing Nie Mingjue's sudden stiffness.

"...Of course we don't have to," Wei Wuxian assured them after a pause.

Instantly comforted by this, Lan Sizhui turned to Jingyi and told him, "Senior will definitely think of something."

And think of something he did:

Taking in a deep gulp of air, Wei Wuxian prepared himself before shouting, "Hanguang-jun!!!!! Hanguang-jun!!!! Come save me! Hanguang-jun, are you back yet?!"

Lan Wangji did a double take at that, while Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng burst into laughter. Normally, Nie Huaisang would have joined them or led the charge.

Now, however, he was concerningly quiet.

The simulation, however, was not:

"Hanguang-jun!"

"Come save us!" the juniors joined in.

"Help me!"

“Save us!”

“Hanguang-jun!!!”

Tears were beginning to pour down the youngest disciple’s cheeks as their cries for ~~their father~~ Hanguang-jun continued without rest. A few moments later, a soft, flowing note from a xiao sounded amid the night.

“Ah, Lan-gongzi, that’s you, isn’t it?” Jiang Yanli asked, turning to her fellow older sibling with a warm smile. Lan Xichen barely acknowledged the arrival of his other-self, however.

“Da-ge?” he repeated again.

“I-” the man paused, uncharacteristically stumbling over his words. “Hold on, just… give me a minute.”

Vibrations from Hanguang-jun’s guqin followed a moment after.

“Hanguang-jun! Zewu-jun!” the juniors cried out, tears still streaming down their faces. The relief in their expressions was obvious.

Lan Qiren tilted his head up a bit, unable to resist preening in pride at his darling nephews.

(His eldest heir was, however, preoccupied. Confused by Nie Mingjue’s reaction, he had turned to stare at the mysterious corpse a little more closely. And now, at long last, he made the connection.)

“...Oh,” he whispered, softly, eyes widening in horror.

Two slender figures flashed through the garden’s worn-down doors. They had the same, impeccable, jade-like posture, and identical snowy robes. They walked shoulder to shoulder with each other, one carrying a xiao, and the other, a guqin.

The headless shadow shifted, and both of the white-robed cultivators paused.

The simulated Lan Xichen’s expression quickly shifted to match the real one’s.

“Xiongzhang?” Lan Wangji whispered cautiously. By now, more and more of the watchers had noticed the frozen states of Sect Leader Nie and the Lan heir, but none had managed to figure out the reason why.

‘It has to be someone else,’ Nie Huaisang thought. ‘That can’t be-’

His eyes, against his better judgment, moved to the corpse’s left arm. Along it, there was a thin, white scar.

‘A few years ago, I-I had climbed one of the sect’s walls — a bird I wanted to catch kept getting away — and then I got stuck. I needed his help, but when he reached for me I slipped and-’

And then the fourteen year old Nie Mingjue had jumped out to catch him, getting a long cut along his wrist from a branch when he skidded along it on the way down. Nie Huaisang had gotten away with just a few bruises, but he had never forgotten the existence of that scar. He would recognize it anywhere. The only reason he hadn't earlier was because the various body parts had been strewn about, not assembled into the proper order.

'But I don't recognize the others!' he reminded himself. 'Across his chest, and across his legs… I would know if he had ones like that!'

There was a long line straight across his chest, and his arms and torso contained wounds that looked more like torture marks than anything else. That must have been why the simulated Zewu-jun paused; he was shocked by what he saw. That didn't necessarily mean he knew someone who had been injured to this extent.

Except the simulation was 20 years in the future. A war would pass between now and then — and thinking about everything that had happened to the simulated Wei Wuxian over that time — of course ~~Nie Mingjue~~ the corpse would gain scars that Nie Huaisang didn't recognize.

'But it can't be-'

(But then how would he explain the simulated Lan Xichen's reaction? If anyone would know the scars and injuries Nie Mingjue would receive in the coming decade, it would be him.)

All the blood left Nie Huaisang's face at once.

Just a short while ago, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had been trying to summon the corpse's soul to set it to rest. Despite who they were — despite everything they could do — they had failed.

'It's almost impossible for that to not have worked,' the Yiling Patriarch had thought. 'Unless… unless this person's soul has been cut apart along with its corpse. Wow… it seems this person's death was even worse than mine.'

Although the simulated Lan Xichen remained frozen, Hanguang-jun worked fast. Bichen flew forward, circling around the corpse and blocking off its attacks. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian grinned. Alone, he had no way to put the corpse to rest. However, now that Lan Wangji was here to help, there was plenty he could do.

Resentful energy seeped out of the corpse, swirling until it was a whirlwind of darkness. The body ran forward, moving right past the frozen Lan Xichen and jumping onto a nearby roof.

The first jade's hair was thrown to the side by the corpse's near-instantaneous movement, but he otherwise didn't react at all.

"Xichen?" Lan Qiren asked, noticing that the real one appeared just as shocked as his virtual counterpart.

Bichen and the corpse clashed again, the latter releasing a cloud of resentment each time they collided. Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian moved swiftly around them. The garden's shack was made of weak, weathered material, so he had to move lightly, hopping onto a box, a gutter, and finally onto the roof. As soon as the corpse noticed the nearby presence of a human, it switched targets to chase after it.

With a grin, Wei Wuxian ran.

The nearby resentment jumped to attention, filling the watchers' veins with adrenaline as the fight went on.

(Which only served to make those already-panicking even worse off.)

The corpse's powerful arm snapped towards Wei Wuxian, but was fended off at the last second by Bichen. Wei Wuxian grinned wider, still unconcerned. Bichen attacked again.

Then, sensing a powerful sword glare coming his way, the corpse raised his arm menacingly.

'It's that move again!' Wei Wuxian realized.

It most certainly was — no matter how much Nie Mingjue wanted to deny it.

Bichen came flying forward, but, moving nearly too fast for the eye to track, the corpse agilely dodged and snatched the hilt of the blade. Gripping the blade tightly, the corpse brought it close and began to examine it, as though trying to figure out what he had latched onto despite his missing eyes.

The juniors paled considerably.

"He grabbed Hanguang-jun's sword?" Jin Zixuan gaped. "Who on earth is this?"

Lan Xichen jumped at the question.

However, the simulated Lan Wangji remained as calm as ever. Pulling out his guqin, he set it flat across his arm and reached down to pluck a single string.

In a flash of blinding blue light, a single wave of spiritual energy was sent out. It became a formless arrow, whistling as it whipped towards the distant corpse-

With a slash of Bichen, the corpse cut the energy in two.

'That wasn't a normal slash,' Wen Ruohan realized, narrowing his eyes. 'A two handed grab and a vertical attack, rather than a diagonal one.'

He glanced over at the frozen Nie brothers, and felt his lips curl into a smirk.

'Ah, I see now.'

Frowning, Wei Wuxian slipped away into the shadows, trusting Lan Wangji to be able to handle the corpse for now. The battle between the two powers continued, the corpse resuming its attack.

(Using Bichen as if it was a saber.)

'Soul shattered,' Nie Huaisang thought again, that term playing on repeat within his mind. 'His soul was shattered. His body was torn to pieces and his soul was shattered!'

He convulsed slightly, feeling a wave of nausea rise up within him despite the fact that there was no food in his stomach to empty out.

'...I thought his body fighting forever in a saber hall was bad. This-'

Before he could finish that thought, a piercing note joined Lan Wangji's guqin, and a wave of suppressing resentment followed suit.

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli realized, relaxing at once (and not just because the resentment commanded her to).

Wei Wuxian had indeed returned. Using the simple bamboo flute he had crafted in the forest, he joined Lan Wangji in playing Rest. However, his playing was nothing short of atrocious.

Wincing at the sharp, piercing scratches coming out of Wei Wuxian's flute, Jiang Cheng grumbled, "Why can't you ever just play normally?! What's the point in you being so talented if this is what we have to hear?!"

However, putting the quality of the music aside, Wei Wuxian's musical cultivation was as flawless as ever. Dark resentment joined the clear spiritual power Lan Wangji was sending out, cooperating with it to attack the corpse on all sides. The headless corpse jumped forward again, and Lan Xichen finally returned to his senses. He grabbed Liebing and began to play as well.

The corpse froze, then slowly turned toward Lan Xichen. Although it was unable to see or hear, it could feel the spiritual power being given off.

'It recognizes him?' Lan Wangji wondered.

A whirlpool of energy formed around the corpse. It slashed and hacked away at the white, blue, and dark red lines, but its attempts at resisting were quickly shut down. Wei Wuxian's eyes glowed an even brighter red, and Lan Xichen's face fell into despair.

The fierce corpse made one final resistance before finally succumbing to their power. With a stagger, he fell to the ground, his body parts unlinking themselves and collapsing into a graceless pile on the dirt.

Now, finally, as the resentment in the air began to clean up, the watchers became able to think again.

“Xiongzhang?” Lan Wangji repeated, concerned.

“We might be wrong!” Nie Huaisang shouted, saying the words in a single breath. “We should… let’s wait to see what Wei-xiong has to say.”

In other words: ‘let’s not even consider the possibility until that’s the only option.’

Nodding once, Lan Wangji stepped back. He was beginning to form his own theories on the matter, and continuing to press now would be pointless. As Nie Huaisang had said, all would most likely be revealed soon enough.

Seeing that the corpse had finally been stopped, Lan Wangji put his guqin down and summoned back his sword. He and Wei Wuxian walked toward the body parts and began to separate them again into guqin pouches, sealing them away. The juniors twittered back and forth, bowing to Zewu-jun, but too high-energy to give anything more than an absent-minded tilt of their heads.

“Go rest,” Lan Wangji ordered at once, causing several of them to jump.

Frowning, Lan Jingyi protested, “But, Hanguang-jun, it’s not nine yet.”

“I understand,” Lan Sizhui said instead, tugging the confused Lan Jingyi away from the scene. With an enviable grace, he directed the other Lan juniors back toward the fireplace, giving one last bow to the three seniors as he went.

Right as Wei Wuxian was about to put the left hand into a pouch, he heard Lan Xichen call out, “Please, wait a moment.”

Both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji paused.

Somehow, it seemed as though the simulated Lan Xichen’s face was even more ashen than the real one’s. With Nie Huaisang’s reaction on top of that, Lan Wangji and Wen Ruohan could be fairly certain they knew what was going on.

Their eyes fell on Nie Mingjue, who stood in uncharacteristic stillness, staring at he collapsed body parts in a hopeless, dawning acceptance.

‘The future isn’t quite as nice as you thought it would be, is it?’ Wen Ruohan wondered, grinning coldly.

And no one seemed to be more aware of that than the simulated Lan Xichen.

“Please… wait a moment. Let me see the corpse.”

Holding the body parts out, Wei Wuxian asked, “Zewu-jun, do you know who this person is?”

Although Lan Xichen opened his mouth, no sound came out. He seemed unable to respond. However, on his right, Lan Wangji answered for him with a single nod.

“I see; then I also know who it is,” Wei Wuxian hummed. “This is Chifeng-zun, isn’t it?”

“What?!” Madam Yu gasped out, turning to stare at him. Although she had noticed his, Lan Xichen’s, and Nie Huaisang’s strange reactions, this was a little hard to swallow.

A corpse this powerful was someone among them?

(His soul had been shattered?!)

In the silence that progressed, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts filled in the uninformed: ‘Earlier, when we were ‘playing hide and seek,’ there was a movement the corpse kept repeating. He would form his hand into a loose fist, then slash his arm through the air as if brandishing a weapon. At first, I thought he might have been a swordsman, but in all my years I’ve never seen someone use a sword that way — without any thought put into the grace of it. Even an assassin would have some agility amidst the cruelty. But, if he wasn’t holding a sword, but a hefty saber with a strong killing intent, then everything would make sense.’

His frown deepened.

‘Furthermore, despite the scars, this corpse doesn’t have anything resembling a birthmark or similar indicators. It’s no wonder even Nie Huaisang wasn’t able to recognize the legs when we picked them up from the saber hall-’

A bitter laugh escaped through the oppressive silence.

‘It’s ‘no wonder?” Nie Huaisang mentally repeated. ‘Is that supposed to justify it?! He was right there — my other self literally saw him and just… didn’t recognize him?! What kind of an excuse is that?’

No matter how much people whispered that Nie Huaisang was useless in comparison to his brother, he had never paid them a second thought. He didn’t want to be good at fighting; he didn’t want to risk his life battling monsters.

But maybe, if he’d spent a little more time learning, he wouldn’t have been so incompetent as to somehow allow his Da-ge’s corpse to turn out like this.

(His soul was shattered.)

If Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji hadn’t been sent on this mission — if they hadn’t been skilled enough to track down the pieces and show them to Lan Xichen — how long would Nie Mingjue have spent torn apart like this? Why was he like this? Having the sabers fight corpses for the rest of time was bad enough, but how could his brother’s actual body end up this way?

If it hadn’t been for the unknown shadows leading Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji to all these pieces-

His thoughts stopped there.

Those shadowed figures, working against the grave robber, had been sneaky, unassuming, and deeply motivated to get Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun to find the pieces. On the other hand, Nie Mingjue had been disapproving of their tactics.

Which hopefully meant Nie Huaisang had nothing to do with them.

~~A tiny part of him was starting to doubt that though.~~

~~After all, for a brief moment there, Nie Huaisang could have sworn his other self looked at the legs Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had found with a strangely sorrowful expression.~~

"Zewu-jun, Hanguang-jun told you about what we saw during the journey, right? Mo Village, the grave digger, Yi City, and all that?" Wei Wuxian asked, then, upon seeing Lan Xichen nod, continued, "Then Hanguang-jun probably told you this already, but the mist-faced man who tried to take the corpse away in the Chang Clan's cemetery knew the Lan Sect's style of swordsmanship like the back of his hand. There can only be two possibilities: one, he's from the Lan Sect and has been practicing the moves from a young age, or two, he's not from the Lan Sect, but he's really familiar with your sect's moves. He might have dueled with your sect's members quite a bit, or might be intelligent enough to remember the moves so long as he's seen them."

Wei Wuxian's observations continued, and many of the watchers paid close attention. A few, however, were still too stunned by the previous revelation to pay it much mind. Among them, the least affected was surprisingly Nie Mingjue himself.

At least, that was how it seemed.

"Are you alright?" a voice asked from his left. Glancing over, Nie Mingjue saw Wen Qing staring at him with an analytical blankness, which slowly transitioned into solemn understanding.

"I mean… sure," he crossed his arms, looking down on the simulation coldly. "It's a surprise, but we were already told I was dead. What more is there?"

The single raised eyebrow Wen Qing sent his way more than answered that question. Feeling unusually scolded, Nie Mingjue looked away. Then again, he supposed that, of everyone here, she had the most right to ask. Contained though her reaction may have been, the agony she felt upon learning what had happened to her brother had been obvious to everyone.

"...You might not have much privacy here, but trying to suppress everything your feeling won't go well," the doctor scolded. "Don't be an idiot."

"I'm not-"

"Just consider what I said," she advised, turning her attention back to the simulation and quite clearly ending that conversation. Sect Leader Nie huffed, annoyed at her insistence on the matter (and maybe, just maybe, knowing that she was right).

Silently, Nie Mingjue glanced back at his brother. Huaisang was still frozen in place, a complicated expression on his face. It was difficult to read even for Nie Mingjue, but the overlaying distress was clear.

Fine; Wen Qing wanted him to accept his emotions? He would show her he had nothing to hide.

Sect Leader Nie stepped next to Nie Huaisang, as close as he could get to a hug in the no touch zone, and the younger brother instantly accepted the offer and stepped inside the illusionary form. No one commented on the slight shakes and trembles occurring inside. One person, however, didn't even try to hide their watching gaze.

Wen Ruohan observed the interaction that had gone down between his niece and Sect Leader Nie, frowning minutely. Unlike his changing opinion of Wei Wuxian, the Chief Cultivator's feelings regarding Nie Mingjue had stayed exactly the same: respectfully powerful, but not so much that he could be considered anything more than an nuisance. The fervent hatred the man had of his sect had been quite amusing for some time, and made him all the easier to manipulate too.

It seemed that last point wouldn't be the case for long, however.

Meanwhile, maintaining the attention of the other watchers, Wei Wuxian had continued his explanation: "The grave robber fought for the corpse because he didn't want others to realize Chifeng-zun had been cut up. If Chifeng-zun's corpse is pieced back together, the situation would be difficult for them. This is someone who knows the secret of the Nie Sect's saber hall, is close to the Gusu Lan Sect, and likely has a rather complicated history… with Chifeng-zun."

"Ah, that's right," Madam Yu muttered to herself. "There were three sworn brothers, weren't there?"

Madam Jin instantly scowled.

"At the Nie Sect's burial hall, Jin Ling experienced quite a bit of malice from the corpse's resentful energy. And now, while I was stalling it, it was shockingly easy to keep its attention. The only thing he and I have in common… is that the blood of the Jin Sect runs in our veins."

Lan Wangji pursed his lips but nodded in agreement, having noticed the same.

"He would not have done this," Lan Xichen insisted without hesitation.

"Right! Let's not jump to conclusions!" Jin Zixuan agreed, eyes wide with desperation.

"A-Xuan?" Madam Jin asked, her frown being replaced by confusion.

Fighting to not wilt under everyone's collective gazes, the red-faced Jin Zixuan rushed out with, "I… the future's Zewu-jun knows him best. Meng… Jin Guangyao isn't the only possibility."

“It can’t be him,” the simulated Lan Xichen added on. “The incents you’re describing — investigating the corpse parts and encountering the grave digger — all happened within the past month. During this month, he’s been discussing matters with me every single night. We were planning for the discussion conference occurring at the LanlingJin Sect next month just a few days ago. He could not have gone so far away and made it back in time; the grave digger is someone else.”

Hearing that, the real Lan Xichen breathed out a sigh of relief. The revelation of Nie Mingjue’s fate was already taxing enough. If he had to discover that it was the result of a betrayal on top of that, he wasn’t sure he would be able to handle it.

“Don’t worry, Da-ge,” he said. “I’m sure Wangji and Wei-gongzi will find the person responsible soon enough.”

“Are you sure it isn’t him?” Wen Ruohan asked aloud. “After all, that traitor managed to fool even me.”

“And saved the rest of the cultivation world in the process!” Jin Zixuan hissed back, barely noticing who he was speaking to. “He’s… he’s a member of the Jin Clan! He’s done so many things as Chief Cultivator! He-”

He was someone who Jin Zixuan’s parents both discarded without a second thought. Who they’d thrown down the stairs of Koi Tower, and sent him back to who knew where. Jin Zixuan didn’t dislike his parents or anything, but, slowly…

He might be starting to disagree with a few of their choices. And, while he wouldn’t do something as idiotic as publically disagreeing with his Sect Leader, trying to fix a few of his parents’ mistakes couldn’t hurt either.

(But that would only be possible if Jin Guangyao was indeed uninvolved.)

But Wei Wuxian didn’t agree:

“Could Jin Guangyao have used a teleportation talisman?” he speculated.

Lan Xichen shook his head: “One must cultivate that technique in order to use it. It is rather difficult to cultivate, and he has never shown any signs of having that ability. Likewise, one must expend large quantities of spiritual power to use the technique, but we went night hunting just a few days ago. His performance was excellent. I am certain that he did not use the talisman.”

His voice was gentle, yet certain.

Nonetheless, Hanguang-jun pointed out, “He did not have to go himself.”

Lan Xichen shook his head again.

“Sect Leader Lan, you know he’s the most suspicious person, don’t you?” Wei Wuxian asked, raising an eyebrow. “You’re just refusing to admit it.”

The bonfire crackled loudly behind him.

And Wen Ruohan huffed a small laugh at the accusation.

The fire cast constantly-changing shadows upon the faces of the three cultivators, making the night appear even stranger than before. In the otherwise-silent abandoned garden, Lan Xichen's emotions were easy to see.

"...I understand that there are reasons for the world to hold many misconceptions about him, but… I trust what I have seen throughout all these years. I trust that he is not that sort of person."

Here, Lan Xichen hesitated. Unlike his other self, he had not spent years defending Jin Guangyao from everyone who tried using his mother's status against him. He wasn't part of the reason Jin Guangyao had gotten to the position he had. He didn't actually know the Jin Sect Leader, and therefore was far less influenced by his own emotions on the matter. Neither guilt nor love were at play here, but he could see the unwavering trust his other self had in the man.

"...What do you think, Da-ge?" he asked. "My other-self seems completely certain."

Nodding once, Nie Mingjue agreed, "You trust him quite a bit. The evidence does point towards him, but… I guess there was a lot of evidence against Wei Wuxian too, at the beginning of the simulation. All we can do is hope that isn't the case."

Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, knowing full-well how this would affect his brother's other-self if it was proven true.

And it seemed Wei Wuxian shared that philosophy:

'Well, it's not difficult to understand why Zewu-jun is defending him. To be honest, even I have a pretty positive impression of him. Perhaps because of his background, he's always treated others with kindness and humility. He's the sort of person who's never offended anyone, and can make everyone around him feel comfortable talking to him. And I barely know him; Zewu-jun's been friends with him for years.'

But…

'Chifeng-zun's death occurred precisely when Qinghe Nie's advances against the LanlingJin Sect on the matter of Xue Yang were reaching their peak. Who would have benefited the most from his death?'

All at once, a dozen eyes turned Jin Guangshan's way.

"Wha — my other self isn't even alive anymore!" he protested at once. "How could I be involved with the gravedigger when I died years ago?"

Putting aside their personal opinions regarding the man, no one could deny that. They slowly looked away.

“The time of the discussion conference at Koi Tower came in the blink of an eye,” Jin Ling’s voice revealed, with no small amount of pride. That made sense, considering the conference was taking place at his home. However, for the more astute listeners, the slight trace of apprehension in Jin Ling’s voice raised a few eyebrows.

A small bit of tension filled Lan Wangji’s upright frame, and he mentally prepared himself for whatever was to come.

From here, Ouyang Zizhen took over: “Most sects’ residents are built in places of beautiful scenery, but the LanlingJin Sect’s Koi Tower sits in the busiest part of Lanling City.”

The scenery before them shifted to prove the claim, even if all of the present watchers were already aware of the fact.

“The main road used to visit the tower is a carriage path more than half a mile in length, and is only opened for events such as banquets or discussion conferences.”

Which they were at now. Sitting with each other as equals, Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and Lan Xichen all road up toward the blindingly bright tower before them. The golden carriage smoothly glided across the stone road, moving slowly so as to allow the Jin driver to point out the history behind each painting they passed on the way.

“That over there is the four most famous sections about the current sect leader, Jin Guangyao,” the woman explained. “They are called ‘Disclosure,’ ‘Assassination,’ ‘Oath,’ and ‘Kind Austerity,’ respectively.”

At the word ‘assassination,’ Wen Ruohan found himself frowning once again. Someone he took in — someone whose talent he’d recognized and rewarded — had turned their backs on him in such a manner.

(As soon as he got out of the simulation, he would find Meng Yao and-)

“The first one depicts Sect Leader Jin as a spy in the Wen camp, secretly disclosing information to our side,” the disciple proudly explained, unaware of the real Wen Ruohan’s darkening glare. “Then there’s Wen Ruohan’s assassination, the oath to become sworn brothers with the rest of the Vernerated Triad, and his rise to the position of Chief Cultivator.”

With every word, Wen Ruohan’s fury grew.

(As well as Madam Yu and Nie Mingjue’s satisfaction.)

And then, following Jin Guangyao’s murals, stood Jin Zixuan’s.

Said boy flinched.

Normally, a sect leader would make the murals of those of the same generation as them inferior, so as to not be outclassed. Everyone understood that, and would accept it without opposition. However, even at a quick glance, it was clear that Jin Zixuan's murals were just as high quality as Jin Guangyao's, and just as plentiful too.

The handsome man in the paintings displayed both pride and vigor. If he had lived long enough to become Sect Leader, he may have had ones just like them.

'Of course he would have those,' was Madam Jin's initial reaction. 'A-Xuan was — is — the heir. It's only right for him to have paintings of at least the level of the son of a-'

She cut herself off. Right as that last word was about to enter her mind, Wei Wuxian's face flashed before her instead.

'I guess, but what's wrong with servants?' Wei Wuxian had asked. 'I'm also the son of a servant, aren't I?'

But Wei Wuxian was special — an exception — and his parents had been happily married, much to Yu Ziyuan's dissatisfaction and disbelief. It was a completely different set of circumstances from a woman who got together with her husband. Jin Guangshan was a married man (and that was something every citizen of Lanling knew), and yet Jin Guangyao's mother had disobeyed every courtesy and gotten together with him anyways.

'It's only natural that A-Xuan has those paintings. I wouldn't have allowed it to happen any other way.'

(But then, why had she been so surprised when she saw it?)

And now Jin Guangyao was under suspicion of being responsible for Chifeng-zun's murder. Of all times, why was this when she was starting to have doubts?

Stuttering and blushing, without a trace of the decorum she had trained to train into him, Jin Zixuan said, 'My… my brother deserves our trust! For now, at least!'

Suddenly, a flash of white entered their sights.

It was Lan Wangji's ribbons, being given additional attention by the simulation at the moment that Wei Wuxian focused on him. On the carriage, the two sets of ribbons flowed freely, red and white dancing through the air as they traveled forward. Hanguang-jun was facing the road, watching where the carriage was going.

On the other hand, it seemed like Wei Wuxian couldn't take his eyes off the man before him.

A little squee left Jiang Yanli's lips, and Lan Xichen felt some of the tension slip away from him at the sight.

‘A-Yao deserves a fair chance,’ he thought, frowning again. ‘But, if he is indeed responsible for what happened to Da-ge, I won’t let him get away with it.’

If Lan Xichen’s future self had heard such a thought, he would have instantly paled.

Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, found his attention captivated by far more important matters.

“Hey, Lan Zhan,” he whispered, leaning close and speaking quietly enough that Lan Xichen could at least pretend not to hear. “Quite a fancy carriage, huh?”

He gestured to the gold engravings with a dramatic flourish, grinning widely when Lan Wangji’s blank expression somehow became even more blank (as he refused to show his honest feelings about said extravagance).

“I know, I know,” Wei Wuxian acknowledged. “But it still suits you better than going the complete opposite direction, doesn’t it? You might be able to make Little Apple cooperate, but having just us and the donkey makes you stick out like a sore thumb!”

“...I do not mind,” Hanguang-jun said in response.

Both the real and simulated Lan Xichens (the latter of whom was trying desperately to pretend to not be listening) seemed to glow with joy at the comment. The teenage Lan Wangji withheld a squeak.

(This was even worse than the teasing! It was equal levels of embarrassment, but he couldn’t bring himself to be mad about it! How unfair!)

As though having somewhat expected Lan Wangji’s response, Wei Wuxian was able to recover immediately and asked, “Hey, do you remember? Back when we were in the cold springs together?”

By the reddening of the real Lan Wangji’s ears, it was clear that he most certainly did.

“When you tried to steal the jade token?” Hanguang-jun asked, raising an eyebrow.

Laughing at the reminder, Wei Wuxian corrected, “No, no. Before that. At… after I got punished. We had both… we met up there.”

‘We had both gotten punished,’ wouldn’t have made sense for Mo Xuanyu to say, so Wei Wuxian had no choice but to correct it. Putting aside Lan Xichen, who might not be dangerous even if he did find out, the Jin coachman was most certainly not someone who had their trust. Luckily, Lan Wangji understood.

“I remember,” he said.

And he did:

‘How did you get here?’

'Zewu-jun told me to come!'

Nie Huaisang, slowly beginning to recover from the earlier shock, sent his 'er-ge' a discrete thumbs up.

'Honestly, Lan Zhan, you really impressed me back there,' Wei Wuxian admitted, rubbing the back of his neck awkwardly, but full of genuine intent. 'I can't believe you punished yourself as well. Being as serious and stubborn as you were definitely isn't something I could do. You're so cool.'

A bright flush covered Lan Wangji's ears as his few remaining defenses caved in. He was slowly working up a resistance towards Wei Wuxian's flirting, but when it came to sincere, honest compliments?

He stood no chance.

And-

'Hey, Lan-er-gongzi, let's be friends.'

'Yes. Yes,' he thought. 'Yes.'

A shine of gold flashed before their eyes as the memory disappeared, bringing them back to the Jin pathway.

"What about it?" Hanguang-jun asked, making eye contact once more.

"I told you a little about my parents then, didn't I?"

Lan Qiren couldn't quite hide a flinch.

'My parents died when I was four. You might think I remember them, but I don't. I don't even remember what my parents looked like.'

Feeling a sudden, unexplainable sourness in her throat, Madam Yu looked away.

'But there's one thing I do remember; I was riding a donkey with my mom beside me, and my dad was right in front of us. I think my mom cracked a joke, making my father laugh…'

"Maybe, someday… we'll have to reenact that."

Lan Wangji's eyes widened.

And with that, the watchers were pulled even deeper into the past. Lime-green leaves covered their vision, and a well-worn dusty path was laid out before them. None of the watchers could recognize this scenery, but they all knew who the trio of illusions before them were.

A donkey brayed loudly.

'Moooom,' a child's voice called out.

'What's the matter?' a woman's responded.

Jin Zixuan gasped; Jiang Yanli cooed; Jiang Cheng gaped; Lan Wangji felt his mind momentarily shut down.

And Yu Ziyuan immediately had to look away.

'Is A-Ying tired?' the woman continued. 'Come, Mom will carry you.'

'I don't want that,' the boy whined, walking slightly faster.

'Why don't you want me to?' the woman demanded at once. 'Mom really wants to carry you-'

'Waaaaah! Dad!" Little A-Ying cried out, reaching towards Wei Changze at once.

'Stop fooling around,' the former Jiang Sect member scolded. Nonetheless, he obediently stepped closer and pulled the young Wei Wuxian onto his back. From the side, Cangse watched with an undeniable fondness.

"What a joke," Madam Yu hissed, too quietly for anyone to hear. Madam Jin's expression also turned bitter for a moment, and she stared at the couple with a heavy gaze.

A moment later, they both sighed.

'Am I really so pathetic that I'd be jealous of a dead woman?' Madam Jin wondered. 'And A-Xuan might end up dead, but… at least he wasn't thrown into the Burial Mounds — wasn't eaten alive by his own corpses, considered a villain by the cultivation world at large.'

(Her standards might have gotten a little warped by the simulation.)

Madam Yu, on the other hand, had a far more burning realization to make.

Back at Lotus Pier, just after the Wen Indoctrination Camp and the Xuanwu Cave, what was it she had said?

'Sect Leader Jiang, take a good look at your biological son! Jiang Cheng is your flesh and blood! Even if you don't like him because I'm his mother, he's still your son!' she had screeched. 'I'm sure you know the rumors. They say that after all these years, you still can't get over a certain someone and even treat her son as your own. Some people even think Wei Ying is your-'

'Yu Ziyuan!' Jiang Fengmian had shouted, furious at the insinuation.

Well of course she would think that. Look at Cangse Sanran! A beautiful woman; an amazing cultivator; a loving mother; ~~everything Yu Ziyuan was not.~~ Why wouldn't Jiang Fengmian have still been in love with her? Sect Leader Jiang's actions during the fall of Lotus Pier had indeed proven that he cared more about Jiang Cheng than he did about Wei Wuxian — had proven that Wei Wuxian wasn't his son — but that didn't say anything about the mothers.

Why, looking at this, it was obvious which of the two of them Jiang Fengmian would love more.

('And whose fault is that?' a little voice hissed into her head.)

Meanwhile, excited by the piggy back ride, the three year old Wei Wuxian was tilting around wildly, trying to see everything he could from this high-up perch.

'Sit there properly,' Wei Changze told him.

From the side, Cangse Sanren called out, 'Eh? Wei-gongzi, is your son so precious that I can't even carry him?'

"She calls him 'Wei-gongzi?'" Wen Qing repeated, somewhat surprised. A moment later, though, she shook her head at her own foolishness. After all, since returning to life, Wei Wuxian had obviously come to find a tremendous amount of joy in the use of 'Hanguang-jun,' 'Lan-er-geg-e,' and 'Lan-er-gongzi,' hadn't he?

And Wei Changze knew full well exactly how true that was.

Huffing in amusement, the rogue cultivator shook his head: 'The last time you carried him, you put a fish in his clothes.'

'It was just a tiny fish!' she protested.

"A fish?!" Jiang Cheng gaped. "That… she-"

"Is most definitely A-Xian's mother," Jiang Yanli finished with a laugh. Hearing that, Yu Ziyuan's sour expression fell until it was simply a bitter emptiness.

'A-Die,' the tiny A-Ying called out.

Lan Wangji's heart stopped for a solid 2 seconds.

'Alright, come,' Wei Changze allowed, dropping his son onto the donkey.

'Aah! A-Die, I'm going to fall!' Wei Wuxian cried out, but continued laughing all throughout. 'Diiiiiiiiiiiie!'

His cries went ignored.

(Cangse Sanren, laughing on the side, certainly wasn't any help.)

'Don't move,' Wei Changze instructed, setting A-Ying upright again. 'Sit properly. You're not going to fall.'

And he was right. Even more excited than before, Wei Wuxian looked around at the surrounding forest from atop the donkey's back. With each step, the donkey tipped him slightly to the left or right, and the child delighted in exaggerating the motion until his father sent him a chiding look.

Nevertheless, his joy was obvious.

'Wow!' the boy gasped out, staring intently at a few water lilies floating in a river to the side.

'A-Ying!' Cangse Sanren called out. 'Are you super high up there?'

'High!' Wei Wuxian responded, bouncing a little in excitement.

Lan Xichen and Jiang Yanli both melted at the scene, while Wen Qing and Nie Mingjue felt years of stress vanish from their bones. Although none of them were biologically related to him, they had all activated on their 'older sibling' switch for him quite some time ago. Wei Wuxian was theirs, now.

And, in Nie Huaisang's humble opinion, was Lan Wangji's most of all.

(Throughout it all, it was getting quite hard to remember that the two had never actually met.)

'A-Ying, tell me, who's the better ride? Your dad, or this donkey?'

In front of them, Wei Changze shook his head fondly at his wife's question, unable to hide the smile that formed on his lips.

Had Jiang Fengmian ever looked at Yu Ziyuan like that? Had anyone ever looked at Yu Ziyuan like that?

Well of course not. She was just the Violet Spider; she couldn't be perfect like Cangse Sanren was! No wonder things had turned out the way they had. Jiang Cheng would order Jin Ling to bring his dog over so he could torture someone, while Wei Wuxian would teach the juniors to let go of their fear and cooperate with each other. How could anything else happen when Cangse Sanren was just so perfect?!

(Not once did she consider whether she could personally do anything to change this.)

Meanwhile:

Wei Wuxian sat, deep in thought in regards to his mother's question. He looked back and forth between the donkey and his father, analytical eyes judging everything appropriately. Finally:

'Dad's the best ride!' the boy declared.

Laughing, his mother instantly agreed, 'Of course!'

Wei Changze just sighed, the smile still present on his face.

“What a shame,” Wen Ruohan couldn’t help but mutter, his mouth dipping into a frown. It was truly unfortunate that the simulation had come too late for them to do anything to save Wei Wuxian’s parents. The Chief Cultivator didn’t care much about them individually, but…

The child Wei Wuxian from the other flashbacks they had seen was a boy who had spent years living on the streets, fighting for food. As carefree as he had seemed at Lotus Pier and the Cloud Recessess, he had remained all-too aware of the enormous debt he owed Jiang Fengmian.

(Which shouldn’t be a debt at all, in Wen Ruohan’s opinion. Considering how much the Jiang Sect got out of having the most talented disciple of the generation as their head disciple, it made absolutely no sense for them to continue to lord their ‘kind gesture’ over him. Jiang Fengmian might have claimed to have learned his lesson, but Wen Ruohan wasn’t stupid enough to believe that.)

He took a deep breath out, feeling his anger rising up within him again. If he had gotten Wei Wuxian — or, as a far more likely outcome, if Wei Wuxian’s parents had survived that night — how would the boy have turned out? Just as brilliant, dedicated, and inventive as ever, but thriving without the constant accusations of ‘showing off’ and ‘playing the hero’ thrust in his face?

Sighing to himself once more, Wen Ruohan dipped his head minutely. He might not have cared much about them while they were alive, but Wei Changze and Cangse Sanren had his respect for the boy they had tried to raise. He could honor their deaths for that, at the very least.

Wen Ruohan’s thoughts faded away right as the simulation returned to the main storyline. Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji stared into each others eyes, the former leaning forward in his seat, and the latter seemingly completely oblivious to the world outside of the two of them.

Finally, Lan Xichen cleared his throat.

“Er-ge!” Nie Huaisang protested at once, a look of complete and utter betrayal on his face.

Rolling his eyes, Nie Mingjue pointed out, “Given the look that Jin disciple is sending them, I’m pretty sure Xichen waited as long as he possibly could before interrupting.”

“He should have waited longer!”

“Huaisang-”

“No, I agree, Da-ge,” Lan Xichen objected. “My other self was clearly grossly unaware of the nature of this exchange. If he had had the necessary context, I assure you I wouldn’t have made that choice.”

Jiang Cheng quietly groaned at the sickeningly sweet sentiment, while Jiang Yanli chuckled lightly.

About two meters away, a Jin disciple announced, "Lan Sect of Gusu, please enter here."

After another half-second pause, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji got up, walking in the direction the disciple pointed them towards. At the top of the stairs up Koi Tower was a wide, brick-paved square, bustling with people.

"...Wow," Jin Zixuan muttered. The other juniors were even more astonished than he was.

Humming in appreciation, Jin Guangshan observed, "It would appear we've expanded considerably. And remodeled too, if I'm not mistaken."

The extravagance here was even greater than the current Koi Tower.

Judging by the simulated Wei Wuxian's shock, it was greater than it had been thirteen years ago as well.

"Then… I guess we have A-Y… Jin Guangyao, to thank for this," Jin Zixuan muttered, unable to keep the disbelief out of his tone. His brother was Chief Cultivator, so some level of competence could be expected, but this was still a shock.

(Even Jin Zixuan might not be able to lead the Jin Sect this well.)

"...Let's hold off before we give any praise," Nie Huaisang suggested, keeping his voice too low for anyone but the nearby Jin Zixuan to hear. Although his face and voice were perfectly pleasant, the Jin heir couldn't shake the feeling that there was something more lurking underneath.

"...Hold off?" he repeated.

"If this 'Jin Guangyao' is actually responsible for what happened to my Da-ge, then who knows what exactly went down to make the Jin Sect progress this far," he mused lightly, tone juxtaposed against the nature of his words. "At the very least, I'd like to give those 'watchtowers' he's so famous for another look."

"Huh?" Jin Zixuan said again, still not comprehending. After all, what could be bad about the watchtowers?

Seeing the other's confusion, Nie Huaisang suddenly fumbled, "Well, I don't know really, I'm just… I really don't know!"

On the far side of the square from where Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were, a gargantuan alabaster base sat over nine stairs that were intricately decorated with ruyi curvature — the picture of excess. At the top of that laid Koi Tower, a magnificent palace overlooking the ocean of Sparks Amidst Snow peonies below. The large white petals surrounding golden pestles were majestic enough on their own, but to see this many all at once?

“Very impressive,” Wen Ruohan acknowledge, and Jin Guangshan seemed to preen under the praise.

“Su Sect of Moling, please enter here!”

“Nie Sect of Qinghe, please come here!”

Sect Jiang of Yunmeng, please enter this way!”

As soon as he showed up, Jiang Cheng shot a sharp glance at them.

‘Oh, please just shut up!’ Jiang Cheng thought, not wanting to hear his future-self ruin his relationship with Wei Wuxian any further. Despite his sincere wish, however, his future self remained unable to heed his request.

Speaking in a resolutely indifferent tone, he greeted, “Zewu-jun. Hanguang-jun.”

Nodding in response, Lan Xichen returned, “Sect Leader Jiang.”

The two Jiang cultivators behind Jiang Cheng bowed deeply to the Lan brothers, but Jiang Cheng paid them no mind. He scanned over the trio, eyes resting on Wei Wuxian for just a second too long.

Then, turning his head to face the other Lan brother, Jiang Cheng commented, “Hanguang-jun, I’ve never seen you at one of Koi Tower’s discussion conferences before. Why the sudden interest?”

Neither of the Lan brothers replied, but it seemed as though Jiang Cheng hadn’t expected a response to begin with. He had already turned towards Wei Wuxian, and the indifference in his expression gave way to hate.

“If I remember correctly, don’t the two of you never take needless personnel while traveling? What’s the situation? Just a once in a blue moon occurrence?”

Burying his face in his hands, Jiang Cheng’s thoughts became an endless repetition of ‘Shut up, shut up, shut up shutup-’

“Now who is this most honorable cultivator? Could someone please introduce him to me?”

After seeing Wei Wuxian’s reaction to Fairy, ~~after torturing him with a dog,~~ there was no way Sect Leader Jiang wouldn’t know it was Wei Wuxian before him. If Jiang Cheng hadn’t known what his other self wanted to do to Wei Wuxian, he would have found the whole situation hilarious.

However, as it stood, the future Sect Leader Jiang might levy an accusation that could get Wei Wuxian executed-

No, no. The simulated Jiang Cheng had already done that quite a few times. However, because he’d apparently accused countless people of that without one of those accusations being true, not even Jin Ling believed him.

As it was, however-

"Er-ge, why didn't you tell me beforehand that Wangji was going to come with you?" a voice asked from behind.

"A-Yao!" Jin Zixuan gaped.

"Thank the Heavens," Jiang Cheng sighed.

The owner of Koi Tower, Lianfang-zun, Jin Guangyao, stood before them. Lan Xichen returned his smile, while Lan Wangji gave a respectful nod. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, stood still, carefully observing the chief cultivator of all sects.

And, although no one called attention to it, Nie Huaisang was doing the exact same thing.

"Jin Guangyao was fairly attractive," Lan Jingyi read aloud, sounding as though he was being forced at knifepoint to read every word. "His skin was 'fair,' and he had a vermillion mark on his forehead. His pupils were 'distinct' against the whites of his eyes, appearing 'lively' but 'not frivolous-'"

"Jingyi, stop with the air quotes," Lan Sizhui scolded with the patience of someone who had been putting up with this for at least three hours.

"I didn't do anything-"

"I could hear them in your tone."

There was a brief silence, before the other Lan boy finally gave in:

"His features were rather clean, simultaneously making him appear attractive and ingenious. The shadow of a smile was always perched on the corner of his lips, revealing his clever character. Such a face was enough to earn the love of women, and yet wouldn't evoke the aversion of men. The elderly would think of him as 'sweet,' while the young would think of him as 'amicable' and 'honorable' and 'reliable-'"

"Jingyi!"

"Whatever, they'll be able to see most of this for themselves anyway!" Lan Jingyi huffed. "Da-da-duh-da-da, small figure, calm demeanor, a powerful aura of inviolability. Done."

Lan Qiren was absolutely never going to allow Lan Jingyi to read out loud in class until he had personally given the boy a few lessons on the subject.

Judging by Lan Sizhui's following sigh, the other boy would agree with him.

Meanwhile, Lan Xichen and Jin Guangyao were catching up momentarily. Their joy was obvious to anyone watching, and the sheer level of comfort they had in each other was enough to make several people look away.

A singe of guilt welled up in Lan Xichen at that, but he couldn't tell if it was due to his other-self trusting someone he shouldn't, or towards himself, for doubting someone who would obviously grow to mean so much to him.

But, looking to the side at Nie Mingjue, who was continuing to stand protectively next to Nie Huaisang, he couldn't find himself regretting his decision either.

Finally, the watchers looked down and noticed the small figure that had followed Jin Guangyao out, hiding behind him all the while. His copper eyes peeked out, making him resemble a terrified puppy shivering in the rain.

"A-Ling!" Jin Zixuan grinned, always excited to see his son.

Too scared to make eye contact with Jiang Cheng, Jin Ling hid even farther behind Jin Guangyao and mumbled, "Uncle."

"Oh? So you still know I'm your uncle?!" Jiang Cheng snapped, making Jin Ling wilt further.

"A-Cheng," Jiang Yanli said, softly but reproachfully. Her brother faded at once, and she stopped there. It seemed the younger version of her brother, at least, understood what she was displeased about; there wasn't much more she could do.

(After all, Jiang Cheng took after their mother a little too well. In some ways, Jiang Yanli couldn't be surprised that he had ended up like this.)

Feeling Jin Ling tugging on his sleeve, Jin Guangyao immediately intervened: "Now, Sect Leader Jiang, there's no need for that. A-Ling realized his mistake some time ago. During the past few days, he's been so scared you'll punish him that he hasn't been eating well. Children just like to make mischief. I know no one loves him more than you. Let's not bother him about it so much."

Jumping at the opening, Jin Ling piped in, "Yes, yes! Uncle can prove it! My appetite's been bad these past few days!"

"Your appetite's been bad?" Jiang Cheng repeated, his glare showing no small amount of skepticism. "Looking at the health in your complexion, I'd say you haven't been missing too many meals!"

"Sect leader Jiang-" Jin Guangyao intervened again.

The more he saw, the more desperately Jin Zixuan hoped that Wei Wuxian's deduction was wrong, and Jin Guangyao was an innocent party. After everything that Jin Guangshan had done — not to say that Jin Zixuan disapproved of his father's action; he just disagreed a little — Jin Zixuan knew the least he could do was offer aid to his half brothers. If Meng Yao was living in conditions even a tenth as bad as the ones Mo Xuanyu had been stuck in, then that was the least he could do.

At that moment, however, Jin Ling had finally worked up the courage to look beyond his uncles and towards the trio standing behind them. At once, he recognized black-robed man:

"Why are you here?!" he blurted out, astonishment more than obvious.

Tilting his head casually, Wei Wuxian grinned and responded, "To get a free meal!"

A quick chuckle left Wen Qing's lips before she cleared her throat a few times, barely managing to compose herself.

However, Wei Wuxian's response only made Jin Ling angrier: "How dare you still come?! Didn't I warn you-"

The Jin heir paused in his threat, feeling Jin Guangyao gently pat his head.

Seeing the unending composure with which the man was handling the situation, Lan Xichen could understand how his other self managed to be so comfortable around him. He hoped, once again, that such faith was not without merit.

(But, remembering every compliment Lan Jingyi had struggled to say, Lan Xichen couldn't quite keep down the growing dread that was beginning to form in his mind.)

Softly, pushing Jin Ling behind him, Jin Guangyao smiled: "Alright, why not? You're our guest now that you've come. I don't know all the details, but I am certain Koi Tower has enough food for one more guest."

He turned to Lan Xichen, giving his sworn brother a soft, personal smile.

"Er-ge, why don't you have a seat first? I'm going to check over there, and make arrangements for Wangji as well."

"There's no need to trouble yourself."

"How is this trouble? Er-ge, you don't have to be so polite now that you're at my place. Really."

At that moment, the disembodied voice of Lan Sizhui spoke (taking over for Lan Jingyi, who Sizhui apparently decided couldn't be trusted with such a task): "Jin Guangyao could remember the age, title, rank, and appearance of anyone after just one encounter. Even if a few years had passed, he'd be able to greet them without any fault. If he met someone twice, he'd be able to remember all their likes and dislikes, and therefore be able to cater to their needs."

Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow, impressed.

(No wonder Meng Yao had gotten close enough to kill him. His support of people he found talented or useful was well known.)

“Since Hanguang-jun had come to Koi Tower without any advance notice, Jin Guangyao hadn’t yet arranged a table for him. However, he was more than capable of doing so, and thus rushed off to prepare.”

“Wow, he’s… really good at that,” Jin Zixuan observed, relaxing when Jiang Yanli gave him a comforting smile back. “Maybe later-”

“A-Xuan,” his mother hissed into his ear. “Don’t get any funny ideas before we know everything.”

Jin Zixuan flinched at the sudden words, spinning to face his mother, but hesitating before whispering back, “I know that. But A-Niang, we’re… bothers?”

A scowl crossed her face and she hissed. “Don’t describe that son of a-”

Both of them paused, feeling a heavy look directed at them. They glanced over, and saw Lan Wangji standing in silent disapproval. Before the simulation, Lan Qiren would not have dared to allow his nephew to glare at someone from an older generation, regardless of what he personally thought. After everything he had seen, however….

He stepped back, and, as if having already known that would be the case, Lan Wangji’s stare continued. There was a tense silence. Madam Jin had nothing she could say in response, for, the moment she stopped to think about it, she had to acknowledge that Lan Wangji was right. She turned away, falling silent once more.

(Jin Guangshan, who had stayed out of the whole exchange, privately thought it was ridiculous for a factual statement to make them all react so strongly.)

The trio followed Jin Guangyao into the Glamor Hall, strolling down a long, red carpet. Beside the numerous sandalwood tables were fair-faced maids, adorned with hoops, jades, and genuine smiles. Even their figures were similar to each other; as they all stood side by side, they created quite a captivating appearance. Even Wei Wuxian had to stare at them for a while once they came into view.

An ugly, bitter taste filled Lan Wangji’s heart. Although his outward expression didn’t change whatsoever, the more observant watchers were able to notice him scratching at his chair’s wooden armrest grumpily.

(Now, suddenly, he was able to understand why his other-self had felt a need to kick a rock several segments ago.)

However, a moment later, a flash of white caught Wei Wuxian’s eye, and his attention was once again captured by the second jade sitting to his left.

Seeing that faithful adoration — and the two weren’t even together yet — a proud, overjoyed aura filled Madam Jin’s body, and the annoyance she had felt earlier was instantly washed away. Both Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli giggled slightly.

One of the maids poured Wei Wuxian a glass of liquor. Seeing that, he smiled once and nodded at her:

“Thanks.”

She froze.

“Huh?” Jiang Cheng glared. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

If that maid thought she was too good for his shixiong-

‘Oh, that’s right,’ Wei Wuxian suddenly realized, looking around and seeing the absurd number of faces focused on him and him alone. ‘Right, right. This is Koi Tower, where Mo Xuanyu harassed somebody from his own sect and got kicked out. Who could have expected him to return so ostentatiously, as if he had no shame. He even slipped into a high ranking seat alongside the Twin Jades of Lan….’

Shifting to the side, Wei Wuxian whispered, “Hanguang-jun. Hanguang-jun!”

“Yes?”

“Please don’t leave me,” Wei Wuxian begged. “There’s probably a lot of people here who know about Mo Xuanyu. If somebody decides they want to talk about the good ol’ days with me, I’ll have to keep on playing the fool and spouting nonsense. I would end up making you lose face.”

A million thoughts flashed through Lan Wangji’s head at once. ‘I wouldn’t mind,’ and ‘That’s more than fine,’ reigned prominently among them, but one thought stood out above all others:

‘Please don’t leave me,’ Wei Wuxian had said.

‘Don’t leave,’ as in Wei Wuxian wanted him to stay; he liked when he was there. It had been obvious through his actions beforehand, especially with the way Wei Wuxian had come back after running into Jiang Cheng, but, compared to what their relationship was beforehand….

‘Huh? Oh no! Those pictures were really great! How could you just tear them up?’

‘Get lost.’

‘What? Get lost? I can’t believe you’d say that! Ah, Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan. They say you’re cultured and elegant, always well behaved. But look at you now, goodness-’

‘GET LOST!’

They had been only kids then (technically older than Lan Wangji was now, but still). It made sense for them to act this way. However, when they were older-

The Wens had attacked. Lan Wangji’s home had been burned down, and the tension of everything within the indoctrination camp (the Xuanwu most of all) had been too much.

‘Um, Lan Zhan-’

‘Wei Ying, you really are… the kind of person I hate the most.’

And then Wei Wuxian was thrown i*nto the* bu*rial moun*ds and-

‘Wei Ying…. Come back to Gusu with me.’

‘To Gusu?’ a pause, then, ‘I see. After all, your uncle despises people who cultivate the demonic path. You’re his most beloved disciple; of course you’re the same as him!’

“Wei Ying-’

“Who do you think you are?! I’m not afraid of you or the Gusu Lan Clan!’

After experiencing an endless fight in the burial mounds, it was no wonder Wei Wuxian had difficulty seeing others as anything but enemies out to devour him whole. However, none of that could have prepared Lan Wangji for what he saw.

For a brief moment, there had been something almost resembling hatred in Wei Wuxian’s eyes.

Which was why, now, there was one thing playing in his head over and over again:

‘Please don’t leave me,’ Wei Wuxian begged.

“You don’t need to ask,” Lan Wangji whispered, too quietly for anyone but himself to hear. “Yes, always. Without question.”

Luckily for Hanguang-jun’s dignity, the older version was much more composed than the younger. Calm as ever, he glanced Wei Wuxian’s way and gave his reply:

“All you have to do is not provoke others,” he said, sliding his alcohol glass across the elongated table towards Wei Wuxian.

“That’s easy enough,” Wei Wuxian responded, brimming with confidence.

“Why do I get the feeling that things are not going to end so easily?” Madam Yu wondered. Though, by this point, she was able to acknowledge that Wei Wuxian often managed to provoke her into punishing him simply by breathing, so perhaps she wasn’t in a position to judge.

At that moment, the Jin Sect’s announcer stepped forward.

“Sect Leader Jin and his wife, Madam Jin, have arrived!”

The doors opened wide, and the couple walked in. Lavish, gold-embroidered robes flowed softly as they stepped, the entire crowd falling silent at once as they observed the pair’s entrance. Although the woman seemed rather dignified, there was a trance of innocence in her expression, and her graceful features almost appeared rather childlike. This was Qin Su.

Jin Guangshan felt that it was only to be expected of his son to land such an appealing bride. He gave an appreciative nod.

And, behind him, his other son stood frozen.

At the moment the announcer introduced the pair as "Sect Leader Jin" and "Madam Jin," Jin Zixuan had half-expected to see himself and Jiang Yanli walking down the hall. That's how it would have been — should have been.

Some small, tiny, suppressed part of Jin Zixuan couldn't help but feel wronged by it all.

(How dare that couple look so perfect, so happy, when they were stealing his and Jiang Yanli's places?)

He felt ashamed of himself immediately after. They had nothing to do with whatever had happened to him and his wife. And, in all honestly, it was even worse to blame them for being happy. After all, the only reason he and Jiang Yanli had any relationship troubles at all was because Jin Zixuan had kept scorning her at every advance. He had viewed her only as the boring girl he was going to spend the rest of his life trapped to, just like his parents were with each other. He had never once tried to get to know her — not until years had already gone by.

'And besides, they're not so perfect after all. If Jin Guangyao is really the one who turned Nie Mingjue's corpse into a-'

The Jin heir cut off that thought a moment later.

In front of everyone's eyes, the happy, idealistic couple walked forward, hand in hand.

What was wrong with him? That was an even worse thing to think! The future's Zewu-jun had the utmost trust in Jin Guangyao, and the future's Chifeng-zun had been sworn brothers with him? How could Jin Zixuan possibly take comfort in the fact that Jin Guangyao might have betrayed them both?!

'A-Yao, please…' he thought. 'Please have had nothing to do with this. I'm sorry for thinking that. I was wrong. I really, truly do want a brother like-'

Well, not like Wei Wuxian and Jiang Wanyin, considering how that had turned out. And not really like the twin jades or Nie Mingjue and Nie Huaisang either, as he was so different in personality from all of them that he couldn't imagine himself fitting in that dynamic. But-

'I'll help you. I'll use my position to help you. I've been living as the heir of the Jin Sect all this time, while Mo Xuanyu was going through torture and who knows what was happening to you. I'll make it up to you both, I swear. So please just-'

Please don't have had anything to do with this.

Once again, it was Lan Sizhui's voice that took over:

"Qin Su and Jin Guangyao had been the representation of loving couples in the cultivation world for the past two years, holding a mutual respect for each other. Everyone knew that Qin Su had been born in the Laoling Qin Sect, a subsidiary clan of the Lanling Jin. Qin Cangye, the leader of the Laoling Qin Sect, happened to be a subordinate of Jin Guangshan, and had followed him faithfully for years. Although Jin Guangyao was Jin Guangshan's son, the two were originally ill-suited for each other-"

Three, simultaneous snorts echoed from the other three juniors of the future, and there was a quiet, mocking "Oh, 'originally?!'" from Jingyi.

"-given Jin Guangyao's mother's status. Qin Cangye opposed the union. However, during the Sunshot Campaign, Qin Su's life was saved by Jin Guangyao. She fell in love with him and never gave up, insisting that she wanted to be his wife. In the end, they finally reached the conclusion of their romantic story. Jin Guangyao didn't let her down either-"

The three snorts occurred once again.

"-Even though he held the important position of Chief Cultivator, his behavior was drastically different from his father's. He never took in any concubines, much less had a relationship with any other women."

"Well, at least he has that going for him," Madam Jin muttered, and, despite their now-ruptured friendship, Madam Yu nodded in agreement.

"It was indeed something many wives of Sect Leaders envied."

"...That does sound good," Lan Qiren began. However-

"The laughter of those future-juniors doesn't lend it much credibility, huh?" Nie Mingjue concluded.

Frowning, Jin Zixuan asked, "You don't think he cheated on her, do you?"

"But they seem so happy together," Jiang Yanli added on, not noticing her mother's slight flinch at those words. "Maybe… maybe he just was hiding something involving Sect Leader Nie from her. I can see how that would make it difficult for their relationship to be considered 'ideal,' after."

"I guess we'll have to see," Nie Huaisang sing-songed, his joyful tone not giving even the slightest hint as to his true feelings on the matter.

At that moment, Jin Guangyao and Madam Jin sat down, and Sect Leader Jin's voice rang out: "Today, I have invited you all here for the annual discussion conference. We are honored to have the prestigious clan members of the cultivation world here. We hold this banquet to welcome all of you."

A picture-perfect, ideal Chief Cultivator.

“I hereby toast-”

So long as…

“To a successful discussion conference!”

…it was real.

“To a successful discussion conference,” the gathered clans toasted back, and Wei Wuxian took a gleeful gulp of the alcohol Lan Wangji had handed over to him. Conversation began again, full of praise for the work of the Chief Cultivator.

The words were exaggerated and grandiose. And pathetically empty too.

Wen Ruohan knew full well that he had not been ‘betrayed’ by the other sects (considering he had attacked first), but he was well used to the manner of speaking sect leaders would have during conferences. They would form alliances with each other, and swear nothing would break them, but, once one became an enemy of the Wen Sect, the other would instantly jump ship and curse them to the end of time.

The praise being given to ~~that traitor~~ Jin Guangyao was no different. If he was truly involved in whatever had happened to Nie Mingjue, things would play out quite interestingly.

The banquet came and left, and soon the clans were splitting off into groups to be led to their chambers for the night. The moon was rising into the sky, but the candlelight reflecting off the golden palace made the room as bright as ever. Lan Xichen paused, staring at the walls absent-mindedly, and Jin Guangyao noticed at once. The Chief Cultivator stood up, walking over to him.

And there was concern in his expression. Whatever else, he appeared to genuinely care about Lan Xichen.

Nie Mingjue clenched his fists together.

‘Maybe… if Meng Yao is innocent in all this,’ he thought, a flew flecks of hope slowly beginning to rise in his heart. ‘Maybe, in this world, we’ll be able to become martial brothers again. And Xichen-’

Jin Guangyao reached out towards Lan Xichen.

And was immediately cut off by a large projectile slamming into him and screaming, “San-ge!!!! Saaaaaaaan-geeeeeee!!!!!!”

“Huaisang?!” Nie Mingjue asked, thrown by the whiplash of seeing his brother tearfully hugging the person who was suspected to have been involved in the damage to Nie Mingjue’s corpse.

(~~In the destruction of his soul.~~)

Having been thrown back by the force, Jin Guangyao had to re-adjust his hat before asking, "Huaisang? What's wrong? Let's calm down first."

Cheeks flushed with alcohol, Nie Huaisang wailed, "Oh, brother! What do I do?! Can you help me again?! I promise, this really is the last time!!!"

"Wasn't that situation dealt with by the people I brought for you?"

"The last situation has been handled, but now there's a new problem! Brother, what should I do? I would rather die than have to deal with this!!!"

The simulated Nie Huaisang's cries went on and on, and the watchers' mouths began to drop open one by one.

"Sect Leader — I mean, Nie-gongzi," Lan Qiren began, forgetting for a moment that the current Huaisang was still just heir. "Are you… begging him for more help?!"

Blinking twice, Nie Huaisang gave an embarrassed laugh and confessed, "It sure looks like that, huh?"

"Wha-"

Jin Zixuan's quiet, confused 'what' was instantly cut off by the famed teacher, who shouted, "You — don't treat this like a strange incident to be observed. That's your future-self there! How many times have I told you that you need to focus in class. If you had simply listened to all of my lessons this wouldn't be happening! I know you never really wanted to be Sect Leader, but that's hardly an excuse! When we leave the simulation-"

Lan Qiren's rant continued on and on, and Nie Huaisang (a certified master of pretending to listen to someone while actually zoning out), nodded at all the right places.

Meanwhile, the simulated Nie Huaisang's cries continued on and on, and his attempt at explaining the new problem he was facing soon became so complicated that even Jin Guangyao couldn't understand.

And the real Nie Huaisang focused his attention on that.

'Do I really not know?' he wondered, still nodding along whenever Lan Qiren paused in his rant to take in a breath of air. 'Back when they found the corpse's — Da-ge's — legs in the ancestral burial mounds, my other self claimed to know nothing about it. But, if I'm spending this much time with Jin Guangyao… if I was that close to Da-ge's legs all this time….'

There was nothing Nie Huaisang could see from his own behavior that explicitly raised suspicion. If he genuinely trusted and relied on Jin Guangyao ("San-ge," his brother's sworn brother), then this was pretty much how he would behave. And sure, Nie Huaisang was certain he'd be capable of solving whatever issue was plaguing the Nie Sect on his own, but why would he if he could just get the Chief Cultivator to do it for him? If Jin Guangyao was really innocent, and Nie Huaisang was really ignorant of the corpse's origins, then everything would be fine.

But if that's not the case….

'I should watch my future-self's actions a bit more closely,' he decided. Little did he know, at that precise moment, Wen Ruohan's thoughts were exactly the same.

By now, the future Nie Huaisang's explanation had gotten so tangled and complicated that no information could be gleamed from it anymore. It appeared as though it was something that couldn't be explained easily, so Jin Guangyao raised a hand, stopping Nie Huaisang's tearful explanation momentarily.

"A-Su, you can go back first," he said, turning to his wife. "Huaisang, let's find somewhere to sit down. There's no need to hurry…."

The sobbing Nie Huaisang clutched onto Jin Guangyao's arm as he was led outside, and, upon Lan Xichen coming within grabbing distance, clutched onto Sect Leader Lan as well, dragging both the sworn brothers outside.

Clearing her throat, Qin Su saluted Lan Wangji, adding, "Hanguang-jun, I don't think you've come to one of Lanling's discussion conferences for quite some time. I apologize if the reception was inadequate in any way."

Lan Wangji simply nodded in response.

And that was another interesting thing to note, in Wen Ruohan's eyes. Unlike Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji was a member of the main clan of a sect. Whatever his feelings about the Jin Sect, it was quite strange for him to not go to any discussion conferences. And it wasn't as though he was resting during that time either.

'Second Master Lan,' the future Jiang Cheng spoke with a sneer. 'You live up to your reputation to appear wherever chaos is. I never imagined that you would show up in such a remote place.'

Uninterested in political power, Lan Wangji went around solving any case he came across, and developed an impeccable reputation as a result. The cultivation world as a whole was more favorably-regarded thanks to his existence, and the Lan Clan specifically had bolstered their current reputation using his actions, despite how little Lan Wangji cared for politics. It wasn't as though Lan Wangji could ever be separated from the Lan Clan, but….

The annoyance he had felt for the Jiang Clan upon learning how horribly they had managed Wei Wuxian was still burning just as strong as ever, regardless of Jiang Fengmian's pathetic attempts at fixing the mess outside. Wen Ruohan had said earlier that simply sending Wei Wuxian away from the Jiang Clan would be enough for him, but, after everything he had seen since then, one thing had become perfectly clear:

There was no one better for Wei Wuxian than Lan Wangji, and no one better for Lan Wangji than Wei Wuxian.

If Wei Wuxian was brought to the Wen Sect, and Lan Wangji happened to marry in, then both of the future's strongest players would be under his influence. It would help the Wen Sect enormously, and, more importantly, would allow both of them to become anything they wanted to be. Leaving Wei Wuxian with the Jiang Sect was a waste of his potential; keeping Lan Wangji away from Wei Wuxian was a waste altogether. The solution was simple.

However, right before leaving behind that train of thought, Wen Ruohan found his gaze narrowing in on the unusually-quiet Nie heir, giving him a once-over. He had no proof so far, but, given the observations Nie Huaisang had made while watching the simulation, the boy was far more intelligent than he appeared. If that was the case, then it seemed unlikely that he truly didn't know anything about his brother's death.

(And if that was even remotely true, then he was a snake in the grass that would put even Jin Guangyao to shame.)

(Wen Ruohan would need to watch him very, very carefully.)

While Wen Ruohan's thoughts were occupied, Qin Su and said her goodbyes and left with her maid. That allowed Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji to finally have a moment to speak privately with each other, something necessary considering how many secrets they were carrying.

So Wei Wuxian did just that:

"The way everyone at Koi Tower looks at me is so strange! Just what did Mo Xuanyu do? Publicly show his love while naked? What's so special about that? The people of Lanling must really be innocent if that's the case."

Blushing at the dirty joke, Jiang Cheng gave a long, exaggerated groan.

When Lan Wangji merely shook his head at Wei Wuxian's nonsense, Wei Wuxian continued, "Hanguang-jun, I'm gonna go ask someone. Watch Jiang Cheng for me. It's best if he doesn't find me."

And just like that, Jiang Cheng's playfully annoyed act stopped dead in its tracks. He straightened up, frowning awkwardly at the ground while his sister rushed to his side.

"If he does start to leave, hold him back for a bit, will you?"

"...Do not go too far," Lan Wangji requested.

'Even if he does, he'll always find his way back to you,' Madam Jin thought, then frowned. 'Though, really, what did Mo Xuanyu do? I can't believe he's done anything to deserve-'

'To be treated the way he was by the Mos' she would have continued, but the hypocrisy in that thought was blatant enough that even she couldn't ignore it. After all, the Mo Xuanyu in her world had been brought away from the Mos at a much younger age, but that was because of Wei Wuxian. The young Patriarch had objected to his treatment at the hands of that family.

Madam Jin, who had lived in the lap of luxury in Koi Tower, hadn't even known about him. No one would risk telling her, because they all knew how she treated her husband's bastard children.

‘It’s still Guangshan’s fault, first and foremost!’ she insisted. ‘It’s his responsibility. It should be his job to deal with them.’

And just look at what those unruly brats had done! One of them had summoned back the Yiling Patriarch (who was actually a good person, but Mo Xuanyu hadn’t known that), and the other was under suspicion of being involved in the destruction of Sect Leader Nie’s soul! She was right in thinking they couldn’t be trusted.

~~But, as she glanced back at her once-friend Yu Ziyuan, she couldn’t help but remember thinking that if anyone else had been in Wei Wuxian’s position, they would have snapped a long time ago.~~

While she had been considering that, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji agreed that they would, at the very least, meet back in their room that night. Now the Yiling Patriarch was walking around, gazing over the crowd as if searching for someone, but failing to find them each time. He walked through the golden halls, then out to the garden, and still he couldn’t find what he was looking for. Finally he passed by an intricately laid-out rock garden, and a voice called out to him:

“Hey!”

“A-Ling, don’t be rude,” Jiang Yanli quietly scolded, but Wei Wuxian was pleased.

‘Found him,’ he thought.

Then-

“What do you mean, ‘hey?’” Wei Wuxian asked in a hurt, feeble tone. “How rude. Weren’t we all lovey-dovey when we parted? We meet again and you’re as cold and heartless as ever. Now I’m sad.”

“Oh, shut up!” Jin Ling protested, shivering as if the words made goosebumps run up his arms. “Who’s lovey-dovey with you?! Didn’t I already warn you not to mess with our sect?! Why have you come back?”

Shrugging once, Wei Wuxian answered, “Honestly I’ve just been following Hanguang-jun. I’m this close to making him grab a rope and tie me to his body!”

“Liar, liar, liar,” grumbled Jiang Cheng, bitter about the (rightful) lack of trust his own future self had been given, even if he understood why Wei Wuxian wouldn’t want to tell Jin Ling they were suspicious of Jin Guangyao, Jin LIng’s beloved uncle.

“Well, it wasn’t entirely a lie… the rope part might be true,” Nie Huaisang pointed out, making Lan Wangji’s ears turn redder than rubies and causing Jiang Cheng to grumpily sink down further into his chair.

“Anyways,” Wei Wuxian continued, “when have I ever messed with your sect? You mean your uncle? Sect Leader Jiang is the one messing with me, alright.”

“Shut up! My uncle’s only suspicious of you! Don’t talk nonsense! Don’t think I don’t know you haven’t given up and still want to…” he trailed off, as though unable to finish.

“A-Ling?” Jiang Yanli muttered quietly, concern taking over. However, just like always, there was nothing she could do to the simulation. Her future self wasn’t even alive anymore; the Madam of the Jin Sect was Qin Su. She seemed to be a wonderful person, but Jiang Yanli couldn’t expect her to treat Jin Ling like her own son.

Once again, frustration about not knowing the truth behind her death welled up within her.

Right as Jin Ling seemed about ready to speak again, there were a few shouts in the distance. About half a dozen boys wearing the Lanling Jin Sect’s uniform jumped out, and Jin Ling stopped talking at once.

Jin Zixuan had a bad feeling about this.

The boys approached, and their leader, a fifteen year old boy with a wider physique than Jin Ling, stepped forward and said, “I thought I saw wrong. So it really is him.”

Blinking in confusion, Wei Wuxian pointed to himself and asked, “Me?”

“Who else?! Mo Xuanyu, to think you still have the gall to return!”

Frowning, Jin Ling interrupted, “Jin Chan, why did you come? What’s going on here is none of your business.”

The other boy gave a mocking laugh.

Seeing this, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts filled the few still-confused watchers in: ‘I see. These are probably the kids from Jin Ling’s generation. And, looking at how they’re talking to each other, this group doesn't seem to be on good terms with Jin Ling.’

Finally, Jin Chan responded, “It’s none of my business, but it is yours? Why do you care about what I do?”

Taking that as their que, four of the boys began to approach Wei Wuxian, only to be cut off when Jin Ling stepped protectively in front of him. Despite his harsh words earlier, Jin Ling was ready to defend Wei Wuxian if need be.

A proud grin worked its way onto Jin Zixuan’s face.

“Stop messing around!” Jin Ling ordered.

“Messing around? What’s wrong with teaching a lesson to an indecent disciple of our sect?”

Jin Ling snorted: “Wake up! He was kicked out a long time ago. He isn’t our sect’s disciple no matter how you look at it!”

“So what?”

More than one person did a double take at Jin Chan’s audacity. They were almost infuriated on Wei Wuxian’s behalf.

(Or they would be, if this kid actually posed any semblance of a threat to the Yiling Patriarch. Instead, they were just a little amused.)

Jin Ling, on the other hand, didn’t have that same luxury:

“‘So what?’ Have you forgotten who he came with today?! You want to teach him a lesson? You’ll have to go through Hanguang-jun first!”

Hearing the name ‘Hanguang-jun,’ the boys faltered momentarily, growing slightly nervous. Even though Lan Wangji wasn’t present, none of them would dare to claim that they weren’t scared of him at all.

Lan Qiren was so proud.

After a few more beats of silence, Jin Chan finally responded, “Ha. Jin Ling, what is this? Didn’t you also hate him? What changed?”

“How do you still have so much to say? Does whether or not I hate him matter to you?!”

Jin Chan laughed and pointed out, “He shamelessly harassed Lianfang-zun, and you’re still defending him?!”

Wei Wuxian did a double take.

And the watchers did one as well.

‘Harassed? Harassed who? Lianfang-zun?’ Wei Wuxian’s normally-nimble mind slowly repeated. ‘Who is Lianfang-zun again? Jin Guangyao? You mean… Mo Xuanyu harassed Jin Guangyao?’

“Huh?!” Nie Mingjue gaped, forgetting for a moment exactly what they were investigating Jin Guangyao of. “That little — how dare he?! If he went too far-”

A protective fury rose up.

(Just like Lan Xichen didn’t know Jin Guangyao well enough to be protective of him, Nie Mingjue didn’t know him well enough to hate him. Right now, ‘Jin Guangyao’ was just a possible suspect, who they vaguely knew might become their sworn brother some day. As a result, when confronted with this new information, Nie Mingjue’s mind had focused more on the ‘sworn brother’ part than the ‘suspect’ one, and righteous anger flooded through him accordingly.)

Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, just seemed bewildered:

‘Ah, Mo Xuanyu, Mo Xuanyu. It’s one thing for you to stare at and bother someone else, but why did you have to…’ he couldn’t even finish, burying his head in his hands and shaking his head in disbelief.

“Aren’t they half-brothers?” Lan Xichen asked, speaking quietly. “I see… that explains the extent of the disgust directed Mo Xuanyu’s way.”

And it explained why Mo Xuanyu had been kicked out of the sect. Although Jin Zixuan didn’t want his half-brother Mo Xuanyu to have done that — hoped desperately that the child ‘A-Yu’ outside the simulation would be proven innocent — part of him subconsciously relaxed. He had wondered why Jin Guangyao hadn’t done anything to save Mo Xuanyu from the horrible circumstances he was living in. If there was an explanation for this (just like there had been an explanation for all of Wei Wuxian’s actions thus far), then maybe, possibly, his imagined future of the three of them working together could come to pass, once Mo Xuanyu was made aware that he couldn’t do something like that again.

~~Maybe Jin Zixuan could have some brothers of his own.~~

However, by this time, Jin Zixuan’s son had allowed his temper to get riled up just a bit too far.

“If you want to fight, then let’s have a fight! I’m not scared of you!”

“Oh, A-Ling!” Jiang Yanli breathed out, nervousness rising.

“Sure! Why not?” one of the other boys cackled. “You’re just going to call your dog to come save you anyways!”

“I can beat you even if I don’t call Fairy!” Jin Ling growled, rolling his sleeves up and storming forward. However, despite his confident words, it didn’t take long for the other boys to surround him. Jin Ling had a slight upper hand in technique, but, as punches flew at him from all sides, he began to struggle quite a bit.

“Hit him!” Wei Wuxian cheered. “Left! On your left!”

“A-Xian, help him!” Jiang Yanli protested. “Oh, A-Ling-”

Jin Ling barely managed to block a kick to his side, and skidded back a few steps.

“Take them down, A-Ling!” Jin Zixuan shouted. “Block!”

Jiang Cheng and Nie Mingjue joined him in the cheering, but Jin Zixuan was the only one who noticed Jiang Yanli’s reaction to it. Despite not wanting to turn his attention away from the conflict his son was trapped in, Jin Zixuan nonetheless directed some of his attention at his fiance.

“Are you alright, A-Li?” he asked, the new nickname coming out naturally, rather than forced as it had been before.

“Ah, yes, of course,” she nodded at once, but the tension in her stance told a different story. Jin Zixuan stood and waited for a bit, and, as the silence stretched on, allowed Jiang Yanli to slowly work up the courage to continue.

She squeezed her hands together, fidgeting nervously.

“I just… I’m afraid I don’t like watching him fight. After the statue and the Nie Sect’s Burial Grounds… I just feel a little uncomfortable watching, sorry.”

“Well,” Jin Zixuan stuttered, having essentially 0 experience with comforting people. “Um, at least he’s only fighting people this time. His life isn’t in danger or anything. It’s a little worse than sparing, but it’s basically the same. And I mean… combat is part of being a cultivator. It’s a good experience for him, since he can’t not be a cultivator.”

“I…. Why not?” Jiang Yanli asked back, and Jin Zixuan did a double take.

“A-Ling, you — ah….” Wei Wuxian winced and covered his eyes with his hand, seeing that the fight was not going Jin Ling’s way.

“Well, he’s a sect heir,” Jin Zixuan pointed out, not quite sure how to explain something that, to him, went without saying. The words did little to help Jiang Yanli however, who only seemed to grow more displeased as she heard them. Jin Zixuan had a point of course; for this culture, at this time, there was essentially no question that Jin Ling would become a cultivator. Even Nie Huaisang had become a cultivator, despite his many protests. Normally, even Jiang Yanli wouldn’t have questioned it.

But that was before the simulation.

“A-Xian’s parents died while night-hunting,” Jiang Yanli said, softly. “Look at what happened to Xiao Xingchen, when he tried to do what was right while night hunting. And now, every time A-Ling seems to go out, he ends up half way to death because he isn’t prepared to take on what comes his way.”

“Well, we’ll… we’ll make sure he same more support. In fact, I’d bet we could just ask Wei Wuxian. He would be happy to help out. If we’re there, we can keep Jin Ling safe. And besides, resentment won’t stop forming just because we want it do. Someone has to do stop it-”

“But why does it have to be you?! Why do you need to be the ones to step forward and take action? Why do you all need to be the ones who put your lives in danger? I understand that the events we’ve seen in the simulation were a war, they were the exception, but think of everything that happened. You, A-Cheng, A-Xian, A-Ling… you’re always going out there, and you’re always in danger because of it. A-Xian was thrown into the Burial Mounds-”

She cut off, the memories overwhelming her.

(A few curious glances turned their way, attracted by the whisper-shouted conversation, but a deadly glare from Madam Yu warned them off. Despite that, however, she said nothing to her daughter herself.)

(If the simulation had taught her anything, it was that when she got involved, everything just got worse.)

"...But, what then?" Jin Zixuan asked. "What else would we do?"

"Just… stop going out on Night Hunts. Stop getting into fights. Let someone else take care of it."

Normally, Jiang Yanli would never say this. For all that she hesitated to confront her family when a disagreement occurred, her kindness was undoubtable, and leaving the world's civilians to fend for themselves wasn't a choice she would make. She herself had worked in the war, even if as a backstage helper.

(But that was all before it had been her son in constant danger.)

"Why should he have to get involved, anyway? What's the point? Why can't you and A-Ling and A-Cheng just give up cultivation and live peacefully," she spun around, facing her fiance head on. "A-Xuan, please. Stop cultivating; stop going out. We don't know how you die, but if you just wouldn't get involved in these things-"

"I — we can't just stop! Cultivation is everything to us!"

"Why not? What good does being dead do you?!"

"Well — you don't even cultivate! How would you understand?!"

The moment he said that, Jin Zixuan flinched and covered his own mouth in horror. He hadn't meant to say that, but, just like with Jiang Yanli, the stress of everything they had seen so far in the simulation — event after event without a moment of privacy to process it — had spilled over uncontrollably.

'Zixuan-xiong, who do you think looks the best?'

'Do you even need to ask? He's engaged. He would have to pick his fiance.'

'He is? What sect is she from? She must be extremely talented.'

'Drop it,' he had said in response.

Jiang Yanli's weak cultivation, her somewhat-average looks, and her meek attitude had always been used by everyone as evidence to justify their reactions. And that boy's response had been the same:

'Huh?' he asked. 'So it's that plain Jiang Yanli. I suppose she's a bit unsuitable.'

But Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli had actually spoken since then. Jin Zixuan had realized how much more to her there was, and had fallen for her for real. They had actually gotten together — chosen to get together, instead of being forced into it.

This was the first time they had disagreed with each other since becoming an actual couple, and, although being able to get through that was a factor in every healthy relationship, neither of them really knew what to do.

"I… sorry, I didn't mean-"

"No, no," Jiang Yanli said at once, stepping back. "You're right, I'm sorry. I wasn't thinking rationally."

"No, I… I just…."

They both hesitated, then looked away.

While that had been happening, the simulation had gone on. Those who had no interest in the relationship drama of two teenagers (as well as those who had been scared away by Madam Yu) had watched as Jin Ling fought valiantly for two minutes before he was knocked two meters back towards where 'Mo Xuanyu' stood.

"Why are you still just standing there?!" Jin Ling had shouted, enraged at Wei Wuxian's passive reaction. He dismissed him a moment later, raising his fist for another attack-

Only to freeze when Wei Wuxian grabbed his arm.

"Wha — hey!"

But, before Jin Ling could get a full word in, Wei Wuxian had twisted his arm behind him and kicked the back of his knee, sending the Jin heir to the ground.

It took more effort than it should have for Wen Ruohan to keep his composure and not laugh.

'What's he up to now?' Jiang Cheng wondered, paying heed to his mother's glare and trying to ignore the discussion between his sister and her fiance (though, secretly, he kept a careful ear on it, just in case).

"Have you learned it?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Huh?!"

'He really is just a teacher at heart,' Lan Qiren thought (watching, out of the corner of his eye, as his nephew fell even more in love). 'He could have easily dealt with those children himself, but instead he wants to do it like this.'

It was hard to tell what would happen at Lotus Pier post-simulation now that Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian had changed so much, Lan Qiren's earlier offer to take Wei Wuxian in for them had most certainly not been revoked. Given what he had done with Wen Ning, even the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian would surely take to teaching like a fish to water.

However, not understanding what was happening, Jin Ling growled, "Do you want to die?!"

“Pretentious tricks,” Jin Chan told his companions, growling in annoyance. “Get him!”

A smirking pretty boy, a determined short one, and a glaring large one sprinted forward at once. Watching their approach, Wei Wuxian stood up and brushed his robes briefly. When Jin Ling looked up at him from his spot on the ground, he received a teasing grin in return.

“Watch carefully now~”

With a twirling side step, Wei Wuxian danced around the first young man, caught his arm, and performed what he had just done to Jin Ling once more. The Jin heir gaped.

And Lan Wangji was trying very hard to not let anything show on his face.

“Wow,” Wen Qing muttered quietly, and the second jade wholeheartedly agreed.

The second went down in essentially the same way, and the third, having seen the two previous victims, defended from that attack, only to end up tripped over Wei Wuxian’s foot and meeting the same fate.

Beating three teenagers was certainly not the most impressive thing they had seen Wei Wuxian do, but the sheer ease with which he accomplished the task — crippled cultivation or not — led to a few impressed whistled.

Lan Wangji, for one, would honestly be perfectly happy to watch Wei Wuxian do that all day.

(Lan Xichen was finding his brother’s barely-suppressed reaction to be one of the greatest things he had ever seen. All in all, this was turning out to be quite a good segment.)

(If Jin Guangyao ended up being innocent, maybe it would even stay that way.)

“Have you learned it, Jin Ling?” Wei Wuxian asked. Jin Ling’s eyes widened, and realization kicked in.

“Yes,” he answered, nodding without hesitation.

The fourth member of the group ran forward, first raised, and Wei Wuxian stepped aside, clearing the way for his Shijie’s son. Jin Ling stepped forward. A moment later, the other boy was thrown to the ground.

Jin Chan attacked last, furious over the humiliation his group had suffered. Jin Ling knocked his punch to the side then ducked to the ground, sweeping a leg out and knocking Jin Chan’s legs out from under him. The brat fell to the floor.

Jiang Cheng gave a loud whoop of approval, and Wen Qing nodded once in congratulations.

Despite the minor argument Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan had just had, when Wei Wuxian had stepped aside to allow their son to take over, neither of them had been able to look away.

The boys coughed from their positions on the floor, the wind knocked out of them, and Jin Ling stood tall.

Lan Qiren was definitely going to offer Wei Wuxian an opportunity to teach if he was able to.

"You-" another cough wracked Jin Chan's frame. "You'll pay for this! Let's go."

"I'm not afraid of you!" Jin Ling declared, smirking proudly as he watched their retreating backs.

'With just a few words and demonstrations from Wei Wuxian, the outcome of the battle completely changed.'

Recalling once again the extent to which Madam Yu had tried to stifle Wei Wuxian's influence in the Jiang sect, Wen Ruohan became even more certain that it would be a waste to leave him there. His intentions were significantly less noble than Lan Qiren's — a personal insistence on helping the talented succeed, rather than a general desire to help improve all his students — but the effect was the same nonetheless.

The question of what would happen to Wei Wuxian after the simulation ended was just as uncertain as ever.

"You look happy," Wei Wuxian observed. "Was it your first time winning against them?"

Giving a proud huff, Jin Ling explained, "I always win one on one, but they always come at me in groups."

'Hey, why did you guys push me?!' the civilian child, playing at being Wei Wuxian, shouted angrily. 'I was all of you against just me. That's not fair!'

Jin Zixuan frowned. There was still so, so much they didn't know about what had happened thirteen years ago. They didn't know how Wei Wuxian had died, how Jiang Yanli had died, how Jin Zixuan had died, or how Wei Wuxian became 'the enemy of the cultivation world.' However, as time went on, and Wei Wuxian worked unendingly to help Jin Zixuan's son in any way he could, one thought came to the forefront of the Jin heir's mind:

'Please… please let what happened not have been my fault.'

And then, almost unconsciously, he found his eyes drifting towards his father.

(The largely disinterested expression on the man's face did not do much to alleviate his son's concerns.)

While Jin Zixuan's thoughts had been taking him deeper and deeper into his subconsciousness, Wei Wuxian had leaned over, resting his arm casually on Jin Ling's shoulder.

'I want to offer to get him some people to back him up too, but, from what I've seen, he always seems to fight alone,' Wei Wuxian thought, frowning slightly.

And, no matter how much Jiang Cheng wanted to deny that, he couldn't.

'He's got those other future-juniors now, though,' he thought. 'The Lans and the Ouyang boy. Partly because of Wei Wuxian, I guess, but still.'

Erasing his frown instantly, Wei Wuxian grinned and leaned even closer.

"Want to learn more tricks from me?" he asked. "This was the first time those kids had seen that trick, but they'll figure it out soon enough. You want more help? I guarantee you'll win the next fight. How about it?"

A swirl of emotions passed through Jin Ling's expression, and, after a beat of silence, he instead responded, "Why are you like this? Uncle Jin Guangyao always tells me not to fight, but… you're encouraging me to fight."

Jiang Yanli jumped slightly, hearing her own words, even if told through someone else, said back to her by her son.

"He's told you not to? And instead do what? Get along with the others nicely?"

"Pretty much."

Jiang Yanli nodded in agreement, still wishing desperately that that could be the case.

However, Wei Wuxian simply shook his head at that and said, "Don't listen to him. Let me tell you — when you grow older, you'll find out that there are an infinite number of people you'll want to beat up, but you'll have to force yourself to play with them nicely. So, since you're still young, go beat up all the people you want!"

"Huh?!" several people gaped.

"'You'll have to play with them nicely?'" Madam Yu repeated. "Didn't you wipe out a decent fraction of the Cultivation World in the Nightless City?"

"Indeed," Jin Guangshan nodded. "And our children were part of that group too."

Many people flinched at that reminder.

However, several people couldn't help but think that, if that was what Wei Wuxian thought being an adult was like, the battle at Nightless City might have not been a sudden moment of insanity, as some of them had thought.

(It might have been a long time in coming, instead.)

Then-

"Are you Wei Ying?"

"Eh?" Nie Huaisang jumped, momentarily startled out of his 'what-to-do-about-Jin-Guangyao' brainstorming session.

Similarly shocked, Wei Wuxian blinked at Jin Ling twice before giving a warm smile and asked, "What do you think?"

Not denial, but not acceptance.

A nearby creek pulled the surrounding leaves downstream.

And every watcher seemed to hold their breath.

(For all the people Wei Wuxian had reportedly murdered, Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli seemed to be the only two he truly felt guilty about. His reactions had been quite telling.)

(Jin Ling's response would be even more-so.)

"...Nevermind," the boy said at last. "I doubt you'd have the guts to lie to me. Anyways, stop bothering Uncle Guangyao!"

Laughing, Wei Wuxian called out to the leaving Jin Ling with, "Don't worry. I've long since moved on from him!"

Lan Wangji ~~most certainly would never have~~ squeaked.

"During the days I was gone from Koi tower, I thought seriously about this. At long last, I finally decided Lianfang-zun was neither my type nor someone who suited me," Wei Wuxian confessed, clutching at his chest dramatically.

Jin Ling backed away.

As did Jiang Cheng, who shivered at Wei Wuxian's cringe-worthy act.

But the Yiling Patriarch continued nonetheless:

"In the past, I couldn't understand my own heart. But, now that I've met Hanguang-jun, I'm certain… I'm now incapable of leaving him. I don't want anyone aside from Hanguang-jun — huh? Jin Ling, why are you leaving?! I haven't finished yet! Jin Ling? Jin Ling!"

'Get lost!' Lan Wangji had shouted.

'Wei Ying, you really are… the kind of person I hate the most.

'Wei Ying, there is always a price to pay for practicing evil. There has never been an exception,' and, 'Some things are beyond your control!'

'Everything is within my control!

'As for any changes to my mind… what would a stranger know about that?'

"Thank you," Lan Wangji whispered, speaking too quietly for anyone else to hear as he brought his hands together in salute to the heavens. "Thank you, for giving us another chance."

And, in some ways, for giving them a third: this vision of the future would change Lan Wangji's actions for sure.

'I promise to make full use of it,' he swore.

Then Jin Ling, whose walk away had stalled as he listened to Wei Wuxian go on and on, sudden jumped to attention.

"You — Hanguang-jun?" he asked, as if suddenly realizing the presence of someone. "I-I'll take my leave now!"

He bowed, then sprinted away.

"Jin Ling?" Wei Wuxian asked. "Really, 'Hanguang-jun?' Who on Earth do you think you're fooling?"

As far as Wei Wuxian was concerned, this was Jin Ling's attempt at payback for all the times Wei Wuxian had pretended to see Hanguang-jun to scare Jin Ling away. The Yiling Patriarch laughed at the boy's adorable attempt. However, a moment later, a body covered in pure white robes stepped beside him.

He froze.

'Oh, this will be good,' Madam Jin thought, and her heart fluttered with a strange joy. A-Li and A-Xuan's relationship was her priority, of course, but, with all the focus Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun's relationship had gotten, how could she possibly not value it?

~~'See Guangshan? There are two men in this relationship wholly and completely faithful to each other — and that's before they're even actually together! How can you see them do this, and still not think that what you do is wrong?~~

"Um… I-"

"'Don't worry,'" a calm voice repeated. "'I've long since moved on from him.'"

As the simulated Wei Wuxian jerked to a stop, the real Lan Wangji felt his ears turn darker than he had ever thought possible.

(Teasing someone else was something 'Lan Qiren's favorite student' would never do, and yet Hanguang-jun seemed to be an absolute master at it.)

"A-ah," Wei Wuxian squeaked. "Lan Zhan, how long have you been here?"

A beat passed between them, before Wei Wuxian, shameless as ever, recovered from his initial shock.

"Hanguang-jun, did you know? Mo Xuanyu was kicked out of Koi Tower because he harassed Jin Guangyao! That's why everyone was looking at me so weirdly! Neither you nor Zewu-jun knew about this; you didn't even know who Mo Xuanyu was! This explains why. Mo Xuanyu has Jin Guangshan's blood. If Jin Guangshan didn't want such a son, he would have never taken him in. If it was as simple as harassing someone from the sect, Mo Xuanyu would have gotten away with just a few scoldings — it wouldn't have been enough to get him kicked out. But if the one he harassed was Jin Guangyao, then things are different. Not only he is Lianfang-zun, but he's also Mo Xuanyu's step brother. What a scandal."

Madam Jin sighed as she was faced with yet another political mess being thrust upon the Jin Sect, and Jin Guangshan couldn't disagree. Although he may appreciate the fairer sex quite a bit, the idea of two siblings getting together — half siblings or not — was absurd! It most certainly wouldn't happen under his watch.

'When I met Jin Guangyao at the square, he interacted with me as if nothing had happened. He spoke so politely I almost thought he didn't know who Mo Xuanyu was. I can't help but approve of his skill,' Wei Wuxian thought.

Jin Zixuan nodded in agreement. He was Sect heir (he wanted to become Sect Leader, even if he had never considered another option), but that didn't mean Jin Guangyao couldn't help. Jin Zixuan would find some position for him, or make one, if there wasn't one already. They could be essentially equals, in this world. So long as Jin Guangyao wasn't involved in what happened to Nie Mingjue, it would be great.

~~Jin Zixuan would repair the damage caused by his father's mistakes.~~

'On the other hand, Jin Ling didn't hide his disgust at all. I guess what he was showing wasn't just because Mo Xuanyu was a cut sleeve, but because the one Mo Xuanyu harassed was his own uncle.'

Although Jiang Yanli still didn't approve of many of the things her son had said, this revelation did change a good deal of the context. A small smile crossed her face.

It seemed Jin Ling cared quite strongly about Jin Guangyao. She really, really hoped it would work out.

Then, Wei Wuxian sighed.

"What's wrong?" Lan Wangji asked at once, picking up on the change in mood immediately.

"Well… Jin Ling is always alone, Lan Zhan," Wei Wuxian said. "He doesn't even have someone to fight by his side. Have you noticed that every time Jin Ling goes out to night hunt, he's always alone? Don't tell me that Jiang Cheng always accompanies him. His own uncle doesn't count!"

Although he tried not to show it on the outside, part of Jiang Cheng tensed at those words. Not only were they shameless to hear from a person who was at least involved in the deaths of Jin Ling's parents, but they were a little too true for his tastes.

(In more ways than one.)

'Back when Wei Wuxian first came to Lotus Pier, and I had to get rid of my dogs, A-Die told me that Wei Wuxian and I would become 'good friends," Jiang Cheng recalled. 'And we did! And I have lots of other friends at Yumeng, so Jin Ling couldn't have learned this from me. He spent most of his time at Koi Tower, so he would have learned most of his behavior from Jin Guangyao-'

Though, between Jiang Cheng and Jin Guangyao, it was quite clear who Jin Ling had ended up most like in terms of temperament.

'-But it's not like Wei Wuxian was just my friend because he owed us. That's not what it was about — is about. We're still friends, and I'm sure my older self has plenty of friends too. I just….'

He froze, finally noticing the concerned glance Lan Wangji was directing his way.

"What?" he hissed, trying desperately to keep down the humiliated blush rising up his cheeks.

"Are you alright?" the oh-so-perfect second jade of Lan asked, speaking quietly enough to not alert the other watchers.

Growling, Jiang Cheng whisper-shouted, "I'm fine! A-Jie and Jin Zixuan aren't going to die in our world, so this isn't going to happen anyways. I don't need your pity, you-"

Thief.

Luckily, Jiang Cheng was able to cut himself off before he said that last word. Wei Wuxian wasn't just his friend because of the debt; whatever happened between them in the future had ruined their relationship, but that hadn't happened yet. Lan Wangji hadn't stolen Wei Wuxian away ~~yet~~.

And then, of course, proving that he and Wei Wuxian were the only ones who could possibly match each other, Lan Wangji simply nodded, moving past Jiang Cheng's rudeness without another word. He remained standing nearby though, ready to offer help if Jiang Cheng needed any (considering Nie Huaisang was caught up in worrying about his brother, and Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli were preoccupied with thoughts on their recent disagreement).

Jiang Cheng wanted to laugh. At this rate, Lan Wangji really would take Wei Wuxian away again. How could he not when he was so mature and talented and amazing ~~at making Jiang Cheng feel guilty.~~

The Jiang heir frowned, disliking the feeling rising up in him again.

While that conversation occurred, Wei Wuxian continued to explain his own concerns to the simulated Lan Wangji:

"Jin Ling's about fifteen already, yet there's nobody his age following him around. When we were young-" Wei Wuxian cut off, seeing Lan Wangji's brows lift slightly, and amended, "Alright, me. It was only me. Still, when I was young, wasn't I completely different from this?"

"That was you. Not everyone is like you," Hanguang-jun pointed out.

"But all children are at least a little like that when there are lots of people, right? Hanguang-jun, doesn't it seem like Jin Ling has no friends in his sect? I don't know about the Yunmeng Jiang Sect, but it doesn't seem like anyone in the Jin Sect wants to play with him. Doesn't Jin Guangyao have a son or a daughter who's close in age to him?"

The traces of lightheartedness leaving his expression, Hanguang-jun responded, "Jin Guangyao used to have a son. The child was murdered, and passed away at a young age."

Madam Jin sucked in a breath.

Her son was alive (was standing right next to her, in fact), but the horror she had felt the moment the simulation predicted his death was not something she could forget. This bastard-child, who stole her son's position as sect leader and might have been involved in Nie Mingjue's death-

Well, even she wouldn't claim he deserved that.

"Wasn't he the young master of Koi Tower? How could someone have taken his life?"

"The observation towers."

"Hm?"

Sizhui's disembodied voice took over, abridging the explanation: "The story the Jin Sect had released to the public was tragic. When the lookout towers were being built, Jin Guangyao not only faced a large amount of opposition, but also displeased quite a few sects. One of the opposing Sect Leaders lost an argument with him and went into a murderous rage, killing Jin Guangyao and Qin Su's only son. The boy had been an ideal child, and the couple had loved him dearly-"

There was a muffled scoff in the background.

"-Filled with resentment, Jin Guangyao tore down the opposing sect as revenge. Qin Su was overcome with grief, and had not been able to bear another child since then."

At those words, Wen Qing couldn't help but recall the fury that had been painted across Wei Wuxian's face when he finally managed to track down Wen Chao. 'Filled with resentment' was a fitting enough description.

(However, corpse or not, her brother cared very deeply about Wei Wuxian. Whatever Wei Wuxian had done afterwords, it was not hunting down the entire sect. Curiosity burned within her once again.)

Wei Wuxian hummed, considering what he had been told before responding, "With Jin Ling's temperment, he manages to offend someone every time he opens his mouth. Your Sect's Lan Jingyi calls him 'Young Mistress' — well, he's right. Many times over the past few months, if the two of us hadn't been there to help him, he would have lost his life."

Both Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli jumped at the blunt words, and the latter's nervousness rose even further. Jiang Cheng just grumbled again, losing himself to his thoughts once more.

And his annoyance doubled in magnitude when Wei Wuxian continued, "Jiang Cheng has no idea how to teach children. Jin Guangyao, on the other hand…."

Sighing once more, Wei Wuxian pressed his fingers against his temple, fighting off the mental strain. Lan Wangji paused, waiting patiently as Wei Wuxian recovered, and providing comfort with his simple presence.

"...Nevermind," Wei Wuxian said at last. "Let's just go inside."

There was a cut forward in the simulation, and the two of them were back in their guest room. As with all rooms in Koi Tower, the guest room was flooded with luxuries and delicacies. Although Hanguang-jun's arrival had been unexpected, Jin Guangyao managed to prepare a spacious and expertly decorated room, full of ornate carvings and detailed embroidery.

What attracted Wei Wuxian's attention was the exquisite liquor cups placed in the center of the room, the white porcelain reflecting the light like a shell.

All at once, Lan Wangji's righteous determination to find out whether Jin Guangyao was involved in the corpse was overwhelmed by its strongest resistance yet: if they didn't immediately go to investigate, maybe he and Wei Wuxian could share a drink again.

Alcohol was against the rules.

They were busy.

People's lives might be on the line.

But Wei Wuxian had been so happy the last time Hanguang-jun had joined him for a drink.

Luckily, Lan Wangji was able to quickly shake himself out of that temptation and put his priorities back in the proper order.

Night had fallen, and stars were high in the sky. Realizing what time it was, Wei Wuxian moved to the next part of his plan. He pulled out one of the drawers and grabbed a piece of paper and a pair of bronze scissors. With that, he cut out a small figure resembling a person. It was about as tall as an adult's finger, and had wide sleeves that flapped in the breeze like butterfly wings. Observing his creation, he smiled proudly.

"...Is this," Wen Ruohan trailed off. "...A Yunmeng technique?"

“Absolutely not,” Madam Yu responded at once. “I haven’t the faintest clue what he’s up to this time. A-Cheng, A-Li?”

The siblings shook their heads in equal bafflement.

Picking up a brush pen, he painted a few strokes.

‘A talisman?’ Wen Ruohan wondered next. ‘But… why that shape?’

Although he wasn’t consciously aware of it, the Chief Cultivator’s main source of fascination with the simulation was getting to see Wei Wuxian’s inventions first hand. To someone who valued talent as much as Wen Ruohan, there was almost nothing as exciting as getting to see such a genius at work.

And each time it happened, his investment in Wei Wuxian grew.

Holding it out for observation one last time, Wei Wuxian nodded to himself, satisfied with what he had done. He set the paper down, took one last gulp of liquor, then sat down on the bed and relaxed. His body seemed to fall unconscious instantaneously, and he might have fallen onto the floor if Lan Wangji hadn’t grabbed him at once. The Second Jade carefully laid him down.

One second passed, then two.

The paperman twitched.

Nie Huaisang yelped at the sudden movement, having been so caught up in his own Jin Guangyao-based thoughts that he’d only been watching the simulation with a quarter of his mind. To Nie Huaisang’s utter horror, Nie Mingjue had to quickly cover up laugh at that.

‘How unfair, Da-ge! I’m using the little brainpower I have to try to think of a way to save you, and the first bits of amusement you show since we found out the body might be yours is at my expense?! How is that right?!’

The Nie Heir pouted at the unfairness of it all.

Meanwhile, the other watchers had been left in a captivated silence as the paperman stood up all on its own. It then flapped its arms rapidly, and the wide sleeves sent air rushing under it.

Moving like a drunk butterfly, it fluttered wobbly over to Lan Wangji’s shoulder. When Hanguang-jun went to grab it, it jumped off his hand, bumping its head against his lips.

Jiang Yanli sucked in a massive gasp of air, and Nie Huaisang, whose attention had been directed towards the simulation again, suddenly screamed in delight.

“Did you see that?” he asked, swirling to face his brother. “Da-ge! Da-ge! Did you see that?!”

Nie Mingjue slowly nodded once, eyes wide in disbelief.

The redness found in Hanguang-juns ears could only be matched by that of his real self's. Using two fingers, the simulated Second Jade caught the piece of paper.

"Do not fool around," he scolded. The paperman wrapped around his finger in response.

Considering that their real bodies had already kissed, this scene should really not be affecting Lan Wangji the way it was.

(Unfortunately, telling himself that didn't do much to help.)

"...You must be careful," Lan Wangji requested. His voice was so quiet — so soft — that many of the watchers wondered how they could have ever thought Hanguang-jun's voice was emotionless. Although they still had difficulty reading his expressions, his worry was clear.

The paperman Wei Wuxian gave an affirmative salute.

'How adorable,' Madam Jin thought, then glanced over at her son and his fiance. She couldn't exactly maintain their relationship for them, and this wasn't even a big disagreement, but she did hope they would have a chance to discuss it soon.

Honestly, it was like they couldn't last a day together. If her son dared to callously hurt Jiang Yanli's feelings again, she would show him something that would make even the Yiling Patriarch step back in fear.

By now, the paperman had successfully fluttered over to the door. It turned itself sideways, slipped through easily, then rushed too fast and fell down on the way out.

"This doesn't bode well," Jiang Cheng muttered.

Perhaps knowing how confusing this would be, Ouyang Zizhen's voice jumped in to explain: "This was a technique called Paper Metamorphosis. Although it was quite useful, there were also many restrictions. There was a strict time limit, and, if even the slightest scratch ended up on the paperman, the soul would receive a similar degree of harm."

"Harm?!" Lan Qiren demanded at once, standing upright.

Jin Guangshan, who had originally though the technique seemed amazingly useful for stealth, quickly recalibrated his interest in it.

Bit by bit, Wei Wuxian traveled through Koi Tower. He rode on leaves, and slipped under doors and tables, even pretending to be an ordinary piece of paper at times. At one point, he heard a cry and paused.

"Er-ge, San-ge… what do I do now?" someone sniffled. "Please, please! You have to help me!"

‘Am I really asking Jin Guangyao for help?’ Nie Huaisang frowned at his other-self’s actions. ‘I lost track of Da-ge’s body. How could I do that?! Do I really not know about it, or is Jin Guangyao really innocent and I’ve confirmed that myself?!’

Too little time had been spent with the future Huaisang for him to know. However, one thought lingered at the edge of his mind:

‘Well, I guess there is another possibility-’

‘Here it is,’ Wei Wuxian thought, and, behind the paperman, the blue form of Mo Xuanyu’s body took shape. Just like when Wei Wuxian had used empathy on A-Qing, the spirits were adding in a depiction of the reactions of Wei Wuxian’s soul.

The illusionary Wei Wuxian frowned at the Blossoming Hall, the building where every Jin Sect Leader resided.

Once again, a feeling of ‘that should be my room but it isn’t’ overcame Jin Zixuan. He sighed, knowing that wasn’t the right response to have.

The number of things weighing on his mind throughout this segment were getting hard for even him to keep track of.

Wei Wuxian fluttered in.

It was magnificent.

Putting aside the beauty of the room itself, there was one thing that would immediately attract a visitor’s eye: the walls were covered with a series of paintings depicting spring, summer, autumn, and winter. Landing on a desk covered in annotated notes, the paperman observed them slowly.

All three Lan frowned, and the first jade even took a step closer to get a better look:

“That looks like-”

‘Amazing,’ Wei Wuxian thought, momentarily growing distracted from his task. ‘The colors and brushstrokes are gentle, yet the landscapes appear vast. It looks like thousands of miles could extend beyond the paper; this artist’s skill is comparable to Lan Xichen’s.’

A moment later, a new realization came over him.

‘Wait, I think these were made by Lan Xichen!’

“...He keeps your paintings in his office?” Nie Mingjue asked, blinking a few times in disbelief.

“It… appears so,” Lan Xichen acknowledged. Although he had already known how close he and Jin Guangyao were from their future-selves’ interactions together, this was something else. It wasn’t a public persona done for meeting with other people; this was something Jin Guangyao hadn’t intended for anyone else to see.

Both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue made eye contact.

'If it's like this then… maybe A-Yao… isn't involved.'

They could hope so, at the very least.

Leaving the paintings, Wei Wuxian flew around the room some more, looking for anything that seemed out of place. On the desk, among the stacks of orderly papers, there was a haphazardly placed paperweight atop an open envelope. The paperman flew closer to investigate.

Although there was nothing written on the envelope, it was thick enough to have obviously been filled. However, try as he might, Wei Wuxian's paper hands were not strong enough to move the weight. He shoved, kicked and pushed as hard as he could, but the envelope remained still.

Suddenly, the door opened.

Nie Huaisang tensed.

'Come on, Wei-xiong. You can do this,' he mentally cheered. 'Figure out what happened to Da-ge! Tell me who's responsible! You can't get caught now!'

Luckily, Wei Wuxian managed to scurry under the desk before he was seen. The door creaked open.

And the one who entered was Qin Su.

'Madam Jin?' Jiang Yanli thought, looking at her to-be sister in law. 'Is she okay? She looks…'

'Sick' would probably be the best term to describe that. Her face was pale, drained of all blood, and she breathed heavily as though she were on the verge of collapsing. The blue form depicting Wei Wuxian frowned when he saw her expression.

Glancing at Jin Zixuan for a half-second, Jiang Yanli thought, 'Maybe… I hope not, but given the focus this is getting, maybe she and Jin Guangyao had an argument. They were called an 'ideal couple,' but I suppose no relationship is entirely without conflict.'

She glanced back at Jin Zixuan momentarily.

Now that she had gotten a moment to cool down, Jiang Yanli supposed that, while she was still worried about her son, Jin Zixuan had a point too. She didn't exactly have another plan for Jin Ling, and it wasn't like being powerless was safer than having cultivation. After all, Jin Zixuan might have died "by Wei Wuxian's hands," but she had too.

She frowned, intertwining her fingers together.

Keeping a hand on the wall for balance, Qin Su slowly made her way over to the desk Wei Wuxian had just been on. She stared at the letter under the paperweight and reached out to grab it, only to pull back at the last second. Under the candlelight, Wei Wuxian could see her lips tremble.

Suddenly, she screamed. As if it a sudden fit of emotion, she threw the envelop onto the ground and backed away from it — acting as if its very presence was poisonous to her.

Madam Jin frowned, then directed a glance her husband's way. If Jin Guangyao had done anything like what Jin Guangshan had always done….

"A-Su, what are you doing?"

Madam Qin flinched.

Jin Guangyao stood behind her, smiling, but concerned. Instantly, Qin Su reached down and snatched the envelope.

"...What's in your hand?" the Chief Cultivator asked.

His voice was calm, as though he was just inquiring about a trivial matter; as though he didn't see the terror on Qin Su's face.

"You don't look to well," he observed. "What's wrong?"

Trembling nervously, Jiang Yanli slowly knit her hands together. Seeing that, Jin Zixuan moved to step closer in support, hesitated, then took a deep breath and approached regardless. He knew Jiang Yanli and he had disagreed about Jin Ling, but they weren't mad at each other. He had to do something.

Gripping the letter tightly nearly enough to tear it, Qin Su said, "...I met with someone today."

"Who?"

"...That person told me a few things, and gave me this letter," she said, ignoring his question.

Laughing slightly at the apparent extremeness of his wife's reaction, Jin Guangyao said, "Who did you meet with? Are you really going to believe whatever people tell you?"

"It couldn't have been a lie. Definitely not."

The desperation in her eyes burned.

Wei Wuxian tilted his head in curiosity.

Then-

"Are the things written here true?"

"...A-Su, if you don't let me see the letter, how will I be able to answer that?"

“Fine! Read it!” she shoved the letter into his hands, fury coating her features.

Well accustomed to past women looking at him like that, Jin Guangshan rubbed his temples tiredly. For all that he didn’t care much for his younger son, he had to admit some pity in regards to this; he too knew what it was like to have a wife be irrationally angry at you.

And, calm as ever, Jin Guangyao stepped further into the light. Holding the letter out, he scanned the words. Despite that, his expression didn’t change at all.

“Well?!” his wife demanded, and, contrary to him, wore a hurricane of emotions clearly on her face. “Speak! Speak to me! Tell me none of this is true! Tell me it’s a lie!”

Looking up confidently, Jin Guangyao responded, “None of this is true; it’s all lies. These are false charges.”

“You’re lying!” she insisted instead. “Things have gotten this far and you’re still lying to me — well, I don’t believe it!”

Sighing, Jin Guangyao countered, “A-Su, I told you exactly what you asked for. Yet, now that I’ve said so, you refuse to believe me. This is quite troubling.”

“Oh my God!” she cut him off. “You… you’re….”

“A-Su, be reasonable. I-”

Before he could get another word in, Qin Su threw the letter onto the ground and sobbed into her hands, shouting “Oh Heavens! Oh Heavens, Oh Heavens! How could you?! You… you really — you’re horrifying. How could you?! How could you?!”

With every word, it became clearer and clearer to the watchers that something big was going on. However, in regards to what that ‘thing’ was, even the most intelligent among them were hopelessly lost.

The tension in the room grew.

Madam Qin stumbled back, then sudden turned around and brought a hand to her mouth, feeling bile rise up in her throat. She gagged, heaving even further, falling to her knees.

All at once, Lan Wangji recalled what had happened to Wei Wuxian, when, during the victory celebration, he remembered what he had eaten in the Burial Mounds. The situations were slightly different, but, if whatever Qin Su had learned was causing such a severe reaction, then they would need to watch carefully.

“Xiongzhang,” Lan Wangji spoke softly. “We should… hold off on making any plans regarding Jin Guangyao until we understand more.”

“Right, I…” Lan Xichen trailed off, and resignation formed on his face. “I know.”

Watching this, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts raced.

‘Just what was in that letter? Has Jin Guangyao dismembered someone-’

Many eyes turned towards Nie Mingjue.

‘But everyone already knows Jin Guangyao killed countless people during the Sunshot Campaign. There are quite a few lives her father has taken as well.’

Wen Qing frowned, wondered how many of those lives were people she knew personally.

‘Could it have been the thing with Mo Xuanyu? No, it’s impossible for Jin Guangyao to feel any attraction towards Mo Xuanyu. Kicking Mo Xuanyu out of Koi Tower was probably his doing.’

Jin Zixuan flinched at that, then looked away. Even without knowing what was in the letter, he could already feel his imagined future with ~~A-Yao~~ Meng Yao collapsing before his eyes.

What was in that letter?

This time, it was Jiang Yanli who noticed her fiance’s concern, and it was Jin Zixuan who relaxed as she laid her hand next to his, as close as the simulation’s no-touch rule would allow.

“Sorry,” he muttered. “For what I said. I’ll make sure A-Ling is safe, I promise.”

For a moment, Jiang Yanli opened her mouth, intending to tell him that she didn’t mind. A moment later, however, she closed it. What she was feeling was certainly nothing compared to what Qin Su was feeling, but calling it ‘nothing’ didn’t feel right either.

Slowly, hesitantly, she sent him a smile.

“I… I forgive you,” she said. “I’m sorry too.”

Jin Zixuan smiled back.

While that was going on, Wei Wuxian continued suggesting and rejecting a whole assortment of reasons, finally concluding, ‘Anyways, in all those possibilities, there’s nothing so extreme that it would make Qin Su react like this. I’m not especially familiar with Qin Su, but we’ve met a few times in the past, being descendents of prominent clans. She was the beloved daughter of Qin Cangye. Her personality was naive, but she lived a comfortable life and was taught excellent manners. She’d never act is such a mad, violent way.’

So what was happening?

Slowly, Jin Guangyao bent down to grab the letter, then held it over the lotus-branched candle stand. The ashes fell to the ground.

“...A-Su, we’ve been husband and wife for so many years. We’ve always respected each other, and lived in harmony. As a husband, I’d like to think that I treat you well. Your actions right now have really hurt me.”

His wife gagged once more.

“You’ve definitely treated me well. Very well,” she forced out. “But I wish we’d never met! No wonder you never… ever since… ever since then…. You did such a thing — why don’t you just kill me?!”

Madam Yu’s mouth dropped open as the gravity of what Qin Su was feeling became clear.

“What on earth-”

“A-Su, before you learned of this, didn’t we live perfectly fine? You only started to feel uncomfortable after finding out. It isn’t physical at all; it can’t hurt you. The only thing that’s been damaged is your mind-”

“Then tell me the truth! How did A-Song really die?!”

“A-Song?” Jiang Yanli repeated. “Their son?”

Not for the first time since the simulation had started, it occurred to Madam Yu that, in terms of marriage, she really didn’t have anything to complain about.

“A-Song? Why are you asking me about him? Didn’t you learn what happened a long time ago? A-Song was killed, and I destroyed those who killed him as revenge. What do you think I could have done? You’d rather believe an unknown person than me? He was my son.”

Something seemed to snap inside of Qin Su.

“It’s because he was your son that this is so horrifying!” she screamed, pulling at her own hair. “You won’t hesitate even to do things like this! What wouldn’t you do?! And now you want me to trust you again?!”

“Stop thinking about it,” the now unnervingly-calm voice advised. “If someone told you this, there’s nothing preventing them from telling other people as well.”

He touched her shoulder lightly, then knelt down to whisper in her ear.

“Tell me, who did you meet with today? If there was one letter, then there can be a second, and a third. Who gave you this letter? Please A-Su, I’m begging you. We’ve loved each other for so many years. Tell me who it is.”

“Don’t,” Lan Xichen whispered, staring at Jin Guangyao with wide, horrified eyes.

Luckily, as naive as she might have seemed at times, Qin Su would never trust Jin Guangyao again. Her hand shot out, slapping his arm away as she sobbed.

“...Am I truly that disgusting?” Jin Guangyao asked, frowning. Looking at just that, one would be inclined to feel pity towards him. However-

“You’re not human,” Qin Su hissed back. “You’re insane!”

With a regret-filled warmth, Jin Guangyao looked down at Qin Su and said, "A-Su, back then, I really didn't have another choice. I had wanted to keep you in the dark about it your whole life. I didn't want you to know about it. Now, though, that plan has been entirely ruined by whoever spoke to you. You think I'm dirty; you think I'm disgusting-"

"Stop talking! Stop talking stop talking stop talking! Stop reminding me!!! I wish I had never met you! I wish that I wasn't related to you at all! Why did you approach me in the first place?!"

"I know you won't believe anything I say now, but know that I sincerely meant all the feelings I've shown you all this time."

"You're still lying!"

"I'm speaking the truth. I've always remembered that you never said anything about my background or my mother. I'll be grateful for that until the end of my life. I wanted to respect you; cherish you; love you. But you must know why A-Song had to die. If we had let him grow up, you and I-"

Qin Su slapped him, making his head snap to the side.

Even without knowing the context of the situation, Madam Yu and Madam Jin nodded in agreement with the action. No matter how good at appearing remorseful Jin Guangyao seemed, the fact remained that he had kept something from his wife. If he lied to her for years about something she would have desperately wanted to know — if he had such little respect for he that he thought he had to filter out the information she, a grown woman, had access to — then he would get no mercy from them.

(Most especially if it was about her son.)

Huffing desperately as emotions overwhelmed her, Qin Su bit out, "And who was the one who caused all of that? A tiger, no matter how cruel, will never devour its cubs! What is it that you won't do for this position?!"

Jin Guangyao frowned, but did not otherwise respond. He had allowed himself to be slapped.

Somehow, that seemed to just make Qin Su more distraught.

Then-

"Will you really not tell me who told you?"

"If I tell you, you'll just kill them to silence them, won't you?!"

Not a single watcher could look away.

A crimson mark in the shape of a handprint formed on Jin Guangyao's cheek.

“What are you talking about?” he said at last. “You must be feeling quite unwell, my dear.”

He stood up, and stepped close.

Two wide, fearful eyes stared up at him.

“Don’t come closer,” she whispered. “Don’t-”

His hand approached her cheek and wiped the tears away. He tucked a lock of hair behind her ear, seemingly indifferent to the way she shook in fear. Then, reaching a hand out, Jin Guangyao grabbed Qin Su’s wrist and began to drag her off.

“Let go!”

“Your father has already left. I’ll send you out sometime soon as well, and you can join him and rest. Let’s finish this quickly; there are still quite a few guests outside. The Discussion conference is tomorrow you know.”

“Get your hands off her!” Madam Yu growled, and murder danced in Madam Jin’s eyes.

Laughing brokenly, Nie Mingjue bisbelievingly asked, “He’s still worried about the discussion conference?”

“Where… where is he taking her?” Lan Xichen wondered.

Fear welled up in Jin Zixuan, and, seeking comfort, he stepped even closer to Jiang Yanli, only to find her stepping towards him as well. They made eye contact with each other, then turned their fearful gazes upon the simulation once more.

“Let go!” Qin Su ordered again, making another attempt to escape. However, at that moment, Jin Guangyao moved his hand next to her head and did something out of the watchers’ sights. Qin Su suddenly stiffened, before collapsing into Jin Guangyao’s arms, unable to move a muscle. Picking up her unmoving form, he carried her away.

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “A-Xian, go after them. Don’t let him take her!”

As though he could hear Jiang Yanli’s plea, the paperman Wei Wuxian did, suddenly reminding all the watchers that if his paper form somehow got crumpled or scratched, his soul would be destroyed.

“What a stupid technique,” Jiang Cheng grumbled angrily, nervousness rising.

Jin Guangyao walked across the room, moving further and further from the door, and ended up in front of a floor length mirror. Reaching forward, his pushed his hand until it seemed to go inside the glass, and then he stepped through.

Wei Wuxian leapt after.

Behind the copper mirror was a secret room, whose oil lamps lit immediately after. On the shelves were books, precious stones, weapons, and even a few torture tools.

In fact, Wen Ruohan was pretty sure he recognized some of those from his own collection.

It wouldn't be unusual for a Sect Leader to have a secret room. What was unusual, however, was the iron table in the center covered in black, dried up traces of something.

'That would be a perfect place to cut someone open,' Wei Wuxian thought.

Jiang Yanli and Lan Xichen paled considerably.

Qin Su was laid down on the table, and Jin Guangyao softly detangled a few knots in her hair.

"Don't be afraid. As it is, you're in no condition to be walking around right now. You should rest. You'll be able to come back as soon as you tell me who 'that person' is."

"Liar," Nie Mingjue hissed.

Suddenly, the blue form of Wei Wuxian's soul glanced to the side. One of the shelves was blocked by a curtain. Painted onto the curtain was a mess of blood-red runes.

'A talisman of forbiddance,' Wei Wuxian realized. 'And a powerful one, too.'

He flew inside.

Jin Guangyao's head snapped back, as if he had noticed a movement.

Nie Huaisang's heart jumped, and, for the first time in quite a while, he slipped inside his Da-ge's chest to hide. Despite that, he made sure to keep his eyes peaking out.

He couldn't afford to miss anything.

After a few seconds, deciding that he was being paranoid, Jin Guangyao finally looked away. Behind the curtain, the paperman Wei Wuxian found a notes page with a large array painted in the center. He frowned, studying it closely, then allowed his eyes to widen.

'That's my handwriting!' he realized. 'These are my notes! 'Different from possession,' 'revenge,' 'forced contract' — these are my manuscripts on body possession! That means, this must be where Mo Xuanyu learned the technique!'

Well, that answered one question.

And created a dozen more.

"A-Su, I need to tend to the guests. I'll come back to see you later."

Peeking out from the document he was hiding behind (a title deed for housing and land) the blue form representing Wei Wuxian watched as Jin Guangyao began to exit the room. Just before he left, however, the Chief Cultivator paused and turned back to the shelf where Wei Wuxian was. He approached.

Lan Wangji's heart rate doubled in speed, and the tension in his form tripled.

However, when Jin Guangyao pulled back the curtain, it wasn't Wei Wuxian he was looking at.

"Were you the one looking at me?" he wondered, addressing the question to the spherical object before him. He received no answer, but seemed to not have expected one. He paused for a second, and left the room a moment later. Upon confirming that the Chief Cultivator was gone, Wei Wuxian slowly began to sneak over.

The light raised in intensity, and, at long last, the watchers were able to see what Jin Guangyao had been looking at.

Nie Mingjue's decapitated head stared directly at them.

And the simulation drew to a close.

A moment of silence passed, the tension still filling the watchers leaving them unable to say anything for some time. Then, quietly, Nie Huaisang sighed:

"I hate being right."

"Lan Zhan."

"..."

"Laaaaaaaan Zhaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaan!"

"Mn?"

"Which would you prefer: cliffs or forests?"

At long last, the (temporary) Chief Cultivator's quill froze, and Hanguang-jun turned his eyes down on his beloved husband. Two bright, silver eyes looked up, Wei Wuxian feeling perfectly at home laying his head across Lan Wangji's lap. Even in the dim candlelight under an already-set sun, the Yiling Patriarch's eyes seemed to glow like stars.

Finally, tearing his attention away from the figure below him, Lan Wangji answered, "Forests."

"Ah, I knew you would say that!" Wei Wuxian beamed. "Yes, indeed, forests are the best. How wise of you Hanguang-jun. If we can find a little clearing in the forest, then we shouldn't have anything to worry about. If we do it by cliffs, on the other hand, we'll constantly need to be making sure none of the kids fall off. I don't know what I was thinking!"

Lan Wangji didn't need an explanation to know what Wei Wuxian was talking about:

"Pick the forest you want carefully," he said. "It could cause problems if our wedding were to be held too close to any sect other than Gusu's."

"I know, I know, but there are too many hills around here! We need a flat clearing, and I thought I knew a place that would work, but it turns out the geography around here has changed in the last twenty years. It looked like there was a landslide or something."

"Mn. Twelve years ago."

"Really? Huh."

For all that he knew he had been dead for thirteen years, it was still somewhat weird to be reminded of the passage of time like this. It didn't help that he'd been so busy lately. If he could just give his work to someone else, he'd have time to go relearn the land surrounding Gusu. Unfortunately, giving possibly dimension-destroying tools to someone else was "irresponsible" and "unwise," so Wei Wuxian had decided against it.

But how was he supposed to plan for the most important moment in his life while also trying to save his other-self from the past's Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan? Not to mention what Lan Xichen had asked him to do for Jin Guangyao (and possibly Xue Yang). This was why he told Lan Wangji they should just stick with their elopement!

(Though getting a fancy wedding fully funded by the Lan Sect sounded kinda fun too.)

"Ah, what I really need to do is find something to distract Nie Huaisang with," Wei Wuxian said. "I'm already doing what he wants me to; he doesn't have to watch over my shoulder to make sure I don't betray him. Seriously! And to think, my first time in the Cloud Recesses, I thought you were too strict and he was too relaxed."

Smiling lightly at the complaints, Lan Wangji calmly informed him, "You learned better, years later."

"I sure did! No way I'll ever make that mistake again!"

"Hm," Hanguang-jun agreed, then wondered, "Is there anything you can do to combine the two problems? Condense them to minimize the amount of work you have to do?"

"Ooh, is that a trick you learned from your oh-so-important Chief Cultivator missions?" Wei Wuxian wondered, grinning teasingly.

The look he got in response showed exactly how happy Lan Wangji was to be reminded of the position he was still stuck with. Now that Wei Wuxian thought about it, he should really make sure to force the rank of Chief Cultivator onto Nie Huaisang before the wedding happened. How was Lan Wangji supposed to relax, otherwise? It was going pretty well so far, with both Nie Huaisang and Wei Wuxian working to change the reputation of the Nie Sect towards at least a minimal degree of competency, but it could still be going a lot faster. Maybe if-“Wait, Lan Zhan, you’re a genius!” Wei Wuxian shouted, abruptly sitting up.

This time, Hanguang-jun hadn’t managed to follow Wei Wuxian’s train of thought. He tilted his head questioningly.

“Nie-xiong loves parties! He loves attending them, and he loves planning them. He kept asking me if he could contribute to our wedding, so I’ll just put him in charge! It’ll distract him, and he knows much more about the current era than I do. Besides, that’ll leave me time to work on the alternate dimension issue!”

“Hm. Would he agree to that?’

“No clue. Only one way to find out!”

As it turned out, after much deliberation regarding his other priorities and his knowledge that Wei Wuxian was just doing this as a distraction, Nie Huaisang did, in fact, agree to the suggestion. Having a chance to plan his favorite couple’s wedding was just too much to risk giving up. Besides, when he first came over to the Lan Sect just a short while ago, he had halfway assumed that wedding planning was what he was being called over to do. It took a few more twists and turns than he had intended, but the end result was mostly the same. He knew there was no one who could plan it better than him!

After getting the position, there was only one thing he could say:

“Ah, I love being right!”

Chapter End Notes

To anyone curious, the title is a reference to Puella Magi Madoka Magica. I don’t expect you all to get it, but I thought it was a little funny, so here we are. The dokey memory was from the Audio Drama Bonus Extra: Wei Wuxian’s Childhood. It didn’t really fit here, but I didn’t want to wait too long before including it. Hope you enjoyed!

Chapter Notes

Once again, beta read by Tintin! Thanks so much!

"Well," Wen Ruohan began, tilting his head slightly in consideration, "I suppose I can't say I'm surprised by this revelation."

At least ten death glares were directed his way, but his underlying 'I told you so' was burning as strong as ever. After all, hadn't they seen first hand that Meng Yao had managed to betray even the Wen Sect? Was it really a surprise to see that he was still a snake in the grass?

For Lan Xichen, the answer was apparently 'yes.'

Lan Wangji silently moved closer to his brother, who was standing with the still somewhat shell-shocked Nie Mingjue and Nie Huaisang. It was one thing to know Nie Mingjue was dead. Given the Nie Sect's style of cultivation, Nie Mingjue had fully expected that to happen soon enough, and Nie Huaisang knew that, given Nie Mingjue's relationship with the Wen Sect, conflicts could break out at any time. That had been shocking, but was still understandable.

Having his own sworn brother keep the decapitated head displayed like a trophy was another thing entirely.

"Da-ge, are-" Lan Xichen began, before cutting himself off abruptly. It had been one thing to use the term "da-ge" when all it did was increase the closeness between the two of them — a nod of acknowledgement towards what seemed to be the evolved relationship of their future-selves. Now, "da-ge" acknowledged that there were three people in that sworn brotherhood, and that it had not played out anywhere near as idealistically as they wanted it to.

Realizing what thoughts had passed through Zewu-jun's brain, Wen Ruohan's aura seemed to flicker in amusement, making Nie Mingjue's glare at him double in intensity. Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, seemed concerningly closed off.

"What will we do with him?" the Nie heir asked.

Several people glanced over, surprised by how ~~blank~~ calm his voice seemed.

"I… we shouldn't decide that now," Lan Xichen said, his usual poise cracking under the anger and betrayal he felt churning within. "We'll wait a bit for when we know more and the news is less… sudden."

“Hm,” Nie Huaisang said, still not letting even a hint of emotion into his voice. His usual whining tone was gone, and even the loud sobbing Nie Mingjue had fully expected was nowhere to be found. Nie Mingjue had never thought there might come a time where he would miss that.

“...It’ll be fine,” he said at last, finally causing Nie Huaisang to look over at him. “Whatever happened was probably a result of him tricking me, considering the level of his cultivation. I just… won’t fall for it. I’ll be okay.”

Although Nie Huaisang smiled at that, none of his usual levity could be found: “Da-ge, I think you’re underestimating just how much someone can hide from you, if they really want to.”

Nie Mingjue wanted to protest that, and Lan Qiren was about to as well. Nie Huaisang wasn’t speaking logically; there was no evidence anywhere that Sect Leader Nie was unusually easy to trick. The Nie heir was surely just speaking out of grief. However, something about that tone stopped them. It didn’t sound like a theory; it sounded like a fact.

As in, ‘you don’t have the slightest idea just how many things I’ve hidden from you; how can I trust you with this?’

Which was ridiculous. Nie Huaisang wore his emotions on his sleeves, and had never so much as managed to find a convincing excuse to escape punishment. He had never been able to hide anything from his brother or Lan Qiren.

And yet, for some reason, both of them hesitated to say that.

Several seconds passed, and no one spoke a word.

Finally, after a bit of thought, Lan Wangji said, “We agreed to not punish people for actions they haven’t yet taken. Given that the real Meng Yao is only a little older than I am, I see no reason to change that plan.”

Especially so long as they still remained unable to punish the Wen Sect for its own transgressions. Madam Yu pursed her lips unhappily at the reminder, and Jiang Yanli had to close her eyes as memories flooded into her brain.

“In any case, you can rest assured, Sect Leader Nie,” Jin Guanghsan’s far-too-lighthearted voice declared. “That boy is certainly no son of mine. I don’t know how my other self could have possibly made the mistake of accepting him, but I most certainly won’t make the same error.”

Wen Ruohan was killed by Meng Yao, and Nie Mingjue’s head had been kept as a prize. The leaders of both sides of conflict between the great sects viewed Jin Guangshan’s son as an enemy. As far as he was concerned, this was an emergency that had to be dealt with immediately.

“Come to think of it, we were talking about how strange it was that Wei-gongzi would attack my son, weren’t we? And the information we have on my death seems… unreliable, at the very least. Why, I'll bet this poisonous snake was involved in both incidents! And who knows what he's done to my wife-"

"Leave me out of this," Madam Jin snapped. "It seems your son has done horrible, awful things, but I want no part in this punishment of yours."

Sect Leader Jin wasn't the only one thrown for a loop. Madam Jin never passed by an opportunity to ridicule, insult, and punish her husband's other children. And, for once, it seemed like she had found one that genuinely deserved it.

(But she had seen first hand what Mo Xuanyu's living conditions had been, and had watched, disbelievingly, as Madam Yu hurled groundless accusation after accusation at Wei Wuxian.)

('You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anyone else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!')

She and Madam Yu had been as close as sisters, before the Jiang Madam had told Wei Wuxian he should have let Madam Jin's son die in that cave. Part of the scorn Madam Jin felt was because of how untrue everything Madam Yu said was. Jiang Fengmian hadn't betrayed Madam Yu; Wei Wuxian wasn't loved more than the man's son. That was what had begun to set her and Madam Yu apart, in Madam Jin's mind.

However-

However….

They didn't know exactly what Jin Guangyao had done, but it was clear by now that he was far from innocent. Wei Wuxian's own experiences had taught the watchers to hold off before making any serious decisions, but things were not boding well for the Meng Yao of their world.

Which meant he would be a perfect target for Madam Jin, if there was anything she wanted to get off her chest. He wasn't a good person — after all, she had seen first hand how he treated Qin Su.

But there had been some time, between the present day and this future, in which Meng Yao had been living at LanlingJin, and Madam Jin had been too.

~~What if there was something she had done that caused him to…~~

"...I have no objections to you punishing him for what he's done, Sect Leaders. Just… leave me out of it," she requested. If she had looked up, she would have seen her son staring at her, wide-eyed.

And hopeful.

"A-ah," her husband coughed. "Well, that's fine. It's all well and good. As I was saying, we might not punish him, but I'll be sure he doesn't have any opportunities to act against us. Our Wei-gongzi said that he and his future self had made a plan for dealing with future criminals, right? Well, the Jin Sect will be sure to offer its full support when it comes to clearing up those messes. Xue Yang and Meng Yao will need to be handled as soon as possible."

"And Sect Leader Chang," Lan Wangji pointed out, recalling the leader who had laughed as Xue Yang's hand was destroyed by his cart.

"Yes, yes. Him too. We'll gather them up and ensure that they won't be able to cause harm to us again!"

There was nothing about the words being said that Nie Mingjue strongly disagreed with, but, somehow, the fact that it was Jin Guangshan saying them left him wanting to object. Then-

Click.

"Greetings, Sect Leaders, A-Cheng, A-Li," Jiang Fengmian's voice rang out.

"H-Hello, Sect Leaders and heirs! And A-Jie!" Wen Ning squeaked.

"A-Ning," Wen Qing smiled, relaxing at once. "Is everything alright?"

"Ah, yes! Sect Leader Jiang just wanted to check in on all of you. Um, Wei-gongzi isn't here right now, sorry. He's meeting with the future's Mo Xuanyu. They have a plan for improving the Pingxin Gateway, and are brainstorming together on it."

'I suppose that makes sense,' Wen Ruohan supposed, accepting the explanation after a bit of thought. 'The only thing better than one Wei Wuxian would be two.'

The Nie brothers still seemed lost in thought, unable to talk, and the Lan and Jin heirs were quite silent too. Part of Wen Ruohan wanted to take advantage of this opportunity to try getting Jiang Fengmian to take action without having to deal with Nie Mingjue's interference, but the lack of information they had on the outside world made him hesitate.

"It… it seems there's still a little time before your next segment starts, so I can update you on the situation out here, if you would like," Jiang Fengmian offered.

"Go on," Madam Yu instructed.

"The Lan Sect has essentially resumed normal activities in terms of night hunts and business, so I don't think there are any issues there. Lan Ziming has been the representative of the elders for the most part, and Sect Leader Lan has been contacted, whenever an especially important decision needs to be made."

All three Lans tensed at that, but had no objections to give. Sect Leader Lan had interacted with the outside world so little in the past decade that it was a little hard to believe that he was qualified for that, but, on the other hand… none of them could forget that he had given his life to save the Cloud Recesses when the Wens burned it down.

They made eye contact with each other, then looked away.

“As for the Jin Sect, Jin Guangshan’s younger brother has taken control, and his son, Jin Zixun-gongzi, is the main diplomatic messenger with the other sects.”

Jin Zixuan barely withheld a groan at that. He liked his cousin just fine, but, after getting to spend some time with Lan Wangji, Jiang Cheng, Nie Huaisang, and Jiang Yanli instead, he found himself strangely annoyed by many of his memories of Jin Zixun.

He really, really hoped things were going okay.

Unaware of Jin Zixuan’s feelings, Jiang Fengmian smoothly continued, “The businesses LanlingJin interacts with are all fully operational, from what I can tell, but the Jin Sect has not fully resumed night hunting yet. Is there a message you would like me to pass along to them, Sect Leader Jin?”

“No, no, it’s quite alright,” Jin Guangshan said, having nothing to tell them. “Just let them keep doing what they are already doing.”

“Of course. As for the Nie Sect, Nie Zhonghui has taken control for now and has resumed the usual levels of night hunting and cultivation practice. The businesses have not been fully contacted however, and, last I heard, Qinghe’s usual tax collection was taking longer than expected to complete.”

“That’s fine,” Nie Mingjue said. “Zhonghui can handle it.”

“Alright. As for the Wen Sect, I’m afraid most of the details have been kept within Qishan, so there’s not much I can say. As far as I can tell, both night hunts and business have resumed as usual under Wen Xu-gongzi. Is there anything you would like me to tell them, Sect Leader Wen?”

“...When you have a chance, tell Chao-er to not forget my warning,” he instructed. “I keep my promises.”

“...Right. I’ll do that,” Jiang Fengmian said. “San-niang, you don’t need to worry, Yunmeng is doing fine. Ah, and A-Li, XiuMin visited Yunmeng not too long ago. Her family was transporting a new import of purple dye to us, and she left you a gift for when you wake up.”

“She did?” Jiang Yanli asked, lighting up at the offer. Her friend was constantly traveling due to her family’s business, so, although Jiang Yanli was sad to have missed to opportunity to meet with her, she couldn’t help but be touched by the gesture.

“I wasn’t allowed to see inside, but she promised it wouldn’t go bad, so you don’t need to worry about rushing out.”

Slowly, she nodded. Jiang Yanli honestly hadn’t expected her father to address her so personally — and certainly not before he spoke to Jiang Cheng. She and her father had a perfectly pleasant relationship, but it had never been about expressing affection. For him to do so immediately, and in front of the other sect leaders at that, left her blushing in an embarrassed happiness.

“Oh, and A-Cheng, the sect is considering a new sheath design for our swords. We’re getting a lot of suggestions submitted, but we thought, after we narrow it down to about two or three, we could let you have the final pick. Would-would that be okay?”

“Uh, yeah!” Jiang Cheng said, immediately blushing at the excitement that he had accidentally displayed. “I’ll… I’ll do that. When we get out.”

“Of course. There’s no rush,” Jiang Fengmian agreed.

Then, hesitantly, Wen Ning piped in, “Y-young Lady Jiang? Young Master Wei also wanted me too… wanted me too…”

“A-Ning, just say it,” Wen Qing advised sternly. “Holding off won’t help.”

“R-right, um… We-we noticed a few tear tracks on your outside body. Y-your father already told us you’re not in danger, but Wei-gongzi wasn’t sure how long his meeting with Mo Xuanyu would be. He said if he wasn’t back before Sect Leader Jiang and I contacted you he wanted me to tell you that… that ‘if anyone so much as looks at you the wrong way, I’ll be sure to handle it in a way no one will be able to stop!’ S-sorry, Young Master Jin, I just-”

“N-no, no. It’s fine,” Jin Zixuan said, shivering at the thought of making an enemy of the Yiling Patriarch. “Yeah… that was probably directed at me. That definitely sounds like the kind of thing he would say, and I… probably deserve it.”

“Yes, of course! I know I… huh?” Wen Ning asked, not fully believing what he had just heard.

A warm laugh rang out, and Jiang Fengmian said, “Wen Ning-gongzi, I told you, you and A-Xian don’t need to worry about Jin-gongzi. We’ve… seen many things, since the simulation began.”

That was putting it lightly. Though, if Jin Zixuan was being honest, perhaps the warning wasn’t so needless after all. Just in the last segment, he and Jiang Yanli had gotten into a disagreement over whether Jin Ling should be allowed to learn cultivation. Jin Zixuan would stand by his position, but he knew full well that he could have done a better job of talking about it with her.

‘I’ll do better, he promised himself. ‘It won’t happen again.’

Perhaps sensing her fiance’s guilt, Jiang Yanli moved her hand next to his as if to squeeze it (or, as close to that as the no-touch simulation would allow), and mouthed a small ‘I’m sorry.’

‘Me too,’ Jin Zixuan mouthed back.

“Well that’s… that’s good?” Wen Ning asked, as though unsure.

“It is good,” Wen Qing confirmed. “And you better be sure to take care of yourself and Wei Wuxian too, alright. I know you’re worried about us, but we’re fine. We can’t hurt each other here."

"Yes! Sorry, A-Jie. I know I shouldn't speak like that. I'll do better, I promise!"

Wen Ning continued on and on, and Wen Qing frowned deeper. It had been surprising to her that Wen Ning would so openly speak what was essentially a threat to a sect heir. Wei Wuxian doing that was one thing — for all that he was fully aware of his position in society, that always flew out of the water when his shijie's honor was on the line — but Wen Ning?

Then again, Wen Ning had risked everything to save Wei Wuxian's life during the battle at Lotus Pier. Perhaps she shouldn't be surprised.

"...A-Ning," she said at last, glancing back at Wen Ruohan before continuing, "Has Wen Chao-gongzi done anything… suspicious lately?"

"Su-suspicious?"

Everyone waited for Wen Ruohan to object to the conversation.

However, instead, he and Wen Qing just made eye contact for a long while, before he nodded, accepting her silent request.

"I'm, uh, I'm not sure specifically of anything like that. Would you like me to go… check, somehow?"

"Not necessarily. You should stay safe, first and foremost."

"O-okay," he said, and, although they couldn't see him, everyone was certain he had blushed a happy pink at the concern.

However, Wen Qing wasn't done quite yet.

"A-Ning, you're not an idiot, so I know you know better than to trust what Wen Chao says without a second thought, but-" she glanced back at Wen Ruohan once more, and he continued to withhold all objections. "Just, if it comes down to it, I expect you to follow your own judgment over any orders given by Wen Chao and Wen Xu."

"I-I-I…" Wen Ning's voice rose ten pitches, disbelief quickly working in. However, none of the Sect Leaders — not even Wen Ruohan — voiced any disagreements. Wen Ning would have thought he misheard, but the seriousness in Jiang Fengmian's expression seemed to confirm it.

"Am I understood, A-Ning?!"

"Y-yes! I… I understand," he promised. "I just-"

But then, before Wen Ning could ask any clarifying questions, the watchers' connection to the outside world fizzled out, and the next segment began at once. The world darkened, and they had to blink a few times to adjust to the change in light.

Wen Qing glanced back at Wen Ruohan once more.

"...I don't see any reason why he shouldn't follow Xu-er's orders," he said at last.

(It appeared he had no objection to Wen Ning not following Wen Chao's.)

"I see. My mistake," Wen Qing said, completely unrepentant.

A small laugh of amusement came from Wen Ruohan, and the conversation ended there.

Slowly, the watchers' eyes adjusted to the darkness. Unsurprisingly, the first thing the watchers were able to see was the seemingly-mountainous head of Chifeng-zun, towering over the tiny paperman Wei Wuxian.

Nie Mingjue pursed his lips together at the sight, and Nie Huaisang felt his hands uncharacteristically clench into fists.

'As I expected, I guess,' Wei Wuxian supposed. 'Chifeng-zun, who seemed to go into almost invincible rages during the sunshot campaign, is sealed under layers upon layers in a cramped, dismal room, unable to even see the light.'

Lan Xichen turned away abruptly, barely able to restrain himself at Wei Wuxian's blunt description.

(His other-self had displayed unwavering trust in Jin Guangyao. Intentionally or not, he had allowed this to continue.)

'If I remove the seal on his head, Chifeng-zun's corpse will be able to sense it, and will come for it on its own.'

Just as Wei Wuxian was thinking that, his paperman form leaned closer to inspect the head, and was suddenly pulled off the ground by an attractive force. He flew forward, slamming into and sticking to Nie Mingjue's forehead.

Unconsciously, Nie Mingjue rubbed his own head, half-expecting to find a wayward paperman stuck there.

The scene changed, and, although they were still in Koi tower, the watchers were now inside the room where Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian's unconscious body were. Hanguang-jun stared deeply at Wei Wuxian's face from where he sat beside him. A moment later, Lan Wangji's fingers twitched. Still gazing at Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji reached up and touched his own lips — just as lightly as the paperman's touch had been.

Where, normally, Nie Huaisang and Lan Xichen would have been the first to jump in excitement at this sight, they were now downcast and silent, staring instead at Nie Mingjue. They were sure they would remember this moment happily later, but, for now, they needed some time.

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian's hands jerked, then clenched into fists. Hanguang-jun's expression immediately hardened, and he lifted Wei Wuxian's head. Holding the Yiling Patriarch's face, Lan Wangji saw that, although Wei Wuxian's eyes were still shut, his brows had knit together and tension was filling his body.

The real Lan Wangji clenched his fists together at that, frowning deeply. Now, even though his other-self was in a room with Wei Wuxian, there still seemed to be nothing he could do.

'Trust him,' Lan Wangji told himself. 'Have faith. Wei Ying can take care of himself.'

~~But he shouldn't have to.~~

A scent of blood filled the air.

Madam Yu jerked at that, and quite a few people stood up. Smell was one sense that the simulation had (thankfully) never bothered to display to them before. The only exception was when A-Qing had-

"I see. We're in a memory," Wen Qing realized, and Wen Ruohan nodded in agreement.

As if the memory's owner had just opened their eyes, light flooded into the simulation, and the glare of a blade shined directly in front of them — along with the disconnected body and head said blade had just severed. The flesh fell into a wet pile on the ground, red soaking through the once-white robes of the Wen Clan.

Neither of the two Wens present commented on this, though both of their expressions grew more stern.

(Wen Qing knew the Wen Clan had attacked first, and understood full well why the Sunshot Campaign fought back. That didn't change the fact that she knew these people, and she couldn't watch their deaths without showing some reaction.)

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian took in the world around him with wide eyes.

'Chifeng-zun's resentment was so strong he forced me into empathy with him,' he realized, a comically shocked look on his face.

Just like the last time Wei Wuxian had done empathy, a light blue form of Mo Xuanyu's body represented his soul. Wei Wuxian was seeing everything in first-person point of view (as if the memories were his own), but the watchers were allowed to see both Wei Wuxian's reactions and, separately, the blade's wielder.

Unsurprisingly, Nie Mingjue stood tall before them, his clothes covered in the blood of "Wen dogs."

"Grab the head," Nie Mingjue ordered. "Hang it up so those bastards can see it."

It was only then that Wen Ruohan took a closer look at the body below.

'Xu-er,' he realized. 'I see....'

Unlike when the Jiangs or Lans had been forced to realize a member of their family would die, Wen Ruohan's expression barely twitched at the revelation. However, it didn't escape Wen Qing's notice that, upon making that realization, Wen Ruohan became surprisingly still, his gaze not twitching from his son.

'Chao-er was just a failure. Xu-er, on the other hand… although he was pitifully lacking in ambition, he had never been a disappointment to the same degree,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'It would be a waste… to allow this to happen in our world.'

Wei Wuxian helpfully added further context: 'If that was Wen Xu, then this must be the battle of Hejian. From what I remember, his head was cut off with a single strike and hung up in front of the troops, as a demonstration to the Wen Sect's cultivators. The rest of his corpse was cut to pieces by enraged Nie Sect cultivators, then ground up and smeared below the earth.'

Hearing that, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but laugh: "But Wei Wuxian was the one at fault for disrespecting the dead?"

Nie Mingjue growled at the comment (and the speaker, most of all), but, try as he might, he couldn't protest; he had been thinking the exact same thing, after all.

In one last demonstration of those thoughts, the simulated Nie Mingjue kicked at the corpse on the ground. Then, he glanced back. The floor was littered with countless casualties, some in the once-white robes of the sun, and the rest in the black, beast-crested uniforms of the Nie. The last third were people not wearing any specific uniform, marking them as rogue cultivators or hired hands. Nie Mingjue scanned his surroundings, as if checking to see if any Wen-dogs had somehow managed to survive.

He saw nothing.

Suddenly, there was a clattering noise from a tile-roof house to his side.

With a slash of his saber, Nie Mingjue created a blade of wind that broke open the house's crude door, revealing a trembling mother and daughter, both panic-stricken in the chaos. The shabby house was completely bereft of possessions, leaving the only hiding place the two could find being a small section underneath a low table. As the young woman's eyes landed on Nie Mingjue — his blood soaked-robes and still-dripping blade — tears began to flow from her eyes.

Nie Huaisang watched this silently.

For all that he cried and screamed at length about how scary his brother was, he had never been genuinely terrified like this. He knew, better than he knew anything else in existence, that Nie Mingjue would never try to hurt him, but….

He couldn't really blame the woman either. With the scent of blood in the air still sickeningly strong, and the image Nie Mingjue made as he looked down on them, Nie Huaisang could, for the first time, understand what people had meant when they mentioned how scary Nie Mingjue was when he got genuinely angry.

However-

“Sect Leader?” a subordinate asked.

The mother’s face distorted in fright, so Nie Mingjue closed his eyes, quickly curbing his killing intent.

“It’s alright,” he said, slowly kneeling and setting his saber down. He stepped away from it, hands loose and unthreatening, and, at long last, the civilian woman relaxed.

She collapsed to the ground, sobbing in relief as she clutched her daughter tightly.

Despite it all, Nie Huaisang couldn’t stop a small smile from forming on his face.

That smile vanished as he recalled, once again, exactly where Nie Mingjue’s head had ended up. A cold light seemed to flash in his eyes.

Having confirmed that there was both no threat and that the women were fine, Nie Mingjue rejoined his army once more. Glancing around, he narrowed his eyes and turned to the subordinate beside him.

“Who was the cultivator who kept guard during the end of the last battlefield clean up?” he asked.

Blinking in surprise, the man hesitated for a moment before responding, “Uh… kept guard at the end? I-I don’t quite remember.”

“Tell me what you do remember,” Nie Mingjue ordered, frowning sternly.

“Uh, Sect Leader, I know,” another cultivator piped up. “The last to leave the battlefield was someone named Meng Yao.”

The Nie and Lan brothers instantly snapped to attention at that, and Jin Zixuan, still resting near Jiang Yanli, tensed at once, looking down to the ground.

Much like when they were watching memories at Yi City, they knew the inevitability of the tragic outcome. Try as he might, Jin Zixuan couldn’t stop a small amount of his brain from wishing they wouldn’t have to watch this.

‘A-Yao,’ he thought. ‘What did you do?’

Noticing the surprise Nie Mingjue showed upon hearing that name, Wei Wuxian added on, ‘That makes sense. Only a few people were able to see it first hand, but, at this point, there’s almost no one who doesn’t know what happened the first time Jin Guangyao, then Meng Yao, came to Koi Tower. Jin Guangyao’s mother was renowned in one of Yunmeng’s brothels. Back then, she boasted a reputation of being one of the most talented prostitutes. It was said that she could play the guqin well and wrote excellent calligraphy. She was so well-educated that she could almost pass as the young mistress of a wealthy family.’

In proof, evidence played out in front of the watchers. The now-deceased woman was shown in all her glory, as the simulation demonstrated what had once been.

'Of course, no matter how great the resemblance, in the eyes of most people, a prostitute was just a prostitute. One day, Jin Guangshan visited Yunmeng. He wouldn't dare to miss the chance to meet such a famous prostitute-'

Madam Jin scoffed at that, and Jin Zixuan wilted further into his chair.

'Jin Guangshan lingered around her for a few days, and left, satisfied, after giving her a keepsake. After he got back, he naturally behaved the exact same way he had before, forgetting all about her.'

And anger rose up in Madam Jin once again at that. It was only after a few seconds had gone by that she abruptly realized how illogical it was for her to be angry her husband had forgotten one of his whores. Of all things, that should have been the one silver lining to it all — that Meng Yao wasn't an immediate danger to her son's right of succession.

It should have been.

(For some reason, it wasn't.)

'In comparison, Mo Xuanyu was rather favored,' Wei Wuxian continued. 'At least with him, Jin Guangshan remembered that he had a son, and even brought him to Koi tower. Meng Yao, on the other hand, wasn't anywhere near as lucky. Just like with Madam Mo, after Meng Yao's mother gave birth to him, she waited patiently for Jin Guangshan to come and take her back. She taught Meng Yao with care, preparing him for his eventual entrance into the cultivation world. Yet, even after Meng Yao reached the age of ten, there was still no word from his father, and she began to grow dangerously ill.'

There was no reason for Madam Jin to be angry about this. She should be grateful, if anything.

'Before she passed away, she gave Meng Yao the keepsake Jin Guangshan had left with her, and instructed him to go to Koi Tower. Meng Yao packed up his belongings and left Yunmeng, arriving in Lanling after an arduous journey. When he reached Koi Tower he was blocked at the entrance, so he held up the keepsake and requested the Sect Leader be notified.'

And Madam Jin remembered this moment all too clearly. She remembered the pain and jealousy and anguish she had felt.

(And yet, until the simulation, the pain she inflicted had completely slipped her mind.)

'The keepsake Jin Guangshan had left was a pearl button. It wasn't anything special, and was often used as gifts for beautiful women, when Jin Guangshan traveled to flirt. He'd pretend the pretty object was a rare treasure, and fill the air with empty promises and vows. He gave and forgot about them as he pleased.'

A scornful laugh escaped Madam Jin's throat.

Jin Guangshan jumped at the noise.

Years of living with her had made Jin Guangshan very sensitive to the changes in her mood, as the eruptions that followed after were never worth the struggle. Giving a nervous laugh, he rushed to do damage control.

"My Darling, really, you must know that they meant nothing to me," he promised. "Isn't that exactly what Wei-gongzi is saying? I have dozens of those pearls on hand at all times; I might as well be giving them to pigs!"

The Lans frowned disapprovingly at that, but, unlike Jin Guangshan, were not ignorant to the fact that those words seemed to only make Madam Jin angrier.

"I'm serious. It doesn't mean anything. A-Xuan is my only heir, and you are my only wife. Those other children aren't threats. In fact, given what Mo Xuanyu and Meng Yao end up doing, it's only become more clear to me how little I can trust them."

The chair's armrests Madam Jin was clutching began to tremble at her strength.

"Really. Those trinkets have no value whatsoever. I'd just as soon give them to a beggar. I can promise you, if Meng Yao approaches Koi Tower again, I'll do far worse than sending him flying down the stairs-"

Cracks began to form.

"I'll prove it to you! Ask for anything you want. I'll let you deal with those bastards however you please! You can whip them or cut them up or hang them out to dry; I couldn't care less if each and every one of them were to die-"

"I know!!" a tremendous shout broke through the sudden silence. "I know none of them mean anything to you. Just like I mean nothing!"

"What? No, no-"

"Don't you speak another word, Guangshan! I'm not stupid. I know you don't care about them at all, and the only reason you keep seeking them out is because you also don't care about me. You don't need to worry, though; I hold no respect for you either."

"W-what?"

"I'm saying that if I had to choose, I would rather you own up to the children you've created and bring them into the sect. No matter what issues that causes later on, it would be better than just forgetting about them the second they leave your sight!"

The silence that followed was more than a little awkward, but Madam Jin was done speaking about this. She turned away from her husband and marched toward where her son and Jiang Yanli were sitting. With her head held high, she sat down next to them, leaving Jin Guangshan alone, only a chair with a shattered armrest for company.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian had continued to narrate, but, as it had mostly been information the watchers already knew, there had been nothing to comment on. After all, it was no secret that Meng Yao had happened to arrive on Jin Zixuan's birthday, and that Madam Jin had darkened upon seeing the pearl the servant had brought over.

Jin Guangshan had crushed the pearl into dust and ordered the sender to be kicked out. Although Madam Jin and Jin Zixuan didn't necessarily support this action, they had done nothing to stop it either.

Thus, Meng Yao had been kicked. And he had rolled down, and down, and down the stairs, smashing against the hard stone at the bottom.

Madam Jin remained silent as she watched this unfold, unable to say a word when confronted with the truth.

At long last, the bleeding Meng Yao stood up. Without saying a word of protest, he dusted himself off, gathered up his things, and left Koi Tower in an instant.

Hesitantly, the watching Jin Zixuan reached out, as if wanting to grab Meng Yao and stop him from leaving. However, even without taking into consideration the actions of the future Jin Guangyao, that was impossible.

The simulated Meng Yao phased right through Jin Zixuan's hand, marching off without so much as a backward glance.

That part of the simulation faded away, and the watchers were returned to the Sunshot Campaign. It was a different setting than the battle they had just seen: now, Nie Mingjue stood atop an unnamed mountain region near Hejian. Wei Wuxian's blue form stood behind Nie Mingjue, floating a few feet off the ground with a solemn expression.

'Right after the Sunshot Campaign began, Meng Yao joined Qinghe Nie's troops. I suppose that's where we are now.'

Nie Huaisang hated every bit of this.

Nie Mingjue was walking up the mountain by foot. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw a lightly-dressed boy leave the emerald forest, a bamboo tube in hand. It appeared the boy had just finished collecting some water, but, as if exhausted by the undertaking, his legs trembled with fatigue. Then, just as he was about to enter the cave where the others were, he paused and listened.

The watchers stepped closer, wishing they knew what was happening, but, as Nie Mingjue had been too far away to hear, there was nothing for them to pick up on.

In the end, bamboo tube still in hand, he turned around and walked in another direction. He found a relatively safe spot and sat down, eating his meal in silence. Cold wind brushed by, sending shivers down his spine.

A large shadow suddenly covered him.

Upon recognizing its source, Meng Yao stood up at once, bowing respectfully and greeting, "Sect Leader Nie."

"...Meng Yao?" Nie Mingjue asked, vaguely recognizing his face.

"Yes, sir."

"Why didn't you rest inside the cave like everyone else?" Nie Mingjue asked, right as another chilling blast of wind swept by.

Meng Yao opened his mouth to answer, then paused, smiling awkwardly. The lack of answer was answer enough. Nie Mingjue walked past him in the direction of the cave.

Now, finally, they could hear what was being said.

As soon as it was revealed, Lan Xichen's lips pursed in displeasure.

"It's true!"

"No way! Jin Guangshan's son?! How can Jin Guangshan's son be living the same way we do? Why doesn't he go find his dad? He'd be relieved of our misery with just a point of his dad's finger!"

"You think he doesn't want to go back? What do you think he was doing when he took that keepsake all the way from Yunmeng to Lanling?"

"He definitely chose wrong. Jin Guangshan's wife is scary."

Madam Jin huffed, but didn't disagree. After all, why would she object? She wanted to be scary.

(A part of her brain whispered that she wanted to be scary to Jin Guangshan; not necessarily to his sons.)

"Let's be honest, Jin Guangshan has so many illegitimate children, at least an entire stack of sons and daughters. Have you ever seen him accept any of them? Making such a scene was just asking to be embarrassed."

"Yup. Shouldn't hope for the hopeless. He got beaten to a pulp, but he only has himself to blame! He dug his own grave."

"What an idiot! With Jin Zixuan, why would Jin Guangshan ever think anything of another son?! Much less one from a prostitute mounted by thousands-"

Nie Mingjue could feel his own temper rapidly beginning to snap.

"Who knows whose seed he was! In my opinion, Jin Guangshan probably didn't dare to accept him because he also had doubts as to that!"

“My bet is that he doesn’t even remember whether he was ever with that specific woman!”

“I’m actually feeling quite thrilled Jin Guangshan’s seed has resigned himself to getting water for us!”

“Resigned?” another cackled. “Did you see how much energy he put into this?! Don’t you see how hard he’s working? He runs around every day trying to get into everyone’s good graces. He wants to accomplish something so that his dad will actually accept him.”

A flame of anger burned in Nie Mingjue’s heart.

The Lan brothers and Jin Zixuan nodded in agreement.

Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, couldn’t help but feel like his brother’s righteousness was leading him to make a very big mistake.

His hand immediately pressed onto the hilt of his saber. Meng Yao ran forward as if trying to stop him, but it was far too late; the saber had unsheathed, and a boulder in front of the cave came crashing down. The few dozen cultivators within the cave jumped to their feet and unsheathed their swords but faltered upon seeing who it was.

“Drinking the water he brought you while speaking such spiteful words?!” Nie Mingjue growled. “Did you join my forces to kill Wen-dogs, or to make idle talk?!”

The cultivators inside all flinched, but knew better than to try to argue back.

“You, follow me,” Nie Mingjue ordered, walking off. Although clearly confused, Meng Yao followed at his heels, head hung low.

“...Thank you, Sect Leader Nie,” he said at last.

“A proper man should carry himself with proud righteousness. There’s no need to care for the talk of those idlers.”

“Yes, sir,” he confirmed, though, based on his expression, he still held many doubts.

However, Nie Mingjue wasn’t finished yet:

“The more those people talk drivel behind your back, the harder you’ll have to work to leave them speechless. I’ve seen you on the battlefield. Every time, you’re at the center of the front lines and you stay behind afterward to clean up,” he commented. “Well done. Keep it up.”

Meng Yao did a double take, seemingly not believing his own ears, and stared disbelievingly at his commanding officer.

“Your swordwork is quite nimble, but not solid enough. More work is needed,” Nie Mingjue advised. It was the closest he got to encouragement, and everyone present knew it.

“Sect Leader Nie, thank you for your advice,” Meng Yao bowed once more.

However, frowning, the incorporeal Wei Wuxian thought, ‘From what I remember, his foundation was too weak to ever make his swordsmanship more solid. To compensate, he had to aim for quantity instead of quality, and learned every technique he could, from every sect that offered.’

And of course his foundation was weak; he had started far too late. Nie Mingjue was used to working with the best of the best, but there were plenty of others significantly less fortunate.

He frowned to himself.

Now, it was Ouyang Zizhen’s voice that spoke, as the version in the far-future had more narration to give: “As time went on, Nie Mingjue began to take notice of Meng Yao more and more. They were both at the center of the conflict, with each battle being just as critical as the last, so Meng Yao’s relentless clearing of the battlefield was easy to notice. After a few battles had gone by, Nie Mingjue promoted Meng Yao to his deputy, and Meng Yao seized the opportunity. He performed every duty required of him to the utmost-”

“Oh, of course he did!” Lan Jingyi couldn’t help but interject. “How else was he going to earn Chifeng-zun’s trust?!”

Nie Mingjue seemed to flinch back at that, almost having forgotten that the Meng Yao before him would one day become the Jin Guangyao they had seen in the future. It was so difficult to remember — Meng Yao seemed so earnest.

And Nie Huaisang knew full well how much trouble his brother would have combining the two.

‘Don’t worry, Da-ge,’ he thought to himself. ‘Even if you don’t remember, I definitely will.’

“Would you shut up, Jingyi!” Jin Ling hissed. “Sizhui said Zizhen was going to read this part! You’re supposed to stay silent.”

“How am I supposed to stay silent while hearing about this?!”

“Jingyi,” Sizhui scolded.

Ouyang Zizhen’s snickering could be heard in the background.

Lan Qiren, once again, was forced to withhold a sigh.

As annoyed as the future’s juniors seemed to be about all this, the simulated Nie Mingjue couldn’t be juxtaposed further. As they were talking, the simulation had displayed a scene from the base camp: Meng Yao was practicing his sword techniques, making up for his late start by putting in ten times the effort anyone else would. And Nie Mingjue sat before him, watching with a smile on his face. He opened his mouth, but the simulation did not add in the words he said. In response, Meng Yao nodded and did the technique again, raising his blade higher that time. No further explanation was needed; anyone would be able to see that Nie Mingjue was giving him some one-on-one training, in return for the exemplary service Meng Yao had offered.

Then, a battlefield appeared.

Nie Mingjue was as powerful and valiant as all the rumors implied, cutting down enemy soldiers one after another at a breakneck speed. Hower, to his back, another person was performing fairly well too. It was Meng Yao, using the technique Nie Mingjue had helped him with to deal as much damage as possible. He wasn't anywhere near as powerful as many other cultivators, but….

Nie Mingjue trusted him completely, and that was far more rare than any amount of power that could be gained.

Nie Huaisang stomped on the ground, not having any other way to release the ugly emotions swirling inside him.

~~Because Nie Mingjue had trusted Meng Yao, and Nie Huaisang could count on one hand the number of people his brother genuinely felt that way about.~~

Finally, Ouyang Zizhen (who had, at long last, managed to stop laughing enough to continue) said, "Unlike Nie Mingjue and Jin Guangyao's relationship in the future, their relationship at this point in time was quite positive. Nie Mingjue regarded him very highly."

The scene changed to Nie Mingjue and Meng Yao looking over a map in Nie Mingjue's office, planning out the next attack. It was just the two of them; Nie Mingjue's other officers were nowhere to be found. He felt that the value Meng Yao offered was worth more than all the others combined.

'It's no wonder he did,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'Meng Yao sounds like the ideal subordinate.'

And, as soon as he had that thought, it occurred to Wen Ruohan that the false sense of security Nie Mingjue had fallen into had undoubtedly been felt by the simulated Wen Ruohan as well. In fact, their feelings might have been almost identical.

~~As much as he hated to admit it, he and Sect Leader Nie were more alike than either of them wanted to be. They were symbols of power and the leaders of each side of the war. Violent, feared, and respected without question. They valued talent and ability above anything else, including bloodline. In some ways, it was no wonder the two of them had both fallen for the same trap, laid out by the same person.~~

~~(But as both of them would probably die before admitting any similarities to the other, Wen Ruohan decided to keep those thoughts to himself.)~~

At that moment, the position of the sun shifted. It was high in the sky: noon, a few days later.

“On that day, Heijin’s battleground welcomed a certain guest,” Zizhen explained.

A gust of wind swept by, sending a set of pure white robes fluttering elegantly.

‘Xiongzhang,’ Lan Wangji realized, eyes widening.

And indeed, Lan Xichen stood before them, approaching the waiting Nie Mingjue with a relieved smile on his face. Although neither Sect Leader could say as much in front of all their subordinates, it was clear to the watchers that both were carefully analyzing every inch of the other’s body in search of injuries. It was entirely possible that something like that would be kept out of official reports, in order to keep up the soldiers’ morale; they needed to confirm for themselves that the other was okay. Luckily, after a few seconds, they were both satisfied with their examinations, and relaxed at last.

All the levity that had been in his voice seemed to vanish at once.

“Go on,” Lan Sizhui whispered, softly. “It’s… it’s okay.”

“R-right,” Zizhen cleared his throat. “Chifeng-zun swept past all obstacles, not leaving a trace of the — of the Wen-dogs after he finished with them. Tales of his unwavering blade filled the air with every additional head that fell to the ground.”

Wen Qing pursed her lips together.

So, it was the phrase ‘Wen-dogs’ that had bothered Zizhen? And he hadn’t continued until Lan Sizhui had given permission, downcast though it had been. The future 20 years from her time hadn’t seemed all that sympathetic towards the Wens.

(She closed her eyes for a moment, trying not to think about how many of the dead were people she knew.)

“On-on the other hand, it was different with Zewu-jun,” Ouyang Zizhen finally continued, his tone relaxing again as the words went on. “After the situation in the Gusu area had settled down, Lan Qiren-xiansheng was more than capable of defending it. Thus, Lan Xichen often traveled to aid others, saving lives from danger.”

A proud smile formed on Lan Qiren’s face, and both he and Lan Wangji have the lightly blushing Lan Xichen nods of acknowledgement.

“Over the course of the Sunshot Campaign, Lan Xichen managed to recover territory and aid in escapes countless times, until he was viewed as a ray of hope — a powerful trump card for the campaign.”

Nie Mingjue grinned at the words, and even Wen Qing couldn’t help giving a slight bow of respect.

(After all, she knew full well that the Wen had started this war. She had been against it from the beginning but had no power to stop it. The fact that Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen were working against the Wens wasn't something she could rebuke.)

(Nevertheless, both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue froze when they saw her bow, forced to recall, momentarily, that the 'Wen-dogs' they were killing left and right weren't actually animals, despite what they were called.)

Meanwhile, the simulation continued on, showing Nie Mingjue leading Lan Xichen (and those the latter was escorting) to a spacious, brightly-lit hall. A few other cultivators were seated inside, and the blue wisps of Wei Wuxian's soul moved forward to observe Lan Xichen closely.

'Their faces really do look alike,' Wei Wuxian thought, humming lightly. 'Their demeanors are so different that anyone can tell them apart with a glance, but looking up close like this… they really are similar.'

He glanced up at the empty sky.

'I wonder what's happening to my body right now. The paperman got invaded by resentful energy; does that show on my body too? Will Lan Zhan notice something's wrong?'

He frowned to himself, concerned.

"Awwww," Nie Huaisang whispered, making Lan Wangji instantly switch from being concerned to embarrassed. He had thought the revelations regarding Nie Mingjue had left Nie Huaisang too distracted for the other boy to comment on any of this, but, clearly, that effect had worn off.

"...It's a reasonable question," Lan Wangji protested.

"I doubt he'd care if it was anyone else watching over his body~"

When the Second Jade's ears flushed bright pink and he looked away, Nie Huaisang decided to declare it his own victory. Nie Mingjue relaxed at the sight, happy his brother had managed to calm down a bit now that some time had passed.

(Little did he know that time had merely turned Nie Huaisang's anger from a burning rage to a cool simmer. Even now, his mind was continuing to go over the situation, carefully thinking through everything he could do.)

(After all, outside the simulation, there was a version of Meng Yao that had no idea what the future would hold. He would require Nie Huaisang's utmost consideration.)

And, at that moment, the focus of most of Nie Huaisang's attention stepped forward, offering everyone teacups. As there was no way to bring servants onto the battlefield, most of those tasks had fallen to Nie Mingjue's deputy, Meng Yao.

Instantly recognizing the face of one of the cultivation world's most talked-about jokes, several people hesitated before grabbing their cups.

‘That’s Jin Guangshan’s son, isn’t it? The son of a prostitute?’

‘Gross. Considering his background… do I really want to drink this?’

Some pushed their cups to the side, and others took out white handkerchiefs, refusing to touch it directly. One sentiment was shared among those gathered:

‘Someone like him is bound to be unclean.’

Nie Mingjue growled at those words, and Wen Ruohan quietly scoffed. A moment later, they both did a mental double take, realizing that the person they were siding with was someone who would practically spit on their graves in the coming few segments — even after they had offered him their protection.

Even still, the two sect leaders couldn’t help but view the comments those cultivators had made as the height of stupidity.

(They couldn’t change their minds about this, even if it meant they had to stoop so low as to agree with each other.)

Unlike the real Nie Mingjue, whose attention would be focused where Wei Wuxian’s was, the simulated Sect Leader Nie remained wholly ignorant of what had just occurred, not glancing over from where he was speaking to Nie Zhonghui. As such, Meng Yao simply smiled, refusing to show the cultivators any weakness even as they spurned him one after another. He set down the very last cup, and the final recipient broke the chain.

“Thank you,” Lan Xichen said, taking the cup with both hands and making sure to meet Meng Yao’s eyes. He took a sip of the tea immediately after, before joining Nie Mingjue’s conversation with Nie Zhonghui. The cultivators who witnessed the scene shifted awkwardly, suddenly feeling uneasy.

‘As they should,’ both Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen thought, nearly regretting the feeling a moment later. Nie Mingjue gave an awkward cough, and Lan Xichen turned his gaze toward the floor. Although the First Jade strongly disapproved of the cultivators’ actions, he couldn’t help but feel as though thinking like that for Meng Yao was betraying Nie Mingjue.

However, he couldn’t fully regret his other-self’s actions, either.

Nie Mingjue had never been once for humor or levity, and that had only become more true after the war began. However, in front of Lan Xichen, his expression seemed to ease.

“How long is your stay?” he asked.

Smiling back with equal comfort, Lan Xichen responded, “Mingjue-xiong, I’ll have to impose on you tonight. I am leaving tomorrow morning to meet up with Wangji.”

“Where will that be?”

“Jianling.”

Frowning, Nie Mingjue asked, “Isn’t Jianling still in the hands of the Wen-dogs?”

Nie Mingjue glanced back and saw Wen Qing staring concerningly blankly.

“Not since a few days ago,” Lan Xichen revealed. “Currently, it is in the hands of the YunmengJiang Sect.”

Another sect leader at the table chimed in, “Sect Leader Nie, I don’t think you heard yet, but the Yunmeng Jiang Sect has grown quite powerful in that area.”

The Jiang siblings sucked in a breath of air, making eye contact with each other, then looking back at their mother to see the proud grin that had taken over her face..

However, another sect leader scoffed right after: “Of course it’s powerful. How could it not be, when Wei Wuxian alone can face millions! What would he have to be scared of? He can just sit there controlling his area, while we’re all off running for our lives. With such luck….”

There was an awkward silence both within the simulation and around the watchers as the resentment of Sect Leader Li was made clear.

‘I suppose that’s where it all began,’ Wen Ruohan thought, sighing slightly to himself. ‘I’m sure demonic cultivation brought awe at first, but as soon as that turned into jealousy, public opinion began to shift. Wen Zhuliu’s core melting hand brought about similar reactions, even before I started using it against other sects.’

He very nearly growled in annoyance.

‘Weak fools who can only whine amongst themselves without doing anything. This is exactly why your sects would all be better served as branches of the Wen. I should never have left any of this in Chao-er’s hands.’

Even as his frustration mounted, not once did it occur to him that it would make far more sense to be annoyed at how Wei Wuxian was defeating his army, and then be pleased at the internal strife the “Sunshot Campaign” had.

Finally, one of the other sect leaders decided the silence had gone on long enough and changed the subject: “W-well, good thing that Zewu-jun and Hanguang-jun are helping everyone. Or else who knows how many sects of innocent cultivators would have fallen into the hands of the Wen-dogs.”

Nie Mingjue nodded once, then directed his attention at Lan Xichen again to ask, “Your brother’s over there?”

“He took a group there at the beginning of the month,” Lan Xichen confirmed.

“Your brother’s level of cultivation is quite high, so he should be more than enough by himself. Why are you going too?”

Before Lan Xichen could answer, the watchers were abruptly reminded of the blue wisps of Wei Wuxian's soul when he excitedly thought, 'Oh, good eye, Chifeng-zun! Lan Zhan's cultivation is definitely the best!! How astute of you!!!'

Lan Xichen's jaw momentarily dropped open in shock, and Jiang Yanli gave a short squeal. Even Wen Ruohan got over his frustration temporarily and found himself chuckling in amusement.

"What the — it's not like he's talking about you!" Jiang Cheng pointed out. "Why on earth are you looking so bashful and happy?!"

"Ah, you have a lot to learn, my friend," Nie Huaisang told him, grinning gleefully at the fully-red face of Lan Wangji to the side of them. "No need to fear, Jiang-xiong. It will all make sense when you're older."

"Hey!"

On the other hand, Lan Xichen sighed, "It's a bit embarrassing to say, but after Wangji arrived he appears to have had a few conflicts with Yunmeng Jiang's Young Master Wei."

At those words, the blush vanished from Lan Wangji's face. He had forgotten, for a moment, how terrible his interactions with Wei Wuxian had been after 'the Yiling Patriarch' came back from the Burial Mounds.

He really felt like his own worst enemy sometimes.

"...What happened?"

Sect Leader Wu piped in, "I think Hanguang-jun objects to Wei Wuxian's methods because they're too unnatural. They say that Hanguang-jun denounced Wei Wuxian to his face, saying how he disgraced the corpses, how he was cruel and loves to kill, how he forgot his original intentions, and so on."

"Incorrect," Lan Wangji coldly objected, speaking up for the first time in a while. "That isn't it. I just… I want to help-"

"Wangji," Lan Xichen whispered softly. "It's okay. We know."

But the rumor mill clearly didn't:

"Really? But everyone who's talking about the battle of Jiangling describes Wei Wuxian in an incredible way. I'd love to see it for myself, if given the chance."

'Hm…' the simulated Wei Wuxian thought, his blue form floating closer to the one who had spoken. 'His story wasn't as bad as most people's. I've heard some people talk about how Lan Zhan and I continue to fight with each other even while we're on the battlefield killing Wen-dogs together. In reality, back then, we really weren't anywhere near as bad as the rumors say. There were just a few trivial clashes…'

With ever word, the anger Lan Wangji had for his other self slowly began to deflate.

'At the time, I kept going around digging up graves, and Lan Zhan expressed his disapproval, talking about how it wasn't a righteous path and harmed both body and mind. He even straight-up hindered me at times. And besides, we were diligently fighting the Wens every few days, so both of us were easily angered, and we often parted on bad terms. Though, listening to this now, it really does feel like a lifetime ago-'

Wei Wuxian suddenly paused, and many of the watchers flinched.

'Ah,' he continued. 'I suppose it was a lifetime ago.'

Jiang Yanli clenched her fists together at that, so both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan tried to send her smiles. She made an attempt to smile back, but anyone would be able to see how shaky it was.

Then-

"You know, in my opinion, Hanguang-jun really doesn't need to do any of that. Even the living are nearly-dead right now, so why should we care about a couple of corpses?"

"Yes, we're on harsh times, right?" another agreed. "Sect Leader Jiang is right. In terms of evil, what could possibly be more evil than the Wen-dogs?! He's on our side anyways. It's fine so long as he's killing Wen-dogs."

'Well, that isn't what any of you were saying when you brought the siege on me.'

"Those hypocrites!" Jiang Cheng shouted. "This almost couldn't be further from what they say in the future!"

"What could have made them change their minds so much?" Jin Zixuan asked. "Right now, it seems like Lan Wangji-gongzi is more against Wei Wuxian than anyone else!"

"This is unbelievable," Lan Qiren agreed, frowning deeply.

Once again, Wen Ruohan quite strongly wished he had gotten Wei Wuxian on his side before this had all begun.

While they had been speaking, the simulated cultivators had finished their meeting, and were now being brought to their resting rooms by Meng Yao. Nie Mingjue had gone off in a different direction, grabbing a slender saber from his room instead. As he walked down the hallway to meet up with Lan Xichen again, he heard the First Jade's voice speak.

"What a coincidence. To think you joined Mingjue-xiong's forces and became his deputy."

"I've been blessed to have earned Chifeng-zun's approval," Meng Yao responded.

There was a bit of a pause, as though Lan Xichen was hesitating on whether to bring something up. Finally:

“These days, Lanling’s Sect Leader Jin has been having some difficulty managing the Langya area. As of right now, he’s trying to recruit more personnel.”

“I… Zewu-jun, you mean….”

“There’s no need to say anything. I remember you once told me that you hoped to earn a proper place in the Lanling Jin Sect, and to receive the approval of your father. Now that you have a position and a future under Mingjue-xiong, does your wish still stand?”

Nie Huaisang froze, listening carefully to every word. He knew how pivotal of a moment this would be and the choices it may lead Meng Yao to make in the coming years. Neither staying with the Nie nor going to the Jin seemed inherently bad now, but one didn’t simply ‘end up’ as Chief Cultivator-

---

A dimension away and twenty years into the future, both Hanguang-jun and Sect Leader Nie Huaisang sneezed.

-which meant Jin Guangyao had undoubtedly put enormous amounts of work in to achieving that. Which was fine; Nie Huaisang had no problems with ambitious people, despite how little he wanted to be one himself. However-

“Yes,” Meng Yao declared at last. “I still wish for that.”

“I thought you might.”

However, right now, there was one thing the watchers were all wondering. They had just seen first hand how scornfully the public treated Meng Yao, regardless of the work he put in. The future, on the other hand, had been full of people supporting Jin Guangyao, as well as rumors regarding how much Nie Mingjue seemed to hate him. So, one question remained: was Meng Yao more like Xue Yang, or Wei Wuxian?

They still didn’t know everything about how the Yiling Patriarch met his end, but their confidence in his morality was strong enough for them to be certain it was at least not fully his fault. Inventing demonic cultivation had seemed completely inexcusable at first, but, bit by bit, it had become more than understandable.

Xue Yang had gone through terrible things too, but the actions he had taken afterward were in no way equal to the crimes committed against him. ‘It’s my finger versus their lives,’ he had argued, like a child who still didn’t understand how the world worked. His past had explained his actions, but had in no way excused them.

So, had Jin Guangyao ended up in the compromising position he did because there was something he desired that the watchers would need to stop, or was it due to a series of circumstances largely outside his control?

(Given the scorn with which the future's juniors spoke of Jin Guangyao, especially in comparison to their love for Wei Wuxian, Nie Huaisang was inclined to bet on the former.)

While Nie Huaisang's thoughts had been running rampant, the simulation had continued undeterred. Meng Yao had continued speaking:

"I want to, but I'm already Sect Leader Nie's deputy. I owe Sect Leader Nie a debt of gratitude. No matter what remains of my wish, I cannot leave Hejian."

"...You're right," Lan Xichen admitted at last. "Even if you want to leave, it would be a difficult thing to bring up. However, I believe that if you choose to ask, Mingjue-xiong would respect your decision. Should he be unwilling to let you leave, I will try to convince him-"

"Why wouldn't I let you leave?" Nie Mingjue interrupted, stepping into the room. Somewhat startled, Meng Yao stood up at once, only to sit down again when Nie Mingjue gestured for him to do so.

Meng Yao pursed his lips together, looking down at the table before him. He seemed unwilling to say a word. Then-

"I'll write you a letter of recommendation tomorrow," Nie Mingjue said.

"Sect Leader Nie?"

"Da-ge!" Lan Xichen brightened up, showing almost as much disbelieving hope as Meng Yao did. Nie Mingjue smiled back, and both he and Lan Xichen felt their spirits rise.

(Nie Huaisang knew that, right now, the two of them were starting to hope this was another Wei Wuxian case, rather than a Xue Yang case. Why else would Lan Xichen have unconsciously started using 'da-ge' again? He, on the other hand, wasn't so optimistic.)

"Take the letter to Langya," the simulated Sect Leader explained. "Find your father."

Disbelieving and nearly-gaping, Meng Yao stuttered out, "Sect Leader Nie, if you've heard everything, then you should have also heard me say that-"

"I didn't promote you because I wanted you to pay me back, I simply thought the position suited you, since you're capable enough and your conduct is to my liking. If you really want to pay me back, just kill a few more Wen-dogs on the battlefield!"

Hearing this, the usually-eloquent Meng Yao became well and truly speechless.

"See?" Lan Xichen asked. "I told you Mingjue-xiong would respect your decision."

Jin Zixuan grinned, turning to Nie Mingjue to say, "Thank you, Sect Leader Nie!"

"You're happy?" Madam Jin asked.

"Well, I mean… it's just — he's capable, and we're apparently having trouble and-"

“And you want to try having a brother?” Jiang Yanli whispered in his ear, making a fierce blush rise up his face (for more than one reason).

“W-well…”

“Sure,” Nie Mingjue shrugged. “If Meng Yao ends up… being an acceptable person, then we’ll make sure he’s sent to Lanling in this world as well.”

Jin Zixuan’s grin widened.

But even Jin Zixuan’s joy was nothing compared to the level of shock being experienced by Meng Yao. His eyes grew red and glistened as he took a deep breath.

“Sect Leader Nie… Zewu-jun… I-” he cut himself off, bowing his head. “I really don’t know what to say.”

“Then don’t say anything,” Nie Mingjue told him, setting the additional saber he was carrying in his hands down on the table.

Most of the watchers displayed visible confusion at the extra saber, finding it to be a strange thing to carry. Contrarily, Nie Mingjue scowled at it, Lan Xichen gained an amused grin, and Nie Huaisang wilted on the spot.

“Huaisang’s saber?” the simulated Sect Leader Lan guessed.

“Traitor!” Huaisang accused but joined in Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan’s laughter shortly after.

“Although I’m sure he’s safe under your sect’s care at Gusu, he can’t neglect his studies,” Nie Mingjue said. “Have someone supervise him when they’re free. The next time I see him, I want to evaluate his saber techniques and his understanding of scripture.”

As Lan Xichen tucked the saber away in his qiankun sleeve, he commented, “Huaisang was initially pleased to be excused from training, proudly telling everyone that he left his saber at home. Now, he has no more reason to slack off.”

The Nie heir flinched at the accusation, and Wen Ruohan sighed.

(He really couldn’t understand why someone so obviously intelligent would spend his whole life playing at being a fool. Even if he disliked the physical training, there was plenty else he could set that mind of his to. No matter how much he thought about it, Nie Huaisang seemed to remain a mystery.)

Meanwhile, Jin Guangshan was becoming increasingly nervous, getting a sneaking feeling that whatever the simulation was going to show next wouldn’t paint him in a good light.

Nie Mingjue lifted his gaze and saw Jin Guangyao watching Lan Xichen with a surprisingly genuine smile. The blank, empty one he showed to those who insulted him seemed like a far away dream, when compared to the one being displayed now. It seemed a bit excessive, considering the limited number of interactions the two of them had.

Nie Mingjue leaned his head on his hand and asked, "Come to think of it, have the two of you met before?"

"We have," Meng Yao confirmed.

"Where? When?"

Smiling sadly, Lan Xichen shook his head and said, "I would rather not bring it up. It's the greatest disgrace of my life, so please don't probe further, Mingjue-xiong."

"Why would you worry about losing face in front of me?" Nie Mingjue wondered, before turning to his other guest and ordering, "Meng Yao, you tell me."

"Since Zewu-jun is unwilling to reveal it, I cannot say any more," the deputy declared unrepentantly.

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan again fell into laughter at the shocked betrayal on Nie Mingjue's face and even Wen Qing seemed amused. They had noticed the same, of course, but they were sure it would be explained soon. Amusement traveled through most of the watchers. As Nie Mingjue grumbled to himself (with a strange air of lightheartedness, despite his chastising words), Nie Huaisang softly sighed to himself.

'You meant a lot to my Da-ge, Meng Yao,' he thought. 'And, from what I can tell, he meant a lot to you.'

Conversation moved on, the trio talking business one moment and conducting idle chatter the next. They were all sitting relaxed and casual, a world away from how they had behaved while in the hall. Unlike before, where they were among colleagues, this appeared to be a meeting between friends.

'Let's see if what you got out of that betrayal of yours was worth losing all of this.'

Wei Wuxian was similarly shocked by the levity in the discussion, but his attention was far more focused on the Lan present than the other two.

'Their relationship is pretty good, right now. Why is Lan Zhan so bad at making conversation when Zewu-jun is so chatty?'

Lan Wangji jumped, not having expected the sudden address. Lan Xichen couldn't quite hide his chuckle at that:

"You see, Wangji?" he whispered, leaning close. "Even when you have nothing to do with what's going on, his thoughts can't help but go to you."

Lan Qiren sent Lan Xichen a reproachful glare, but it was completely worth it when the first jade got to see his brother flush scarlet from his head to his toes.

‘Well, he’s okay the way he is,’ Wei Wuxian decided. ‘Yeah, it’s fine if he keeps his mouth shut. I talk more than enough for the two of us, so he can just listen and acknowledge me with his ‘mn’s. That’s nice too. What do you call…’

Wei Wuxian’s thoughts continued on and on, deviating completely from the conversation he probably should be focusing on. As the not-yet-Venerated Triad drifted from one subject to another, the Yiling Patriarch’s mind remained solely focused on exactly one thing.

And Lan Wangji’s ears darkened more and more as time went on.

(He wondered if Wei Wuxian knew that his thoughts were singularly directed in much the same way.)

Someone cleared their throat.

“A few days later, Meng Yao left Hejian for Langye with a letter of recommendation from Nie Mingjue,” Lan Jingyi declared, sounding mistrustful and scathing as he did. “After he left, Nie Mingjue went through a chain of new deputies, but Senior Wei couldn’t help but feel as if each replacement was always somehow half a beat slower. Meng Yao was a ‘rare talent’ — according to the blind-”

“Jingyi!”

“Meng Yao was resourceful and quick witted,” Lan Jingyi said in one breath, not wanting to face anymore of Lan Sizhui’s disapproval. “He was able to understand what was left unsaid, complete a task in its entirety even when only a fraction of it was described to him. Always efficient, never sloppy — it was hard to not compare the work of others when you’d grown used to someone like him.

“After some time, the Jin Clan of Lanling, which had already been struggling to hold the line at Langye, was nearly at its breaking point. Lan Xichen happened to be assisting another afflicted area, so Jin Guangshan sought help from Hejian instead. Nie Mingjue answered the call.”

Sect Leader Jin and his son both pretended they hadn’t noticed the scathing emphasis given to his name.

In the center of a busy camp, Nie Mingjue and Jin Guangshan could be seen bowing in greeting to each other.

“I really can’t thank you enough, Sect Leader Nie,” Jin Guangshan said, the unusual amounts of stress clearly weighing on him. “Without your help, I’m sure the outcome of today’s battle would have been quite different.”

“Hm,” Nie Mingjue acknowledged curtly. “Sect Leader Jin, how has Meng Yao been doing nowadays?”

Hearing the name, Sect Leader Jin paused and asked, "Meng Yao? Sect Leader Nie, I don't mean any offense, but who is he again?"

Jin Zixuan jumped at the harsh revelation, paling in apprehension, and Lan Xichen, whose other self had encouraged Meng Yao, felt his heart rate increase twofold. All the watchers and the simulated Nie Mingjue knew for a fact that Jin Guangshan wouldn't be able to forget an incident that had sparked so many rumors, and yet the man had lied to their faces without flinching. Nie Mingjue seemed to take the news worst of all.

'Did something happen to him? When Wei Wuxian disappeared during the war, he ended up thrown into the Burial Mounds. I'm sure what happened to Meng Yao wasn't anywhere near as bad, but…' he clenched his hands into fists and cursed. 'I shouldn't have let him go. I knew what Jin Guangshan was like, but I didn't even try to warn him about-'

"Enough," a quiet but stern voice declared.

Nie Mingjue glanced to the side and saw Wen Qing standing there. The Wen doctor was staring straight ahead, eyes focused on the simulation and taking in every detail. Finally, she continued:

"There was nothing else you could have been expected to do. He chose to go to Lanling, even after what happened to him the first time he tried. He's smart; he knew full-well what he was getting into. You tried helping him get what he wanted. You couldn't have known anything would happen."

"...I know that," Nie Mingjue protested.

"Of course you do," Wen Qing agreed, somehow making Nie Mingjue feel like he had just lost.

(Unbeknownst to him, Wen Qing had said those words partly for herself. After all, if she was right about a certain theory of hers, Wei Wuxian had been caught by Wen Chao without his core — lacking his only form of protection because she had cut it out. It was Wen Chao's fault, first and foremost, but she couldn't claim to be uninvolved either. That said, she had no way of predicting what would come next, so she knew better than to blame herself relentlessly.)

Unfortunately, unlike the incorporeal watchers, the simulated Nie Mingjue couldn't remain lost in his thoughts. He had to actually respond to the man who had just lied so brazenly to him a few seconds after offering thanks.

"...Meng Yao was my deputy in the past. I wrote a letter of recommendation for him to bring."

"Really? But I've never seen such a person or the letter. Oh dear. If I had known Sect Leader Nie had sent over his deputy, I definitely would have received him well. Perhaps he got into an accident during his journey."

As cruel as it seemed, Jin Zixuan dearly, dearly hoped so. If Meng Yao had gotten into an accident or gotten captured, then Jin Guangshan hadn't intentionally sent him away. If Meng Yao was captured on the way by Wens, then Madam Jin's anger wasn't a factor in all this. If Meng Yao had never arrived at Lanling at all, then it wasn't Jin Zixuan's fault things had turned out this way.

'...What kind of brother am I, to hope something like that happened to him?'

The Jin heir fell silent, unable to resist sending Nie Huaisang a mental apology. No matter how little he wanted it to be true, he couldn't help but feel like his position as Jin Guangshan's rightful son had played a factor in the fate of Nie Mingjue's head.

Funny. He used to be so proud of having that position.

Meanwhile, Nie Mingjue had decided enough was enough. He turned on his heel and walked away.

Despite asking other sect members about Meng Yao's whereabouts, he continued to not receive a clear answer. Frustrated, he marched into a forest, hoping to clear his head for a while.

The forest was quiet and secluded. A battle had just occurred, and the area quite clearly hadn't been cleaned up yet. Corpses littered the pathway, wearing the uniforms of the Wen and Jin Sects.

Jiang Yanli paled at the sight, unable to keep images from the Massacre of Lotus Pier out of her mind, and Jin Zixuan had to force himself to watch. He refused to look away and potentially miss realizing someone he knew had ended up dead.

There was a noise from in front.

Nie Mingjue put his hand on the hilt of his saber and approached cautiously. Through the branches and leaves, he saw Meng Yao standing amid piles of corpses.

Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen relaxed at once, but Nie Huaisang only became more tense. The latter reaction was proven correct a moment later:

Sect Leader Nie took a step closer, and the watchers were able to see Meng Yao twist his wrist, pulling a long sword out of a cultivator's chest.

His expression was absolutely calm. A pleased smile appeared as he flicked the blood off his sword. He moved carefully, not allowing even a drop to land on his clothes. The sword wasn't his own; it had an emblem of fire on the hilt, meaning it belonged to the Wens. The attack that had gotten the cultivator was also a Wen's. And that made sense, considering the victim was a member of the Lanling Jin Sect.

Except the corpse was far too fresh to have died anything except seconds ago, and all the Wens had long since retreated from this area.

Without saying a word, Nie Mingjue unsheathed his saber. A sharp ring pierced through the air.

At the familiar sound, Meng Yao immediately spun around. The second he laid eyes on Nie Mingjue, his soul seemed to evaporate on the spot.

"...Sect Leader Nie?" he asked.

He only received a cold glare in response. His saber seemed to glow red as qi enveloped it, glinting with the shade of blood.

On the side, Wei Wuxian's blue, wispy form thought, 'I can feel the disappointment and hatred within him. I see. I had been wondering what would happen.'

The real Nie Mingjue clicked his tongue, but, thanks to the glimpse they had gotten of the future, was far less surprised than his other self had been.

Meng Yao had spent years working for Sect Leader Nie, and knew him better than anyone else. He instantly dropped his sword.

"Wait! Sect Leader Nie, I can explain! Please, wait. I can explain!"

"What do you need to explain?!"

Meng Yao threw himself on the ground at once, practically crawling closer as he insisted, "I had no other choice! I had no choice!"

Lan Qiren's face became stern.

"No other choice?" he repeated. No choice meant there was nothing he could have reasonably done to get a different outcome. As difficult as it would have been to believe at first, Wei Wuxian had genuinely had no other choice when it came to inventing demonic cultivation.

But the calm expression that had been on Meng Yao's face was-

"What do you mean you had no other choice?!" Nie Mingjue shouted. "What did I say when I sent you here?!"

Nearly groveling at Nie Mingjue's feet, Meng Yao continued, "Sect Leader Nie! Sect Leader Nie, just listen to me! I-I did join the LanlingJin Sect's forces. This was my superior. During my time here, he always despised me. He often humiliated me and beat me-"

"So you killed him?!" Nie Mingjue snarled back.

"No, no! Not because of this. What humiliation can I not put up with? What could I not endure, if it was only beatings and scoldings? But every time we took over one of the Wen Sect's strongholds, I strategized with every last drop of my energy. I fought as hard as I could. And yet, with just a few brushstrokes, time and time again he'd make it all his own doing, saying it had nothing to do with me!"

And there was the ambition Nie Huaisang was looking for. Ambition wasn't inherently a bad thing (even if Nie Huaisang had none of it himself), but it would take a lot for someone with Meng Yao's background to end up as Chief Cultivator.

Idly, the Nie heir wondered how often that ambition would push Meng Yao into a situation in which he had "no choice" but to respond.

"This isn't the first time," Meng Yao continued. "It was every time. Every single time! I tried to reason with him, but he couldn't care less! I turned to others, but nobody was willing to hear me out!"

Nie Mingjue slammed his hand against his armrest and cursed again.

"You should have just come back to the Nie Sect," he hissed.

"And just now he called my mother a — he called my mother a… I reached my limit. This.. it only happened since I was outraged and thrown into insanity the instant he said that!"

However, neither version of Nie Mingjue could believe that.

"You're lying!" the simulated version accused. "You reached your limit and were momentarily outraged?! Would someone experiencing that have killed a person with the expression you had? Would they purposefully pick a deserted forest that had just experienced a battle?! Would they use a sword from the Wen Sect — use Wen techniques?! You've clearly been carefully planning this out!"

If it had just been killing his superior officer, maybe things could have been salvaged. Nie Mingjue would be disappointed in Meng Yao, but maybe it could have been justified. Perhaps, they could have moved past this.

However, when confronted, Meng Yao had immediately spilled out a nearly-perfect lie, making himself into the victim. There was no way Nie Mingjue could trust him after that, and any respect had had left for the other had vanished in an instant.

Nie Huaisang was so, so pleased.

However, Meng Yao insisted, "I'm telling the truth! Each and every word!"

"Even if it was true, you still shouldn't have killed him! It was only for a few trivial achievements! Do you really care about glory that much?!"

"'Trivial achievements?'" Meng Yao repeated, voice shaking as he spoke. "What do you mean, 'a few trivial achievements?' Chifeng-zun, do you have any idea how much work I put into getting those trivial achievements?! How much I suffered?! Without that glory, I have nothing!"

There were a few rings of truth in there, Nie Huaisang thought. Given the way Meng Yao had been treated by the other Nie cultivators at first, it made sense that he'd fiercely hoard every victory he could get. In that way, he was the complete opposite of Nie Huaisang: to have anything, he would need to prove himself time and time again. But-

'How much glory do you feel like you need, and how far are you willing to go to get it?'

The simulated Nie Mingjue stared down, a mix of disbelief and growing hate on his face, and observed the tears shining in Meng Yao's eyes with a thick wall of mistrust. His memories came forward, and the calm, business-like expression that had been on Meng Yao's face as he killed the man blocked out every other thought in his mind.

The contrast was stark.

"...Meng Yao, let me ask you something…. The first time I saw you, did you purposefully put on a pitiful act, so that I'd come to your rescue?"

"What?" Lan Xichen asked, stunned by the mere suggestion. "No… no, that couldn't have been-"

"If I hadn't stepped in, would you have done what you did today and killed those people?"

The Lan heir appeared to have been struck silent. In Gusu, honesty was one of the most valued concepts. There were exceptions, of course, and people did break the rules sometimes, but a carefully-orchestrated plan like this wasn't something he could have ever considered.

Lan Wangji pursed his lips together as well, but remained silent for the time being.

Similarly, there was a pause between the simulated figures before them. Nie Mingjue's question had cast a heavy weight over the conversation, and Meng Yao knew he had to choose his next words carefully. He swallowed and opened his mouth to speak-

"Don't lie to me!" Nie Mingjue shouted before Meng Yao could even get a single word in.

With a quiver, Meng Yao snapped his mouth shut again. The fingers of his right hand dug into the dirt.

"...Da-ge," Lan Xichen muttered quietly. "This is…."

"Yeah. I know," Nie Mingjue responded. He didn't regret what his other-self was doing, especially not while knowing how the future had turned out, but he could tell as easily as anyone else that his other-self wasn't thinking rationally. If it had been a stranger he caught acting like this, he may have been just as insistent on punishment, but the tone he would have used would have been completely different.

The simulated Nie Mingjue had trusted Meng Yao, and the betrayal he was feeling was clouding his mind. What Meng Yao had done couldn't simply be overlooked, but Nie Mingjue was more than compromised on the matter.

After a while, Nie Mingjue resheathed his sword.

"...I won't do anything to you," he said at last.

Meng Yao looked up.

"Go confess what you did to the LanlingJin Sect. Receive your punishment there. Let them deal with it however they see fit."

He was still thinking clearly enough to know he wasn't being fully logical. So he removed himself from the situation, allowing the people actually responsible to handle it.

"Thank you, Sect Leader Nie!" Jin Guangshan said at once. "I can't apologize enough that you had to see that, especially when you were doing so much to help my Sect already. I can assure you, that son of a whore will be punished accordingly."

"But Father-"

"Zixuan," Jin Guangshan said scoldingly, cutting his son off. "Look at what he's done. You can't possibly want to claim that boy as your brother now. Just think of where Chifeng-zun's head ended up!"

Jin Zixuan's gaze fell at that.

"...Chifeng-zun," Meng Yao spoke at last. "I can't go there now. Not when I've come so far-"

"You chose the wrong path. Deal with the consequences yourself."

"You're sending me to my death."

"If your words are true, that won't happen," Nie Mingjue assured him.

At least, the simulated Nie Mingjue did.

The real one paused, glanced to his left at the confused, uncertain Lan Xichen, then to the right at the grinning Jin Guangshan. Sect Leader Jin was staring directly at him, hoping to move past any bad blood this had created between them.

'You're sending me to my death,' Meng Yao had said.

"Don't worry, Sect Leader Nie," Jin Guangshan repeated. "What he has committed is a grave crime — especially since it disturbed you while you were already so busy. The Jin Sect will not let this stand!

Though, of course, we won't kill him. I'm sure he thinks making up a ruse like that is his only chance of escaping punishment."

A mocking laugh left Jin Guangshan's throat at his son's foolish attempt.

Wei Wuxian stared at the corpse before him, delicately resting a hand on Wen Ning's shoulder as he said, 'The Sects agreed to force me to hand you and the Stygian Tiger Seal over to them. I tried to destroy the amulet before I died, and you… it was said you'd been turned into ashes by the LanlingJin Sect.'

He felt along the chains on Wen Ning's wrists, and anger overtook his face.

'Of course. They were trying as hard as they could to restore the damaged pieces of the Stygian Tiger Seal. Why wouldn't they salivate at the thought of having the ghost general as well?'

And then-

'After Xiao Xingchen discovered the truth, he went across three provinces to find Xue Yang, who was still happily picking fights with others. Taking advantage of the discussion conference happening at Koi Tower, Xiao Xingchen brought him over and demanded severe punishment. With his straightforward list of evidence, most sects didn't have any problems with that. The only exception was the LanlingJin Sect.'

Because Xue Yang had been the sect's guest disciple so that the seal could be put back together.

Nie Mingjue's other self had interfered, insisting on a punishment. So they had promised to do so.

However: 'The LanlingJin Sect was indeed the Sect with the thickest face. Although, in Koi Tower, it promised all the Sects that Xue Yang would be executed, when it left Nie Mingjue's sight it immediately changed Xue Yang's death sentence to life imprisonment.'

And if the Jin Sect could lie about that-

'My Darling, really, you must know that they meant nothing to me,' Jin Guangshan had promised less than an hour ago. 'Isn't that exactly what Wei-gongzi is saying? I have dozens of those pearls on hand at all times; I might as well be giving them to pigs!'

The simulated Nie Mingjue had been so confident that Jin Guangyao would receive a fair trial. After all, if the facts of the matter were clear, then regardless of Meng Yao's parentage, the Jin Sect surely wouldn't allow their judgment to be swayed.

Surely they would be fair. They were one of the five great sects, after all.

(Because that assurance had worked so well with the Wens.)

All the while, Meng Yao continued to insist that he couldn't go before the Jin Sect — that any such trial would be a death sentence for him. And all the while, Nie Mingjue insisted that the Jin Sect would be fair.

(Maybe, just maybe, Meng Yao had a slight point there.)

"Go!" Nie Mingjue ordered. "Reflect on your actions. Turn over a new leaf."

"...My father hasn't seen me yet," Meng Yao whispered.

Refused to see him; had done everything in his power to ignore him.

Both Jin Zixuan and Nie Mingjue flinched.

“I haven’t even met him yet. They’re going to kill me.”

But Nie Mingjue insisted, his gaze stern and unwavering, until Meng Yao finally breathed out a shallow, “I understand.”

“Stand up,” Sect Leader Nie ordered.

Although his body shook, deprived of all energy, Meng Yao forced himself to his feet. He staggered forward, then stumbled, on the verge of falling. Nie Mingjue reacted at once and steadied him.

There was still a level of affection there, despite everything.

“Thank you, Sect Leader Nie,” Meng Yao murmured.

After nodding once, Nie Mingjue turned around. He had found the person he was looking for, and so, so much more. He wanted nothing more to do here. However, right as he was leaving, Meng Yao spoke again.

“Really… I just can’t.”

Nie Mingjue whirled around and froze a moment later. The instant Nie Mingjue had turned his back to him, Meng Yao had gotten a sword into his hand. The blade was pointed at himself.

“Sect Leader Nie, I’m… unworthy of your kindness,” he said, and his face fell into despair. The blade stabbed straight through his stomach and out his back, impaling him instantly.

“Meng Yao!”

“A-Yao!”

Jin Zixuan and Lan Xichen’s cries filled the air.

Meng Yao collapsed into a pool of blood, and his own rapidly began to join it. Nie Mingjue froze for a split-second, too shocked to react, then ran forward at once and knelt down next to him.

“Meng Yao, what do you think you’re doing?!” he shouted, reaching forward to lift the other man. He cradled him close, sending qi into the other’s body.

Eyes wide, Lan Xichen bit his tongue to keep himself still, too shocked to remember the future while Meng Yao was bleeding out before him.

All the blood had left Meng Yao’s face, and he sent Nie Mingjue a weak look.

“Sect Leader Nie, I-”

Before he could finish, his head drooped. Nie Mingjue gritted his teeth, sending even more energy into Meng Yao’s body, being careful to avoid the blade of the sword all the while.

Then, abruptly, he felt a cold stream of energy at his stomach, and he lost the ability to move.

‘Ah, I thought so,’ Wei Wuxian frowned. ‘Meng Yao injured himself in a way that wouldn’t touch his vital organs. I bet Nie Mingjue never expected Meng Yao would harm him.’

And indeed, he hadn’t.

As Meng Yao pulled the sword out of his own stomach and stood up, there, for once, was no anger in Nie Mingjue’s expression. Instead, the only thing that could be seen was pure, unadulterated shock. He had seen Meng Yao kill his superior officer, and had seen him lie without hesitation, but the idea that his former deputy would ever act against him was ludicrous.

Or at least, it had been.

‘Naive fool,’ Wen Ruohan thought scornfully, before sighing to himself a moment later. ‘Then again, considering what happens to me, I suppose I’m not one to talk.’

He and Nie Mingjue had both seen Meng Yao’s skill, and had both trusted him in turn.

And time and time again, had been betrayed by that man.

Putting pressure on the wound, Meng Yao fled, completely ignoring his promise to face justice for what he had done. Nie Mingjue, on the other hand, remained kneeling as he had been when he first tried to help Meng Yao.

Right before Meng Yao disappeared from sight, he hesitated, then looked back. A half second passed, and the hesitation on his face tapered off into a sad acceptance. Bringing his heels together, he gave Nie Mingjue a formal bow, before fleeing the premises.

“What?” Nie Mingjue asked, gazing at the simulation in obvious confusion. “I… why would he-”

“I guess he does have at least a little respect for you,” Nie Huaisang quietly muttered, making Nie Mingjue pause and turn his brother’s way. “Not that it meant much in the end.”

Nie Mingjue growled, “If he respects me so much, then why-”

He tried to finish his question, but no sound came out. He knew full well why.

Meng Yao hadn’t met Jin Guangshan yet, but he apparently knew how the Jin Sect handled matters of justice much better than the simulated Nie Mingjue did. He cursed himself. He wished he had known — he should have known — but he couldn't forgive what Meng Yao had just done either.

'Was every sign of vulnerability I've seen from him so far just an act to get what he wanted? A lie to bring him a bit of the honor he apparently values more than human lives? And… and more importantly….'

Qin Su's words, which Nie Mingjue had interpreted as her paranoia taking over after a single horrifying realization, suddenly seemed much more relevant:

'Then tell me the truth! How did A-Song really die?'

'A-Song? Why are you asking me about him? Didn't you learn what happened a long time ago? A-Song was killed, and I destroyed those who killed him as revenge. What do you think I could have done? You'd rather believe an unknown person than me? He was my son.'

'It's because he was your son that this is so horrifying!' she screamed, pulling on her own hair. 'You won't hesitate even to do things like this! What wouldn't you do? And now you want me to trust you again?!'

Nie Mingjue still didn't know exactly what had been revealed to Qin Su, but, after watching this, he felt like he could understand her a lot more than before.

'You killed your superior. You imprisoned your wife. You might have even killed your son,' Nie Mingjue thought, gritting his teeth as his current helplessness sunk in. 'You can value your father's approval, you can value glory, you can value power, but… like Qin Su said, what wouldn't you do?'

The Jin Sect, Nie Mingjue could see now, would probably not have been fair to Meng Yao. However, no matter what explanation Meng Yao made or what justification he gave, Nie Mingjue would never be able to trust him again.

~~Although, a small part of him did wonder whether Meng Yao had considered doing more to Nie Mingjue. It would be much harder to cover up, but letting a witness live… perhaps not everything Meng Yao had shown him was fake.~~

There was a time skip forward to a few days later. Nie Mingjue had long since regained the ability to move, but the anger in his stance hadn't diminished at all.

"Chifeng-zun became prone to flying into terrible fits of rage," Ouyang Zizhen explained. "He was especially fierce whenever he went to battle against the Wen Sect."

'For the reserved and aloof Sect Leader Nie, it was exceedingly rare for him to find someone whose work ethic, morals, and character he could accept, and even rarer for him to find someone he could genuinely trust,' Wei Wuxian's thoughts continued as Nie Mingjue mercilessly cut down Wen after Wen. 'This kind of reaction is only natural.'

"His rage didn't die down one bit, even when Zewu-jun arrived, finally having time to assist in Langya."

The future Lan Xichen appeared on screen, recognizing the fury in Nie Mingjue's eyes immediately.

"Mingjue-xiong, what a temper you seem to be in," he observed. "Where's Meng Yao? Usually he would come and douse your flames-"

"Don't mention his name in my presence!" Nie Mingjue shouted back.

'Well, I'm glad Da-ge doesn't trust that snake anymore,' Nie Huaisang thought, but frowned. 'I can't imagine all this anger is reacting well with our cultivation. He died of a qi deviation, didn't he? I guess I can see why.'

Nie Huaisang now knew without a shadow of a doubt that he would never allow Meng Yao to live near his brother.

Right as Nie Huaisang came to that conclusion, the simulated Nie Mingjue had finished explaining what had happened to Lan Xichen. He neither embellished nor neglected a single detail, being as frank and serious as possible. However….

"How could that be?" Lan Xichen asked. "Maybe there was a misunderstanding?"

"How could it be a misunderstanding?! I caught him in the act! He should start praying for his life!" Nie Mingjue slammed his fists against the table, toppling the cups on it with the following tremor.

"...How on earth did they end up as sworn brothers?" Jiang Cheng asked, shaking his head in disbelief.

Although the past hour had been a constant stream of harsh realities, Jin Zixuan hadn't fully given up hope yet: "Well… we do know that they do end up sworn brothers. M-maybe Sect Leader Nie discovers something that changes his mind?"

"How could that be?" Jin Guangshan scoffed. "That boy truly displays his low birth at every turn."

Quite a few people sent the Jin Sect Leader annoyed glares at those words, and he backed off instantly at the disapproval, clearing his throat and awkwardly looking away. One voice, however, was notably silent.

Despite all past history indicating otherwise, Madam Jin for once had nothing to say that would indicate she agreed with her husbands words.

On the other hand, after managing to calm Nie Mingjue down again, the simulated Lan Xichen had a suggestion: "Judging from his words, the person he killed had definitely done him wrong. That said, he should not have taken that man's life either. We are in harsh times… it is quite difficult to determine who was genuinely at fault."

'Determining that would have been a lot easier if he hadn't run away,' Nie Mingjue thought, then paused. 'Though… I'm not sure I'd trust the Jin Sect to be able to direct blame appropriately.'

What Meng Yao had done was wrong, and had broken Nie Mingjue's trust until the end of time. No one would argue that Meng Yao should be allowed to kill anyone who slighted him, and allowing him to get away with this would almost certainly mean his Jin superior officer would not be Meng Yao's last victim.

The Jin Sect wouldn't have been fair.

But Nie Mingjue couldn't just let that act go, either, so what should he have done?

"I wonder where he is now," Lan Xichen pondered.

"Well, he better hope I don't catch him," Nie Mingjue hissed. "If I do, I'll offer him as a sacrifice to my saber!"

Ouyang Zizhen cleared his throat and said, "As if those words were a prophecy, Lianfang-zun — er, is that too polite? And he wasn't called that yet, so I mean Sect Leader Jin — er-"

"Meng Yao," Lan Jingyi insisted, huffing scornfully.

"My uncle," Jin Ling interrupted, sounding just as unsure of that description as Zizhen had been of the others, "disappeared for the next few years. As if he was a stone at the bottom of the ocean, no one could find even a trace of him. Chifeng-zun loathed him to the same degree he had once valued him, and became angry whenever the name was mentioned. At least… for a time."

"Ooh, dramatic," Lan Jingyi whispered, only to yelp as Jin Ling, presumably, stomped on his foot.

However, this moment was far from enough to inject any levity into the watching cultivators. After all, some very important questions were going to be answered soon, and many had a sneaking feeling they wouldn't like the explanations given.

Suddenly darkness covered the world, and the blue illusionary Wei Wuxian clutched at his head, rubbing his temples as if trying to dispel an ache.

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji asked, moving close, then turning to look at Nie Mingjue. Wei Wuxian was in empathy; the only way he should be able to feel pain now was-

The simulated Nie Mingjue's eyes blinked open, and the watchers were finally able to see where he was. Through the heavy blurriness, they could just barely make out a number of figures laying on the cold, jet-black stone ground. Nie Mingjue's head had been injured, dried up stains of blood covering his cheek and eyelashes. A warm trickle of new blood moved down his face.

Wei Wuxian was astonished.

'Chifeng-zun was extremely effective during the Sunshot Campaign, winning nearly every battle he was a part of. The enemy couldn't even approach him, much less injure him this badly! What sort of situation is this?!'

A small movement came from the left.

Wen Qing bit her lip when she realized the source of the movement had been a set of cultivators wearing the Wen Sect's robes. They were moving to a kneeling position, bowing as low as they could. Given the state Nie Mingjue was in….

A bone chilling pressure filled the air. Nie Mingjue looked up slightly, and could vaguely see a figure sitting on the throne before him. The blood in his eyes prevented him from seeing clearly who it was, but no one had any doubts as to the figure's identity.

The Wen doctor swallowed, concern rising up within her.

She knew her sect leader quite well, and Nie Mingjue's position did not look good.

The doors of the palace opened and someone entered. All the disciples present, regardless of rank, were kneeling before the Chief Cultivator, and yet the newcomer merely sent him a nod of salutation before heading in. He walked forward nonchalantly, then leaned close to the person in the chair to whisper something. They exchanged a few words before Wen Ruohan nodded and dismissed the other.

The newcomer was pleased.

With slow strides, he approached the staggering Nie Mingjue. Although his body had been attacked on all sides, Sect Leader Nie was forcing himself to remain standing, despite his trembling legs.

The newcomer laughed.

"Long time no see, Sect Leader Nie."

To no one's surprise, the newcomer was Meng Yao.

Jin Zixuan and Lan Xichen both sucked in gasps of air, trying to calm themselves down and focus on the simulation. They had no idea what was going to be shown, but it ranged through all sorts of outcomes. It looked bad, certainly, but Meng Yao was a spy on their side, so, surely, that meant he could at least somewhat be trusted.

(However, their suspicions left them growing more nervous by the second.)

(And they were far from alone in that.)

Beside them, the one person who should be happy with what was being shown was mysteriously dour.

Wen Ruohan frowned, observing Meng Yao's smile with cold eyes.

'For him to act so shamelessly in my presence… I probably valued him even more than I did Wen Zhuiliu,' Sect Leader Wen thought. 'If he was able to fool the cultivation world as a whole for years, I suppose I shouldn't be surprised he made such a good spy. Still….'

It left a bad taste in his mouth.

'I see,' Wei Wuxian thought at last. 'I think I know when this is.'

Nie Huaisang inched closer to Nie Mingjue, swallowing nervously.

'Towards the end of the sunshot campaign, some information was leaked. When Nie Mingjue conducted a surprise attack on Yangquan, he instead ran into Wen Ruohan, who captured all the cultivators Nie Mingjue had and brought them to the Nightless City.'

"Leaked?" Lan Xichen repeated. "But who…."

"There's too much we don't know," Lan Wangji pointed out. "For now, let's just watch."

At that moment, Meng Yao tilted his head in a strangely casual way, commenting, "I never expected to see you in a situation like this."

"Get lost!" Nie Mingjue snarled back.

Another laugh echoed, this one pitying and degrading all at once: "Do you still think you're the King of Hejian here? Look carefully — right now, you're in the Sun Palace."

"Sun Palace?" one of the nearby cultivators repeated. "Don't make me laugh. This is only a den for a bunch of Wen-dogs!"

'Nie Wulin? What are you doing?!' Nie Huaisang thought, eyes widening. Nie Mingjue, who had already recognized the speaker, also tensed when he spoke. Wen Ruohan surely wouldn't let such a comment go-

However, it wasn't Wen Ruohan who acted next.

Meng Yao's eyes changed at the comment, and he unsheathed his sword. A line of blood slit across the cultivator's neck, and he died without a sound. The other Nie cultivators wailed, screaming as they tried throwing themselves at Meng Yao.

"Wulin!" Nie Huaisang joined in, shocked by the sudden loss. With his own limited cultivation, Nie Huaisang hadn't even been able to notice the attack before Nie Wulin had been killed.

Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli, who had experienced similar feelings during the massacre of Lotus Pier, sent him a pitying look.

"You-" Nie Mingjue began.

"You Wen dog!" Nie Linqing, Nie Wulin's brother in law, shouted in rage. "You think you're so powerful… why don't you just try killing me as well!"

"Sure," Meng Yao agreed easily, and that next cultivator was dead a second later.

Nie Huaisang looked away, and Nie Mingjue slammed his fist against the armrest of his chair, shattering it into pieces.

“I… why… that couldn’t have been necessary,” Jin Zixuan muttered.

Hoping to subdue the despair growing within her fiance, Jiang Yanli quietly pointed out, “He… he’s a spy, right? So he has a-a character that he’s presenting to the Chief Cultivator. Maybe he… saw cruelty as a way to attract Sect Leader Wen’s eye. He’s just playing a part, perhaps?”

“Does anyone else have something to say?”

Everyone looked towards the calm, uncaring, almost peaceful smile on Meng Yao’s face.

“...He’s a really good actor, if that’s at all true,” Jiang Cheng muttered.

Then, Meng Yao snapped his fingers. At once, a pair of Wen cultivators came over and got to their knees, presenting a large box for him to observe. When Meng Yao opened the box, its contents were revealed.

“Baxia?!” Nie Mingjue realized, turning to glare at Wen Ruohan. “Your arrogance knows no bounds!”

“Get lost, Wen dog!” the simulated version shouted, though his anger was directed at Meng Yao alone.

Still smiling, Meng Yao pulled out the saber and ran his hands over it, teasing along the metal as he said, “Sect Leader Nie, I’ve already held Baxia quite a few times in the past. Don’t you think it’s a bit redundant to protest this now?”

“Take your hands off it!”

Because Meng Yao had held Baxia when Nie Mingjue trusted him. By mentioning that now, the extent to which their relationship had changed became all the more apparent.

‘What a performer,’ Wen Ruohan thought, admiring Meng Yao’s cruelty, then swiftly losing the smile on his face. ‘I suppose that ability made him quite an effective spy.’

As further proof of his talent for dramatics, Meng Yao then tilted the saber back and forth, weighing it with his hands: “Sect Leader Nie, I’d say your saber can count as a top tier spiritual weapon. However, compared to your father’s saber… it still seems somewhat inferior.”

Nie Mingjue froze.

“Why don’t we work together to guess how long it will take Sect Leader Wen to break this one?”

All the blood rushed to Nie Mingjue’s head at once, and the simulation turned red.

‘There’s nothing Sect Leader Nie regrets as much as the death of his father,’ Wei Wuxian recalled. ‘He had only been a teenager back then. Someone gave Wen Ruohan a rare saber, and he was quite pleased. He went around showing it off, and everyone praised it without fail. Everyone knew how volatile his temper could be, so no one was willing to risk upsetting him. Unfortunately, one of his guests either had a grudge against Sect Leader Nie or wanted to gain attention through a unique answer, and so responded ‘Of course your saber is unparalleled, but I’m afraid there’s one person who would disagree. The Nie Sect is known for saber cultivation, how could Sect Leader Nie admit yours was superior?’

Despite knowing this story better than he knew anything else, Nie Mingjue’s fists clenched tighter and tighter with every word. Jiang Cheng, Jiang Yanli, and Jin Zixuan sent Nie Huaisang pitying gazes, but the Nie heir seemed to become increasingly uncomfortable at the attention. Seeing that, Wen Qing cleared her throat and glared; everyone looked away a moment later.

‘Thus, Sect Leader Wen called Nie Mingjue’s father over. Wen Ruohan held the saber for a while, looking it over, then replied succinctly: ‘yes, this is quite a good saber.’ He slapped the saber a few times, then told Sect Leader Nie to take it back.’

The simulation ever-so-helpfully displayed said scene before their eyes. The Wen Ruohan of a few years ago did just as Wei Wuxian described, and the watchers could feel a slight spark of energy enter the blade as he did.

‘Ah, yes. I remember that,’ Wen Ruohan thought. ‘For such a renowned saber, it was pathetically easy to break. I would have expected more.’

He glanced up, and saw Nie Mingjue gritting his teeth together.

‘...Though, considering how much trouble the son ends up making, perhaps I should have been more thorough. If I wanted to destroy the Nie Sect, I should have done that. If I wanted to wait until the Wen Sect was stronger, I should have just left well enough alone.’

He sighed to himself, regretting that decision for the first time in his life.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts had continued with summarizing the events the watchers were already well-familiar with: ‘At the time, nothing had seemed wrong with the saber. Not even the previous Sect Leader Nie suspected anything, though he was annoyed by Wen Ruohan’s commanding attitude. However, he joined a nighthunt a few days after he returned, and, mid-battle with a beast, his saber suddenly broke into pieces. He was severely injured by the horn of the beast, right before Nie Mingjue’s eyes.

‘Following that, Sect Leader Nie’s injuries didn’t manage to heal, and, after being ill for half a year, he left this world, either from anger or his illness. The Qinghe Nie Sect has detested the Wen Sect ever since.*’

It was quite strange to Jiang Cheng, to hear this now. Nie Mingjue had always seemed so much older than him. Back when the man first became Sect Leader, Jiang Cheng had heard his father talking about the tragedy, and how frighteningly young Nie Mingjue had been at the time. However, even when he was just the Nie heir, Sect Leader Nie had always been awe-inspiring and intimidating in equal measure. To the younger Jiang Cheng, Nie Mingjue had seemed more than old enough to assume his position.

(Until he watched the simulation, and saw his eighteen year old self become Sect Leader just as abruptly.)

(Jiang Fengmian's concerned talks with the Jiang elders following the event suddenly made much more sense.)

'Meng Yao mentioning this now of all times, and right in front of Wen Ruohan, is about as cruel as one can get,' Wei Wuxian concluded, and no one could object to that.

"Say, Sect Leader Nie, don't you think-"

However, before Meng Yao could finish, something unexpected happened. The chains binding Nie Mingjue were strained to the fullest as Nie Mingjue swung forward, landing an attack on Meng Yao. He flew back, coughing up blood.

Nie Huaisang's eyes lit up in satisfaction, and even Lan Xichen couldn't object.

The figure on the throne shifted, as though he wanted to move.

(To punish Meng Yao for his failure? Or to intervene on his behalf?)

They didn't get a chance to find out, because, seeing the same, Meng Yao immediately got up and kicked Nie Mingjue's chest. As the last of Nie Mingjue's strength had been used just before, he was thrown back and fell to the ground.

Wei Wuxian gaped, 'There were so many rumors about what happened that night, but I never thought I would get to see Lianfang-zun kick Chifeng-zun!'

'And you never will, Wei-xiong,' Nie Huaisang promised, something cold flashing in his eyes. 'Not in our world, at least.'

Having kicked Nie Mingjue to the ground, Meng Yao walked over and stomped on his chest, shouting, "How dare you act in such a way before Sect Leader Wen's eyes?!"

He swung his sword downwards, seemingly intending to cut Nie Mingjue in two. In a flash, however, Nie Mingjue clapped his hands together around the blade, halting the sword in its tracks and in fact shattering it from the sheer force. He kicked Meng Yao back, summoned Baxia, raised his blade, and-

A sudden force pulled him away from Meng Yao. Blood streaked across the floor as an invisible hand pulled him towards Sect Leader Wen's throne.

Wen Ruohan had just saved Meng Yao's life.

Tension filled the air, felt most strongly by Madam Yu and her children. They had very little knowledge of what Wen Ruohan was actually capable of, and, as Nie Mingjue created a blood trail a dozen meters long across the floor, no small amount of unease settled in.

Mid-flight, Nie Mingjue grabbed one of the nearby Wen disciples and threw him at Sect Leader Wen. There was a spike of energy. The disciple burst into pieces before making contact with Wen Ruohan, having outlived his use in the Sect Leader's eyes.

Wen Qing swallowed, but years of practice kept her from otherwise reacting.

In the time Wen Ruohan had dedicated to his own disciple, Nie Mingjue had prepared an attack. He swung his sword, sending a blue light rocketing towards Sect Leader Wen, and Meng Yao tensed at once.

"Sect Leader! Watch out!"

"No need!" the man laughed, his youthful voice showing no concern for the large number of Wen disciples Nie Mingjue's attack cut through. He had protected Meng Yao, but apparently couldn't care less about any of them.

'Despicable,' Lan Qiren thought, glancing over to see that the real Wen Ruohan was just as unbothered as his simulated self had been.

If he were to be asked about it, Wen Ruohan would have simply shrugged and said, 'Most of them were only there because they had proven themselves to be expendable. Good contributions should be rewarded, but lacking any simply means you're taking up valuable space.'

(However, even he had to admit he was a little surprised by the sheer callousness with which his other-self acted. As far as he could remember, he had never done something quite this extreme to his own disciples.)

But there was no time to think it through further. Within the blink of an eye, Wen Ruohan appeared in front of Nie Mingjue and sent him crashing into one of the hall's golden pillars shortly after. Blood trickled down his forehead, blurring the watchers' sight even more. A fist slammed into his chest, and his body sunk half a meter into the ground.

The spirit of Wei Wuxian reacted as well, able to feel the same things Nie Mingjue was. He gasped for air, staring at Wen Ruohan with no small amount of shock. That feeling was shared among the watchers.

It was a little hard to measure abilities exactly. Wei Wuxian had been extremely talented with the sword, and only became more dangerous as the Yiling Patriarch. Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen were equally infamous for their talent, and Nie Mingjue's skill was undeniable.

'I've never fought him myself, but Nie Mingjue was probably one of the three strongest people I've ever met,' Wei Wuxian concluded. 'And Wen Ruohan's just playing with him!'

Wen Ruohan stepped on Nie Mingjue's chest, and their vision began to darken.

"My apologies for doubting you, Sect Leader," Meng Yao bowed.

"Useless. He's the one who killed Wen Xu?" Wen Ruohan asked.

“Yes, sir.”

Wen Xu was Wen Ruohan’s heir, but his power wasn’t equivalent to even a tenth of what Wen Ruohan could do. Wen Chao wasn’t even worth talking about, and Wen Qing, the Sect member he was perhaps proudest of, was too distantly related to be crowned Sect Leader.

(And that was before she had betrayed the Wen Sect.)

‘The war cost me my heirs, Wen Zhuliu, my doctor’s loyalty, and, eventually, my life,’ he thought, frowning minutely.

(And, although the simulation hadn’t yet yet confirmed it, he was pretty sure the war had also cost the core of the most talented person he had ever seen.)

“What will you do with him, Sect Leader?” Meng Yao asked. “Will you kill him now? Or send him to the fire palace?”

“The-the fire palace?” Jiang Yanli asked, keeping her voice in a whisper.

“It’s, um,” Jin Zixuan looked away. “I’ve heard it’s Wen Ruohan’s personal playground. I-I think it would mean my… mean Meng Yao isn’t willing to give Chifeng-zun a straightforward death.”

“Ah, I… I see.”

“Why bother playing around with someone already half-dead?”

“Now, that’s not it at all. With Sect Leader Nie’s sturdy body, he might become all great and mighty again after just a few days of rest,” Meng Yao pointed out.

“Fine. Do as you please,” Wen Ruohan acknowledged, sheathing his own sword again.

“No, wait… was he buying time?” Madam Jin asked, staring in shock. They knew Meng Yao had already betrayed Wen Ruohan by working as a spy for the Sunshot Campaign, so this might be….

Or it might not.

“I honestly can’t tell what’s real and what’s not anymore,” Lan Xichen confessed. “I genuinely don’t know.”

And then, before they had a chance to discuss it further amongst themselves, a Wen disciple suddenly burst through the door.

“Sect Leader!” the man shouted frantically. “A large force of enemy has come!”

“What?”

“The army is right outside our doorstep! They somehow took down our scouts before those disciples could report to us!”

A frown formed on Wen Ruohan's face, but it transitioned into a more amused acceptance shortly after. Even with the report he had been given, the once Chief-cultivator showed no fear or concern.

(Given how this all turned out, perhaps that was his first mistake.)

"Meng Yao, let's go," he ordered. "If he's as sturdy as you say, he'll survive until we get back."

"Yes, Sect Leader."

Nie Mingjue remained collapsed on the floor, watching as the two exited the room at a leisurely pace. The door clicked shut, and silence reigned. The two disciples who hadn't followed after the Sect Leader (tasked instead with watching over the prisoner) were too terrified to even think about touching Nie Mingjue. Not because of Nie Mingjue himself, but because Wen Ruohan had already implied he wanted to see what would happen if Nie Mingjue was left alone, and they were well aware of how little they were worth to him.

It felt strange to direct this at Wen disciples after what the sect had done to Lotus Pier, but Jiang Yanli nonetheless felt a bit of pity for the pair that had been left to clean up the deformed remains of their once-comrades.

However, she couldn't help but notice the shock that was on their faces as well.

'I wonder how much of Wen Ruohan's brutality is a result of the war, rather than a cause of it,' she thought, analyzing the surroundings quietly. 'A-Cheng and A-Xian certainly changed a lot even in just the first few months, and Wen Ruohan lost Wen Zhuliu and both his sons…. At the very least, I can't imagine Wen Qing-guniang passively allowing her brother to be near someone who does this regularly. She would have surely tried to run away far sooner, if this was at all common.'

Emotional intelligence had always been Jiang Yanli's forte. She knew Wen Ruohan had never cared all that much for his sons as people (especially not Wen Chao), but that was different from saying he would be completely unaffected by their loss. As Jiang Yanli looked over the stunned expressions on the Wen disciples one more time, she felt a bit of pity rise up once more.

However, she quickly shook her head a moment later, trying to wipe those unnecessary thoughts from her memory.

Not only would that realization do her no good, but there was another factor even more relevant to her silence. She knew the Wen disciples here — the victims her observation might help — the ones who had been most affected by this — were far from innocent. They worked for Wen Ruohan's torture chamber; while they might not be Meng Yao, they wouldn't have made it this far if they weren't more than capable of the same cruelty as Wen Ruohan.

Which was why, when a flash of silver suddenly slipped by both their necks, no one was remorseful.

"Xiongzhang," Lan Wangji realized first, instantly recognizing the technique used as chord assassination technique.

The two bodies collapsed to the floor, and Lan Xichen stepped out of the shadows.

"Mingjue-xiong! It's okay, it's me!"

The memories here were clouded and hazy, Nie Mingjue barely conscious by this point.

"Come on. I'll get you out of here!"

Darkness took over.

When Nie Mingjue blinked his eyes open next, he was mercifully nowhere he recognized. It was a tent made of animal hide, containing a single bed and a desk loaded with medical supplies. He glanced to the side, and a Lan Sect disciple rushed over.

"Sect Leader, how do you feel?"

"Awful," Nie Mingjue responded bluntly.

Those words made Nie Huaisang relax however, a small smile appearing on his face for the first time in a while.

"What's the current situation?"

"Ah, the-the siege on Nevernight is continuing," he responded. "It's been a day and a half since you were rescued. We've made considerable progress, it's just… every time Wen Ruohan enters the battlefield, we're pushed back into retreating, and we have to regroup. The Yunmeng Jiang delegation should arrive soon though. I think we'll be okay — they're sending the Yiling Patriarch!"

The illusionary Wei Wuxian jumped at the mention.

"...When will he be arriving?"

"Perhaps a few days from now? Within a week."

Nie Mingjue looked out of the tent and onto the battlefield outside, considering.

"The whole Yunmeng delegation is arriving, but they only care that Wei Wuxian will be there?" Madam Yu muttered, but, when she noticed her son turn downcast at those words, she suddenly regretted having spoken them out loud.

It seemed like every time she opened her mouth, her children wilted just a bit more.

Well, no matter. She would live this time around, and would make sure the allied sects wouldn't ever be so narrow-minded again.

(Even if she could privately admit that, after what she had seen the Yiling Patriarch accomplish, the sects' faith did not go unwarranted.)

Nie Mingjue forced himself to sit up.

"Sect Leader Nie!"

"Da-ge!" Nie Huaisang protested.

"I need to get back out there," he said.

"You need to stay!" the disciple responded. "The healers did everything they could, but you're definitely not fully recovered yet. I can't let you-"

"Move."

The disciple hesitated, unable to disobey the direct command.

"Idiot," Wen Qing hissed. "If you're injured, the last thing you should do is head out and make it all worse."

Nie Huaisang nodded frantically in agreement.

"I needed to join the battle," Nie Mingjue responded defensively. "We have a chance of ending the war. I can rest all I want after that's done. I can handle it."

"Someone who died of a qi deviation should not tell me what he can and can't handle!" the doctor snapped back. "You have no idea how long this battle is going to take! If this ever happens again, you better wait for a doctor to give you the all-clear before you even think of so much as standing up! Do I make myself clear?!"

And then, before Nie Huaisang's eyes, an unbelievable event occurred: Nie Mingjue paused, opened his mouth to argue back, then, noticing the death-glare Wen Qing was sending him, gave in. He looked away, breaking eye contact with her.

(And at that moment, the Wen doctor became one of Nie Huaisang's favorite people in the world.)

Unfortunately, the Lan disciple on watch had nowhere near the same level of intensity that she did. He caved in almost immediately, standing aside as Nie Mingjue hauled himself up and got dressed in whatever armor he could find.

'Pathetic,' Wen Qing thought, sighing in annoyance.

Wind pulled dust into the air, and, when it cleared, the watchers were able to gaze over a massive battlefield. It was twilight in Nevernight City, and thousands of cultivators fought with all their might.

“The 23rd Year of Xuanzheng, the Year of the Goat,” Jin Ling announced. “The QingheNie Clan, the GusuLan clan, the LanlingJin Clan, and the Yunmeng Jiang Clan led tens of thousands of cultivators to storm Nevernight City. The fierce battle went on for several weeks, and yet the city would not fall.”

Most of the watchers tensed at those words, but Jin Guangshan instead relaxed:

‘I’m glad the Jin Clan was able to participate in the final battle. That will be a big factor in indicating how much influence we have after this war is over.’

He glanced at Wen Ruohan, hoping that this fact hadn’t completely severed his ties with the man in this current time.

The watchers were brought down and allowed to look up at the imposing, looming main palace — a place which the allied forces hadn’t even managed to step foot on yet. Then, the doors opened.

Wen Ruohan stepped out and looked down at the dozens upon dozens of enemy cultivators filling up every inch of the stairway. He laughed.

“Know your place,” he advised simply, forming his qi into a ball of energy, then throwing it up into the sky. It reached its desired position, then exploded out — the shockwave sent at least 700 disciples flying. The weakest of the bunch were thrown back so harshly that, when they landed, the bones in their body snapped into pieces.

It had taken Wen Ruohan a mere ten seconds to decimate the front of their force.

Jin Guangshan really, really hoped Wen Ruohan wouldn’t hold a grudge.

The shockwave reached out far enough to even be felt by the people fighting on the edges of the battlefield. Lan Wangji spun around, wide eyed, to face the source. Wei Wuxian and Jiang Wanyin frowned as their comrades were blasted behind them.

“Wen Ruohan!” Jiang Cheng shouted, glaring up as Zidian crackled beside him.

‘Ha! Look at that! Despite what everyone said, A-Cheng’s cultivation was more than strong enough to let him stand against Wen Ruohan’s attack,’ Madam Yu thought, lips curling up. ‘Of course he was able to! He’s my son!’

Nevertheless, the person who seemed least affected of all was the now mostly-recovered Nie Mingjue. He unsheathed his saber, blasting through the Wen disciples in his way without even bothering to defend against them. One of the stronger ones attacked-

Black shadows jumped up and tore the Wen to bits, clearing the way for Nie Mingjue. The watchers knew very well what the source of those shadows was was.

Only one thing could make spirits feel like they were hearing a flute’s whistle without actually creating any noise.

The watchers glanced back and saw Wei Wuxian floating in the air, the Stygian Tiger Seal in hand as he commanded his army to provide support.

'My other-self knew he would do that,' Nie Mingjue realized. 'I didn't even hesitate to charge, which means… I've gotten used to fighting with this group. I trust them.'

(So then, how did he end up on the battlefield against Wei Wuxian? He had trusted Meng Yao too, once, but… he simply couldn't imagine Wei Wuxian ever doing anything like what Meng Yao had done to break that trust.)

Regardless, the most important thing for the current simulated Nie Mingjue was clearly Wen Ruohan. Black, whip-like shadows knocked the disciples before Nie Mingjue back, leaving him a clear path to the Chief Cultivator. He blasted forward, and there was a clang as his sword made contact, sending a house-sized cloud of dust into the air. Through the cloud, slashes of golden light were visible as combat continued. They struck out, cutting through a sturdy wooden pillar and forming gashes in the stone floor below. Part of the roof fell, crashing into the ground below.

Then, a clang rang out. And everything else stopped. The dust settled.

Nie Mingjue's blade was frozen in the air, held in place by Wen Ruohan's hand.

"Damn it," Nie Mingjue muttered. He knew full well how valuable the simulation's information could be, and getting to see himself fight Wen Ruohan was some of the most useful hints of all. However, no matter how hard he focused, he couldn't figure out what he could do to turn the tide.

And unfortunately, neither could his other-self. Wen Ruohan pulled the blade forward abruptly before slamming his palm into Nie Mingjue's chest. Sect Leader Nie gasped out as the wind was knocked out of him and fell to his knees. Luckily, before Wen Ruohan could do anything more, there was a gleam of blue light, and an unheld Lan sword attacked. It was stopped twenty centimeters away from Wen Ruohan, halted by a field of energy. However, Lan Xichen himself appeared shortly after, grabbing his blade and resuming the attack. Nie Mingjue got up as well, and the pair fought as one. While Lan Xichen was more adept at manipulating his sword's position through the air, Nie Mingjue had the advantage when it came to close quarters combat. They worked as a team, making up for each other's weaknesses without needing words to communicate.

However, Wen Ruohan remained as calm as ever.

Jiang Yanli swallowed nervously, and Jin Zixuan moved his hand around hers in what would have been a reassuring squeeze if they could touch.

No matter what the pair did, Wen Ruohan slipped out of the way each time, dancing around their attacks without changing his relaxed stance. In the next instant, Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue both attacked at once, but Wen Ruohan merely reached forward and grabbed the tip of Lan Xichen's blade. He pulled it to the right, using it to block Nie Mingjue's attack before knocking both of them back.

He wasn't even using his own sword.

'How foolish of me,' Wen Ruohan thought, lacking the smug grin many of the other watchers expected him to have. 'I should have dealt with them right away. Wasting my time like this… the losses the Wen Sect sustained during the war hit my pride, I suppose.'

(And Wen Chao was one thing, but Wen Xu had always been an obedient, loyal son, and Wen Zhuliu had always been his best disciple. 'Care' might be too strong of a word, but Wen Ruohan was far from indifferent to those two. The anger his other self was experiencing was caused by more than just his pride.)

~~Even if he had won the war, by this point, he would have lost far more than he had gained.~~

The battle went on, and Wen Ruohan continued playing with his opponents. He paid no mind to his own forces, whether that be the ones falling to the allied forces, the ones being kept away from him by the Yiling Patriarch, or the few who had been too close to the battle for Wei Wuxian to push them away, and so were little more than meatshields as the battle went on.

A sadistic smirk formed on Wen Ruohan's face, and he began forming his qi into a new shape. It was a spiral swirling outwards, practically forming a tornado directly in front of him. When Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue next attacked, their blades slammed into the center of that spiral and came to a resounding halt.

Glee was more than apparent in Wen Ruohan's expression, and cruel, mocking laughter began to resound. Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen could neither continue to attack nor retreat, stuck in place by the field Wen Ruohan had created.

And then a Wen soldier turned around. He stood in the shadows created by the building, but several watchers had been paying attention to him. He had been one of the few close to the battle who had somehow managed to survive. Unlike all the other disciples Wen Ruohan had mowed down without care, this one was being watched — protected, almost. The Chief Cultivator had made a point of never aiming attacks in the direction of this specific disciple.

And, at this moment, that disciple was standing directly behind Wen Ruohan, making it hilariously easy for him to unsheathe his sword and cut straight through Wen Ruohan's neck.

The silence that followed was deafening.

Wen Ruohan's eyes widened. He paused, then turned around. Meng Yao stared back at him, unflinching.

Realization settled in Wen Ruohan's expression as the gravity of the betrayal that had just occurred settled in.

Over and over again, whether that was while Nie Mingjue was captured or during this battle, Wen Ruohan had worked to keep Meng Yao safe. He had saved his life when Nie Mingjue attacked him, and had kept Meng Yao out of the firing range during this battle.

Where everyone else had belittled Meng Yao's heritage, Wen Ruohan had respected his talent.

Where everyone else had gossiped behind his back, Wen Ruohan had promoted him and offered his utmost trust.

~~And that trust had been used against him, just like Nie Mingjue's had.~~

Wen Ruohan fell to the floor, and Meng Yao took off his Wen robes, casting them to the ground in rejection.

A roar of victory swept across the battlefield, as the Sunshot Campaign had destroyed the strongest sun of all.

On the other hand, the watchers were strangely muted. This was the victory they wanted, and Madam Yu especially had been burning with a desire to see Wen Ruohan fall ever since Lotus Pier had been torn to the ground. However, even she remained silent. After all, the person who had fulfilled their wishes was Meng Yao.

Objectively speaking, there was nothing wrong with what Meng Yao had done. It was great in fact; the end of a war, and the downfall of a tyrant. But, by this point, they had already seen him switch sides and stories so many times, that they didn't quite know what was true.

"...He was a spy for us, right?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"Right," Madam Jin confirmed. "Yes, I think they mentioned he had been sending information. So he… was keeping up an act all this time."

She paused.

'Or he might have decided which side he genuinely wanted to be on last minute.'

"Jin Guangyao had been acting as a spy in the Wen Sect," Jin Ling summarized. "He passed messages along to Lan Xichen, and, when the time came, helped the allied army launch an attack on the Sun Palace, saving Nie Mingjue's life."

"So… the only reason Chifeng-zun escaped is because of him?" Jiang Yanli asked.

"They said… they said he might have been captured because information had been leaked," Jin Zixuan muttered, eyes wide. "Did he… you don't think Meng Yao was planning on saving Sect Leader Nie's life so that he'd owe-"

"Do not jump to conclusions. We don't have any evidence in support of that," Lan Qiren pointed out.

Madam Yu scoffed: "With how many lies that brat has managed to slip past us, I certainly wouldn't be surprised if it was true."

And that was just the problem, wasn't it? The plan might have been to betray the Wen all along, and Meng Yao's loyalty never once fluctuated. Or perhaps the success of the Yiling Patriarch, Chifeng-zun, and the Twin Jades had convinced Meng Yao that the smartest thing to do would be to side with the Sunshot Campaign. Or maybe there wasn't a grand plan, and Meng Yao's personal affection for his father, Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue tipped the scales. Meng Yao always had a story that made everything he did seem understandable and justifiable, but they only ever had his word to go off. It might be true, but there was only one time the watchers had seen him that they could be sure wasn't an act, and it was when Meng Yao had killed his Jin superior. The calm satisfaction that had been written over his face at that moment did not paint Meng Yao's other actions in a positive light.

And the simulated Nie Mingjue most certainly agreed.

He and Lan Xichen both stared at Meng Yao, separated from the rest of the army by the dozens of stairs leading to the main entrance of the Palace. Jin Guangshan's son had taken off the Wen uniform, and Lan Xichen displayed a quite obvious amount of relief. Nie Mingjue, on the other hand, soon became overcome by fury.

"You won't get away this time," he hissed, tightening his grip on his saber. He shot forward.

"A-Yao!" Lan Xichen called out, but it was too late. Meng Yao was thrown into one of the pillars, collapsing against the ground immediately after.

Lan Xichen ran in between them.

"Mingjue-xiong!" he called out, raising his hands unthreateningly. "Mingjue-xiong, A-Yao had no choice-"

"No choice?!" Nie Mingjue repeated. "He killed Wulin! And Linqing! Am I supposed to just accept that?!"

"Of course not," the real Lan Xichen said at once. "But he was a spy. You need to calm down and think; there might be more to the story."

Sect Leader Nie paused at that, hating the idea of acknowledging Lan Xichen's point, but unable to disagree regardless. After all, hadn't he realized the same just a little while ago?

(Even if Meng Yao had been telling the truth about his superior officer, Jin Guangshan would never be fair with him.)

However, the simulated Nie Mingjue had become overcome by rage.

"No choice?" he repeated. "He became those Wen-dogs' fangs and claws, and now you're telling me he had no choice?! The things he did under Wen Ruohan…."

"Sect Leader Nie, I really had no choice!" Meng Yao protested. "You must understand. Given the situation at the time-"

"It should have been simple enough to decide whether or not to kill them!"

“Was it really up to me? Sect Leader Nie, think about it from my perspective-”

“I won’t!”

He attacked at once.

Lan Xichen breathed out a tired sigh, rubbing his temples as he muttered, “Even now, I still can’t tell what’s real and what’s not.”

Did Meng Yao really feel like he had no other choice? Or had there been some satisfaction there, for getting a chance to hurt and kill people who he had been subordinate to while he was in the Nie Sect?

No one could really tell.

(But they would need to know, if they were going to even consider letting the Meng Yao of their world live.)

Drained from the fight with Wen Ruohan, Nie Mingjue was unable to kill Meng Yao, especially while Lan Xichen continued protecting him. Every other disciple in the war was too far away to see what was going on, and Meng yao was forced to doge in a direction that brought him further from the crowd. It was just the three of them.

“Mingjue-xiong!”

“Sect Leader Nie!” Meng Yao called out at last. “Don’t you understand that if I hadn’t killed them then, you would be dead now?!”

‘In other words,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘’You owe me, so you can’t kill me,’ huh?’

Nie Mingjue’s movements halted. Then he frowned.

“All right, fine! After I kill him, I’ll take my own life!”

“No! No!” Nie Huaisang shouted from the side. “Don’t listen, Da-ge! You can’t trust anything he says!”

Sighing at the futility of it all, Nie Mingjue lifted his hand and motioned a reassuring pat on Nie Huaisang’s head. Despite the no-touch rule, the gesture was enough to calm the Nie heir down slightly.

With a humph, Nie Huaisang sat back down.

However, weakened as he was, Nie Mingjue had still not managed to kill Meng Yao.

“Mingjue-xiong!” Lan Xichen repeated again.

“Xichen, move!”

Nie Huaisang sent Lan Xichen a glare (only stopping when Nie Mingjue sent him a disapproving look). However, as the first jade appeared to wilt under the Nie heir's silent reprimand, Nie Huaisang supposed it was all well and good.

"Mingjue-xiong! Calm down! Why would this be worth it?"

Growling, Nie Mingjue demanded "Why don't you ask what he did?!"

Lan Xichen looked back at Meng Yao, and saw the face full of terror. The spy stammered, not daring to speak to the enraged Nie Mingjue, and turned to cast his eyes towards the ground.

"That day… after you fled from Langya," Nie Mingjue had to cut himself off and breathe, his anger practically steaming out of him. "I was wondering why I couldn't find you no matter where I looked! So you became an underling for the Wen-dogs and took sides with the tyrant of Nightless City?! You-"

"Mingjue-xiong.'

The real Nie Mingjue jumped slightly. He knew full well how unusual it was for Lan Xichen to ever cut someone off — it was something he only did when he truly felt he truly had to.

And this was one such time:

"Do you remember the maps of Qishan and the information on the Wens' tactical formations that you've used the past few months? Do you know who offered you that?"

"...You."

"I was just delivering them. Do you know who the source of that information was?"

The meaning was clear enough. Nie Mingjue glanced over at Meng Yao, and his brows furrowed as if he couldn't believe what Lan Xichen had said. Meng Yao stood, head lowered, and offered no protests of his own.

"There's no doubt. A few weeks ago, the reason I was able to aid you and help you escape from Wen Ruohan was because he contacted me on where to lead the army. Or else, how could we have gotten in?"

Nie Mingjue was unable to respond.

"After the incident at Langya, A-Yao was remorseful, but he was afraid he might run into you. All he could do was sneak into the Qishan Wen Sect and gain Wen Ruohan's trust, writing me letters in secrecy. At first, I didn't know who was sending the letters either. I only managed to realize it from a few clues he mistakenly left."

"Well, that…" Jin Zixuan paused. "That at least confirms the positive assumptions we made."

"Not at all," Wen Ruohan disagreed. "I saw nothing in there that would confirm one way or the other that he was always intending to be on your side. For all you know, he was feeding both sides information, and only made his decision after going back and forth quite a bit."

Lan Xichen frowned at those words, pointing out, "We have nothing that would indicate any of that is true."

"Except for how many times he's lied, and how good he is at coming up with a story that justifies what he's done?" Wen Ruohan suggested back.

Obviously, a bit of doubt wasn't anywhere near enough to confirm that anything Wen Ruohan had said happened. The man himself knew full well that Meng Yao could have always been on the Sunshot Campaign's side ~~no matter how poorly most of them treated him, or how well Wen Ruohan did.~~

But the bit of doubt was enough to make them hesitate.

Lan Xichen paused, looking over with a stern expression. They had seen Meng Yao kill many people throughout the simulation, and they had no way of knowing how much those victims truly deserved it. Unless the simulation showed them in full, they had no way of knowing to what extent Meng Yao really had "no choice." However, Lan Xichen knew for a fact that his other self in the future trusted Meng Yao implicitly.

And he was also well-aware of the fact that the future Jin Guangyao had kept Nie Mingjue's head in his secret chamber like a trophy, keeping it up on a shelf while letting the rest of his dismembered body be strewn about across the country.

And they couldn't forget what he had done to Qin Su.

'It's because he was your son that this is so horrifying!' she shouted.

"Did you not tell Mingjue-xiong about all this?" Lan Xichen asked at last, glancing back at Meng Yao.

"...Zewu-jun, you saw it too. Even if I had tried to explain, Sect Leader Nie wouldn't have believed me."

'So, you had 'no choice' once again?' Nie Mingjue thought. 'Though, I guess he's not entirely wrong.'

But they couldn't just trust him.

The simulated Nie Mingjue was far less indecisive. Despite the words and excuses coming at him from all sides, he still seemed to be considering dealing with Meng Yao right then and there. Knowing that full well, the simulated Meng Yao's face was full of fear. Despite that, he stepped forward on trembling legs, and kneeled down at once.

Lan Xichen turned his way: "Meng Yao?"

"...Sect Leader Nie, back in the Sun Palace, although it was in order to gain the trust of Wen Ruohan, I did indeed harm you and say inappropriate things. I purposefully aimed at your scar, knowing that the fate of the previous Sect Leader Nie still hurts you deeply. Although I had no other choice, I'm truly sorry."

A stern expression crossed Nie Mingjue's face, and he responded, "The one you should be kneeling and apologizing to isn't me, but the cultivators you killed with your own hands."

Nie Huaisang nodded rapidly in agreement.

"Wen Ruohan had a cruel character. Whenever someone disobeyed him, he'd practically turn mad. Since I was pretending to be loyal to him, I had to respond when someone insulted him! So-"

"It's seems like you've been doing these sorts of things for quite some time."

'A fair point,' the real Lan Xichen thought.

The simulated one frowned, clearly disagreeing.

"I was in Qishan," Meng Yao reminded him.

Lan Xichen sighed as well, adding, "Mingjue-xiong, he was undercover in Qishan. Sometimes there would be things he would have to face that… could not be helped. While he was forced to do these things, his heart was also-"

'You don't know that though,' Lan Xichen thought. He hoped it was true — he wanted it to be true — but they really didn't know for sure.

And Wei Wuxian sighed as well: 'Zewu-jun is still… too kind. Too pure.'

Lan Xichen flinched slightly.

'Then again, I suppose the only reason I'm so guarded against him is because I already suspected him. The Lan Xichen shown here has no reason to be on guard against someone who was forced to be a spy, enduring the agony alone. We're going at this with such different viewpoints, how could our feelings be compared?'

Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, and Lan Xichen sent his brother a small smile.

However, at that moment, the simulated Nie Mingjue raised his saber.

"Mingjue-xiong!"

"Da-ge?"

Lan Xichen had gotten too far away from Nie Mingjue and Meng Yao to be able to stop the attack before it landed. Meng Yao looked up at the saber, eyes wide.

"Mingjue-xiong," Lan Xichen repeated, placing his hand on Shouyue. "Please-"

A silver light flashed as Nie Mingjue swung down-

The bolder to the right of Meng Yao shattered into pieces.

When Nie Mingjue had raised his saber, he had been considering it down to the last second. However, he had changed his mind and spared Meng Yao.

Now, they would get to see how many lives that choice would affect.

(For better and for worse.)

Meng Yao stared at the cleanly split saber, blinking in disbelief at the fact that he was still alive. Meanwhile, Nie Mingjue resheathed his saber, turned in his heel, and walked away. In the end, his saber couldn't fall on Meng Yao.

The simulation faded to black.

When light returned, the watchers once again found themselves in the in-between zone, where they could wait for the next segment to start. Unlike some previous times, the silent pause that followed wasn't out of shock, but rather a near-tangible sense of frustration shared by most of the watchers.

The simulation was meant to allow them to gain insight into the truth. However, even after watching everything that had happened, most of them still didn't quite know what to make of Meng Yao.

"...I wish we had gotten to see a few of his thoughts," Lan Xichen sighed.

Although he didn't entirely disagree, Lan Qiren nonetheless had to point out, "We won't be able to see anyone's thoughts once we leave the simulation, Xichen. It's better to not get too used to this."

The first jade tilted his head in acknowledgement, but his wish was still shared by everyone there.

"I want to see how Wei Ying and my future self deal with this," Lan Wangji commented. "He'll have seen the same scenes we did, and my future self will most likely trust his judgment. Obviously, the situation differs — we won't have Qin Su-guniang's life to immediately worry about, and Chifeng-zun's head is not there — but I would still like to make a decision after seeing that."

"While I do agree that Wei Wuxian is unlikely to be fooled by him, the situation seems much simpler than that," Wen Ruohan mused. "We simply can't trust Meng Yao, regardless of what world it is. We should deal with him at once."

Quite a few people pursed their lips together at that, wanting to disagree but not confident enough in their side to do so. Madam Jin especially frowned when she saw the small flinch her son had given. When Meng Yao had killed Wen Ruohan, he had been doing the world a great service. Who were they to oppose-

“We shouldn’t allow our personal experiences to cloud our judgment too much,” a voice calmly advised.

Wen Qing froze. It was Lan Wangji that had just spoken, and she and Lan Qiren both realized simultaneously how dangerous that could be. Wen Ruohan didn’t like when Sect Leaders disagreed with him. For mere heir, and a second son at that-

“Why can’t we?” Wen Ruohan asked back. His voice wasn’t angry, and it wasn’t offended. There was no mocking scorn or arrogant disregard to be found. If anything, he seemed genuinely curious by what Lan Wangji had to say.

(Wei Wuxian had proven himself to be unmatched in every aspect in Wen Ruohan’s eyes, but Hanguang-jun, the lightbearer, could be considered worthy of respect as well.)

(After all, Wei Wuxian might like others, but he would never fall in love with someone who wasn’t truly his equal.)

“...I do not believe Meng Yao can be taken at face value,” Lan Wangji clarified. “However, the ways in which he has personally affected our future selves could very easily alter our understanding of these events. What we saw between your future self and his was only a few minutes as compared to years of having known each other. However, as it was your future self, you might initially feel like you’ve seen the full picture already.”

Wen Ruohan paused for a moment, considering that. In the few minutes they had seen, Wen Ruohan had watched his other self prioritize Meng Yao without fail — saving the boy’s life a half dozen times in the process — only to wind up dead at his feet mere moments later.

Was that really not enough to understand their relationship? The betrayal on his other-self’s face told a pretty clear story, in Wen Ruohan’s mind.

However, the little light-bearer might have a point as well. There was still so much they hadn’t seen. In the case of Wei Wuxian, the later revelations had proven just how little choice he had in the bad actions attributed to him. In the case of Yi City, the conclusion of the flashback had shown just how infuriatingly tragic the world could be. They still didn’t know the full context of Nie Mingjue’s death or what Qin Su had been talking about.

“...Do you believe our decision will change if we wait?”

Although Lan Wangji’s expression didn’t fluctuate at those words, he nonetheless responded with urgency: “We agreed to not punish anyone for crimes they haven’t yet committed. I would still like to wait and see how my future self approaches this situation.”

“Those situations aren’t comparable. Your future self will face a Meng Yao that has already committed those acts.”

Of course,” Lan Wangji nodded. “So our response will be considerably less intense.”

Wen Ruohan laughed, “Less intense just means less effective. Do we do nothing and just hope he never tries to rejoin the cultivation world?”

“I don’t see why not!” Jin Guangshan jumped in, the first to break up the stream of consciousness between Lan Wangji and Wen Ruohan. “In fact, as he is essentially a problem of the Jin Sect, I’ll make sure to handle that personally. At the very least, we can ensure he has no way of entering our world.”

“Huh? But A-Die,” Jin Zixuan interjected at once. “We can’t just keep him from joining a sect! There are plenty of sect leaders who won’t agree.”

“Of course we can. Keeping him out of the cultivation world is entirely within our power, should we all agree.”

And that was the point, wasn’t it? The reason they had all been invited into the simulation was the influence they had on the cultivation world. If all thirteen of them decided on one thing (and Jiang Fengmian and the Wen brothers could be made to agree as well), then that would happen. They had enough power to represent the cultivation world; no cultivation clan would realistically be able to defy them.

“What do we think about what Wei-xiong was mentioning earlier?” Nie Huaisang brought up. “Remember? He said there was an organization my and Wei-xiong’s future selves suggested as a means of dealing with Xue Yang, right?”

Memories flooded back into the watchers’ minds:

‘Xue Yang was dealt with, then?’ their Wei Wuxian had asked, in one of his calls to them.

They had confirmed as much.

So Wei Wuxian had continued, saying, ‘On the subject of how to deal with the child version of him, the clans in the future decided they wanted to forbid him and the others from joining cultivation clans.’

More and more, everyone was starting to suspect that Meng Yao counted among ‘the others’ the future Wei Wuxian had mentioned.

And Wei Wuxian had continued, explaining ‘He said there were a few calls for harsher punishments, so this was the one thing the future clans wouldn’t budge on. They recommended we sponsor a new organization that will exist for keeping watch on them without introducing them to cultivation in any way. Presumably members of the great sects will be heavily involved, so your plan on having members of the Nie clan keep track of him is still more than possible.’

“...Isn’t it a little different with my… with Meng Yao?” Jin Zixuan asked. “Xue Yang had never really cared about the sects, beyond which ones he wanted to get revenge on.”

(There was also the small detail of the Jin Sect refusing to execute him and possibly faking his death, but he wasn’t ready to think about that yet.)

“A-anyways. Xue Yang wanted to be safe and, well, to have food, but he never specifically wanted to be part of a sect. Meng Yao, on the other hand… he’d apparently give up anything to join the Jin Sect."

"So therefore he deserves a position in it?" Nie Huaisang asked, raising an eyebrow. "What evil wants, evil should get just because he wants it the most?"

"It's not evil to want your father's acknowledgement," Jiang Cheng grumbled from the side.

"Perhaps," Lan Wangji acknowledged. "But just as it would be going too far to decide on a punishment now, I can't simply accept offering him what he wants without further measures."

Nie Huaisang nodded, "Da-ge lost trust in him because of actions he took after joining the Jin Sect. That's obviously not enough."

(There was an unspoken extra meaning here too. The simple way to get Meng Yao what he really wanted was for Jin Guangshan to offer support and love. However, many of them doubted he would be able to fake it well enough to fool someone like Meng Yao, and if the alternative was creating a situation in which Meng Yao could genuinely earn Jin Guangshan's approval?)

(Well, over the course of the simulation, every single watcher except Jin Guangshan had started to get just enough of a bad feeling to know that was a bad idea.)

"Besides, Meng Yao is invited into the Jin Sect by Sect Leader Jin after the Sunshot Campaign, right?" Nie Huaisang added.

Nodding slowly, Jin Zixuan hesitantly agreed, "...I guess?"

"He hasn't had his son together with Qin Su-guniang yet. He hasn't even gotten together with her. But something about their son was horrifying for her to find out. Becoming Sect Leader of the Jin Sect might not have been enough to stop Meng Yao. If that didn't satisfy him, then why do you think your plan would?"

Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng flinched.

"I agree," Nie Mingjue agreed, breaking up the huddle of just the youngest ~~and drawing Wen Ruohan's attention away from his brother~~. "So, we're back where we started. Jin-gongzi isn't wrong when he says that the future's organization-plan will have a different impact on Meng Yao than it will on Xue Yang. Let's finish this flashback first, and then, the next time Wei-gongzi contacts us, we can tell him our choice regarding the two of them. He can lay the groundwork for that, and, if we haven't changed our minds when the simulation ends, we can get to work on that."

As Nie Mingjue was the one most involved in the flashback that had been shown, no one disagreed. Some of them most certainly wanted to, but even the most outspoken held their tongues.

(Madam Yu especially wanted to object to all the special treatment the low-born bastard son was getting. However, every time she opened her mouth to speak, she could hear a calm, casual, ‘what’s wrong with servants?’ flash in her mind. She wasn’t scared of Wei Wuxian’s voice, but, for some reason, every time she heard that line she found herself unable to say whatever she had been planning to. Thus, she remained silent.)

On the other hand, there were the few people who had been at least somewhat on Meng Yao’s side. Lan Xichen was praying desperately that his other self’s faith in the man was not entirely unfounded, and Jin Zixuan was trying (and failing) to make sense of the curiosity, duty, and guilt swirling inside him. That said, as they didn’t personally know Meng Yao, they were nowhere near as certain of their hope for him as their other selves might be. Banning Meng Yao from ever joining a sect was a harsher punishment than the straightforward solution it would be for Xue Yang. However, the more they thought about it, the more they had to acknowledge that might be the best option they had.

Meanwhile, outside the simulation, a far less morally-questionable individual was sitting across from Wen Xu, joining him for tea. Unfortunately, this individual was not morally straightforward in that he could never be accused of doing wrong.

Quite the opposite, in fact.

“It’s unbelievable I tell you! What are our sect’s coming to?”

“...” Wen Xu remained silent.

“I mean honestly. Before the Great Sleep happened, everything was going great! Now problems are popping up left and right, Sect Leader Jiang is the only one who’s actually out here, and as a result that Jiang Sect gets to hoard all knowledge about the simulation to itself. I swear to the Heavens that when I find out what they’re planning… why I’ll teach them a lesson, I tell you!”

“....” Wen Xu didn’t *think*there was any alcohol in this tea, but maybe he should double check that.

“Gods, Sect Leader Jin might not be dead, but if he was he’d be rolling in his grave. To think that a lowly son of a servant would speak that way to me! Has all sense of courtesy been lost in this world?! No one even intervened. The Jiangs are becoming far too arrogant, I tell you. They must be up to something with our Sect Leaders!” Jin Zixun declared, pounding his fist on the table in righteous fury.

“...I see,” Wen Xu said. He didn’t particularly care what Jin Zixun thought, but, as his father would be displeased if he didn’t take advantage of the Jin Sect’s sudden weakness in leadership, he had felt it important to maintain relations. That said, every single word Jin Zixun had uttered since entering the Sun Palace had gone in one ear and out the other for Wen Xu.

(For such a loud person, Jin Zixun was frighteningly easy to zone out of when you realized he wasn’t actually saying anything of value.)

“And to top it all off, he refused to answer any of my questions about the simulation. They’re clearly hiding something, or else why would they be so confident?! For a servant to mock me… we really must deal with them, don’t you agree Wen-gongzi?”

Wen Xu gave no answer.

Unfortunately, he was not the only one there.

“Absolutely,” Wen Chao agreed. “He must be dealt with at once!”

“Ah, I knew you would see reason!” Jin Zixun declared. “It’s no surprise, considering your heritage, but I’m pleased to see that not everyone has gone insane since the Great Sleep occurred.”

“Most certainly not. I am well aware of just how imperative it is that we handle him before he grows too powerful to control. In fact, I’ve already begun making a few plans of my own,” he laughed, and no one commented on the near-crazed look in his eyes.

“That’s amazing Wen-gongzi!” the courtesan by his side declared. She was a beauty, although an usual choice for Wen Chao. There was a reason for that, however; this girl’s light eyes and smaller chest made it so she could not be any more different from Wang Lingjiao, in Wen Chao’s mind.

(After what he had seen in the simulation, the mere thought of sleeping with her made him puke.)

“Do tell!” Jin Zixun insisted. “I have been trying to plan, but, with Sect Leader Jiang’s protection, he had seemed like a difficult target.”

“No need to worry. He may be powerful, but Wei Wuxian is not-”

“Wei Wuxian?” Wen Xu repeated, finally registering two words in the conversation. He quickly backtracked through his memories, going over what had just been said, and his eyes widened.

Confused, Jin Zixun frowned and asked, “Wen-gongzi?”

“Absolutely not,” the heir cleanly rejected.

“I… I beg your pardon?”

“Sect Leader Wen, your Chief Cultivator, has declared that boy off limits,” Wen Xu said, standing up. “I do apologize for the sudden announcement, but I’m afraid I must ask you to leave, Jin-gongzi.”

“W-what?”

“Wei Wuxian has more than just Sect Leader Jiang’s protection. Unless you are willing to make an enemy of Wen Ruohan, I suggest you pick your next actions carefully.”

And at that moment, Jin Zixun's brain finally reminded him of the conference that had taken place not too long ago, and the way Wen Xu had protected Wei Wuxian without question.

"But… but I-"

"Dismissed," Wen Xu ordered, turning on his heel and leaving without offering a response. His steps echoed loudly in the hall, and when the servants closed the door behind him it seemed to slam deafeningly loud.

Jin Zixun flinched.

(He really, truly, could not afford to make an enemy of the Wen.)

However-

"Don't mind him," Wen Chao said. "He left the simulation early. He doesn't know what he's talking about."

"...What does the simulation have to do with this?"

Wen Chao's eyes went dark for a moment, memories flashing through at a blinding rate. A slight tremble overtook his body, and his concubine moved away from him nervously.

"The simulation has everything to do with Wei Wuxian," he laughed once, the sound broken and crazed in a way that made even Jin Zixun step back. "It shows exactly how much we need to stop him."

"To stop him? Does he… he isn't actually capable of upsetting the current order of things that much, is he? I… no. No, you're being ridiculous."

He stood up, marching out. He couldn't afford to listen to any more of this. He had been wrong; both the Wen brothers had obviously gone insane as a result of the simulation, just as he kept telling everyone would happen.

"If you don't believe me, then let's test the accuracy of the information!" Wen Chao demanded. "You wanted his weakness, right? I'll tell you. That little freak of nature grew up in the streets like the beast he is. He fought with other creatures for food, until he somehow managed to trick Sect Leader Jiang into thinking he was human."

Jin Zixun walked out faster.

"See how he reacts to a dog, Jin-gongzi!" Wen Chao shouted. "I promise you, you'll believe me after that."

Here, at last, Jin Zixun paused.

"I got a few wolves for myself, just in case that monster came calling. I'll let you have as many as you want. Try it, and see how he reacts. You might be surprised."

Slowly, the Jin turned back around.

“It’s a wonderful feeling, to make a being like that shake in fear.”

Up above, there was one additional person there that none of the people below knew about. He was small enough to hide behind the wooden beams that made up the roof, and he had been present for the entire conversation.

‘Wen Ning, you’ll never believe this!’ Wei Wuxian declared, as excited as the mere fifteen years he had lived insinuated. ‘Come see what I made!’

Wen Ning had snuck inside. He had gotten off the call with the watchers quite some time ago, so he hadn’t had anything else to do anyways.

‘Mo Xuanyu — the future one, I mean — has been working on this with me. It’s the next step in an advancement of the Píngxíng gateway. You know how we’ve managed to make it so that we can talk to each other in real time now?’

‘Yes?’

‘Well this right here can separate our spirits from our bodies!’ he declared, gesturing excitedly at what looked to be a giant necklace pendant. In the face of this, there was only one thing Wen Ning could ask.

‘Wh-why would we want to do that, Wei-gongzi?!’

‘Well it’s kinda boring to always be in just that incorporeal zone when we talk, and it’s super annoying to describe things from our world when I can’t show the people on the other side. It’s only step one of fixing that problem, but I’ve tested it a few times and I think it’s pretty safe. Want to give it a try?’

If it was the Wen Ning of a month ago, he would have frozen in fear and been unable to do anything. However, right now, his sister needed him, and any advancement Wei Wuxian made in understanding was one step closer to keeping her safe.

‘Yes, I’ll take it!’ he had said.

So, to test it, he had gone to the Wen Sect, and had floated his incorporeal body up to the roof. And then a few people had walked in below him, and he had worried that he would be caught if he tried to leave.

And then they had started talking.

“I… really need to tell Wei-gongzi about this,” he muttered, eyes wide.

Chapter End Notes

Okay, I must admit, while I've always liked Nie Mingjue, I've never loved-loved him.
Writing this chapter may or may not have changed my mind.
(Which also means I'm now even sadder about his death 😭😭😭)

Po-

"A-Lu, stop that!" A-Yue demanded, slapping her brother's hand away. He jumped at the sudden movement, hitting his toes against the table in front of him in the process.

"Ow!" he whined, standing up at once. "What was that for?"

"Shi-xiong, are-are you alright?" Mo Yu asked, looking back and forth between A-Lu's toes and face with no small degree of worry. A-Yue rolled her eyes.

"He's fine, A-Yu," she insisted.

Huffing in annoyance, A-Lu gave a disgruntled mumble of "At least A-Yu cares about me."

"You kids okay back there?" a voice called out.

"We're fine, Da-shixiong!"

Scowling, A-Lu insisted, "I'm not."

They heard a huff of a laugh, and the door creaked open.

"What are you three doing?" Wei Wuxian asked. "When you offered to watch over Wen Ning's body, I had thought you were just looking for an excuse to get out of helping me."

"We weren't!"

"An excuse?!"

“Da-shixiong, that’s not it!” Mo Yu insisted at once, tugging on Wei Wuxian’s pants. His eyes gleamed with tears, not recognizing the teasing for what it was.

“Alright, alright, I’m sorry,” Wei Wuxian caved in, reaching down to scoop Mo Yu into his arms. “So, what’s wrong?”

The siblings’ faces fell to the ground, and A-Yue muttered a depressed, “We’re just worried about Wen-gongzi.”

“Yeah. It’s weird to see him like this,” A-Lu agreed.

Wei Wuxian’s eyes drifted to the left, where Wen Ning’s unconscious body laid. A pendant sparking in resentful energy was laid around his neck, giving that part of the room an ominous red glow.

“I told you, it’s perfectly safe,” Wei Wuxian reassured. “Some very smart people in the future have been working on it with me, and I’ve tested it quite a few times myself. Wen Ning’s basically just asleep.”

“But he’s not asleep!” A-Lu protested. “If he was asleep, he’d be able to wake up if something happened, but no matter what I do he doesn’t react at all!”

In demonstration, he poked the unconscious Wen Ning on the cheek again, and, at the obvious lack of reaction from the Wen cultivator, gestured wildly towards him in a ‘see?!’ manner.

“B-besides,” A-Yue continued, “Wen-gongzi promised he would help me with my archery. He can’t do that if he’s like this. I need to wait for him because of that!”

Smiling softly, Wei Wuxian bounced Mo Xuanyu in his arms a few times, touched by the concern the three kids were showing for Wen Ning. It really made him grateful that the other boy had shown up, even if he was still a little confused as to why Wen Xu sent him in the first place. Without Wen Ning, things would have been much more-

POP

A face came out of the floor.

“AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAHHHHHHHHHHHH!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!” the kids shrieked, Mo Yu burying his face in Wei Wuxian’s chest and flailing wildly while A-Lu and A-Yue jumped behind the bed Wen Ning was resting on, scrambling for their lives.

“Eh? Wei-gongzi?” the face in the floor asked.

“Hi, Wen Ning.”

At those words, the kids peaked out of their hiding places, slowly and hesitantly looking down at the head that was sticking out of the wooden floor. It was Wen Ning’s.

“H-hello,” the face greeted.

The kids were too petrified by fear to respond.

Shutting his mouth and squirming awkwardly, Wen Ning then floated up, phasing out of the ground until his whole body was a foot in the air. He drifted up smoothly like a leaf carried by a wayward breeze, and not at all like the 60 kilogram boy he was supposed to be.

“S-sorry for scaring you,” he said.

Wei Wuxian laughed.

“Well, we weren’t expecting that, huh, A-Yu?” he asked the boy in his arms. “I suppose I should have known. I’ve heard this is the time of year in which A-Nings will spontaneously sprout out of the ground, terrorizing innocent bystanders!”

Wen Ning wilted at the description, while A-Yue and A-Lu straightened themselves up, giving equally stubborn ‘I wasn’t scared’ glares at Wen Ning. The Wen representative wilted further at their looks.

Then, a voice nearly too quiet to hear spoke up.

“Is he dead?” A-Yu asked.

“Hm? No, no, definitely not. We wouldn’t be able to talk to him if he was dead,” Wei Wuxian said ~~ignorantly~~. “Wen Ning is just fine. Though I’m not sure why he chose to come out of the ground.”

“S-sorry Young Master Wei!” Wen Ning stuttered. “I was coming back from Qishan, but-but on the way people kept glancing my way and I was almost noticed a few times! I was just going to float through the sky on the way back, but I thought someone might see me that too, and if I pretended to be physical and just walked around someone was probably going to bump into me and then they’d notice they couldn’t touch me and I’d-”

“Is that a problem?” Wei Wuxian asked. “It’s not like it’s a secret that we’re working on improving our communications with the future. I certainly don’t think you’d have to go so far as to hide underground and try to make your way back to us blind.”

“Well, I… heard something.”

The deliberate vagueness of his words made Wei Wuxian frown slightly.

“Y-you’re fine?” the tiny voice asked again. “You’re not… you’re not a ghost? You’re not dead?”

Blinking in surprise at Mo Yu’s continued questions, Wen Ning abruptly realized that he was still floating mid-air above his body. A ghost wasn’t exactly a far-off guess. He blushed.

“I’m not dead,” he confirmed, lowering himself. “Here, just watch.”

Wen Ning descended into his body, floating down vertically to touch his finger against the pendant on his chest. Upon making contact with it, there was a spike of resentment as the pendant glowed, sucking his soul in. That glow then spread throughout the unconscious body below, fading out of the pendant as it settled into Wen Ning. A moment later, the physical body's eyes blinked open. He sat up.

"S-see? I'm fine."

"Woah," A-Lu gaped. He reached out again, poking Wen Ning's cheek one more time, and delighted when Wen Ning jumped at the action with a little 'eep!'

"Wen-gongzi's okay?" A-Yu asked one more time, turning to Wei Wuxian for additional reassurance.

"Yup!" the head disciple confirmed cheerily, taking the pendant off the now fully-conscious Wen Ning's neck. "And if there's anything off with him, I'll be able to deal with it right away. Come on, why don't you and A-Lu and A-Yue head out for now. I'm gonna make sure Wen Ning's doing fine."

He set A-Yu down, and watched as the siblings guided him out, reassured now that they'd seen Wen Ning's safety for themselves.

"Go to the kitchens, if you have time!" Wei Wuxian called out after then. "I heard an elder got his hands on a bunch of watermelon at the market today!"

"Okay!" two voices called back.

The door clicked shut.

"Now then," Wei Wuxian turned back to Wen Ning. "Is everything alright? You were acting a bit strange."

Wen Ning abruptly sat up straight: "You're right! It's an emergency, Wei-gongzi!"

"What is?"

"Wen-er-gongzi and Wen Xu-gongzi are fighting over whether or not to send an army of dogs after you! They've got it all prepared, and-and I think they're going to send their forces to invade Lotus Pier!"

"I... what? Why-"

"Because Wen-er-gongzi thinks his father likes you too much!"

Wei Wuxian mentally backtracked his mind for a moment, going over what had been said again.

He did know of Wen Chao and Wen Ruohan. And he knew Wen Xu personally, from the intersect conference. And he could vaguely understand the meaning of an "army of dogs."

And yet, the full sentence still made no sense.

"...Say that for me again?"

"W-well," Wen Ning stuttered, not quite knowing how to approach this. "I-I'm sorry! It's just… well, it was a bit confusing, but the important thing is that I'm pretty sure the Yunmeng Jiang Sect will be attacked by a bunch of dogs!"

Wei Wuxian nodded once in understanding.

'Maybe I did mess up the pendant, somehow,' he thought. 'I wasn't expecting it to cause hallucinations. I better figure out what he saw as soon as possible so that I can make sure the rest of his mind is okay.'

He smiled.

"Start over from the beginning. I'm sure we'll be able to figure something out," Wei Wuxian suggested.

Nodding rapidly, Wen Ning forced himself to take a deep breath and began: "Th-then, I guess it started this morning, when I got in contact with the watchers. See, A-Jie told me to be careful of Wen-er-gongzi, and Sect Leader Wen didn't say anything to disagree with her."

"Nothing?" Wei Wuxian repeated. "Was he just not paying attention?"

"She said it to everyone! It wasn't a whisper or anything, and, while I couldn't see them, everyone still seemed to be choosing their words pretty carefully, so I-I think he was there? But she told me to trust my own judgment over his orders!"

"That seems like a pretty good philosophy to have in general," Wei Wuxian commented. "Your sister's a smart lady; maybe that's all there was to it."

"That's what I kinda thought too. But I was still a little nervous, so when I agreed to test this for you, I thought I could at least head over to the Wen Sect to see. Just in case! I wasn't really expecting to find anything, but I could move over long distances so much faster while I was incorporeal, so I thought it couldn't hurt! But then-then I was in Qishan, and I went into a room, and then someone opened the door below and I panicked and hid behind the ceiling beams. I know I didn't have to and I guess I could have just explained that I was there to test your invention, but they startled me when they opened the door, and it… it ended up being Wen Xu-gongzi, and I thought he might be mad if he found out I hid from him so I just stayed up there."

"...Alright, fair enough," Wei Wuxian acknowledged, handing over a cup of water to help calm the somewhat-panicking Wen Ning down.

"A-anyways. After Wen Xu-gongzi walked in, Wen-er-gongzi did too. And following the two of them was someone from the Jin Sect. It was… it was Jin Zixun-gongzi."

He said the name hesitantly, afraid of the memories it might spark for Wei Wuxian.

"..Jin Zixun? Oh, you mean the Jin Sect member handling external affairs!"

“Y-yes.”

Wei Wuxian blinked, waiting for him to continue.

“You’re… you’re not worried?’

“Why would I be? That all seems to make sense.”

“Well, it’s just… Jin Zixun-gongzi said all those awful things about your mother and Sect Leader Jiang, so I just-I thought…” he trailed off, noticing Wei Wuxian’s look of confusion. The head disciple’s brows were knit together, and he seemed to be thinking rather carefully, as if trying to recall who Wen Ning was talking about.

The silence continued.

“It… it was just a few days ago,” Wen Ning reminded him.

“Eh? Was it?” Wei Wuxian asked, still knitting his brows together. “Hm. So much has been happening recently that I guess it just didn’t stand out. Alright, continue.”

(If Jin Zixun knew that his attempts at pressuring Wei Wuxian were so inconsequential that the boy didn’t even remember them he would have gotten so enraged he would have probably had a heart attack on the spot and died. Unfortunately, he was far, far away, and had no idea what was being discussed.)

“O-okay. So Jin Zixun-gongzi was there, and they had the usual greetings, and then he started, um… complaining. About you, specifically. He-he was pretty offended by how no one came to his defense last time he visited Lotus Pier, and started accusing you of trying to take over the Jiang Sect while the rightful leaders weren’t around.”

Wei Wuxian nodded, knowing full well that some of the gentry had accepted that consensus. It was a bit annoying, but, now that Jiang Fengmian had left the simulation, the Jiang Sect Leader had been working day and night to convince the public that there was no merit to the rumors.

(Unfortunately, no amount of reassurance would convince certain people.)

“Wen Xu-gongzi, Da-shixiong, was pretty displeased with the conversation and left in the middle, but Wen-er-gongzi was even more invested than Jin Zixun-gongzi. Wen-er-gongzi is the one who brought up sending dogs against you. I-I think it might have been mentioned in the simulation because he was certain they would work against you!”

Here, at last, Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened.

“Mentioned in the simulation?” he repeated. “But that… why would they….”

The future’s Mo Xunayu and Jiang Cheng had told him that his future self had died at twenty two.

But Jiang Fengmian had been acting noticeably different since he had left the simulation, and not just in regards to his own children. He had spoken out against the new rumors surrounding Wei Wuxian, something he had never attempted even when it was his own honor under question. Wei Wuxian had thought that was a symptom of temporarily not having to worry about upsetting Madam Yu, but, even still, it had been surprising that Jiang Fengmian would go so far.

And then there had been that time with the child Mo Xuanyu, when Jiang Fengmian had looked at him and Wei Wuxian, and all Wei Wuxian had been able to see was guilt.

And a few hours ago-

"...Jiang-shushu told me he contacted the Wen Sect after you spoke with them this morning," Wei Wuxian commented. "Do you… know what he said?"

"Ah, yes!" Wen Ning nodded. "He was passing along a message from Sect Leader Wen, as well as one of his own. I-I'm not entirely sure, but I think he was warning Wen Xu-gongzi against being 'overly ambitious' while Sect Leader Wen is gone. M-maybe he didn't like the most recent trade deal made between the Wen and the WanglinNian Sects?"

"...Maybe. You also said he was passing along a message from His Excellency?"

"Yes! Sect Leader Wen wanted to tell Wen-er-gongzi that he 'keeps his promises.' I-I'm not really sure what that means, but it actually came up after Da-shixiong left Wen-er-gongzi and Jin Zixun alone!"

"In what way?"

"Well, Jin Zixun was a little intrigued by the… the suggestion Wen-er-gongzi made, and wanted to test it at once. But Wen-er-gongzi…"

'Just send a bunch after him? Are you crazy? That will get traced back to us at once!'

'You told me you had a bunch of dogs for me to use to see if your theory was right. Why are you backing out now?'

'It's not just the Jiang Sect that's on Wei Wuxian's side. You heard what my brother said… my father personally wants to keep him alive. I think he hopes to use him instead of just getting rid of him, but that-that's only because he doesn't understand how dangerous Wei Wuxian is!'

Jin Zixun laughed: 'Dangerous? He's just an annoyance! That son of a servant couldn't possibly be useful to someone like His Excellency! Are you insane?'

'No, you don't understand. We need to be careful, subtle, like-like Xue Yang! He wasn't caught!'

'Like who?'

(Most would say Xue Yang destroying the Chang family wasn't the most subtle of attempts, but, in Wen Chao's eyes, if Xue Yang wasn't given punishment immediately after, it counted as being subtle.)

'You don't know him, but… yeah, maybe we should go find him. I bet he would be helpful,' Wen Chao seemed to cackle. 'Father will forgive me if I present that brat to him. We don't need the Yiling Patriarch if Xue Yang is on our side!'

Jin Zixun, who didn't know who 'Xue Yang' or 'The Yiling Patriarch' were, just stared blankly in response.

"Xue Yang?" Wei Wuxian repeated. "But wasn't he a criminal in the future? Why would they want to emulate…."

He trailed off, considering the words deeply. Allegedly, the reason the future's Mo Xuanyu wanted them to create an organization was to help people like Xue Yang lead different lives. However, that was made under the assumption that all the great sects were in support of that endeavor. Was Mo Xuanyu's plan really to go against the Wen Sect to find Xue Yang? Wen Ruohan hadn't seemed especially opposed to the organization plan when Wei Wuxian had brought it up, but Wei Wuxian supposed the man's own son would know best. Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning hadn't exactly been able to see the watchers while contacting them, so they might have missed a few clues they would have otherwise seen.

"If I'm remembering correctly, wasn't the Yiling Patriarch the inventor of demonic cultivation?" Wei Wuxian asked. "I guess Xue Yang was involved too… then maybe the reason why Wen Chao is so angry with me isn't my current influence, but the demonic cultivation I'm learning from Mo Xuanyu."

"Eh?" Wen Ning jumped at the suggestion. "You think so? Then what should we do? Should we… tell Sect Leader Jiang?"

"No, no, there's no need to bother him," Wei Wuxian shook his head, then paused. There had been a notable change in Jiang Fengmian's behavior since he had left the simulation. Going out of his way to check in on Wei Wuxian, caving into many of Wei Wuxian's mostly-joking requests, and, most recently, sending his own warning to the Wen brothers…. It had all seemed pretty strange. When Wen Chao had requested Wei Wuxian's presence, but the heir's recent dog-acquisition had made Wei Wuxian nervous, Jiang Fengmian had offered to go instead. Wei Wuxian already owed Jiang Fengmian more than he could pay back simply because the man had taken him in, but now….

Was this really just because Madam Yu wasn't here?

"Wei-gongzi," Wen Ning spoke up. "I-I'm sorry if you think I'm intruding, and I'm fine with doing something else, but if you don't mind too much I-I really do think we should tell Jiang Fengmian. That was basically a threat against you, and… if you don't want to, then we should at least try to add a few more defensive measures around the Pier!"

(Yes, Wen Ning was basically betraying the Wen Sect by telling another sect to defend against them, but his sister had practically given permission so he was going to worry about that later. Right now, Wei Wuxian was his priority.)

“I guess you’ve got a point,” Wei Wuxian admitted. “Yeah, alright. Let’s tell Uncle Jiang about what you saw and see what he says. At the very least, it seems like Wen Xu isn’t as interested in this plan as Wen Chao is, so we can see about talking to him. Hopefully this can all be taken care of without it exploding into an emergency.”

Wen Ning nodded rapidly in agreement, and Wei Wuxian smiled warmly. Out of the corner of his eye, however, he found himself glancing back at the room where the unconscious Jiang members were being watched over.

‘I wonder how Jiang Cheng is doing today,’ he thought.

“Awful,” Jiang Cheng said. “I’ve never heard of something more stupid in my life.”

“But Uncle!” Jin Ling protested. “You told me you would at least try to get along with Wei Wuxian! Especially after the fuss you caused in the Cloud Recesses all because of a misunderstanding!!”

“‘Not actively fighting with him’ and ‘attending his wedding’ are not at all the same thing!” Sect Leader Jiang Wanyin snapped back. “I don’t care that Nie Huaisang wants my help. If Sect Leader Nie was somehow stupid enough to agree to plan the wedding for them, then he has to live with the consequences.”

Stomping his feet on the ground, Jin Ling shouted back, “He’s not even asking for much! All he wants is some purple dye, and in exchange he’ll try to arrange things so there aren’t any issues with you attending the wedding. What’s the problem?”

“The problem is that I’m not going to attend the wedding. I have better things to do than watch Wei Wuxian and that husband of his frolicking around like-”

“The least you could do is say Hanguang-jun’s name! If you call him just Wei Wuxian’s husband at their wedding it’s going to be-”

“I already said I’m not going!”

The shouting continued nonstop, and the servants at Lotus Pier didn’t so much as bat an eye. While it would usually be considered concerning for two Sect Leaders of the Great Sects to be shouting at each other in such a way, it was perfectly normal when it came to these two.

(And besides, Nie Huaisang hadn’t really planned on Jiang Cheng agreeing to this. All he wanted to do was put the suggestion into his mind, so that the Jiang Sect Leader would react appropriately when Nie Huaisang initiated the next part of his master plan. He had brought Wei Wuxian back to life to get this wedding; everything was going to go perfectly.)

“Wen-guniang?”

“Yes?” she asked, glancing to her side to see Nie Huaisang staring up at her.

“I think my Da-ge has something to say to you, but he’s too much of a coward to come over on his own-”

“Huaisang!” Nie Mingjue shouted, storming over and trying to pull Nie Huaisang away. Unfortunately, as a result of the no-touch rule, he was unable to actually grab his brother and was thus left floundering as Nie Huaisang continued to talk.

“Anyways, now that he’s here, I’ll let him have the floor.”

“Huaisang!’ Nie Mingjue growled, but, upon seeing Wen Qing’s expectant face, quickly straightened up, clearing his throat. Unfortunately, his brother hadn’t said anything false thus far. Nie Mingjue did have something he wanted to say to her, and had been deliberating with himself on how to get it out.

“I… it’s…” he cleared his throat, making sure to look Wen Qing in the eyes. “I don’t regret what I did during the war — fighting back against the Wens, I mean…”

He trailed off and Wen Qing raised an eyebrow, wondering what his point was.

It wasn’t that Nie Mingjue regretted fighting back against the Wen-dogs. He hated Wen Ruohan, and the simulation had made it all the more clear that the tyranny of the Wens had to be stopped. However….

‘Did you join my forces to kill Wen dogs or to make idle talk?’ the simulated Nie Mingjue demanded.

Later, Ouyang Zizhen had paused, not wanting to say the words ‘Wen-dogs,’ and only doing-so because the members of the Sunshot Campaign used those terms.

‘Isn’t Jianling still in the hands of those Wen-dogs?’

‘W-well, good thing Zewu-jun and Hanguang-jun are helping everyone. Or else who knows how many sects of innocent cultivators would have fallen to the hands of those Wen-dogs.’

‘I’ve heard some people talk about how Lan Zhan and I continue to fight each other even while we’re on the battlefield killing Wen-dogs together.’

‘Sect Leader Jiang is right! In terms of evil, what could possibly be more evil than those Wen-dogs?! He’s on our side anyways. It’s fine, so long as he’s killing Wen-dogs.’

That phrase was said over and over and over again, becoming ingrained into their minds until it felt natural to say it. But Ouyang Zizhen had hesitated, and Wen Qing had forced herself to not react every time those words were repeated.

But it was propaganda. They needed to rally everyone together against the opposite side. That’s all it was; a way to get people to unite against the enemy army. ‘Wen-dogs’ obviously didn’t include Wen Qing-

(Was it so obvious?)

It was clear that the future Wen Ning was dead, and it was quite likely that Wen Qing was as well. They had betrayed the Wen Sect, but… there had been no news of Wen Ruohan finding out and executing them.

What had happened to the future's Wen Qing, in the end?

'It's fine, so long as he's killing Wen-dogs!'

"I don't… regret fighting in the Sunshot Campaign, but in regards to calling you that-"

Cruel, despicable, dehumanizing term.

"I won't use the term Wen-dogs in our world," Nie Mingjue said at last. "I apologize for… making you sit through it."

Wen Qing's eyes widened, and she would have surely done a double take if she hadn't already been looking at him. It was true that it had bothered her slightly to hear that, but it wasn't as though she didn't understand.

"...No one ever called me that," she pointed out, not knowing what else to say.

"Right, well…" Nie Mingjue trailed off. "Anyways, I-"

"Anyways, we're sorry!" Nie Huaisang popped in. "You helped our side out, so making a name that also applies to you into an insult was probably wrong, is what Da-ge is trying to say."

"Would you stop speaking for me?!"

Holding his hands up in surrender, Nie Huaisang quietly slunk back to Lan Wangji, Jiang Wanyin, and Jin Zixuan, who were staring at him with wide eyes.

Wen Qing laughed.

"Alright then," she decided. "Apology accepted, so long as you manage to stay true to your promise of not repeating that."

"Right!" Nie Mingjue agreed at once, nodding at her. "Thank you!"

He glanced to the side and saw Lan Xichen send him a nod of encouragement.

And, at that moment, the simulation went dark.

The watchers all paused in what they were saying, trained by now to pay attention when the world shifted like this.

The first sound that appeared was unusually-awkward, hesitant, and somewhat-forced narration from Lan Sizhui:

“Now that Wen Ruohan had died, even though the remnants of Qishan Wen were still alive, they were already beyond hope. Their… their defeat was set in stone,” he explained.

Wen Ruohan’s eyes went cold, and Wen Qing took a deep breath, forcing herself to not otherwise react. She truly didn’t blame Nie Mingjue or Lan Xichen or Wei Wuxian, and even Meng Yao, whose alliances seemed sketchy at best, had made a final choice that she couldn’t claim was objectively terrible. She understood why they made the choices they did.

(Unfortunately, the winning side of this war would be much less mature than her when it came to the Wen survivors.)

“The sacrificial Meng Yao, who had been undercover in Nightless City for years, became famous immediately after the battle,” Sizhui continued as the visuals shifted to show celebrations breaking out across the army. “The plethora of expectations all around pushed Lianfang-zun, Zewu-jun, and Chifeng-zun closer together.”

A blue wisp of Wei Wuxian followed diligently after Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, Jin Guangshan, and, further back, Meng Yao through the now-empty halls of the Nightless City. Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen were still obviously exhausted from the battle which had just occurred, but Jin Guangshan seemed to pay that no mind, easily taking the lead of the group (being the only one who hadn’t spent the last week and a half fighting non-stop).

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts turned toward the individual following behind, unable to meet Nie Mingjue’s eyes.

‘For a long time, I’d thought it was strange that Meng Yao and Nie Mingjue could end up as sworn brothers. Whatever trust there had been between them vanished the moment Meng Yao betrayed the Nie Sect, and even all of Lan Xichen’s attempts at bringing them closer together had seemed fruitless. Now it’s pretty clear that, aside from Lan Xichen’s influence, the most important factors were gratitude for saving his life and writing the letters. To be precise, throughout the war, Nie Mingjue had more or less depended on information from Lan Xichen, which had been received through Meng Yao’s letters. Nie Mingjue probably still thinks of Meng Yao as a rare talent he could rely on, and so wants to bring him back to the right path. However, Jin Guangyao wasn’t his subordinate anymore, so the only way he would have the authority to do that was by becoming sworn brothers with him. Once he had that, he could try urging Jin Guangyao in a different direction, just like how he’s interacted with Nie Huaisang all these years.’

The Nie heir couldn’t help but frown at the comparison. His Da-ge might have wanted to create a similar relationship with Meng Yao, but, no matter how often they argued, there was no one Nie Huaisang loved and respected more than his brother — Meng Yao’s relationship with him obviously couldn’t be further off.

As soon as he reached the throne room of the Nightless City, which looked out over the courtyard below, Jin Guangshan spun on his heel and turned to face his companions.

“Sect Leader Nie, Sect Leader Lan,” Jin Guangshan began, “We have fought long and hard to reach this point, and withstood many sacrifices on the way. Although our soldiers are celebrating now, there is still a layer of tension hanging over them. I believe we need a way to prove to them that the battle is over, so that they may finally set their hearts at ease.”

“...Of course, Sect Leader Jin,” Lan Xichen agreed, noticing that Nie Mingjue’s patience was growing especially thin. “What do you suggest?”

“The Lanling Jin Sect will host a Flower Banquet, lasting for at least a week. It is only appropriate, after years of struggle, to celebrate with equal magnificence! I have already spoken to Sect Leader Jiang about this, and he has accepted my invitation. I hope that you two will do the same.”

“I… of course.”

“Right,” Nie Mingjue acknowledged, though he looked just as put off by the suggestion as Lan Xichen. There was an unspoken undercurrent to their acceptances.

(If you have enough resources to pull something like this off, why did you constantly request backup during the war? How are you already prepared to hold a banquet, when your sect offered so little help in the final battle?)

But they couldn’t speak those thoughts out loud.

Even if most of the watchers heard them just the same.

“When will the banquet be held?”

Instead of answering, Jin Guangshan glanced back at his son, who immediately responded, “In two days. The LanlingJin Sect has a few more preparations to make, but we would be honored to host the other sects as soon as possible so that we may finally set everyone’s consciences at ease.”

Nodding once, Lan Xichen smiled and agreed, “Then, let’s do as you say, A-Yao.”

He glanced to the left and the right, checking to see if there would be any objection from the other Sect Leaders in the room. As much as it seemed like Nie Mingjue wanted to protest, he remained silent.

The real Nie Mingjue could understand his other self’s feelings.

‘The LanlingJin Sect has a few more preparations to make, but we would be honored to host the other sects…’

‘We’ would be honored. Jin Guangshan had accepted him under the pressure of Meng Yao’s miraculous accomplishment in the war, bringing him into the Sect with open arms. It was just as Nie Mingjue had once wanted.

Except, last time Nie Mingjue had sent him there, things hadn't worked out that way at all. Was the approval Jin Guangshan was giving him now really enough to make it so that Meng Yao would never be 'forced' to commit such an act again?

Nie Huaisang, at the very least, doubted it.

But the simulated Nie Mingjue felt unable to put up anymore resistance and relaxed his stance, forcing himself to not engage Meng Yao for the time being. Lan Xichen's smile widened at that.

And the real Lan Xichen looked away, an unusual awkwardness covering his expression.

Finally, without a single word being spoken, Nie Mingjue walked out, unwilling to engage with Meng Yao anymore. The not-yet-Jin had to step to the side hurriedly to avoid Nie Mingjue's path, bowing as Chifeng-zun walked straight by.

Following Nie Mingjue was Jin Guangshan. He stepped at a slow pace, far more leisurely than Nie Mingjue had been, but no less confident. When he reached Meng Yao, he smiled and nodded once.

It was acknowledgement; praise; acceptance.

Meng Yao smiled back, small dimples forming in his cheeks as he cast his eyes to the ground.

And a strange, ugly feeling twisted in Jin Zixuan.

He frowned at himself. As far as he knew, this was exactly the kind of thing he had been looking for the past few days through the simulation. He had seen time and time again how horribly his half siblings were treated, and how unfair his own status was in comparison. Even if the new revelations as to Meng Yao's character had put a bit of a damper on things, he did still want a brother — had been overjoyed when he found out Mo Xuanyu had been taken in by the real Wei Wuxian outside the simulation.

So what? Was this jealousy? Was he really so conceited that he'd not want his father to even smile at the person who ended the war?

'I guess it's possible,' he thought. 'I've never had a sibling before. I've heard it can be hard to share.'

And yet, some part of that explanation still didn't feel quite right.

While Jin Zixuan's thoughts and memories had flashed through his mind, the rest of the watchers remained focused on what happened before them. Lan Xichen had begun to leave as well, and, unlike Nie Mingjue, had stopped to acknowledge Meng Yao.

"A-Yao," he said.

Meng Yao looked up.

‘How long did they know each other before Xiongzhang started calling him that?’ Lan Wangji couldn’t help but wonder. He knew he had asked his brother to start referring to him as “Wangji” instead of “A-Zhan” at the ripe old age of fourteen, but that didn’t change the fact that the Lan Xichen he knew would refer to even his closest friends with far more distance than that.

How much time could they have possibly spent together by this point?

It seemed Nie Mingjue wasn’t the only one who had found Meng Yao’s abilities, pitiful situation, and (apparent) character to be captivating.

As if in proof of that, Lan Xichen and Meng Yao stared at each other for some time longer, as if Lan Xichen was trying to convey his feelings with just his eyes. Eventually, having chosen his words, he spoke again:

“A-Yao, you don’t have to take Mingjue-xiong’s actions personally. He is very aware in his heart that he feels both gratitude and resentment, and that he abhors all evil as a deadly foe. He is just worried you’ve fallen down the wrong path.”

“Abhors all evil as a deadly foe?” Meng Yao slowly repeated, staring into the distance. “Am I evil then?”

Lan Xichen appeared taken aback by that question.

And many of the watchers were too.

“I-that’s not what I mean,” he clarified.

Nodding once, Meng Yao finally looked up to make eye contact with Lan Xichen and said, “Zewu-jun, there’s no need to be so polite. I’ve served Sect Leader Nie for a long time. I understand his intentions. I have also never taken it to heart before.”

A pause passed between them.

“...Zewu-jun, go ahead with Sect Leader Nie,” Meng Yao requested. “I’ll take care of everything here.”

Eyes falling, Lan Xichen paused for a moment before finally nodding and agreeing, “Alright.”

Meng Yao stepped back and began to bow, only to be stopped by Lan Xichen’s firm hand. They made eye contact and smiled. Then, at last, Lan Xichen left.

As the simulated Sect Leader Lan walked out, the watchers were left to think about the question Meng Yao had asked, and had trouble coming to an answer.

“I don’t… I don’t think so?” Jiang Yanli attempted first, hoping to comfort her fiance. “He’s just… evil is a bit much, isn’t it? So far, I've at least understood why he made the choices he did."

“What exactly are we considering to be evil, in this case?” Wen Ruohan wondered aloud. “I’m assuming ‘all Wen-dogs’ are included there, yes?”

“You!” Madam Yu stood up. “You lot are in no way the victims here! How dare you look so proud of yourself after what you did!”

“Will do,” he corrected seamlessly. “And besides-”

“And besides, Wen Qing and Wen Ning definitely don’t count as that,” Nie Mingjue sternly interrupted. The Wen doctor paused at that, glancing at Nie Mingjue for a moment in silent thought. Nie Huaisang, meanwhile, nodded furiously in agreement.

Fearing Wen Ruohan’s annoyance would grow, Jin Guangshan hastily cut in, “I think it’s rather hard to say he’s not evil. Just think of how many people he’s betrayed and how many of us he kills! And his poor wife. How could we not consider him evil after that?”

“It almost feels like Jin Guangyao and Meng Yao are different people,” Madam Jin observed, frowning deeply (and notably not commenting on her husband). “No matter what happens in the future, there’s no way Jin Guangyao was ‘forced’ to do whatever he did to his child.”

“He wasn’t forced to do any of the things we’ve seen him do,” Nie Mingjue agreed. “They’re not different people. It’s all still him.”

“So, you think he is evil then?” Jin Guangshan wondered.

“That word is too subjective to be useful here,” Lan Wangji cut in.

Raising an eyebrow, Wen Ruohan asked, “Then, do you have a better way to describe it?”

There was a moment’s pause as Lan Wangji considered that question, before, at last, he replied, “Rather than evil, it would be more useful to discuss at what point he becomes set in his ways. Unchangeable, or at least so difficult to change that it’s not a realistic investment.”

The watchers looked at each other again, before, one by one, all unconsciously turning Nie Mingjue’s way. Aside from Wen Ruohan, he had been affected by Meng Yao the most.

And, as Sect Leader Nie stood there, only one thing replayed in his mind.

‘...My father hasn’t seen me yet. I haven’t even met him yet. They’re going to kill me.’

The simulated Nie Mingjue hadn’t believed him.

But the real one did.

(Perhaps he was a fool for thinking this, maybe he was an idiot for listening to anything Jin Guangyao had to say, but….)

“Not yet,” Nie Mingjue decided. “He’s not irredeemable yet.”

Thankfully, as if having known that the watchers would need some time, the simulation hadn't yet moved on to the next important plot point. It had gone through sweeping scenic shots of the blood-soaked land outside the Nightless City, allowing the watchers to observe the result of their collective choices.

At long last however, deciding that it had given the watchers enough time to converse, it changed scenes. There was a rustle, then a stampede of footsteps, then a cheer. Light filled the world.

"...Wow," Jiang Cheng muttered.

White peony petals covered the ground like snow, and full flowers were hung from the roofs of buildings in baskets woven together out of reeds. Their golden centers reflected the light even further, making it into a truly blinding scene. The sources of the earlier sounds were the crowds of people excitedly passing through the petal covered streets, all rushing towards the same location. The destination of these excited travelers was, unsurprisingly, Koi Tower.

Nie Mingjue stood atop the decadent structure, and the steep scowl on his face did nothing to deter the enthusiasm of everyone who passed him. Every time Nie Mingjue stepped somewhere, the crowds would part, people on both sides bowing and greeting "Chifeng-zun" with excitement and awe.

'Such a show of extravagance is going to reach even the heavens,' Wei Wuxian thought with a little chuckle as his incorporeal form followed after Nie Minjgue. 'All these people both fear and respect Nie Mingjue. There were quite a lot of people who feared me too, but you'd be hard pressed to find someone who respected me.'

'Well, I can't say I'm surprised by that,' Nie Mingjue thought. 'Putting aside what we found out about the future, Wei Wuxian is using demonic cultivation. Of course that isn't accepted.'

(Because that was so very different from Nie Mingjue's own cultivation, huh?)

'We use resentful animals; Wei Wuxian uses the corpses of humans. That's completely different! Our simulated versions don't know the reason he was forced into creating that. They can be okay with one without being okay about the other-'

(But Wei Wuxian had been encouraged to use it as a weapon of war. It was only after the war, when he wasn't useful anymore, that people really started to disapprove.)

Which made sense. Demonic cultivation was dangerous, and people tended to fear what they didn't understand.

(But a very, very tiny part of Nie Mingjue then recalled Meng Yao's face, when the Nie cultivators had gossiped and ridiculed him behind his back, using his parentage as the justification for their scorn.)

(That face then transitioned into Wei Wuxian's, as he bit his tongue and kept his silence while Madam Yu brought his parents up in her rants time and time again.)

‘...I wonder what people’s reactions would be if I was the one who had brought demonic cultivation to the war.’

That thought remained unanswered, however, as the simulated Nie Mingjue reached his destination. There was a table set up with three glasses, and Meng Yao and Lan Xichen stood on each side. In the audience, Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji, Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, and Jin Guangshan stood in wait. Nie Mingjue’s eyes turned briefly to Meng Yao. There was a bit of a tension there, but it lacked the clear dismissal of their last interaction. The reason why became clear a moment later, when Nie Mingjue turned his eyes towards Lan Xichen and relaxed.

“Ah,” Lan Xichen realized. “My other self must have insisted on the two of them interacting a bit.”

“W-well, I can understand why you would want your friends to get along,” Jiang Yanli pointed out.

Lan Xichen nodded to her once in thanks but remained somewhat grim. He couldn’t figure out yet just how big of a mistake his other self was making. He was still firm in the belief that it wouldn’t be fair to punish Meng Yao for actions he hadn’t taken yet, but….

He really did need to watch closely.

The voices of this simulated trio were completely different. Where Nie Mingjue’s was gruff and confident, Lan Xichen’s was calm and assured, and Meng Yao — now, apparently, Jin Guangyao — was jovial and performative. And yet, in this moment, they all spoke as one.

Together, they continued, “We hereby take an oath to become sworn brothers. We vow to not seek fame and fortune, and vow to be of one heart and one mind, and to help those in need. May the heavens and the earth be our witness. If one were to think otherwise, they shall face a thousand accusing fingers and be torn limb from limb.”

Nie Huaisang remained silent as he listened to the words being spoken. He had to be, because it was all he could to keep himself from laughing at Jin Guangyao's too-calm expression.

‘We vow to not seek fame and fortune, and to help those in need?’ he mentally repeated, wishing, once again, that he had his usual fans. ‘If what Qin Su implied about their son is at all true… if Jin Guangyao killed his own son and framed his political opponents so that he could put up the Wen Sect’s supervisory offices under the name ‘watchtowers,’ then… well, considering how good that snake is at lying, I guess I shouldn’t be surprised that those were just empty words to him.’

A voice that sounded like a strange mix between his brother’s and Lan Wangji’s began lecturing him to not jump to conclusions about Jin Guangyao’s actions without sufficient proof. Nie Huaisang thought for a bit, acknowledged their point, then subsequently wrote it off.

(He was open to changing his mind if something new was discovered, but, for now... Jin Guangyao's interaction with his wife didn't exactly leave much open to interpretation.)

The scene transitioned away. The decorations flooding the streets made it clear that the flower banquet was not yet over, and yet it felt like many things had changed. Across the street from where Nie Mingjue was, beside the base of the glittering Koi Tower, stood Jin Guangyao.

'Now that he's become sworn brothers with Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen, he's been accepted into the clan,' Wei Wuxian thought, observing Jin Guangyao's golden edged robes and the vermillion mark between his brows. The spark of cleverness in his eyes was still there, but there was a new aura of calmness that hadn't ever been present before.

Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue both frowned, disliking the framing of their sworn brotherhood — something they wished could be just a personal exchange — as such a political move. On the other hand, they knew full well that everything they did was political. In addition, both of them had been disgusted by the slanderous comments people whispered behind Jin Guangyao's back and wanted to feel like it was a good thing that Jin Guangshan had accepted him.

(But, much like Jin Zixuan, they couldn't help but feel like something was off about that.)

Then, Jin Guangyao shifted, and the watchers were able to see who was with him.

"What?!"

"No, no-"

"That damn-"

"Xue Yang?!"

And indeed, there was a significantly younger Xue Yang standing before them, also wearing the robe of Sparks Amidst Snow. Although his features were still cute and strangely childlike, he was already rather tall — a young master full of youthful talent. They seemed to be talking about something amusing, Jin Guangyao gesturing with a smile, and Xue Yang bursting into laughter right after.

"W-well," Jiang Yanli cleared her throat. "I suppose Xue Yang hasn't attacked the Chang family yet, right? And… even Xiao Xingchen enjoyed spending time with him, at one point."

"Yeah…" Jin Zixuan nodded. "I-I guess."

Xue Yang looked around, glancing at the surrounding cultivators — eyeing them like they were pieces of trash. When he saw Nie Mingjue, he had none of the fear other scoundrels would have; instead, he grinned, flashing his canine teeth. Noticing that Nie Mingjue's expression was rapidly darkening, Jin Guangyao whispered something in Xue Yang's ear, causing the younger to skip off in another direction shortly after.

“I didn’t think anyone would be able to control that ruffian,” Madam Jin commented. It was a little hard to tell if she meant that as an insult or a compliment.

Tilting his head in consideration, Nie Huaisang asked, “Say, did we ever find out where Xue Yang’s body was taken to? We assumed that the masked guy wanted the Stygian Tiger Seal, right?”

“Oh?” Jin Guangshan looked over, surprisingly interested. “What are you suggesting?”

“Nothing, nothing!” Nie Huaisang wailed. “I just thought it was weird that he and Jin Guangyao are friends! I thought maybe — I don’t know — maybe it wasn’t for the Seal. Maybe they’re just helping each other out as friends!”

“If it was because they wanted to help him, the masked perpetrator would have intervened before Xue Yang’s arm had gotten cut off. There’s no point in rescuing a corpse already starting to cool,” Madam Yu scoffed, very carefully not thinking about how far above and beyond Wen Ning went to recover her and her husband’s bodies.

“Ah, I guess so,” Nie Huaisang acknowledged.

And yet, a seed had been planted. ‘They clearly know each other. What if Jin Guangyao is involved in even more of what’s happened than we’ve realized.’

Jin Zixuan swallowed nervously.

In the meantime, Jin Guangyao had walked over to Nie Mingjue and was now greeting him respectfully: “Da-ge.”

“Who was that?” Nie Mingjue asked, not bothering to respond to his greetings.

Jin Guangyao opened his mouth, then hesitated for a moment before finally answering, “Xue Yang.”

“Xue Yang of Kuizhou?”

Jin Guangyao nodded.

“I guess he’s already infamous,” Madam Jin muttered, sighing at the fact that her sect was welcoming someone like that with open arms.

In further confirmation, Nie Mingjue knit his brows together and demanded, “Why are you wasting your time with someone like him?”

“The LanlingJin Sect recruited him.”

A bit of an awkward silence passed.

Even after all this, they still had no idea how much Jin Guangyao knew of Xue Yang’s true character. He could be indeed unaware and interacting with him positively as a result. He could be aware but forced to associate politely with Xue Yang due to his father's orders. He might be aware of Xue Yang's nature but indifferent to or even approving of the implications.

As always with Jin Guangyao, they really didn't know.

"Please excuse me," Jin Guangyao bowed. "I need to take care of a few matters for our guests."

He scurried off, not willing to speak to Nie Mingjue any longer. Sect Leader Nie shook his head and turned around, and at that moment, the blue form of Wei Wuxian's soul seemed to light up.

'Lan Zhan!' he thought.

"Awwww," Nie Huaisang, Lan Xichen, and Jiang Yanli all said simultaneously. Lan Wangji's ears flushed pink and his heart skipped a beat, but he recognized the change in his heart rate as a result of happiness, rather than embarrassment.

(A thought which did, in fact, make him quite embarrassed.)

Meanwhile, the simulated Lan Wangji showed no such embarrassment, walking side by side with Lan Xichen with his usual calm expression. The two jades of Lan stood together, one carrying a xiao and the other, a guqin.

Wei Wuxian gave an impressed whistle.

'Lan Xichen's warm smile contrasts against Lan Zhan's cold dignity, but they are nonetheless equally stunning and similarly poised; truly the same color, yet two different airs. No wonder other people always startle and exclaim before such a sight.'

Lan Wangji had turned two shades darker, and even Lan Xichen seemed caught off guard by Wei Wuxian's flowery prose. Poetry had never been difficult for Wei Wuxian (much to Jiang Cheng's frustration and Nie Huaisang's enjoyment), but the unexpectedness of it managed to catch them off guard.

(And Jin Guangshan might not feel attraction towards his same sex, but Koi Tower was proof enough that he appreciated beauty in any form. He nodded along with Wei Wuxian, giving the pair a long, considering look.)

'The current Lan Zhan still has a few traces of naivete around the edges, but his cold expression is still the same!'

Wei Wuxian's eyes remained glued to Lan Wangji's face, as though he was unable to move away. Eventually, it seemed like something was starting to rise up within him, and he finally couldn't take it anymore.

'Ah, Lan Zhan, I've missed you so much!' he thought, zooming over and wrapping his arms around Lan Wangji's neck, practically squealing as he hopped close and squeezed.

Jiang Cheng did a double-take, then looked away at once.

Lan Wangji's blush darkened even further, but he couldn't help himself from thinking back, 'I missed you too.'

Then, an unexpected voice called out: "Sect Leader Nie, Sect Leader Lan."

Everyone turned towards the source of that voice and found the new Sect Leader Jiang there, the Yiling Patriarch standing close behind. Jiang Cheng's sword was at his waist, but at Wei Wuxian's there was only a single flute, made of bamboo from the Burial Mounds.

Lan Wangji frowned, 'Why doesn't he go back to using his sword? I understand why he wouldn't during the war and why he wouldn't while in his new body, without a golden core, but why now?'

No answer came. The real Wen Qing, Wen Ruohan, and Nie Huaisang, who had their own suspicions, didn't know Lan Wangji's thoughts, and so were instead distracted by the humongous blush that took over the blue illusion of Wei Wuxian.

'Ah, I'm so embarrassed!' he thought, watching his past self give a nod of respect to the gathered Sect Leaders. 'I look so pretentious! I can't believe I did this! I wish I could go back in time and beat myself up!'

"Huh?" several people gaped.

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked. "I… I think you're doing fine?"

Sure, they could somewhat see what he meant. The Yiling Patriarch was powerful, and clearly knew it. He seemed slightly arrogant and took on a confrontational appearance.

Still, Wei Wuxian's reaction seemed a bit much. Except-

Except….

"...We know how he became that way," Wen Qing slowly pointed out. "We were with him every step of the way and found we agree with… almost every choice he made…."

(She was still definitely unwilling to talk about her core theory.)

"We're on his side, but…."

She and the other watchers looked back again, at the 'Yiling Patriarch' before them. Now that they were analyzing more closely, they could see that he actually wasn't standing "close behind," but rather side by side with Jiang Cheng. And that had felt good — right — because Madam Yu had said over and over again that Wei Wuxian was just the son of a servant, but they all knew he was so much more than that.

(Some of them were even slowly starting to figure out that it wasn't a shameful feature to have in the first place.)

But, forgetting that for a moment, and forgetting how much they trusted and respected Wei Wuxian….

“I suppose I can see what he means,” Jin Guangshan acknowledged. “Wei-gongzi’s definitely not trying to make friends right now. It would be less strange if it wasn’t such a bit difference from how he used to be. As for the lack of Suibian… it seems he still refuses to use a sword even now.”

Nie Mingjue frowned, “...I don’t see why he wouldn’t carry his sword now. For common courtesy, at least.”

“It's quite strange, isn't it?” Nie Huaisang shrugged. His gaze drifted back.

Madam Yu seemed to be moving in a far more positive direction than Nie Huaisang had expected. The theory Wen Qing, Wen Ruohan, and Nie Huaisang had come to might not have as many consequences as he'd initially expected, especially if Madam Yu managed to come to that conclusion herself. He waited for a moment, curious over whether she would start to think about it.

Unfortunately, Madam Yu didn’t so much as blink.

(Wei Wuxian was the Yiling Patriarch. The watchers had seen the kind of things he could do. Power like that made him dangerous. Subconsciously, most of the watchers had difficulty even conceiving of the idea that someone so powerful might not have a golden core.)

Lan Wangji, however, gained a thoughtful look. Unfortunately, only Lan Xichen would be able to tell.

The time it had taken the watchers to discuss that had been more than enough time for Jiang Cheng and Nie Mingjue to finish their greetings to each other. Neither had anything unnecessary to say, so the two soon began to move their separate ways. The black robed Yiling Patriarch glanced around a bit, before his eyes landed on Lan Wangji.

The second jade shook off his thoughts at once, standing alert and staring at the scene before him.

But, before Wei Wuxian was able to say anything, Jiang Cheng returned to his side. He had noticed Wei Wuxian not following him when he started to walk off and had come back to get his second in command. Shaking himself out of his thoughts, Wei Wuxian quickly fell into step beside his sect leader.

“Chifeng-zun is so much taller than you,” he whispered with a grin.

“Shut up.” Jiang Cheng glared. “You’re really asking to die.”

“How do you always manage to interrupt them at the worst possible times?” Jin Zixuan wondered.

Jiang Cheng scowled belligerently: “I’m not interrupting. Wei Wuxian and I were doing something already, until he started acting all weird.”

Sure, Wei Wuxian was happy around Lan Wangji, but that was in the future when he and Jiang Cheng were enemies. Right now-

“Ah, Jiang-xiong,” Nie Huaisang tutted a few times, shaking his head. “You have a lot to learn.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?!”

“Why does Wei Ying not carry his sword?” the simulated Nie Mingjue asked.

The real Nie Mingjue had, in fact, asked that exact same question just a short while ago.

However, the watchers all couldn’t help but tense at the cold, untrusting tone the simulated one used.

“Carrying a sword was a sign of etiquette,” Jin Ling explained to them, as if any of them could somehow be unaware. “It was especially important for powerful sects and extremely rude to do otherwise. Not that Wei Wuxian ever bothers.”

“I mean, he’s the Yiling Patriarch,” Ouyang Zizhen pointed out in a not-quite-hushed whisper. “I don’t think anyone’s going to be looking for his sword when he has his flute.”

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes.

“Actually, Senior Wei often carries his sword,” Lan Sizhui revealed. “Ever since he started training with it again, he started bringing it everywhere. He just…”

“Thinks it’s funny to keep it hidden,” Lan Jingyi concluded. “Since then he can pretend to be all weak and defenseless in front of Hanguang-jun. It’s his go-to set-up for when he wants to dramatically collapse into Hanguang-jun’s arms.”

““Ah,”” Jin Ling and Ouyang Zizhen both hummed in understanding.

Lan Wangji’s ears flushed bright red.

Right as his other self finally managed to respond, “He probably forgot to bring it.”

“He would forget something like this?”

Lan Wangji didn’t even blink as he replied, “It’s nothing out of the ordinary.”

The memory of Wei Wuxian wasn’t here to hear Lan Wangji say that.

But the blue illusion of Wei Wuxian was.

‘Well, well, well, bad mouthing me behind my back?’ he thought, bouncing around to lean over Lan Wangji’s shoulder, draping himself across Hanguang-jun’s back as if unable to contain his excitement. ‘I’ve caught you now!’

“Mn,” Lan Wangji said quietly, almost nodding in agreement.

Feeling a need to elaborate, Lan Xichen smiled, “Young Master Wei has explained that he doesn’t see a point in caring about redundant formalities. Putting aside not bringing his sword, if he decides one day to stop wearing clothes, what can anyone do to stop him? Or so he’s claimed.”

“I… what-”

“Wei Wuxian!” Jiang Cheng screeched, cheeks flushing in embarrassment.

(Lan Wangji was absolutely not thinking about what had just been described.)

Meanwhile, Madam Yu sighed, rubbing at her temples as she muttered, “No sense of decorum at all.”

In a far more polite expression of the same sentiment, Lan Xichen concluded, “He’s truly youthful.”

Wei Wuxian’s illusionary form seemed to blush, looking away from the scene awkwardly as he thought, ‘Well, I suppose there’s nothing I can say against that.’

Then, almost too quietly to be heard, Lan Wangji muttered, “How frivolous.”

The words were extremely soft, as though only directed at himself, but they made Wei Wuxian flinch slightly, as though unable to handle them.

“Hm?” Lan Xichen suddenly straightened, as if just realizing something. “Wangji, why are you still here?”

Somewhat confused, Lan Wangji calmly responded, “You are here, so I am too.”

“Why have you not gone to converse with Wei Wuxian yet? He’ll soon be gone.”

‘Hm? Wei Wuxian thought. ’Did Lan Zhan have something to say to me?’

“Wha — Xichen!” Lan Qiren suddenly shouted. “What do you think you're doing? Wangji's relationship with Wei Wuxian is none of your business!"

Jiang Cheng frowned deeply. On the other hand-

“Well done, Lan-gongzi,” Madam Jin declared. “Honestly, with how complicated the situation between them has become… Lan-er-gongzi, in our world, you really must communicate to him that you’re worried about his health, and not the demonic cultivation.”

Lan Qiren jumped slightly at those words, knowing that his own (previous) stance on demonic cultivation was a large part of the reason Wei Wuxian misunderstood it that way.

"I suppose that's part of why it works out so well that A-Xian came back to life when he did," Jiang Yanli commented. "Looking for the corp… for Chifeng-zun's body parts has given them a lot of time to just interact with each other."

And they had all seen first hand just how big of a difference that made.

And then, before anything more could be said, there was a loud clamor from the other side of the base.

"Jin Zixuan!" Wei Wuxian's voice shouted, surprising the blue illusion of himself. "Have you forgotten about the things you've done and said?! What do you mean by this?"

The simulated Jin Zixuan fumed: "I was asking Sect Leader Jiang, not you. And the one I was asking about was Jiang-guniang, not you. How are you related?"

Jin Zixuan wilted, and Jiang Yanli consolingly motioned out patting him on the head.

"Well said! How is my shijie related to you?! Back then, who was the one who couldn't see-"

"Sect Leader Jiang!" Jin Zixuan addressed instead. "This is my Sect's Flower banquet and your sect's disciple! Are you going to control him or not?!"

Having come close enough to see, Lan Xichen wondered, "Why are they arguing again?"

Jin Zixuan jumped at those words too and wilted further when he heard Madam Jin giving a long, drawn-out sigh.

Lan Wangji appeared stuck between going toward the conflict and staying where he was. Then, just as he seemed to make up his mind to move, Sect Leader Jiang's voice rang out:

"Wei Wuxian, you can just shut your mouth," he hissed. "Young Master Jin, I'm sorry. My sister is doing quite well, thank you for your concern. We can talk about this some other time."

"Next time?" Wei Wuxian repeated. "There is no 'next time.' Whether or not she's doing well isn't any of his business, either! Who does he think he is?!"

He turned around and left, ignoring Jiang Cheng's call of "What are you doing? Get back here!"

Watching this, Madam Yu pursed her lips, torn. On one hand, she couldn't believe what an embarrassment Wei Wuxian was being. A ~~son of a servant~~ disciple picking a fight with a Sect heir was already bad enough, but he was even interfering in her daughter's to-be husband.

This was the couple that would give her Jin Ling; how dare Wei Wuxian try to tear them apart? And the real Jiang Yanli had been so happy with Jin Zixuan, as they watched the simulation.

On the other hand, that was only the real Jin Zixuan. The simulated one — the one in that timeline — was the man who had made her daughter cry over and over and over again, without so much as a real apology. Sure, he clearly felt badly about the soup incident, but after what he'd done he deserved some of this pushback and resistance. With just the information the twenty year old Wei Wuxian had, Madam Yu might have made the same decision.

So, in summary, she had no idea what she felt about this scene.

Madam Jin, on the other hand, content in her knowledge that Jin Ling would be born anyways, reveled in the struggle her son was confronted with. 'See?' her gaze seemed to say. 'This is what happens when you don't listen to me.'

Lan Wangji sent Jin Zixuan a comforting look, knowing full well the kind of embarrassment Jin Zixuan was experiencing.

But the simulated Jiang Cheng was far more firm in his own stance, shouting, "Wei Wuxian! Where do you think you're going?!"

"Anywhere is fine!" Wei Wuxian shouted back. "Just don't let me see that face of his. I never wanted to come anyways! You can deal with whatever's here yourself."

Having been abandoned by Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng's face clouded over.

And the real Jiang Cheng frowned as well, but for completely different reasons. He had seen their relationship in the far-future and had known from the beginning that it almost couldn't be more different from the one they had now. He had seen the start of what brought about that change — Lan Wangji, the Xuanwu, the burning of Lotus Pier ~~and the way Jiang Cheng had choked him for it~~ — but now he was starting to see the effects.

'Still,' he thought. 'Is it really too much for Wei Wuxian to just bring his sword?'

At that moment however, Jin Guangyao passed by. He had been tasked with fixing all sorts of problems throughout the banquet, so when he saw the expressions on everyone's faces, he immediately called out, "Young Master Wei, please wait!"

Wei Wuxian's face was dark, and he wasn't paying attention to anyone's calls. He continued marching out. His path led him directly by Lan Wangji, who reached out toward him. But, right as Wei Wuxian got within reaching distance, Lan Wangji hesitated and pulled back. The two brushed by each other without speaking a word.

"It really is strange to see just how different their relationship is in the future," Jin Guangshan commented idly.

Jin Guangyao couldn't catch up. He sighed, turning his gaze to the ground.

“And there he goes…. Ah, Sect Leader Jiang, what should I do?” he asked.

“Don’t mind him,” Jiang Cheng said at once, forcing away the darkness in his expression. “Just look at how impolite he is. He’s used to getting away with this sort of thing at home.”

He then turned toward Jin Zixuan and began talking with him amicably.

Nie Mingjue had very little interest in this, however, and so didn’t stick around any longer. The blue illusion of Wei Wuxian sighed, grateful. It was embarassing enough to watch his past self even without the argument between him and Jin Zixuan.

The watchers understood completely.

(Jin Zixuan especially.)

The Jin heir could sympathize with his older self. He had made mistakes in his interactions with Jiang Yanli too (though much smaller ones than his simulated version had), and if Wei Wuxian was preventing him from making that up to her, he would be frustrated too. But….

But, Jin Zixuan couldn’t help but glance back to where his father was. The man stood close to Wen Ruohan, barely having moved from that position even as the simulation had shown atrocity after atrocity from the Wens. He then looked at his mother, who was so indescribably unhappy in her marriage that she had practically become a supporter of Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji just to see a healthy relationship form.

Jin Ziuan wasn’t his father. He wasn’t even like his father.

But he had grown up wanting to be. Not in this way, maybe, but certainly in others. Jin Guangshan was a competent Sect Leader. He had made a powerful alliance with Wen Ruohan (and wouldn’t needlessly break it, no matter how many lives that cost). Jin Guangshan had made the Jin Sect prosper (and then used that money to buy himself women). Jin Guangshan was cautious in war, not starting fights unnecessarily (meaning Jin Zixuan was the Jin’s representative during the war, with his father staying behind in Koi Tower).

And then, slowly, Jin Zixuan looked into the distance, where Meng Yao was running from place to place to deal with any issues that occurred. He looked at the golden robes on Jin Guangyao’s body and recalled the blinding smile that appeared when Jin Guangshan acknowledged him.

And then he recalled the casual ease in the future Jin Guangyao’s expression as he terrified Qin Su out of her mind.

Meng Yao had been far from a perfect person, but working under Wen Ruohan for years, even as a spy, had most definitely not made him better.

(And now the feeling Jin Zixuan had initially thought was jealousy came back, and he instead identified it as dread. Because, as much as he didn’t want to admit it, he was starting to think working under Jin Guangshan had made Jin Guangyao worse too.)

The world before them shifted, moving forward in time, and Jin Ling's voice announced: "Qinghe Nie, The Unclean Realm."

Nie Mingjue sat on a mat. Before him was Lan Xichen, who had laid a guqin flat across his lap. Lan Xichen brushed his fingers over the strings, expertly weaving the notes together into song.

🎵♩♪♩🎵♪🎵🎵♪

The last note was played, and Lan Xichen allowed the vibrations of the strings to come to a stop.

Jin Guangyao laughed: "Well, now that I've heard Er-ge's guqin skills, I might as well smash my guqin the moment I get home."

"Your skills are also quite impressive outside of Gusu," Lan Xichen commented. "Were you taught by your mother?"

He shook his head and answered, "No, I taught myself by watching her. She never taught me such things, focusing instead on reading and writing and bringing over a handful of swords and cultivation guides to help me practice."

Lan Xichen nearly did a double take, asking, "Swords and cultivation guides?"

"Er-ge, you've seen them before, haven't you? Those small booklets sold by common folk, filled with jumbled sketches of human figures and deliberately mystifying captions. Anyways, all of them are scams," Jin Guangyao concluded. "They're meant to trick ignorant children and innocent women like my mother. You won't lose anything by practicing them, but you definitely won't gain anything either. But, how could my mother have known that? She bought them no matter how expensive they were, telling me that when I met my father in the future, I had to know as much as possible so as to not fall behind. All of her money was spent on this."

Wen Ruohan frowned slightly at those words, considering them carefully.

Meng Yao had said something to that effect quite a few times. And with the rumors about his first attempted entrance into Koi Tower, a very clear picture was painted. His mother was probably the person he cared about most, given how much affection he spoke of her with. And she had told him practically every day about how wonderful the Jin Sect was, how noble his father was, and how perfect his life would be if he could just prove himself to be a useful cultivator.

That determination had been obvious from the beginning, when he went on errands for those worthless brats in the Nie Sect, just to gain a little favor from them.

Yes, the more Wen Ruohan thought about it, the more certain he was. A man like Meng Yao was too ambitious — too determined — to ever settle for anything less than perfection. His mother had promised him that perfection would come with gaining his father's approval as a member of the Jin Sect. It didn't matter how well Wen Ruohan treated him or how poorly Jin Guangshan did. Wen Ruohan could save Meng Yao's life as many times as he wanted; if Meng Yao saw a chance to gain Jin Guangshan's favor, he would take it. The future Wen Ruohan was a fool for thinking otherwise.

And yet, was Meng Yao really happy there?

Wen Ruohan thought about the scornful gazes he had seen directed Jin Guangyao's way. It was certainly better than before (he was a member of the Jin Sect; no one would dismiss him so openly), but it was far from perfect. One had to look no further than Jin Guangyao's name to realize that.

*Guang*yao. His courtesy name was just his original name with a prefix added — and not even the right prefix! Jin Guangshan had to accept him because of the political situation following Wen Ruohan's death, but he was doing everything in his power to push Jin Gunagyao out of the line of succession.

It was possible that Jin Guangshan was simply worried about Jin Zixuan's rights as heir. Maybe he didn't want the son he had raised to suddenly feel threatened. Maybe, as he got to know Meng Yao, he would start to care more.

But, given what Wen Ruohan knew of the man, that was unlikely.

He rubbed his brows.

"What is wrong with you?" Wen Ruohan couldn't help but mutter. An insanely talented, unfalteringly loyal boy was dropped into his lap, and Jin Guangshan was going to do everything he could to stifle that potential. How had Wen Ruohan ended up with Wen Chao, while Jin Guangshan got Meng Yao? The Jiangs had made the exact same mistake with Wei Wuxian. Why on earth would someone work so hard to break down their most loyal soldier?

He really, truly, couldn't understand them at all.

Meanwhile, the simulated Lan Xichen had reached a comforting hand out toward Jin Guangyao, saying, "You're very talented, to have learned so much simply from watching others. If a master could offer you advice, you would make rapid progress."

Jin Guangyao grinned: "A master is right before my eyes, but I wouldn't dare to trouble him."

"Why not? Younger master, please sit."

Madam Jin tensed at the term, but, eventually, had to concede. Jin Guangyao was accepted by the Jin Sect; he indeed was a young master now.

~~As he should have been from the beginning, given who his father was.~~

But what about her A-Xuan? He didn't deserve to have to be reminded of what kind of a creature his father was. If they would all just stay out of her family's lives-

Which meant staying in sects where they were mocked for their heritage, or in the Mo family, where conditions were even worse.

(Whatever she felt about the matter, she couldn't say they deserved that.)

"What would you like to teach me, master Lan?" Jin Guangyao asked, the title coming out teasingly.

"Hmm," Lan Xichen paused for a moment before his eyes fell on Nie Mingjue, whose tense posture and knitted brows belayed his stress. "Then… how about the Purification Tone?"

"What?" Lan Qiren gaped.

Jin Guangyao's eyes lit up, but, before he could speak, Nie Mingjue interjected, "The Purification Tone is an exclusive teaching of the Gusu Lan Clan. It isn't meant to be leaked to outsiders."

Lan Xichen simply smiled, however, explaining, "The Purification Tone is different from the Eradication Tone in that it can be used to clear one's mind. How selfish would it be to withhold such a therapeutic technique? Besides, why would teaching it to our third brother be considered leaking it?"

Lan Qiren frowned, wanting to protest, but hesitating a moment later. He didn't trust Jin Guangyao. None of them could after seeing how well he could hide the truth. But, just by going off what Lan Xichen knew, the choice Lan Xichen was making couldn't be considered anything but righteous.

"I… Uncle," Lan Xichen began, feeling a need to justify himself even after what his other self said.. "I'm-"

Lan Qiren shook his head, and, when Lan Xichen paused, explained, "I do not disagree with your choice. And besides, the Purification Tone is a peaceful, healing technique. Informing Jin Guangyao of it can't have any consequences beyond the spreading of that information, which, as your other self said, may in fact be a good thing."

Lan Xichen relaxed, smiling again.

Wen Ruohan personally thought Lan Qiren was being a bit overly-optimistic, but he refrained from commenting on the matter.

The same was true of Nie Mingjue, who withdrew his objection upon seeing how set Lan Xichen was on his choice.

The sun set then rose again, then set and rose and set and rose. Several days passed by in a matter of seconds, bringing them to a secure courtyard in the center of the Qinghe Nie compound. The trees rustled in the wind, and a few pants of exertion came from a familiar face.

Nie Huaisang stood in the center of the courtyard, holding a large saber in the air. Well, saying he was "holding" it might be a little too generous; the shaking of his legs and arms under the weight of the saber led to him teetering back and forth, bouncing this way and that by the saber's weight.

"Huh," Jin Zixuan blinked. "I don't think I've ever seen you hold any kind of weapon before."

Giving a loud whine, Nie Huaisang protested, "Because I don't like them! Stop watching!"

His other self attempted a few swings, but, rather than him wielding the saber, the way he would constantly be flung after it made it seem more like the saber was wielding him.

Nie Mingjue groaned.

"Da-ge!" Nie Huaisang protested.

"Come on now, Da-ge," Lan Xichen added in. "At least he's practicing."

The reason why was revealed a moment later. The watchers were zoomed out, allowing them to see Nie Mingjue and Jin Guangyao watching carefully from the sides. Where Meng Yao had been ecstatic at the one-on-one advice Nie Mingjue had offered him, Nie Huaisang was very much not.

He panted a few times, struggling to raise the saber once again.

Nie Mingjue wanted to sigh, though he managed to keep it internal this time. Lan Xichen was right; if Nie Mingjue sighed every time Huaisang tried to practice, he would want to practice even less. Still, Nie Mingjue was leaving him in charge of the whole sect. He should at least be somewhat able to defend himself for when he had to deal with sect politics without Nie Mingjue's protection.

Then again, the future Nie Huaisang, while not strong, did at least seem content with his life. Maybe Huaisang didn't need him as much as Nie Mingjue thought he did.

Regardless, at the point in time the simulation was displaying, Nie Huaisang was getting his brother's full attention. He tried for a few more seconds, but, soon enough, gave up and let the saber fall to his side.

"Da-ge," he complained. "Time is up. We should take a break."

"You just had a break half an hour ago! Keep practicing. You're not allowed to stop until you've mastered it!"

Two, simultaneous, dawn-out groans came from the two Nie Huaisangs at those words, and the real one beside them seemed to be trying to melt into his chair in protest.

The color of leaves on the trees changed from a vibrant green to a fiery yellow-red, and a door slammed open.

“Ah!” Nie Huaisang jumped, looking up from the fan he was tenderly holding to see his brother storming in. A dozen folding fans were flattened out before him, lined in gold and displayed for him to observe at his leisure. He had been muttering to himself as he compared the inscriptions on each one.

But now, Nie Mingjue had come in.

“Nie Huaisang!”

The real Nie Huaisang jumped as well, and even Nie Mingjue seemed taken aback by the level of anger in his own voice. As far as he remembered, the only people he used that tone with were the Wens.

“B-b-brother!” Nie Huaisang gasped out, having fallen to his knees from the surprise and terror.

“Where is your saber?!”

“In… in my room.” Nie Huaisang looked this way and that. “No, in the school grounds… no, no, let me think-”

“You bring a dozen fans wherever you go, yet you don’t even know where your saber is?!!”

Nie Huaisang was very, very glad Wen Xu and Wen Chao had left the simulation already. If one of them had laughed at this scene, his Da-ge would have really blown a fuse.

“I-I’ll go find it right now!” Nie Huaisang offered.

“There’s no need! Even if you find it, you won’t get anything out of having it. Go burn all of those!”

All the color drained out of Nie Huaisang’s face, and he hurriedly swept them all into his arms, protesting, “No, brother! All of these are gifts!”

“Da-ge!” the real Nie Huaisang objected as well. “I’ll practice! I will! Don’t burn them!”

Feeling awkward about having to do this in front of everyone, Nie Mingjue nonetheless forced himself to nod, patting the area around Nie Huaisang’s head a few times.

“Alright,” he said. “But you will need to practice.”

Nie Huaisang wilted.

The simulated Nie Mingjue reacted quite differently:

“Gifts?!” he demanded, slamming his hand on the table and causing it to crack. “Who gave them to you?! Tell them to get out of here right now!”

“I gave them,” a distant voice said.

Jin Guangyao walked in from outside the hall, and Nie Huaisang lit up. His knight in shining armor was here.

The real Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, darkened considerably.

"Ah," he said, slowly. "I've changed my mind, Da-ge. Burn away."

A sudden awkwardness had come over Nie Mingjue as well, and he fell silent once more. Lan Xichen frowned, but, understanding Nie Mingjue's emotions, didn't have anything to say.

'In reality, it's not that Jin Guangyao can calm Nie Mingjue's anger,' Wei Wuxian thought, watching his once-schoolmate hurriedly hide behind his 'San-ge.' 'It's just that, whenever Jin Guangyao comes, all of Nie Mingjue's anger gets directed at him instead, meaning he has no presence of mind to scold Nie Huaisang. There's nothing inaccurate about calling Jin Guangyao Nie Huaisang's knight in shining armor.'

Thus, Nie Huaisang was absolutely delighted, greeting Jin Guangyao excitedly as he stepped back out for a moment to grab his precious fans. Seeing Nie Huaisang's reaction, Nie Mingjue's outrage doubled.

"Don't send him those useless things!"

Startled by the loud noise, Nie Huaisang dropped a few of his fans on the ground and had to hurriedly scoop down to make sure none of them were broken. Jin Guangyao knelt down as well, offering some assistance.

"Nie Huaisang's hobbies are quite elegant," he said, giving a calm smile. "He's dedicated to art and calligraphy, and has no propensity for mischief. How can you call such a thing useless?"

"Yes, yes!" Nie Huaisang nodded. "San-ge is right!"

"Ha!" Nie Mingjue laughed. "In cohorts now, are you?"

"Hm," Wen Ruohan hummed to himself, watching the interaction with narrowed eyes. As genuine as the support might seem at first glance, there were a few other possibilities in play for Jin Guangyao's motivations. One of the things he was best at was playing the helpless victim. The more he angered Nie Mingjue — as he surely must be aware this gift would do, especially with him being the sender — the more he would be able to convince Lan Xichen that Sect Leader Nie's anger against him was completely unreasonable. Each act might be a small thing, but, as they built up, the receiver would begin to crumble. In addition, little by little, Jin Guangyao was buying Nie Huaisang's affection. And not just with money, either; he knew Nie Huaisang's hobbies quite well and was defending him in front of Nie Mingjue without question.

On the other hand, there was the chance that none of that was true. Even a master manipulator couldn't be completely separate from human interaction. Maybe he really did just want to grow closer to Nie Huaisang. Perhaps the gift was a genuine symbol of affection, and Nie Mingjue's temporary anger was worth it to support what Nie Huaisang loved.

Wen Ruohan had always considered himself to be fairly good at reading other people, but Jin Guangyao was stumping him time and time again.

"Perhaps," Nie Mingjue began, acknowledging Jin Guangyao's point, "But Sect Leaders have no need for such a thing."

"I'm not going to be Sect Leader though!" Nie Huaisang shouted. "You can stay it. I'm not doing it!"

Nie Mingjue pursed his lips together tightly.

And there was a collective intake of breath. They knew, now, that the reason Nie Mingjue was so insistent on preparing Nie Huaisang for his position was because he may not have much longer to live. Even if he had a child right now, they would be far too young to take over the position by the time he died, so the role would go to Huaisang anyways.

And yet, to the simulated Nie Huaisang, his brother seemed invincible. He would never even consider such a thought.

Next, Nie Mingjue turned to Jin Guangyao and asked, "What did you come here for?"

"Er-ge said that he gave you a guqin," Jin Guangyao responded, as respectful and pleasant as one could be. "He wanted to have it available near you for whenever he needed to help calm your temper. However, he confessed to me yesterday that, as he recently has become wrapped up in his affairs as Sect Leader, you refuse to let him come. The GusuLan Sect is at a critical point in the reestablishment of the Cloud Recesses, but there's no reason you should be unable to receive treatment for the time being. I'm sure that's why he decided to teach me the Purification Tone. I may not be as skilled as Er-ge, but I believe I'll still be able to provide some assistance."

Both Nie Mingjues sent him a heavy glare. They didn't trust him or his supposed good intentions. It wasn't as though there was anything lacking in the explanation he provided, but they had seen first-hand just how good Jin Guangyao was at making up stories to justify all sorts of outrageous things.

(Wei Wuxian had supposedly done things even worse at Nightless City, and yet Nie Mingjue and the other watchers were willing to give him the benefit of the doubt until they saw the full story. How was it fair to mistrust even the reasonable things Jin Guangyao did?)

(But from what they'd seen so far, Wei Wuxian had actually been through extreme circumstances that justified the things he did. And yet, even when unreasonably blamed, he had never tried to justify his behavior, even to himself.)

(But they had somewhat wanted him to explain. Why was it wrong now that Jin Guangyao had done so?)

<(Because he always lied.)

And it appeared the simulated Nie Mingjue felt the same:

"...Just take care of your own business," he said at last, rejecting Jin Guangyao's offer.

Nie Huaisang, however, appeared interested: "Da-ge, what song? Can I listen? Let me tell you, the limited edition you gave me last time was absolutely-"

"Go to your room!" Nie Mingjue shouted.

Nie Huaisang fled at once. Not to his room, mind you, but rather to the central hall, where the additional presents Jin Guangyao had brought him lay. Nie Mingjue scowled, seemingly wanting to protest his brother's complete and unashamed refusal to follow his orders, but just sighed to himself a moment later.

The real Nie Huaisang grinned briefly, knowing his other self had won.

Nie Mingjue glanced over at Jin Guangyao, his eyes falling to the other's dust-covered robes and slightly out-of-breath panting.

'He must have run here straight from Koi Tower.'

And, if Jin Guangyao was genuinely trying to help Nie Mingjue here — if he was truly trying to make up for what he had done — then Nie Huaisang would have no complaints to give. He might actually be so grateful he'd kowtow before Jin Guangyao, showering him with thanks and praise. Despite Nie Mingjue's refusals and blatant disregard, Jin Guangyao was putting significant effort into improving Nie Mingjue's health. He was practically a saint.

If it was real.

Nie Huaisang sighed internally and heard a quiet external sigh from Lan Xichen, who was stuck in the same mess of thoughts as Nie Huaisang.

And the simulated Nie Mingjue might be following that line of thinking as well.

"Sit," he requested at last, gesturing to the spot he wanted Jin Guangyao to take.

Jin Guangyao complied, but, as he did, he looked over to where Nie Huaisang had departed to and added on, "Da-ge, if you're concerned for Huaisang, softer words would do no harm. Why act like this?"

Madam Jin internally scoffed: 'I can promise that whatever you do to end up with his brother's head affected him far more than nagging ever did. Guangshan uses flowery words almost as well as you do, but the women he leaves always end up damaged beyond repair.'

But-

"Even when a blade's at his neck, he still acts like this," Nie Mingjue complained. "Looks like he'll always be a good for nothing."

Nie Huaisang didn't flinch.

But Nie Mingjue did.

While the younger brother was perfectly content with that reputation and took actions to encourage it, the elder wished his other self hadn't said it. Especially not to someone who wasn't family — who had killed Nie Wulin — who might use Nie Huaisang's weakness and their fraying relationship against them. Only an idiot would say that-

…Nie Mingjue could see what they meant when they said his other self needed to listed to the Pacification Tone.

As Nie Mingjue had come to that conclusion, the rest of the watchers had been listening to the simulated conversation continue.

"It's not that he's a good-for-nothing,"Jin Guangyao disagreed. "It's just that his heart lies somewhere else."

"And you know where his heart lies?"

"Of course, isn't that what I'm best at?" Jin Guangyao smiled. "The only person who I can't discern is you, Da-ge."

Wen Ruohan almost laughed.

'Yes, that is what you're best at,' he thought. 'To the point where you were able to simultaneously and flawlessly gain both my and the first jade's favor. Though, I do sympathize with your current plight. I, too, hadn't understood Nie Mingjue well enough to predict how much trouble his Sunshot Campaign would be.'

He would think about that more carefully, this time.

Even Wei Wuxian seemed to be relating to what Jin Guangyao said.

'Back when Jin Guangyao was working for him, he tried watching carefully, but Nie Mingjue refused every possible avenue. Women, liquor, riches? He wasn't interested in any of them. Arts, calligraphy, antiques… he saw them as nothing more than piles of ink and mud. The finest green tea leaves and dregs from a roadside booth? There was never any change in Nie Mingjue's expression. Meng Yao tried everything he could to find something Nie Mingjue enjoyed other than saberwork and killing Wen dogs, but he was simply an impenetrable iron wall.'

"...This is a little sad, Da-ge," Nie Huaisang couldn't help but comment, his lips quirking up.

"Some of us have priorities focused on our actual work," Nie Mingjue said back sternly, still not having forgotten the ways Nie Huaisang had behaved at the Cloud Recesses in the early segments.

However, that scolding atmosphere fluctuated when Lan Xichen leaned over and whispered, "Still, Da-ge, Huaisang might have a point. Perhaps you should consider getting a hobby."

“What?! Xichen-”

“Mental health at extremes can affect physical health too,” Wen Qing calmly pointed out. “Especially for those of us who have a family history of qi deviations.”

There was nothing Nie Mingjue could say to that. It took all of Nie Huaisang’s self control to keep from cackling.

Shortly after, the simulated Jin Guangyao switched topic toward the reason he had come, asking, “By the way, Da-ge, where is Er-ge’s guqin?”

Nie Mingjue pointed him to the left, and Jin Guangyao moved swiftly to pick up the instrument. He began to play.

The sun dimmed in the sky, progressing forward in time, then became bright again, moving to a later day.

The sky dimmed, then lit up, then dimmed, then lit up. Jin Guangyao continuing through the Purification Tone with expert skill. Its notes filled the air, and the power of the cultivation attached to it sunk through the watchers’ skin. If it had been powered by resentful energy, some of the watchers may have fallen asleep.

“Jin Guangyao would travel from Lanling to Qinghe every few days, playing the Purification Tone to Chifeng-zun each time,” Sizhui explained. “He tried his hardest, without speaking a single word of complaint. The Purification Tone was indeed effective.”

The watchers nodded, able to feel the traces of resentment in Nie Mingjue calming bit by bit.

“Well,” Wen Qing sighed, “I suppose you’re at least trying to make yourself better.”

As compared to the cold-faced acceptance they had found from Nie Mingjue when they first heard of his death, this was vastly preferable. Even the simulated Nie Mingjue had noticed that his reaction to Nie Huaisang’s fans was excessive, and he was now working toward a cure.

Unfortunately, they all knew it wouldn’t work out the way he wanted.

As the music continued to play, the watchers were shown flashes of the moments in between. Jin Guangyao and Nie Mingjue conversed somewhat each time, and, slowly, the flashes of hostility there dimmed.

‘Perhaps re-establishing the Cloud Recesses was just an excuse,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Maybe, in actuality, Lan Xichen actually wanted to offer them a chance to get closer.’

Lan Qiren, Lan Xichen, and Lan Wangji all flinched.

“Eh?” Jiang Yanli turned their way. “Is something wrong?”

“...That wasn’t the right note,” Lan Wangji responded. “He made a mistake.”

“Ah, I suppose A-Y… Jin Guangyao is new to this. Even if I wanted to offer them a chance to get closer to each other, I probably should have come to check in on them every once in a while,” Lan Xichen said.

A frown crossed Lan Qiren’s face. The mistakes Jin Guangyao was making were most certainly not the Purification Tone, but, somehow, the new chorus made still sounded slightly familiar to him.

These misplaced notes blended smoothly into the rest of the song, and, as it continued, became nearly unnoticeable. Despite that, the three Lans would still show slight signs of discomfort every time one of them showed up.

Then, an angry shout broke through the peace.

“Sect Leader Nie!”

“Wait-”

The two Jin disciples who tried to intervene were thrown off, and they didn’t dare to stop him after. He marched straight into the Blooming Garden, where Lan Xichen and Jin Guangyao were discussing something over a pile of blueprints. Seeing who had barged in, Lan Xichen turned his attention in that direction.

“Da-ge?” he asked.

“Don’t move.”

Nie Huaisang frowned at the tone his brother had used. Nie Mingjue was easily angered, and, even if he knew how to control his temper as Sect Leader, he would also rarely hesitate to confront people he disagreed with. However, what Nie Huaisang was used to was a loud anger, full of (often one-sided) shouting and big, emotional hand motions.

This, right here, was a far more quiet, serious anger.

The kind Huaisang knew better than to oppose.

Slowly, Nie Mingjue turned to Jin Guangyao and ordered, “Come out.”

Jin Guangyao looked at Nie Mingjue, then glanced at Lan Xichen and smiled, requesting, "Er-ge, could you please excuse me this one time? I have some private matters to discuss with Da-ge. I'll have to ask for your explanation at a later time."

Lan Xichen's face clearly displayed his worry, but, presented with Jin Guangyao's request, caved in nonetheless.

As Lan Xichen watched this interaction unfold, he could see quite easily how his other self would instantly view Nie Mingjue as a violent aggressor and Jin Guangyao as an always-appeasing victim.

But, somehow, that didn't seem like the full story this time.

Jin Guangyao followed Sect Leader Nie outside the Blooming Garden, to the very edge of Koi Tower. As soon as they reached that edge, Nie Mingjue spun around and attacked.

"Ah!"

"Hey, what are you doing?!" Jiang Cheng shouted, flabbergasted.

Jin Guangyao dodged the first strike, proving how little effort Nie Mingjue had put into it, and raised a hand toward the surrounding Jin disciples, preventing them from responding.

"Da-ge, why are you so angry?" he asked. "Let's calm down-"

"Where's Xue Yang?!" Nie Mingjue shouted back.

All the watchers froze at that name.

'Xue Yang' was one they would never be able to forget. His tragedy, and the tragedies he inflicted on others, would be seared into their minds until the end of time. Which meant that this was right after Xue Yang had destroyed the Chang family.

The previous Sect Leader Chang had needed some punishment for what he had done. The current Chang family might need to be checked, to ensure that such a thing wouldn't happen again. But killing every last member of the family, down to the youngest child?

'Of course they were equal. My finger was my own, but those lives were other peoples'. Why, they're not even equal. They wouldn't be equal no matter how many of them I killed. It was only around fifty. How could that be equal to one of my fingers?'

And the Jin Sect….

The Jin Sect had protected him even after that.

Jin Zixuan suddenly felt very, very sick.

Meanwhile, Jin Guangyao had responded to Nie Mingjue at once, telling him the story that had been reported to the masses: "Xue Yang? He's already been locked inside the dungeons, imprisoned for life."

"Well clearly not!" Jiang Cheng muttered. "Fuck's sake, didn't they even say that Jin Guangyao killed Xue Yang immediately after he became Sect Leader?"

Unable to resist, Nie Huaisang parroted back, "Well, clearly not."

"What was it you said to me back then?!" Nie Mingjue shouted. "I wanted him to repay blood with blood, and yet you imprisoned him for life?!"

"...As long as he receives his punishment and can't offend again, perhaps paying 'blood for blood' and imprisoning him for life works out the same."

"Can't offend again," Wen Ruohan repeated. "How amusing."

As much as he hated to, Nie Mingjue couldn't help but agree.

"You.. do you even know what he's done?! Things are already like this and you're still defending him?!"

"I didn't defend him," Jin Guangyao disagreed at once. "I was also shocked by what happened to the Chang Sect. How could I have known Xue Yang would kill more than fifty people? But my father is set on defending him-"

"You were shocked?! Who was the one who invited him to the sect?!" Nie Mingjue shouted. "Who was the one that recommended him? Who regarded him so highly that he gained a grand position. Don't use your father as an excuse. How could you have not known what Xue Yang was doing?!"

"Right!" Jin Guangshan added on, spurred by Nie Mingjue's anger. "Honestly, that snake. He thinks that just because he betrayed and killed Sect Leader Wen, he can get away with anything. To think he would try to frame me like that."

Nie Mingjue wanted to nod in agreement. Like his other self, he couldn't tell when Jin Guangyao was lying, so now everything looked like a lie. However, he hesitated.

"...You are still Sect Leader," Lan Wangji calmly pointed out. "If you had insisted on executing Xue Yang, as per your agreement with Sect Leader Nie, then there would be nothing Jin Guangyao could do to counter that."

"Yes, yes," Jin Guangshan waved a hand dismissively. "But, as we saw with Lan-gongzi, Sect Leader Nie, and Sect Leader Wen, that boy has quite the silver tongue. I'm sure he whispered some sort of poison into my ears that changed my mind."

"...Are you sure about that?" Jin Zixuan couldn't help but ask. Jin Guangshan turned toward his son in shock, and Jin Zixuan slapped a hand over his traitorous mouth, unable to believe what he had just said.

And Jin Guangyao continued to insist: "Da-ge, that really was what my father ordered! I couldn't refuse! Now you want me to deal with Xue Yang — what am I supposed to say to him?!"

"There's no need for an explanation. Come back to me with Xue Yang's head in your hand!" he demanded. "Meng Yao… don't speak your pretentious words to me. Your whole act stopped working on me a long time ago!"

For the first time, the watchers were able to see what seemed to be genuine unease flash across Meng Yao's face.

"Honestly, does he know or not?!" Madam Yu snarled. "Why isn't the simulation just showing us what he really feels about Xue Yang. It can display thoughts, this shouldn't be that hard!"

"...Perhaps not knowing for sure is the point," Wen Qing speculated. "It's not as though we'll be able to know what people are thinking after we leave the simulation. With what we know now, what would be the best thing to do with Jin Guangyao?"

The watchers fell silent for a moment in thought.

"Investigating further," Nie Mingjue said at last. "I'm… my other-self is directing all his anger at Jin Guangyao right now. It's clouding my mind. We'd need to deal with Xue Yang first, who's the more immediate threat, then look into it as closely as we can."

Just like the future's Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were doing every time they came across a possible threat.

"The Chang Clan will be the first group we need to deal with," Lan Qiren said next. "We saw first hand what they do. Punishment will be delivered accordingly, regardless of the rank that perpetrator holds."

If someone saw Nie Mingjue's eyes look between Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan at those last few words, no one commented.

However, at that moment, Jin Guangyao finally seemed to snap.

"My 'whole act?' What act? Da-ge, you've always yelled at me for being too calculating and dishonorable. You say that you're a proud righteous person, and that you aren't afraid of anything. That proper men shouldn't need to play with schemes! Fine. That's fine. Your background is noble, and your cultivation is high. But what about me? Am I the same as you?!"

Lan Xichen stared, looking back and forth between the simulated Jin Guangyao, the simulated Nie Mingjue, and the real one, standing right beside him. He couldn't tell for sure, but, if he had to guess, he would say the words coming out of Jin Guangyao's mouth right now were the honest truth — in his mind, at least.

This, right here, was what he really felt.

“Firstly, my cultivation is nowhere near the level of yours. When I was born, was anyone around to teach me? Secondly, I have no prominent background. Do you really think I’m in a steady position, here at the Lanling Jin Sect? Do you think I can rise into power the moment Jin Zixuan dies?!”

The real Jin Zixuan flinched at that, and Madam Jin gave off a slight growl. This was exactly why she was so opposed to allowing one of those bastard children into the sect. Of course it was the position of Sect Leader he was after. Those brats were all so greedy for-

For….

“Are you crazy?! Jin Guangshan would rather bring in another illegitimate child than allow me to succeed him! You think that I should be as fearless as you? Well, I’m afraid of everything! You’re right, I’m terrified of other people. Because I’m not like you!”

The words seemed to come in one ear and out the other for Madam Jin, but the feelings — the desperation, the terror, the hate — lingered in her mind. Jin Guangyao wasn’t someone she could ever trust. Madam Jin fully believed that he would kill Jin Zixuan if he thought it would get him more power. Just think of vicious lie he probably told to get rid of Mo Xuanyu-

~~Just think of the conditions Mo Xuanyu had ended up in as a result.~~

Yes, Jin Guangyao was greedy. He was greedy for praise, and for political power.

(Because what would he have, without that?)

(Maybe, if she had just promised them security, her son wouldn’t be endangered by them.)

However, Madam Jin was the only one lost in thought at this time. Every other watcher sat up straight, eyes glued to the simulation before them, as Jin Guangyao shouted out his every thought.

“Yes, you can say all that, but I’m nothing like you! Someone whose stomach is full will never believe the pain of those who are starving!”

But the simulated Nie Mingjue was far less sympathetic than the watchers: “In the end, all you’re saying is that you don’t want to kill Xue Yang because you don’t want your position at Koi Tower to waver!”

“Of course I don’t! But, Da-ge, I have always wanted to ask you something. You’ve killed far more people than I, and yet, when I killed just a few cultivators out of desperation, why do you continue to bring it up?!”

Nie Mingjue was so enraged that he began to laugh: “Good! I’ll give you my answer! Countless souls have fallen under my saber, but never due to my own desires! Much less to raise my position in the world!”

“Then, Da-ge, are you saying that all the people you’ve killed deserved their deaths?”

When Nie Mingjue paused for a moment, a sudden spark of courage came over Jin Guangyao and he began to laugh. He walked a few steps closer to Nie Mingjue.

And Nie Huaisang frowned, watching the energy in his brother fluctuate. The longer they had been inside of the simulation, the more sensitive they had become to changes in resentful energy. Where before he would have only been able to see the images being shown in front of him, even Nie Huaisang was now able to notice something was wrong.

“Da-ge?”

“Hm?” Nie Mingjue responded, glancing back briefly. Nie Huaisang trotted over to his brother, phasing through to get even closer than should be physically possible, then stood on his tiptoes to whisper into Nie Mingjue’s ear.

“The song Jin Guangyao is playing for you isn’t working at all. I don’t know if it’s because of his words or other factors, but you seem closer to a qi deviation than ever right now.”

Nie Mingjue frowned at the comment, but didn’t object. He, too, had noticed how volatile and dangerous his other-self’s qi and demeanor was.

“After we leave the simulation, please let someone else handle him,” Nie Huaisang continued. “Even if you know better than to trust the Jin Guangyao of our world, I’d rather you don’t get directly involved in dealing with him.”

“Hm,” was all Nie Mingjue said.

Meanwhile, standing face to face with this tightly-wound Sect Leader Nie, Jin Guangyao whispered with an unnerving level of calm: “Then, Da-ge, may I ask just how you decide if someone deserves death? Are your standards absolutely correct? If I kill one but save hundreds, would the good outweigh the bad, or would I still deserve death? To do great things, sacrifices must happen.”

“What?!” Nie Mingjue snarled.

“Then why don’t you ever sacrifice yourself?” the simulated version snapped back. “Are you more worthy than them? Are you different, somehow?”

Jin Guangyao stared at him for a moment too long, before he quietly whispered, “Yes.”

‘It was only around fifty of them! How could that be equal to one of my fingers?’ Xue Yang asked.

Jin Guangyao looked up, his expression containing some pride, some calmness, and a faint trace of insanity: “Compared to them… yes, of course I’m different!”

Rage took over Nie Mingjue’s form, and the traces of poisonous resentment enveloped him whole.

The sound of a collision rang through the air.

Nie Mingjue had kicked Jin Guangyao, and said sworn brother hadn't resisted at all. He hadn't looked away or flinched as he was sent rolling like a pebble down Koi Tower.

Staring down at the fallen Jin Guangyao, resentment still swirling like a tornado within him, Nie Mingjue hissed, "No wonder, coming from the son of a prostitute."

"What?" Lan Xichen gasped out, unable to believe what he had just heard. Nie Mingjue looked shocked as well, and Wen Ruohan could understand why.

The interactions Nie Mingjue and Jin Guangyao had before everything had gone down proved that Jin Guangyao's family history didn't matter to Nie Mingjue. He didn't consider it shameful, and he respected Jin Guangyao's capabilities regardless. But, when bombarded by how different their moral compasses were, the genuine resentment within him poured out into the thing he knew would hurt Jin Guangyao the most.

Someone cleared their throat.

Wen Ruohan glanced to the side and saw his niece staring straight at Nie Mingjue, not giving him any room to look away as she said, "We will need to find a more effective way of dealing with your sect's issue. As soon as we leave the simulation, the first thing you do better be contacting the future to see if they have any ideas. Am I understood?"

Although he heard Wen Qing's words perfectly clearly, Nie Mingjue's only response was to look away.

The last thing he'd said had been wrong. He was out of line.

When Jin Guangyao finally landed, he'd rolled down more than fifty steps. Before long, he forced himself up, practically crawling to manage it. Despite that, he sent away the servants who looked ready to rush to his side. He dusted off his robes then stood, staring straight at Nie Mingjue.

Nie Mingjue's other-self had already known he needed to do something about his cultivation and his relationship with Jin Guangyao. That was why he had so easily agreed to having Jin Guangyao play the Purification Tone for him. And yet, after this incident with Xue Yang, it was clear that this solution would never work.

Silently, Wen Ruohan scanned over the situation one final time and thought, 'It seems getting the Nie Sect to keep quiet about what they'd done with Xue Yang isn't the only possible motive Jin Guangyao could have for permanently dealing with Nie Mingjue. Let's see how this plays out.'

At that moment, Lan Xichen ran over, having heard the commotion.

"What happened?" he asked.

Jin Guangyao smiled: "Nothing, Er-ge. Thank you for your assistance."

"Get out of my way!" Nie Mingjue shouted.

“Da-ge! Sheath your saber first! Your mind is in turmoil.”

The watchers, who could see the changing resentment in Nie Mingjue’s soul, understood that quite well.

However-

“I’m fine!” Nie Mingjue insisted. “I know what I’m doing! He’s beyond hope. If things keep going, he’ll do harm to the world for sure. The sooner he’s killed, the sooner we can be at ease!”

“Da-ge, what are you talking about?!” Lan Xichen gaped. “These past few days, he’s been constantly running to and fro from Lanling to Qinghe for you. Is it only your word that indicates he’s beyond hope?”

‘For dealing with Chifeng-zun, bringing up the good and bad others have done is a good tactic,’ Wei Wuxian thought.

And, as expected, Nie Mingjue looked over at Jin Guangyao following those words. He was bleeding from an injury he had sustained during the fall, and another wound, which had been wound in bandages, reopened as well.

Lan Xichen looked over at him and said, “You can go back. I will talk to our eldest brother.”

The real Lan Xichen looked away from the screen, not knowing what to feel. He had such different information than his other self that it was hard to make a judgment.

“A-at the very least,” Jiang Yanli spoke up, voice quiet but heard nonetheless. “I think I can easily understand why Zewu-jun’s other-self would look at that situation and see Lianfang-zun as a victim. I’m sure Jin Guangyao’s never talked about whose life he values the most in front of Zewu-jun.”

“Certainly,” Madam Jin agreed. “But that doesn’t change the fact that my sect seems to be doing something with Xue Yang that’ll indirectly lead to Xiao Xingchen, A-Qing, and Song Zichen’s deaths.”

Because this Jin Guangyao wasn’t chief cultivator yet; he was just a member of the Jin Clan. It wasn't just Jin Guangyao’s fault.

Which was a harder situation to deal with than being able to point at one individual and blame everything on them.

Once Jin Guangyao had left, Nie Mingjue’s posture loosened. Lan Xichen pulled him along, and the two began to walk.

Meanwhile, Madam Yu fell increasingly silent.

‘Compared to them? Yes, of course I’m different!’

Which was a terrible moral position to take. The only one who might agree was Wen Ruohan, who valued people almost solely by what they could offer. It was wrong.

'But valuing my own pride over Wei Wuxian's hand was perfectly justifiable, huh?' she thought. 'When it was Wei Wuxian's hand at stake, the logical thing to do was to save the sect and sacrifice it. But when it's a mere maid demanding my submission, it's worth the lives of everyone at the pier?'

She had already acknowledged (to herself, at least) that her values in that situation were misplaced. But to hear the*son of a prostitute* was saying such similar words…

Well, it dug the knife in another inch deeper.

"What do you think about what he said?" Jin Zixuan asked at last, not putting any tone into his voice. "About… about when ending one life can save hundreds."

"He's making excuses," Nie Mingjue said at once.

But Lan Xichen didn't fully agree: "Da-ge, putting aside what he does later for a moment, what he does during the Sunshot Campaign-"

"You really believe any of his excuses?" Wen Ruohan laughed. "Isn't it obvious by now that he was playing both of us? How can you possibly trust anything he says?"

Lan Qiren glared: "Played you? You attacked our sects — it would be inexcusable to side with you after that."

"And how many sects did I manage to destroy before any of you so much as tried to object?"

"You-"

Loud voices rose up from all sides, everyone trying to shout over each other to prove their stance. Nie Mingjue continued expressing his own doubts, but wasn't willing to side with Wen Ruohan on any argument. Nie Huaisang piped in as well, and then Madam Yu had taken some offense to something he had said, and now everything was spiraling out of control.

'There is no one right answer to this,' Lan Wangji thought, watching the simulated Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen's walk. 'When Jin Guangyao asked whether saving a hundred lives was worth one… that wasn't enough of a description of an event for any absolute statements to be applied. If someone is actively trying to kill 'hundreds' of people and you kill them, no one would blame you for the choice you made. But…'

He paused, thinking back to the conversation he had heard before.

'...If you kill your own child, and pin the blame on your political adversaries so that you can wipe their clans out…. Those Sect Leaders were opposing the watchtowers, and Jin Guangyao was able to put them up after he wiped the families out. If what I'm thinking really is what happened, then you could say that ending those lives saved many more.'

However-

‘In that situation, there were far too many other options. He could have gotten the same result with just a bit more effort. It doesn’t matter if the watchtowers save a million people, those murders would not be justified.’

And, worst of all….

‘Even if we decide that you were right to do what you did during the Sunshot Campaign, this philosophy you’re adopting of ‘I have no choice because it’s for a greater purpose’ cannot be something we normalize. To do great things, sacrifices must happen? So you won’t even try to look for ways that don’t involve sacrificing anything at all?’

Although this was a much steeper mess of complexities than Yi City was, the ever-growing feeling of dread it gave him remained the same. Regardless, just as was true of Yi City, they needed to get all the information they could before coming to any real conclusions.

“Da-ge,” Lan Xichen began at last, “I feel that… you’re unaware. Our third brother is in a really terrible situation at the moment.”

All conversations stopped, and every eye turned towards the scene.<

“If we go according to his words, he’s always in an awful situation,” Nie Mingjue muttered back.

And that was true too. Jin Zixuan sighed.

“But who would deny it?” Lan Xichen continued. “A moment ago, he talked back to you, didn’t he? Do you really think that’s normal for him?”

Nie Mingjue couldn’t respond, silently agreeing that it was strange for Jin Guangyao to lose his composure like that.

“Madam Jin never liked him to begin with. After Zixuan-xiong passed away, it became commonplace for her to hit and scold him.”

Madam Jin flinched at that, then wondered a moment later why she was so surprised.

“These days, his father also refuses to listen to him. Every proposal A-Yao sends forth is returned, rejected.”

An image flashed before them. The numerous blueprints that had been left between Lan Xichen and Jin Guangyao on the table — watchtower designs they were pouring over.

Jin Guangshan laughed nervously and sunk back, trying to avoid everyone’s eyes.

“For the time being, let’s not try to force him too harshly. I trust that he knows what he should do, so long as we give him enough time.”

“I hope so.”

Jiang Cheng laughed: “What he should do? What? Like declare that Xue Yang is dead when he’s actually running around getting Xiao Xingchen to massacre villages?”

Lan Xichen barely suppressed a wince.

“...He might have genuinely thought Xue Yang was dead, given the wounds he had when Xiao Xingchen found him,” Lan Qiren pointed out. But, as was always true with Jin Guangyao, there was no way to be sure.

(They needed to do what the simulated Wei Wuxian was doing now, and investigate in full.)

“Several days later, Qinghe,” Jin Ling announced.

‘Oh, that’s a surprise,’ Wei Wuxian thought, watching Meng Yao enter the school grounds. ‘I would have thought he’d stay away for a while, after what happened with the staircase incident.’

“He’s fearless to the point of shamelessness,” Nie Mingjue muttered. He didn’t trust Jin Guangyao, and didn’t really like him anymore either, but he was still more clear headed than his other-self. Xue Yang needed to be dealt with, but…

Using his mother’s position against him was in poor taste, to say the least.

That Jin Guangyao was still coming to help him even after that….

Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, narrowed his eyes. It was strange how much work Jin Guangyao was doing for Nie Mingjue. A wave of suspicion washed over the Nie heir.

Jin Guangyao waited at the edge of the field, while Nie Mingjue devoted his full attention to Nie Huaisang’s training. Exhaustion took over the young heir after just a few moves, and, upon seeing Jin Guangyao, his mind switched focus completely.

Excited for more gifts, he scurried over.

“Nie Huaisang, do you want this strike to land on your head?! Get back here!”

The words were the same, but the tone was so much harsher than he usually was — even compared to other times he’d trained Nie Huaisang.

It was hard to tell whether the cause of that was his anger at Jin Guangyao or the corruption filling his qi day by day.

“Brother, time is up! I’m going to rest!” Nie Huaisang responded easily.

“You’ve already rested. Keep on going until you learn it.”

Giddy with excitement, Nie Huaisang had a bounce in his step as he responded, “I won’t be able to learn it anyways. I’m done for the day! San-ge, show me what you brought!”

This behavior from Nie Huaisang was no different from normal. In fact, the watchers had seen him act almost exactly like this earlier in the segment. And yet, this time, Nie Mingjue snapped:

“Even a pig would have learned this by now! Why can’t you?!” he growled.

Nie Huaisang jumped at the words, practically doing a double take toward the simulated version of his brother. No matter how frustrated Nie Mingjue got with him, or how many times Nie Huaisang skipped training, Nie Mingjue had never said something even close to that.

And the real Nie Mingjue knew that just as well.

“I…” he began, then cut off, stunned. “I… that’s not what I-”

Shocked by the reaction, the simulated Nie Huaisang moved closer to Jin Guangyao — a sight which only made Nie Mingjue angrier.

“It’s been a whole year already, and you still haven’t learned this set! You stand on the field for just thirty minutes before complaining that you’re tired. You — you don’t have to excel, but like this you can’t even protect yourself! How did Qinghe produce such a good-for-nothing?! The both of you should be tied up and beaten once a day!” he spun towards his disciples. “Carry out all those things in his room!”

“What?!” Nie Huaisang stood up. “Da-ge, you can’t!”

Nie Mingjue could only gape speechlessly, not knowing what to say. These weren't from Jin Guangyao. It wasn't suspicion of Jin Guangyao causing this, it was a desire to hurt Huaisang. And sure, he'd made similar threats earlier in the simulation. This time, however, there was a look in his eyes that left no room for confusion.

A moment later, the disciples really did bring out the fans, porcelain, and paintings from his room, and Nie Huaisang panicked.

“Da-ge! You can’t burn them!” he protested.

“Da-ge, don’t act rashly,” Jin Guangyao advised.

Yet Nie Mingjue’s saber had already acted, and all the delicate objects in the center of the field erupted into flames.

“No!” Nie Huaisang shouted, running forward to them. Nie Mingjue reached out to try to stop him — forgetting, for a moment, that the flames wouldn’t hurt — and watched as his hand phased through his brother helplessly.

“Da-ge! Stop it!” Nie Huaisang protested.

But, in the simulation, these things had already happened. There was nothing the real Nie Mingjue could do.

And then, worst of all-

"Huaisang, be careful!" Jin Guangyao called out, pulling back the simulated Nie Huaisang, who had also been about to enter the blaze. Jin Guangyao had done that, not Nie Mingjue.

Instead, Nie Mingjue had been the one to set the fire.

He felt sick.

The antiques shattered, and the paintings crumbled before their eyes. Black ash took the place of the priceless pieces of art, and Jin Guangyao frowned at the smoke filling the air.

Nie Huaisang stared in wide-eyed shock. However, in comparison to his other-self, there was a different focus for that emotion. After all, this Nie Huaisang's pieces of art were still fine. That left him to be concerned over something else.

Like the fact that his Da-ge would never do something like this.

Nie Mingjue had always been worried about Nie Huaisang's ~~ability to protect himself~~ grades and had never had much interest in the things Nie Huaisang valued. However, he had also bought Nie Huaisang his first paintbrush, and had always (after a bit of complaining) caved in and bought Nie Huaisang every piece of art he wanted. Even when he got mad, there was never anything even resembling this.

In some ways, this slow poisoning of his mind seemed far worse than a simple death.

As Nie Huaisang thought that, the black smoke continued to rise.

Compared to most of the other watchers, Madam Yu's reaction was rather subdued. Somehow, under the surprise, was a level of normalcy that she couldn't quite explain.

No, that might not be true. It was more that she didn't want to acknowledge it. After all, what Nie Mingjue was doing right now was familiar territory to her. She loved her children more than anything in the world, but that didn't change the fact that she always disregarded Jiang Yanli's hobbies, filled Jiang Cheng's mind with self doubt and insecurity, and sowed discord whenever she stepped into the room.

(And she didn't have the excuse of an oncoming qi deviation to justify it.)

By now, the priceless pieces of art had become a pile of soot on the floor. Jin Guangyao turned around, pulling up Nie Huaisang's hands.

"Are they burnt?" he asked, calmly inspecting them.

What should have been Nie Mingjue's job — what*had always* been Nie Mingjue's job — was now being performed by a dirty, untrustworthy snake.

Nie Mingjue could not let this happen again. Whatever prize or reward it would take to motivate Wei Wuxian or the people in the future to look into this would be a cheap price to pay if it meant avoiding this for the rest of time.

“Please, go prepare some medicine,” Jin Guangyao requested next, speaking to the disciples. They left to do as requested immediately.

‘They had to be ordered to do that?! Really? Not a single one of them thought of it?’ Wen Qing scoffed, before amending, ‘I suppose Sect Leader Nie’s reaction must have surprised them just as much as it surprised Nie Huaisang.’

She sighed.

Meanwhile, the simulated Nie Huaisang was trembling. His eyes were wide as he stared at the charred remains, shock seemingly taking over. His hands shook slightly, and his heart beat wildly. The memories and feelings and years of work he had put into his collection had been burned away in an instant.

Because of his brother.

Slowly, Jin Guangyao put his arm around Nie Huaisang’s shoulders and whispered, “Huaisang, are you okay? You should stop watching. Go back to your room and get some rest.”

Nie Huaisang’s red eyes watered, but he still didn’t make a sound.

“It’s alright. I’ll buy you more, I promise-”

“I’ll burn everything you bring,” Nie Mingjue countered at once.

Nie Mingjue flinched at those words, stepping back and shaking slightly, just like his brother was.

Anger and hatred suddenly flashed across Nie Huaisang’s face.

“Fine! Fine, do whatever you want! Burn them!” he shouted.

“Huaisang!” Jin Guangyao stopped forward at once. “Your brother is still angry. Don’t-”

But Nie Huaisang wasn’t done: “Sabers, sabers, sabers! Who wants to practice that damn thing?! So what if I want to be a good for nothing?! Whoever wants to do that work can be Sect Leader if they care so much! I’m not learning it because I can’t learn it and ‘I don’t like it’ means I don’t like it! What’s the point in forcing me?!”

He kicked his saber to the side and ran away, ignoring Jin Guangyao’s shouts at him to stop.

Meanwhile, Nie Mingjue stood frozen in place, staring blankly at the area before him.

A broken laugh left him and he whispered. “I’m going crazy.”

Lan Xichen turned to him immediately, wanting to protest that, but fumbled when it came to something to actually say.

“...You knew this was a possibility, didn’t you?” Lan Wangji asked. “We will take more precautions against your incoming qi deviation in our world.”

But those words did little to shake Sect Leader Nie.

‘I pushed Jin Guangyao down the same stairs as…’ he trailed off, but his gaze traveled toward Jin Guangshan regardless. ‘I called him the son of a prostitute, I burned Huaisang’s fans…’

“...Do you think the mistakes you’ve heard in the Purification Tone were intentionally put there by Jin Guangyao?” Madam Yu asked, directing her question at Lan Qiren. “I certainly wouldn’t put that above him.”

“...It’s possible,” he admitted at last. “Even still, Sect Leader Nie is being corrupted at a shockingly fast rate. Misplaying just a few notes in the song shouldn’t be enough to cause such a strong reaction.”

“Doesn’t matter,” Nie Huaisang pouted, grumpily moving closer to his brother again. “We don’t know for sure whether Jin Guangyao was involved in Da-ge’s death, but he’s keeping his head! Da-ge’s body was severed instead of being put to rest! He has a lot more to explain than just Da-ge's death.”

There was a bit of silence afterwards, no one quite sure if the wrong word would make Nie Huaisang burst into tears. Nie Mingjue looked around somewhat awkwardly, before finally making eye contact with Wen Qing.

She gestured toward Huaisang, raising an eyebrow.

Feeling strangely scolded, Nie Mingjue stepped closer and whispered, “I’m-I’m sorry about what happened to… what I did to your fans.”

There was a slapping sound as Wen Qing facepalmed and groaned.

“I’m not upset about the fans right now Da-ge!” Nie Huaisang shouted back.

Seeing that the simulated Nie Huaisang was refusing to listen to him, Jin Guangyao began to follow after. Just as he stepped forward, though, another voice spoke up:

“Stop!”

The command was clear.

Jin Guangyao came to a halt, turning back to look at Nie Mingjue.

“You still dare to come?” he demanded.

With downcast eyes and a low voice, Jin Guangyao softly responded, "I came to acknowledge my mistake."

"Have you?" Jiang Cheng scoffed, making Jin Zixuan breathe out a short sigh.

'Lanling Jin was indeed the Sect with the thickest face,' Lan Sizhui had read out to them, once upon a time. 'Although, in Koi Tower, it promised all the Sects that Xue Yang would be executed, when it left Nie Mingjue's sight, it immediately changed Xue Yang's death sentence to a life imprisonment. Hearing about Lanling's decision, Nie Mingjue was enraged and pressured them again. The Lanling Sect rambled about, refusing to give him Xue Yang no matter how hard he tried. All the other sects watched from the sidelines, but, shortly afterward, Nie Mingjue passed away from qi deviation.'

And then Xue Yang had gone on to-

Yes, Nie Mingjue was quite clearly feeling the effects of his oncoming qi deviation, but that didn't mean Jin Guangyao was innocent either.

(And the same was especially true of Jin Zixuan's father, who was sitting, perfectly content, to Zixuan's right.)

Meanwhile, as Jin Guangyao faced Nie Mingjue, clearly proclaiming his remorse, the blue illusionary Wei Wuxian gave an impressed whistle.

'He's got an even thicker face than me,' he thought.

Meanwhile, Nie Mingjue just scoffed: "Have you ever acknowledged your mistakes?"

'Not at all,' Madam Jin thought, spitefully, before, 'Not that I have much room to talk.'

"Sect Leader! Lianfang-zun!" a voice called out from the side, saving Jin Guangyao from having to reply. "Young Master has locked the door to his room and won't let anyone inside."

Nie Mingjue raised an eyebrow at his brother, who gave an unrepentant shrug. If he hadn't known about Nie Mingjue's incoming qi deviation, he would have been just as mad about the destruction of his prized possessions.

Just as angry as before, the resentment practically bubbling under his skin, Nie Mingjue growled, "Let's see how long he can lock himself up for. How dare he defy me?!"

Nie Huaisang now looked even more unrepentant than before.

Jin Guangyao, on the other hand, spoke with a kind expression: "Thank you. Please give me the medicine. I'll take it to him later."

The bottle was handed over, and the disciple hurried out, not wanting to be caught between the pair of notable figures any longer.

"Just what are you here for?" Nie Mingjue asked at last.

Jin Guangyao looked surprised: "Da-ge, have you forgotten? I'm supposed to play guqin for you today."

But Nie Mingjue didn't hesitate at all.

"There's no room for discussion regarding Xue Yang," he declared. "Stop trying to flatter me. It won't work."

Not for the first time, a memory took over Nie Mingjue's mind. A-Qing — that strong, confident, clever, irreplaceable girl — screaming in agony as she was blinded in both eyes.

If Nie Mingjue hadn't died, how much longer would she have been able to live?

However-

"I'm not trying to flatter you," Jin Guangyao disagreed. "Secondly, if it's not working, then why would you care whether I'm trying to flatter you or not?"

Nie Mingjue fell silent.

"He has a point too," Lan Qiren said. "We can all see how badly the corruption is affecting you."

Nie Mingjue had no response.

"Da-ge, these days you've become stricter and stricter with Huaisang," Jin Guangyao continued. "Is the saber spirit… does Huaisang still not know about the saber spirit?"

"Why would I tell him so soon?"

"And how, exactly, does keeping it secret help?" Wen Qing snapped, glaring at Nie Mingjue with all the intensity of a mother bear. From the sidelines, Nie Huaisang enthusiastically cheered her on.

Nie Mingjue just sighed, annoyed, once again, that the simulation had decided to broadcast that little tidbit regarding the Nie Sect's cultivation style.

And, at nearly the same time, the simulated Jin Guangyao sighed as well: "Huaisang is used to being spoiled, but he can't be Qinghe's idle second young master his whole life. One day he'll realize that you're doing this for him, Da-ge. Just like I realized you're doing this for me."

Upon hearing that, the watching Wei Wuxian laughed.

'Bravo, bravo,' he thought. 'I'm not able to say such words even through two lifetimes, and yet Jin Guangyao can adjust his tone so that it doesn't sound strange at all. It even sounds slightly pleasant.'

But that wasn't enough to sway Nie Mingjue.

"If you really do understand, then come see me with Xue Yang's head in your hands," he instructed before turning away dismissively, fully prepared for the excuse that would follow. Except-

"Yes," Jin Guangyao said at once.

Nie Mingjue paused, then looked toward him again.

"Yes, Da-ge. If you give me one last chance, then, in two month's time, I'll come see you with Xue Yang's head in my hands!"

Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow, unsure of what Jin Guangyao thought he was accomplishing with this. Did he actually mean it? Was Xue Yang's survival a mistake on his part?

Or-

"And what if you fail?" Nie Mingjue wondered.

"If I fail then, Da-ge, you can do whatever you want to me."

'Wow, I'm actually pretty impressed,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Even though Jin Guangyao was always scared of Nie Mingjue, he could still use a myriad of verbal techniques to manipulate Nie Mingjue into giving him another chance. I wasn't expecting that.'

Lan Xichen flinched slightly, fully aware of his own involvement in the mess.

The sky darkened and the sun vanished from the sky. The notes of the Purification Tone began to echo throughout the city.

🎵♪♪🎵♪♭

All three Lans flinched once again.

Nie Mingjue, meanwhile, let out a breath of air. He didn't like this. Even without undergoing these events personally, the things Jin Guangyao had done made it impossible for Nie Mingjue to feel comfortable around him. That said…

The rage that had been apparent in the simulated Nie Huaisang's expression was seared into his mind, and the way everyone except Nie Mingjue had gone to help him afterward stood out just as prominently. As the simulation had said, he had cultivated faster than all his ancestors, so he was falling faster than them too.

He wasn't thinking clearly anymore. If Jin Guangyao could help him with that, then Nie Mingjue wouldn't refuse.

(The one reassurance he had was that his other self was at least not so far-gone as to reject the help Jin Guangyao was offering. If he wanted even the slightest chance of becoming better again, the Purification Tone was a must.)

(Even if, apparently, it hadn't been enough.)

“Da-ge.”

Nie Mingjue glanced over, and saw Lan Xichen staring at the simulation with a stern expression. Every time the wrong note was played, the frown on his face became just a touch more stern.

“The Cloud Recesses hasn’t been destroyed by the war in our time,” Lan Xichen said. “I won’t be as busy. This time, I’ll make sure to be the one playing for you.”

Nie Mingjue’s eyes widened in surprise, and, upon feeling the watchful eyes of Wen Qing, made sure to nod.

“...Thank you,” he muttered back. Lan Xichen smiled in turn.

“One day, the Qinghe Nie Sect was holding a martial arts competition!” Ouyang Zizhen announced, with a level of enthusiasm that would be more understandable if he was seven instead of seventeen.

“I’m so jealous. The Nie Sect always holds the best conferences.”

“This is still in Chifeng-zun’s time, you idiot,” Jin Ling whispered back. “Stop bouncing! If Sect Leader Nie’s not in charge, then the usual tea ceremony and fan-painting events aren’t going to be included.”

“I guess-”

“Tea ceremony?”

“Fan painting?”

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan both gaped, expressing their disbelief. That wasn’t really a martial arts competition then, was it?

(Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, seemed delighted by the prospect. His position as Sect heir should be more than enough to empower him to create a similar tradition in his own world, so long as his brother didn’t object. Wonderful; something to look forward to for when they left.)

Regardless of Ouyang Zizhen’s newfound disappointment, the simulation marched on. Nie Mingjue was walking through the grounds of the competition, personally ensuring that everything was as it should be. Despite the growing levels of instability the watchers could feel in his qi, everyone he passed bowed to him with the utmost respect. He walked to a quieter part of the grounds, seeking to check out something just beyond. A soft voice whispered something.

And Lan Xichen’s voice responded.

“Da-ge chose to make the oath with you. He must approve of you,” the first jade of Lan said.

Dejected, Jin Guangyao softly responded, "But, Er-ge, didn't you hear what he insisted be said in the oath? 'Face a thousand accusing fingers,' be 'torn limb from limb?' That was clearly a warning for me! I-I've never heard such an oath before!"

There was a beat of silence from the watchers, no one able to dispute that, before Nie Huaisang very quietly said, "Just a thought, but… maybe becoming sworn brothers with someone you don't trust wasn't the best idea you've ever had, Da-ge."

Nie Mingjue groaned, rubbing the spot between his eyes tiredly.

However, the simulated Lan Xichen responded, "He said, 'if one were to think otherwise.' Do you think otherwise, A-Yao? If not, then why are you worrying over it so much?"

"I don't, but Da-ge has already decided I do! What can I do against that?"

'Poisonous snake,' Nie Mingjue frowned. 'This is different from when you said Jin Guangshan wouldn't give you a fair trial. I would believe you if you would just… if you would…'

Nie Mingjue trailed off in his head, unsure of how to finish that.

"Da-ge has always cherished your talent," Lan Xichen softly pointed out. "He's hoping you will choose the right path."

Jin Guangyao seemed to shake his head: "It's not that I don't know what's right and what's wrong, it's just that sometimes I can't do anything about it. Nowadays, I have it bad no matter which side I'm on! I have to be on everyone's good side. I wouldn't care if it was someone else, but have I mistreated Da-ge in any way?"

"Yes!" Nie Huaisang said quite firmly, and even Lan Xichen had to tilt his head slightly in acknowledgement. It might not fully register to Jin Guangyao, but lying to escape punishment — breaking Nie Mingjue's trust in the process — was more than enough to be considered mistreatment, and that was without what had happened in Nightless City and with Xue Yang.

Jin Guangyao wasn't entirely wrong and the simulated Nie Mingjue wasn't entirely right, but pretending nothing had happened between them was a fallacy of the highest proportions.

"Always 'no choice,' huh?" Wen Ruohan muttered quietly.

"Er-ge, you heard it as well," Jin Guangyao muttered, voice trembling. "What did he call me?"

Lan Xichen sighed: "His anger was simply too great for him to think before he spoke. Da-ge's temper now is incomparable to how it was in the past. You must not provoke him again."

Lan Xichen frowned slightly at his other self. At this point… it really seemed like the best thing to do was to keep Jin Guangyao and Nie Mingjue from having to interact with each other. He understood what his other self was trying to do, but…

“Zewu-jun,” a soft voice came from his right.

Lan Xichen looked over, and saw Jiang Yanli moving closer to him, a kind smile on her face.

“I… you don’t have to be so hard on yourself. I think the fact that you’re trying to make things better is admirable,” she said. “You try to explain Jin Guangyao’s actions to Sect Leader Nie, and Sect Leader Nie’s actions to Jin Guangyao. Compared to just… staying on the sidelines while things get progressively worse, what you’re doing is much more admirable.”

Lan Xichen’s eyes softened in understanding, and he whispered, “Jiang-guniang, you’re not responsible for fixing your parents’ relationship. You did as well as you could.”

(After all, Lan Xichen didn’t have much room to speak in regards to his own family.)

“Still,” Jiang Yanli said, shifting awkwardly. “I… I think, with the information you had at the time, you chose as well as you could., too.”

“Thank you,” Lan Xichen said at last, and his smile became a touch more genuine.

Meanwhile, Lan Xichen’s other self had continued speaking: “These past few days, Da-ge has been deeply troubled by the saber spirit, and he’s had an argument with Huaisang again. They still haven’t made up.”

At those words, Jin Guangyao practically began sobbing: “If he says such a thing while blind with rage, then isn’t that just how he thinks of me on a daily basis?! Is it that because I couldn’t choose my background, and my mother couldn’t choose her fate, I’ll have to be humiliated by others for the rest of my life?! If so, then how is Da-ge any different from the people who look down on me? No matter what I do, to them I’ll always be ‘just the son of a prostitute!’”

Nie Mingjue looked away, wishing, once again, that he hadn’t said that.

Wei Wuxian, meanwhile, was even more impressed.

‘Last night he was acting all friendly and innocent with Nie Mingjue, playing him the guqin. The complaints he’s giving to Lan Xichen now couldn’t be read at all in his expression.’

Jin Guanyao’s face turned sour: “Da-ge, he… he-”

A kick slammed open the door, shattering it against the wall, and Nie Mingjue stormed inside.

“You! How dare you?!”

Jin Guangyao panicked and darted behind Lan Xichen, who opened his mouth to speak. Before he could, however, Nie Mingjue unsheathed his saber and attacked. Blocking the weapon with his own sword, Zewu-jun could only glance behind himself at Jin Guangyao momentarily.

"Run!" he shouted.

Jin Guangyao dashed out the door.

"Get out of my way!" Nie Mingjue ordered, chasing Jin Guangyao outside.

The real Lan Xichen did a double take: "Wait, is that-"

He cut himself off.

"What?" Jin Zixuan asked. "But that's-"

Although he had left fleeing, Jin Guangyao was walking back toward the simulated Nie Mingjue at a leisurely pace. Nie Mingjue slashed his saber, cutting the man in two and sending the blood splattering against the wall.

Jin Zixuan looked away but didn't object. Putting aside whether or not Jin Guangyao truly deserved this for a moment (which he very well might), as he was now, Nie Mingjue's wasn't even capable of properly judging.

Nie Mingjue's anger hadn't depleted at all. He rushed forward again toward the square. However, even in comparison to when he fought after being in Wen Ruohan's torture chamber, he seemed unsteady. Tripping, stumbling, looking this way and that. His breathing was coming out far too fast to be normal.

Nie Huaisang moved closer to his brother at once, and Wen Qing and Lan Xichen both frowned deeply.

'He really is on the verge of a qi deviation, huh?'

Despite the unusual lack of balance, Nie Mingjue did make it out onto the square. And there was--

Jin Guangyao!

Jin Guangyao!

Jin Guangyao!

Every face he could see was Jin Guangyao.

Jin Zixuan's eyes widened and Jiang Yanli gasped, "Wait, so it wasn't him that was cut down just now? Then who…"

Nie Mingjue gritted his teeth, fighting the urge to turn away. His other-self had well and truly gone insane. The Purification Tone hadn't managed to stop it, and even Nie Huaisang's anger hadn't been enough to snap him out of it.

The resentment he could feel within his others-self was boiling over now; it had won.

Nie Mingjue was experiencing a qi deviation.

And, as with everyone who succumbs to such a force, reason and logic could no longer be effective. He lifted the blade up, saw every Jin Guangyao turn to look at him, then swung down.

Blood covered the courtyard.

Jiang Yanli turned away.

Screams echoed throughout the city, but no one could stop Nie Mingjue's rampage. Lan Xichen, the only one who possibly could, wasn't aware that Nie Mingjue was undergoing a qi deviation, and would be far more concerned with looking for the real Jin Guangyao.

Which meant there was nothing to stop Nie Mingjue from mowing through the surrounding crowd of 'Jin Guangyao's like a soaring hawk cutting through air. Head after head came off, and the central grounds were soon covered in red.

"Guqin music?" Lan Wangji realized.

♪♫♪♫♪♭♪

The second jade's brows furrowed at the additional mistake, and he concluded, "Jin Guangyao must be playing from a spot Chifeng-zun can't see."

The watchers all looked around, but couldn't figure out where the music was coming from. They had to agree.

Nie Huaisang frowned: 'Jin Guangyao… is he really trying to help Da-ge? Then why cut apart his body?'

It didn't matter for the time being. The simulated Nie Mingjue's mind was now so clouded, he didn't even think to look for the source of the sound. Instead, he was preoccupied with cutting down each and every 'Jin Guangyao' he could see.

♫♪♪♫♪♫♪♭♫♪♭

A growl came out of the simulated Sect Leader Nie, and he grabbed his own head as if in pain. When he opened his eyes again, blood began to drip out.

After a shout of rage, he turned and decapitated down the next Jin Guangyao.

The real Nie Mingjue let out a breath of air, rubbing his own temples as well. It was difficult to watch this, and the supposedly-calming music didn't seem to be working on even the real Sect Leader Nie. Nie Mingjue supposed that, unlike Wei Wuxian's cultivation, which was aimed at spirits, the Purification Tone was currently meant to affect just his other self, so it made sense for him to not feel anything.

Then-

"Da-ge!" someone shouted.

Nie Mingjue's eyes widened at once.

"No, no-" he whispered, standing up. "Huaisang, get out of there!"

And yet, that voice seemed to calm the simulated Nie Mingjue for a moment. He shivered, then slowly turned around. Among the sea of Jin Guangyaos, there was one face that was different.

It was Huaisang's.

The real Nie Huaisang, staring at the simulation before him, felt his eyes water. A small bit of hope was beginning to settle in.

If Nie Mingjue could recognize him, if Huaisang could snap his brother out of this, then maybe-

Maybe there was something….

Maybe the corpse wasn't….

The simulated Nie Huaisang stumbled forward. Seeing that Nie Mingjue had stopped moving, Nie Huaisang beamed, tears still in his eyes.

"Da-ge! Da-ge, put down your saber! It's me!"

But, before Nie Huaisang could approach him, Nie Mingjue fell over.

"Da-ge!" both Nie Huaisangs shouted, running toward the collapsed Sect Leader.

At that moment, Nie Mingjue's eyes cleared up, and he finally saw the real Jin Guangyao. The man stood at the end of the corridor, not a trace of blood on him, and held a guqin aloft. Tears were streaming down his eyes.

'The Sparks Amidst Snow on his chest almost seems to be smiling for him,' Wei Wuxian thought.

Jin Zixuan hated the implications, but couldn't disagree. The Lans said he'd been playing wrong this whole time. It could be a mistake — it might have been an honest error — but, after everything they had seen from him, that was hard to believe.

(And either way, not a single person watching could doubt that Nie Mingjue's death would make Jin Guangyao at least a little pleased.)

"I'm sorry Da-ge!" the simulated Huaisang wailed, grabbing his brother's arm. "I won't make you mad anymore! I'm sorry! I'm sorry!"

But, no matter how much he pleaded, it didn't change the fact that Nie Mingjue's vision was growing darker and darker at every second.

"Da-ge!" Nie Huaisang shouted. "Da-ge!"

Everything became black.

And Nie Huaisang felt that last bit of hope inside him vanish.

"...ei Yi…"

The words were muddled, quiet, and impossible to make out. The blue illusion of Wei Wuxian looked around, wondering where they were coming from.

"...ei… ng!"

They were a bit clearer that time; desperate, too.

"Wei Ying!"

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened.

With a snap, he forcefully pushed himself out of the empathy he had been in, returning to his paperman form. The sealed head of Nie Mingjue was before him, eyes still bloodshot and open in anger.

'I'm running out of time! I need to get back to my body!' he realized.

In a different room of Koi Tower, the simulated Lan Wangji stared down at Wei Wuxian, worry clear even to those who had never been able to read Hanguang-jun's face.

Lan Wangji sucked in a breath of air, the tension in his body rising.

The paperman Wei Wuxian flapped his sleeves as though he was a butterfly, slipping out from behind the curtain. However, as he did, he noticed something in the corner of the room.

Jin Guangyao stood there, smiling, and unsheathed his sword.

Jiang Cheng stood up, shouting, "No, no, no-"

Instead of scolding him for the lack of composure, Madam Yu now seemed to contain the same degree of worry.

The paperman Wei Wuxian darted to and fro, dodging each attack by a hair's breadth. The tip of the sword nearly sliced him several times. If this continued, he'd end up dead for sure.

‘This was a technique called paper metamorphosis,’ Ouyang Zizhen had explained. ‘Although it was quite useful, there were also many restrictions. There was a strict time limit, and, if even the slightest scratch ended up on the paperman, the soul would receive a similar degree of harm.’

Jiang Yanli laced and unlaced her fingers with each other, having nowhere else to put the growing nervousness filling her body.

At that moment, however, the paperman of Wei Wuxian seemed to notice something to the side. There was a sword being kept there, held aloft like a trophy of war.

‘That’s Suibian!’ he realized.

“Suibian?!” Jiang Cheng gaped. “But why would the Jin… Lan-er-gongzi and I gave it back to….”

It was a little easy to forget, after having followed Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji so long, that his martial brother was still technically public enemy number one.

In this case, however, that turned out to be quite a blessing. The paperman flew forward, practically throwing itself onto Suibian’s sheath. At that moment, receiving the command, the blade sprung out and began to battle with Jin Guangyao’s sword.

Shock flashed across the chief cultivator’s face.

However, the new Sect Leader Jin managed to regain composure mere moments later, continuing his fight with the paperman-controlled Suibian instead. Jin Guangyao’s Hensheng wrapped around Suibian, its strange flexibility causing many unexpected results. The two swords began to battle in the air, leaving Jin Guangyao open to try to grab at the paperman Wei Wuxian directly. His grasp was dodged quite a few times, the paperman’s movements too unpredictable to assume, but a talisman flung by Jin Guangyao’s other hand suddenly burst into flame around Wei Wuxian.

‘The soul will receive a similar degree of harm,’ Jiang Yanli recalled, watching the surroundings become ablaze with light. ‘A similar degree of… of-’

Luckily, equally aware of that, Wei Wuxian acted fast. He maneuvered Suibian — who was still mid-battle with Hensheng — in front of Jin Guangyao. The light of the fire became a blinding beam directed at Jin Guangyao’s line of sight, allowing Wei Wuxian to flutter out of the room momentarily unimpeded.

‘Time’s almost out!’ Wei Wuxian thought nervously, not even bothering to hide his paper form as he flapped back to Lan Wangji at top speed. In any other case, the desperate swimming of the paperman through the air could have appeared comical.

Now, all the watchers were too tense to find any amusement.

By chance, at that moment, the door he was flying towards flew open. Lan Wangji, growing nervous, had wanted to take a look around. Wei Wuxian took that opportunity to throw himself onto Lan Wangji's face.

Hanguang-jun froze.

That was just the sort of reunion Nie Huaisang had been hoping the two would have. Filled with trust, and a feeling that there was no greater reassurance than being with the other.

However, with his brother's death fresh on his mind, there was little room for him to feel happy about this.

The paperman covered Lan Wangji's eyes, shivering and trembling as it did. After a few moments of that, Hanguang-jun gingerly reached to pick it up and set it on Mo Xuanyu's unconscious body.

A short while later, the body's eyes trembled, and Wei Wuxian awoke with a gasp.

Relief filled Jiang Yanli's body, and she collapsed back into her chair in an unusually undignified manner.

"A-Li?" Jin Zixuan whispered in concern, unsure of what to do.

Blushing, Jiang Yanli sat back up, sending her fiance a hesitant smile. Now that Wei Wuxian was awake (in a human body) again, his chances of success seemed much, much better than before.

Blinking a few times to adjust to the light, Wei Wuxian pushed himself up. However, as soon as he did, dizziness seemed to overtake him and he stumbled into Lan Wangji.

(Who, of course, caught him at once.)

Wei Wuxian tried to pick himself up once more, only to collide the top of his head with Lan Wangji's chin. They both jumped at the sudden pain, and Wei Wuxian immediately began to rub both the top of his head and Lan Wangji's chin with a hand.

"Ah! I'm sorry, Lan Zhan! Are you alright?"

Jin Guangyao was still an issue. They needed to figure out what had happened to divide Nie Mingjue's body like that, discover why Jin Guangyao had his head, and hopefully rescue Qin Su. However, as he watched the interactions of the two before him, the real Nie Mingjue couldn't help but forget those concerns for a moment.

He and Wen Qing both gave ~~infuriatingly fond~~ sighs and shook their heads.

(At least not everything to come out of the simulation was bad.)

However-

"We need to go!" Wei Wuxian suddenly declared, grabbing onto Lan Wangji's hand and pulling him up. Hanguang-jun didn't resist at all, keying into Wei Wuxian's desperation and standing as well.

"Where to?" was all he asked.

"The Fragrant Palace! The bronze mirror there is the entrance to a secret room! His wife found out some secret of his and he dragged her inside, and she should be there right now! Chifeng-zun's head is there as well!"

While most of the watchers tensed up at the mention of Nie Mingjue's head, Madam Jin found herself far more concerned with the first thing Wei Wuxian had brought up. It wasn't as though she was completely indifferent to Nie Mingjue's plight. He had shown himself to be a righteous man — something that became especially obvious when Madam Jin compared his reaction to Xue Yang with her husband's — and her own son was getting along with Nie Huaisang quite well now, linking them further. It was just….

Compared to someone who was already dead, the still alive Qin Su weighed on her much more heavily. Jin Guangyao had been rumored to be faithful, devoted, and ever-loving towards his wife. Madam Jin had thought that, even if Qin Su wasn't Jiang Yanli, she had still managed to surpass Madam Jin as her successor in a way that definitely mattered. She wasn't being constantly cheated on by her husband; she was truly and genuinely loved.

But the Jin Guangyao they had seen interact with her before Wei Wuxian was pulled into empathy was not someone she could trust.

'I had thought that this era would be the end of women getting played with and thrown about by the Jin Clan's Sect Leader. Even if that turns out to not be true… maybe we can at least prevent her from dealing with the consequences.'

Otherwise, throughout the entirety of her other self's life, Madam Jin wouldn't have accomplished anything.

While Madam Jin's thoughts had been caught up in that, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had shot towards the palace, sweeping by everyone in their way. However, realizing that they couldn't stop this pair, the guards followed their training and shouted as loud as they could, attracting the attention of both Jin Guangyao and the myriad of important guests at Koi Tower that day.

The first person attracted by the noise appeared, his sword already unsheathed.

""A-Ling?!"" both Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan jumped, not having expected to see him. They both frowned slightly shortly after, wishing their son wouldn't need to see his beloved uncle's lies destroyed first-hand.

"Why are you here?" their son demanded, unsure of what to make of the situation. "Wait, that's my uncle's bedchamber! Have you come to the wrong place? No, you're intruders, aren't you?! What do you want?"

While Jin Ling had been speaking, many other guests had journeyed over as well.

"What happened?" one asked.

Another poked his head in hesitantly: "Why is there so much noise here?"

"This is the Fragrance Palace. Isn't it a bit… unsuitable for us to be-"

"But I heard sounds of alarms."

"Another giant spectacle," Madam Jin cursed, rubbing at her brows tiredly.

However, no sound came from within the palace. Wei Wuxian knocked on the doors.

"Sect Leader Jin? Madam Jin?"

Jin Ling glared and shouted, "Just what do you want?! Everyone's assembled here because of you! This is my uncle's bedchamber. His bedchamber — do you understand?! Haven't I told you not to make a mess?!"e

"Oh, of course," Jin Guangshan muttered. "He's still in Mo Xuanyu's body. In the eyes of everyone else-"

"Just be quiet, Guangshan!" Madam Jin hissed, quite effectively silencing her husband.

At that moment, however, Lan Xichen arrived, and the crowd fell silent. Zewu-jun and Hanguang-jun made eye contact, an entire conversation passing between them. Lan Xichen hesitated, before his expression became more complex, disbelief and concern warring within him.

Suddenly, a cheerful voice asked, "What's wrong? Was the reception during the day not good enough, so now everyone wants to host an additional banquet at my place?"

Jin Guangyao calmly walked out of the crowd.

Jiang Yanli shivered slightly. He seemed perfectly pleasant and kind, but his demeanor hadn't changed at all even while he was dragging the struggling Qin Su into the secret room.

Like with Hanguang-jun versus Lan Wangji, the older version of Jin Guangyao was even better at hiding his emotions than his younger self was.

However, Wei Wuxian didn't hesitate at all, clasping his hands together and beaming, "Lianfang-zun, what good timing! If you hadn't come, we wouldn't have been able to see what's inside the secret room of the Fragrant Palace."

"He's just coming right out and saying it?!" Jiang Cheng gaped. However, he didn't otherwise protest. Throughout the simulation, Wei Wuxian had maintained a fairly good track record when it came to getting results through shameless things like this.

"Secret room?" Jin Guangyao asked. "Why? Are secret rooms now a rarity? Any sect with a couple of scarcely used treasures would have a secret room, right?"

Lan Wangji opened his mouth to speak, but, before he could, Lan Xichen stepped in and asked, "A-Yao, would it be possible for you to let us in to take a look at your treasure room?"

Jin Guangyao turned to look at him.

"Well done, Xichen," Lan Qiren said quietly. He had faith his nephew wouldn't allow his personal feelings to cloud the investigation, but getting that confirmed was nice as well. Although the simulated version probably should have given more thought to Nie Mingjue's concerns, he was at least listening to Wangji's.

(And in all honesty, when up against someone who was as good of an actor as Jin Guangyao, there was only so much you could expect.)

Jin Guangyao shifted uncomfortably, protesting, "Er-ge, since it's a treasure room, there are a few things inside that aren't meant to be seen by the outside. And you want me to open it all of the sudden…."

Watching Jin Guangyao give his explanation, Wei Wuxian's thoughts turned instead toward the secret room: 'It's impossible for Jin Guangyao to have teleported or otherwise moved Qin Su outside the room in such a short amount of time. She must still be in there.'

Madam Jin and Madam Yu both nodded in agreement.

'Wei Wuxian,' Madam Yu thought sternly. 'You better save her.'

"Er-ge, showing it to you would be one thing, but I don't think it's appropriate to display it to everyone."

"Still, I must insist."

"It's also quite inappropriate for me to bring any women I'm not married to inside. To ask such a thing…."

"I hope you'll excuse our rudeness then."

With every excuse Jin Guangyao gave, Lan Xichen simply became more determined.

Without saying a word, Nie Huaisang turned his eyes on his other self, who was watching the interaction with what seemed to be a growing level of confusion.

He hummed to himself thoughtfully, then turned back to the speakers.

Finally, it seemed like Lan Xichen became truly set in his decision.

"Open it," he ordered.

Jin Guangyao stared intently for a moment, then smiled: "Since Er-ge is so intent on seeing it opened, I suppose I have to open it for everyone to see, don't I?"

He opened the door with a wave of his hand and began to walk inside.

"Ha!" someone scoffed from the background. "People say that Gusu Lan values conduct and courtesy more than anyone else. I guess those rumors are just rumors after all. Barging into the bedchamber of a Sect Leader is good conduct, indeed."

Even though he heard every word, Lan Qiren didn't so much as flinch. Instead, his thoughts turned back to the past — to what would have happened in their world by now if it weren't for the simulation.

Wei Wuxian would get in trouble constantly. He would speak back and mock and tease. But, when it came down to it, he was as righteous as even the best Lans, doing what he could to help time and time again.

The simulated Lan Xichen was putting what was right over what seemed socially acceptable; he and Wangji had learned the values of Gusu Lan far better then Lan Qiren ever had.

However, not everyone was as dismissive of the words as Lan Qiren was. Wei Wuxian glanced back at the speaker for a few moments before his eyes lit up in recognition.

'He came in shortly after we did. Didn't the people who greeted him call him Sect Leader Su?'

The watchers did a double take. They recognized him from more than what Wei Wuxian had just said.

"...Wasn't he a member of the Lan Sect?" Jiang Cheng asked. "Yeah, isn't he the one who lost his sword in the abyss incident, which meant Wei Wuxian had to save him?"

Frowning in thought, Jin Guangshan added on, "And he shot Wei Wuxian in the Xuanwu Cave, didn't he?"

"He's also the one who sold out the Cloud Recesses to us," Wen Ruohan pointed out, enjoying the rage that briefly flashed across Lan Qiren's face.

As a Sect Leader, Su She wore all white, looking handsome and a touch arrogant as well.

'Although his features could be described as fair, he isn't anything special,' Wei Wuxian decided.

It would be quite strange for dismissive words like that to make Lan Wangji happy. In fact, it would be rather rude for him to gain pleasure from such a blatant disregard of someone else. Therefore, he wasn't happy.

Not at all.

"Forget it, forget it," Jin Guangyao shook his head. "It's not as though there's anything disreputable in here."

He stepped inside, still seeming quite calm (even with a minor air of awkwardness now around him). Jin Ling stomped in after, glaring at Wei Wuxian on the way for causing all of this.

"You would like to look at the treasure room, right?" Jin Guangyao confirmed. At their nods, he entered. Everyone piled in shortly after.

The room looked unchanged. There was a curtain covered in symbols hanging over the cabinet, and an iron table in the center. In addition, there was Qin Su, standing with her back to them.

Madam Jin relaxed, breathing out a sigh of relief, and Jiang Yanli gave a warm smile.

Lan Xichen appeared somewhat stunned, asking, "Why is Madam Jin here?"

"All of our possessions are shared," Jin Guangyao responded. "A-Su often comes here to look around as well."

'Liar, liar, liar,' Wen Qing thought, before sighing to herself over how redundant idea was.

'He didn't move her?' Wei Wuxian wondered, inspecting the scene a few times over. 'Isn't he scared she'll say something?'

An ominous feeling began to run down the watchers' spines.

Wen Ruohan was a little impressed with Jin Guangyao's daring.

Wei Wuxian moved closer to her face and watched as she continued to breathe. Her expression was blank, but….

'I don't think she's undergone an enchantment or poison,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'As far as I can tell, she seems perfectly conscious.'

"Then… why isn't she running?" Jin Zixuan had to ask, turning to his mother for answers. She, however, remained stern-faced and silent.

They had more watching to do.

Growing concerned, Wei Wuxian walked back over to the cabinet and lifted the curtain. The head, which had been behind it just a few moments ago, was now gone. In its place, a lone dagger rested.

Nie Huaisang's expression darkened considerably.

(Unbeknownst to him, so did Wen Ruohan's.)

Lan Xichen had been staring at the curtain as well, a foreboding expression on his face. Upon seeing that it wasn't what he was expecting, relief took over.

"What is this?" he asked, gesturing toward the weapon.

"This is something rather rare," Jin Guangyao declared, picking the dagger up. "It was the weapon of an assassin, killing countless people during its use. If you look at the blade of the dagger, you won't see your reflection — you'll see the reflection of someone else.

Sometimes it's a man, sometimes a woman, and sometimes an elder. Every one of these reflections is a spirit who died at this blade. Due to its strong energy, I decided to seal it behind this curtain."

"Then… that means-"

"That's right," Jin Guangyao nodded. "This dagger once belonged to Wen Ruohan."

Everyone's gaze turned towards him, but the Chief Cultivator remained focused on the one who had spoken.

'Yes, he played me quite well, didn't he?' Wen Ruohan thought. 'I won't deny that I made many enemies who wouldn't hesitate to attack, but… to think that this person, who I helped in a way no one else had, would act like this.'

If it had been for Lan Xichen, then it would have at least been somewhat understandable. Loyalty begets loyalty, and favors are returned. But Meng Yao had been motivated most strongly by Jin Guangshan — someone who would abandon him without a second thought.

~~Just like with Wei Wuxian and the Jiangs.~~

Once again, there was only one thing Wen Ruohan could think.

'Truly… such a waste.'

'Everything looks perfectly normal,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'I guess part of the reason he prepared so many other treasures in this room was in case of an event like this.'

Lan Xichen suppressed a slight shiver.

'He really is thoughtful,' the Lan heir thought. 'With how violent and unreasonable Da-ge must have seemed by comparison, I suppose it's no wonder my other self made the choice he did. I will need to be careful going forward.

"Wait," Madam Jin suddenly spoke up. "What is she doing?"

While most of the watchers had been focused on Jin Guangyao, Madam Jin had been watching Qin Su. The new Madam Jin was still standing, just as blank faced as before, but her hands were beginning to twitch.

Jin Guangyao twirled the dagger in his hand demonstratively one more time, even flipping it in the air-

Qin Su snatched it away.

"Qin-guniang!" Jiang Yanli gasped, staring at her with worried eyes. "W-what is she…."

There was a complicated expression on her face. Pain, anger, humiliation….

"A-Su?" Jin Guangyao asked, suddenly seeming concerned.

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji both ran towards her, trying to grab the dagger. Before they could, she stabbed herself in the stomach, stepping just out of their reach. She pushed it through all the way to the hilt, not leaving any chance for her own survival.

Madam Yu stared, wide-eyed, at the sight before her.

Wen Qing rushed to the girl's side.

"A-Su!" Jin Guangyao shouted, running close. He rushed forward and grabbed her limp body, and Lan Xichen immediately pulled out medicine. However, with the sharpness of the blade and the negative energy infused within, there was no point.

Qin Su's hand fell against the floor, and the last of the light in her eyes left once and for all.

There was a beat of silence.

Then, Madam Jin spun towards Jin Guangyao.

"You! What did you do?!"

"Miss Su!" Jiang Yanli screamed.

"What…" Jin Zixuan's eyes were wide. "I… what?"

Lan Xichen stood frozen.

"A-Su! A-Su!" Jin Guangyao shouted over and over again, clutching her body tightly. He cupped her face with one hand, trembling, as tears poured down his cheeks.

If this scene was the first thing they had seen, not a single one of the watchers would have thought there was anything off about Jin Guangyao. The idea that he was the one responsible would be…

(Well, perhaps Qin Su's accusations regarding their son were now even more credible than they had been before.)

"A-Yao…" Lan Xichen began at last. "Madam Jin… I'm sorry."

Jin Guangyao looked up and, with a shaky voice, asked, "Er-ge, what's going on? Why… why would A-Su suddenly take her own life? And why did you gather in front of the Fragrant Palace, and demand I open my treasure room? Is there something you haven't told me?"

At that moment, Jiang Cheng stepped forward. He had arrived late, but his expression left little room for uncertainty.

"Zewu-jun, please explain this. The rest of us here are still in the dark," he requested in a cold voice.

The real Jiang Cheng couldn't help but frown slightly at the reappearance of his older self.

The other sect leaders agreed with Jiang Cheng, turning toward Lan Xichen for answers.

After a pause, Zewu-jun began to speak: "...Sometime ago, a few disciples of Gusu Lan were on a night hunt. When they passed through Mo Village, they were attacked by a dismembered arm, full of resentful energy and killing intent. Using it as a compass, Wangji has been investigating, and discovered… that it was Da-ge."

Everyone in the treasure room fell into an uproar.

"Da-ge?!" Jin Guangyao gaped. "But Da-ge was buried. You and I saw that happen with our own eyes!"

But his shock had nothing on another's:

"Da-ge?" Nie Huaisang, now Sect Leader Nie, repeated. "You mean my Da-ge? Xichen-xiong, you mean my brother? Our eldest brother?!"

Lan Xichen nodded, and Nie Huaisang took a single, stumbling step forward. He dropped his fan, and his knees gave out.

"Sect Leader Nie!" someone shouted, and Lan Xichen rushed forward to catch him.

Nie Mingjue frowned, knowing how much of a shock this would have been for the simulated Nie Huaisang.

"Where's the medic?" someone called, coming to support Nie Huaisang as well.

Jin Guangyao's eyes were full of tears, but they now seemed red with anger.

"Dismembered," he repeated, half-disbelieving. "Dismembered?! Who in the world could have done something as insane as that?!"

"Well, I don't know mister 'let's keep Chifeng-zun's head as a trophy in my treasure room,'" Wen Qing mocked. "Perhaps someone with extensive power, money, and both personal and political reasons to get rid of him."

To the few who had been momentarily swept up in Jin Guangyao's gripping performance, her words served as a much-needed wake up call.

Meanwhile, Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow. It was rare for Wen Qing to speak up so scornfully on matters concerning strangers. Then again, Nie Mingjue might not count as a stranger to her anymore.

At that time, Lan Xichen, who still lacked much of the information they had, could only shake his head: "I don't know. While we were searching for the head, the clues disappeared."

Jin Guangyao paused, as though slowly coming to a horrifying conclusion.

"You… Er-ge, you wanted me to open up my treasure room because you-you were suspicious Da-ge's head might be with me?"

A look of guilt flashed across Lan Xichen's face.

"Except it was with you," Lan Qiren growled. "Xichen, you can't allow yourself to fall for his tricks in our world, understood?"

"Ah, yes, uncle," Lan Xichen agreed. As he said that, however, his eyes went somewhat unfocused. He looked at the simulation, and yet seemed to be staring past it all the same.

Sure, they now knew for a fact that Jin Guangyao was terrifyingly good at acting. However, they still couldn't see through his lies. What would happen if someone else showed up — just as good at lying as Jin Guangyao, but not included in the memories being sent back in time.

"As Sect Leader Nie said, we'll investigate," said a hushed voice on his left. Lan Xichen looked over, as saw his younger brother standing next to him, concern obvious under the outward blankness.

"Wangji?"

"If something happens, we'll do a thorough investigation," he said. "We won't let this happen again."

From the side, Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan were nodding rapidly, and Wen Qing and Nie Mingjue both nodded once.

"...Right," Lan Xichen agreed, a small smile forming on his lips.

In the meantime, however, his other self was simply forced to stand there, having nothing to say in response to the betrayal that appeared in Jin Guangyao's eyes.

"...Forget it," Sect Leader Jin said at last, looking away. "Let's drop the matter. Though, Er-ge, how did Hanguang-jun know that there was a treasure room inside my bedchamber? And why did you think Da-ge's head was in my room? Koi Tower is quite fortified… if I had really done something, would I have let his head be found so easily?"

Lan Xichen paused, unable to answer his questions.

'Not only can he not answer, but I can't find an answer either,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Who could have expected that, in such a short amount of time, Jin Guangyao would not only be able to move the head but also force Qin Su to take her own life before everyone's eyes.'

It was indeed impressive.

Wen Ruohan shook his head, forcefully casting aside his thoughts about what could have been if he'd chosen Wen Ruohan's side.

Then, Jin Guangyao sighed: "Xuanyu, did you tell something to Er-ge and everyone else here? What's the use in making up these easily exposable lies?"

Jiang Cheng frowned, "Does he know the paperman was Wei-er… Mo Xuanyu?"

"Wei Ying was the first person to approach the Fragrance Palace," Lan Wangji pointed out. "He also has the lowest rank."

Although the son of a former sect leader, Mo Xuanyu's status couldn't hope to compare against Zewu-jun's, Hanguang-jun's, or that of the Sect Leaders and Sect heirs there. Madam Jin felt herself frown slightly at the reminder.

At that moment, the person who spoke next was Su She: "People who aren't from the LanlingJin Sect might have not heard of him before. His name is Mo Xuanyu. He used to be a disciple of the LanlingJin Sect. However, because of his indecent conduct, he was thrown out. He harassed Lianfang-zun. From what I've heard, nowadays he's been following around Hanguang-jun, having proven himself to Hanguang-jun's likings."

Lan Qiren frowned at the crude phrasing. He would be watching Su She very carefully once they left the simulation.

"He has been following after Hanguang-jun everywhere. Why would Hanguang-jun, who has always been known for his grace and righteousness, keep such a person by his side? It truly is difficult to understand."

With every word, the expression on Jin Ling's face darkened, and chattering broke out among the gathered Sect Leaders.

Slowly, Jin Guangyao set Qin Su's body down, standing up and placing a hand on the hilt of his sword as he said, "I won't bring up the past, so tell me the truth. A-Su's bizarre death… are you involved in it at all?"

'Really, if any of his act was actually true… he would have been so much better than Guangshan,' Madam Jin thought, a bitter smile forming on her face. Of course the one good Sect Leader the Jin Sect had was nothing but a liar and a fake.

~~And she had to wonder… if she had raised him as her own, supported him with the power of the Jins, would she have been able to change him?~~

Unfortunately, there was no way of knowing. The Jin Guangyao in the simulation wouldn't change just because they wished it, and he was the one Wei Wuxian needed to handle right now.

'How expertly played,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'When he says it like that, of course everyone will think I kicked up a fuss by lying and that I had something to do with Qin Su's death. And what am I supposed to bring up in response? That I saw Nie Mingjue's head? How I snuck into the secret room? The mysterious person Qin Su met with before she died, or the letter that could just as easily be a fabrication? That would only make me look more suspicious!'

While Wei Wuxian was trying to come up with a plan, Jin Guangyao unsheathed his sword. Lan Wangji moved in front of Wei Wuxian at once, unsheathing Bichen to block any attack. Seeing that, the other Sect Leaders began unsheathing their swords as well.

Wei Wuxian remained silent.

"Well you have to say something!" Jin Zixuan pointed out. "I mean… he has weighed it against you, but he can't have hidden Chifeng-zun's head that well. If they all look for it-"

"They would have to believe him to do that," Madam Jin pointed out.

"But-but the people here…" Jiang Yanli stuttered. "A-Cheng's future self is there! Maybe he would listen. And Nie-gongzi is there as well. They're some of the most powerful sect leaders present, and Zewu-jun is already on A-Xian's side, so…."

Both Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang looked away — one frustrated and angry, one scratching his cheek and slightly embarrassed — and did nothing to back up Jiang Yanli's hopes. Their future selves didn't even seem to really be friends anymore; the chances of them working together to force a proper investigation was less than zero.

(The people gathered here might be the future's sect leaders, but there didn't seem to be anyone all that interested in actually finding out the truth.)

(Wen Ruohan frowned even deeper, thinking, for a brief moment, that if he hadn't been so stupid — attacking the other sects in an altogether meaningless display of power — he might be able to actually do something to help.)

As more and more people prepared for combat, Wei Wuxian began looking around. Reasoning with everyone seemed impossible, so he needed to look for an escape route and a weapon.

Suibian laid waiting atop a cabinet. Wei Wuxian immediately grabbed it and unsheathed the sword. To his surprise, wide-eyed stares and gasps broke out among the gathered Sect Leaders, quite a few even stepping back further out of fear.

"It's the Yiling Patriarch!" Jin Guangyao revealed.

Jin Ling's eyes went wide.

"What?"

"...Oh," Lan Xichen muttered quietly. "Oh no."

In an instant, the blades of every disciple in the room pointed at him — including Jin Ling's.

Jin Zixuan stood up, "Wait, A-Ling, he-"

"What a surprise to see that the Yiling Patriarch has returned to this world and decided to make an appearance here. Apologies for the lack of proper reception."

Wei Wuxian still appeared confused. Luckily, he wasn't the only one.

"San-ge, what did you call him?" Nie Huaisang wondered, frowning slightly. "Isn't this Mo Xuanyu?"

Not lowering his blade at all, Jin Guangyao ordered, "Huaisang, A-Ling, come here. Be careful. Since he pulled his sword out, he's most definitely the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian!"

"I guess that explains his reaction to Wei Wuxian's sword earlier," Madam Yu sighed. "What a mess."

No one could disagree.

"Since the actual name of his sword is embarrassing to say, people usually call it 'Wei Wuxian's sword,' 'his sword,' or 'this sword.' The words 'Yiling Patriarch' evoked even more fear in all of them than finding out Chifeng-zun had been dismembered did. Even people who didn't intend on fighting had unsheathed their swords," Jin Ling explained.

And yet, despite the absolute disaster unfolding in front of him, Wei Wuxian remained calm. It wasn't arrogance — both he and Lan Wangji were fully aware of just how dangerous these opponents could be, and there were very few resources around for Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation. It wasn't as though Wei Wuxian thought this would be easy to get out of.

(Instead, it almost seemed like, as bad as things currently were, Wei Wuxian was just a bit numb to it all. Expectant.)

However, whether through genuine confusion or a desire to help, there was one person who kept trying to protest:

"D-don't tell me that anyone who pulls out that sword must be the Yiling Patriarch! San-ge, Hanguang-jun, there must be some kind of misunderstanding here, right?"

"There's no misunderstanding. He's undoubtedly Wei Wuxian."

"...At least you're asking for a further investigation," Nie Mingjue muttered. Nie Huaisang lit up at the slight praise, even though the watchers all knew none of the present Sect Leaders would listen to the words of 'the Headshaker.'

"Wait! Uncle, wait!" a sudden shout echoed. "Didn't my Shushu hit him with Zidian back on Dafan mountain? His soul wasn't wiped out, so there must not be anyone possessing this body, right? And so he can't be Wei Wuxian, right?!"

"A-Ling?" Jiang Yanli asked, staring in surprise.

Jin Zixuan stared for a moment too, before a large, proud smile covered his face. Although people probably wouldn't listen to him anymore than they did to Nie Huaisang, it was nice to see him try.

(Two people were trying to defend Wei Wuxian. That was a whole lot better than none.)

However-

"Dafan mountain?" Jin Guangyao asked. "That's right. A-Ling, now that you've reminded me, I'm recalling just what appeared on Dafan mountain. Wasn't Wen Ning summoned there?"

"Shoot," Jin Zixuan deflated, having to acknowledge how good of a point that was.

Having had his protest both dismissed and refuted, Jin Ling paled slightly.

"...It would seem that none of you know this, but back when Mo Xuanyu was at Koi Tower, he saw a copy of one of the Yiling Patriarch's manuscripts in my room. The manuscript involved a dark technique of 'sacrificing' one's body at the cost of your own soul as a means to summon a spirit to get your revenge. Even a hundred more strikes from Sect Leader Jiang's Zidian wouldn't lead to a different result. The person using the technique sacrificed their body willingly! It doesn't count as possession at all!"

Yeah, okay. There wasn't much that could be said now.

Still….

From the center of the room, the Second Jade of Lan softly exhaled before muttering, "We still don't fully know why the current world hates him so much."

The last they had seen had been right after the war. Sure, there was annoyance regarding his "arrogance" and concern over how dangerous he could be ~~now that he wasn't a needed weapon anymore,~~ but there had been nothing even resembling this.

What had actually happened at the Nightless City?

"But… since the use of that technique can't be proven, we have no way to confirm whether it happened, right?" someone pointed out.

"It's true that the use of the body sacrifice can't be proven, but his identity can. Ever since the Yiling Patriarch received a cultivation backlash and got torn apart by ghosts at the top of the Burial Mounds, his sword sealed itself."

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened in surprise.

"He didn't know?" Jiang Cheng asked, raising an eyebrow. How did that not come up? Surely, someone would have mentioned it when they next saw him wield his sword. Jiang Cheng had seen it happen first hand when Lan Wangji attempted after the sword was reclaimed. Wei Wuxian might have stopped carrying it around, but there was no reason for him to give up spiritual cultivation entirely. He loved flying on his sword.

He supposed that just went to show how much the world would have changed in the next few years.

Wei Wuxian's expression turned a bit more worried than it had been before.

"I believe I don't need to explain how a sword seals itself in detail. The sword is a spiritual weapon. It refuses to let anyone apart from Wei Wuxian use it, which is why it was sealed. And yet, just a second ago, 'Mo Xuanyu' here pulled it out!"

At those words, a dozen attacks were sent Wei Wuxian's way.

And yet Lan Wangji blocked them all.

Wen Ruohan nodded once in approval.

(Jin Guangshan just raised an eyebrow, somewhat impressed by what his bastard son had managed to do. If he had known the boy was this good at talking his way out of things, he might have accepted him in earlier. Well, there was always time to change that.)

Luckily for everyone, in the simulation, Jin Guangshan was already dead. Unluckily, Jin Guangyao's words had worked everyone up into a frenzy.

Attack after attack came Wei Wuxian's way, until Lan Wangji responded with his own and instantly blew a large portion of the Sect Leaders back with his sword glare.

"Wangji!" Lan Xichen shouted.

A few of the Sect Leaders who had been knocked over by Bichen's energy growled, "Hanguang-jun, you-"

However, while Lan Wangji had been buying time, Wei Wuxian had been hard at work. Without giving away what he was focusing on, he had sent a few traces of resentful energy to open the lock on the window lattice behind him. It contained metal bars, and everyone present had thought it was sealed shut. At that moment, the hinges connecting it to the wall were loosened and it fell to the floor.

Before it had even made contact with the ground, Wei Wuxian was out. He hopped through the window and landed on the ground a story below, sprinting as soon as he made contact. Hanguang-jun followed a half second after, bringing up the rear.

As they ran, dodging and instantly incapacitating anyone who tried to attack them, Wei Wuxian thought, 'I see. Jin Guangyao must have realized who I was the second he saw the paperman use Suibian. And so he quickly made up a series of lies, caused Qin Su to take her own life, and then forced me towards the cabinet Suibian was laying on top of so I would reveal my identity. Scary, scary. Who could have known that his reaction would be so fast, and his lies, so flawless?'

It was a massive understatement, but the watchers also couldn't deny that 'scary, scary' seemed like a perfect description of Jin Guangyao. It took him only a minute to come up with such a lie, and they still didn't know what he had done to make Qin Su take her own life.

Jiang Yanli clasped her hands together, privately saying a quick mournful prayer for Qin Su's soul.

Wei Wuxian turned a corner to head toward the exit, and Lan Wangji followed right after.

My reputation's always been terrible, so this isn't my first time in a situation like this,'* Wei Wuxian thought as he ran, eliciting several frowns from the gallery. 'In fact, in this life, my mindset's pretty different from in my last one. Getting away first, and hoping to counterattack later, is going to be much more effective than trying to claim I'm innocent, only to get slashed by hundreds of swords.'

There was a certain, unmistakable levity to his words that didn't at all match the perilous situation.

Lan Wangji became even more silent than before.

'His mindset is 'different' from how it was in his last life. In that he's not foolish enough to try something as 'ineffective' as convincing anyone of his own innocence.'

And the sect leaders that had been around last time were the people who had been brought into the simulation.

'Wei Ying… what happened to you?'

The explanation for that was still a ways away though.

'Everyone believed with the utmost certainty that I'd somehow return to seek revenge sometime in the future. With Jin Guangyao fanning the flames, no one will ever side with me,'* Wei Wuxian concluded, then, somewhat disbelievingly, glanced to the side. 'It's different for Hanguang-jun though. He doesn't need to come up with an excuse; people will do that for him. Even now, I'm sure they're all saying he was deceived by the Yiling Patriarch or something.'

Which meant-

"Hanguang-jun, you don't have to follow me."

"What?" Nie Mingjue asked.

Jiang Cheng gaped: "Why are you throwing away the only help you have?!"

And the simulated Lan Wangji didn't reply.

"You really want to go with me?" Wei Wuxian asked. "Think carefully. After you walk out this door, your reputation will be destroyed!"

The two had already flashed down the steps of Koi Tower. However, in their journey, they had been avoiding pursuers around every corner, unable to take the most obvious path out. As a result, someone had gotten there before them.

It was Jin Ling.

Jiang Yanli relaxed at once, relieved to see her son again. Despite the shock he had experienced, he did at least seem to be physically fine. Given how he spoke of Wei Wuxian while recording the narration for the simulation, Jiang Yanli could be assured their relationship would repair itself soon enough.

Of everyone who could have cut the pair off, he was by far the best option.

Wei Wuxian clearly felt the same. He breathed out a sigh of relief and moved to go around him. However, before he could, Jin Ling unsheathed his sword and blocked their way.

"You're… Wei Ying?" he demanded.

Everyone paused at the same moment as Wei Wuxian.

Jin Ling's unexpected actions had stalled them long enough for some others to arrive. Lan Wangji turned away, slashing Bichen through the air, using the sword aura to throw their pursuers back. Attack after attack came from a dozen cultivators, but not one of them could get by Hanguang-jun.

Meanwhile, the expression on Jin Ling's face was nearly indescribable. There was anger, hatred, doubt, hesitation, fear, distress-

Someone he had grown to trust turned out to be the person he had been raised to hate most.

"You really are Wei Ying, Wei Wuxian?!" he shouted.

What kind of a response could Wei Wuxian give, exactly?

The pain in Jin Ling's voice was infinitely greater than his hatred. Wei Wuxian's expression faltered, and he looked away for a moment.

But they were running out of time.

"Jin Ling-" he began, only to stop.

A sword had passed through his stomach. He glanced up, and, for a half second, he saw a younger Jiang Cheng standing there wielding the blade. A moment later, that illusion faded away, and he saw the truth.

Jin Ling had just stabbed him.

The world tilted, and Wei Wuxian fell to the ground.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted.

Chapter End Notes

I feel like my chapters are somehow getting longer and longer. I really didn't plan on this happening! ¯_(ツ)_/¯

Maybe we'll try to make the next chapter a bit of a more reasonable length.

Chapter Notes

> Hi everyone! Tintin, my beta reader, has been a little sick lately. They were a super huge help as always, so if you could give them some support I'd really appreciate it! Also: Warning! The following chapter contains Jin Guangshan (and everything that implies).

See the end of the chapter for more notes

There was a knock at the door, and both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji glanced towards it. It was getting relatively late in the day (for Lans), the sun having just set, and most residents knew better than to approach the happy couple's home once night fell. Little Lan ears wouldn't be able to handle the sounds that would surely follow.

(Luckily, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji hadn't started quite yet.)

After hurriedly untying the knot around Wei Wuxian's hands and putting the responsible forehead ribbon back on his own head, Lan Wangji straightened himself up and moved toward the door, opening it without delay.

"Xiongzhang?" he asked, his eyes widening slightly when he saw who it was.

"Wangji," Wei Wuxian heard another voice greet back. "May I come in? It will only take a moment."

Hanguang-jun stepped aside, allowing Lan Xichen into the room. The first jade had a set of papers and scrolls in his arms, which Lan Wangji softly took from him without delay. There was a distinct air of delicacy around Lan Wangji's actions, as though Lan Xichen was made of something far more fragile than glass. Perhaps paper mache, or barely-wet sand, or something else along those lines; a medium able to be torn to pieces at a slight gust of wind.

After Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and the kids had checked the inside of the past's simulation, Lan Xichen had run out of his seclusion voluntarily upon hearing Wei Wuxian's less than ideal reaction. That was the first time he had left seclusion in quite some time, as well as the first ever unnecessary exit on his part. Since then, although occasionally making journeys, Lan Xichen had still mostly remained inside.

Which made his sudden appearance here quite surprising.

"Can we do something for you, Zewu-jun?" Wei Wuxian asked, watching as Lan Xichen sat down at the table before him. Lan Wangji sat to Wei Wuxian's left, putting down the documents Sect Leader Lan had brought inside. Curious, Wei Wuxian leaned against his husband, observing the papers below.

“I was thinking about what Huai… what Sect Leader Nie said,” Lan Xichen confessed. “I still don’t think it would be right to punish Meng Yao for what Jin Guangyao did. Especially since, at the beginning at least, Meng Yao was far more… reactive. He only took action once confronted by others.”

Wei Wuxian couldn’t definitively say that was objectively false, so he nodded along and wrapped his hand around Lan Wangji’s now tightly-clenched fist.

“That-that said, I… I do think there was a transition. And maybe… me letting him get away with smaller crimes perpetuated the issue and led to what eventually occurred.”

“Jin Guangyao is responsible for his own actions,” Hanguang-jun said. “You cannot be expected to take accountability for the things he chose to do.”

A sad smile worked its way onto Lan Xichen’s face, but he nodded once and said, “I know. I just think that, maybe, if we had stopped the smaller instances, the larger ones wouldn’t have occurred.”

If they hadn’t let him get away with killing his Jin superior (or had at least gotten him a fair trial over it), maybe Jin Guangyao wouldn’t have framed and murdered whole clans to build his watchtowers.

Maybe.

“That’s still the same issue though, isn’t it?” Wei Wuxian asked. “We couldn’t immediately tell whether he was telling the truth, and he had no trust in the people in power, so he wouldn’t even let a trial occur.”

Lan Xichen nodded once, pursing his lips together slightly at the reminder, only to freeze when-

“Ow!”

All three heads turned toward the window, where that sound had just come from. They had felt the presences of two people for a few minutes now, but, given how far away the pair had been, hadn’t been worried about eavesdropping. However, just a moment ago, one of the presences had tried to sneak closer.

And, in the dark, had tripped over a log and fallen flat on his face.

“Are you alright, Jingyi?” Wei Wuxian called out.

“I’m fine!”

“Jingyi-” Lan Sizhui cut off and sighed, realizing that trying to hide themselves had been pointless from the start.

Silently as always, Lan Wangji stood up and walked toward the door, welcoming the pair inside. If not for Lan Qiren training perfect posture into the two of them, they would surely have had to drag themselves inside, heads hung low.

“Sect Leader, Senior Wei, Hanguang-jun,” they greeted.

Grinning, Wei Wuxian leaned forward and said, “You know, Sect Leader Lan was having a pretty important conversation with us. Don’t you think it’s a bit rude of you little Lans to eavesdrop? To say nothing of the rules!”

Lan Jingyi gaped, having no way to respond to Wei Wuxian of all people lecturing him about the Lan Sect’s rules, and Lan Sizhui seemed to wilt even further.

“Sorry, Xian-gege,” he apologized. “But… we’re not uninvolved. We helped!”

“That they did,” Lan Xichen confirmed. “I hope you’ll excuse their actions this time, on my behalf.”

Lan Jingyi relaxed at once, knowing that Hanguang-jun couldn’t be too disappointed in him if Lan Xichen said it was okay.

“They helped?” Wei Wuxian repeated. “With what?”

Gesturing to one of the scrolls he had brought with him, Sect Leader Lan elaborated, “These are mainly copies of the notes you submitted to the Lan Sect’s library regarding your most recent invention. The juniors helped me get access to them without alerting the rest of the sect, as would surely have happened if I had gone myself. I hope… we might be able to find a way to stop Meng Yao before he goes too far, but there are issues of how reliably we will be able to do that. You’ve brought up a few times how you’re trying to gain influence in the alternate dimension, but, even if you succeed, we won’t exactly be able to conduct a full investigation without going there. Then I thought… I thought maybe we could use the simulation. You’ve adapted empathy to work on living souls as well, and given it the ability to project that information to a crowd. We can display memories; there would be no need to rely on just his word when we can simply see what happened.”

“Ah. That would be very helpful. Though if he’s choosing which of his memories to show us, then it’s hard to trust them completely,” Wei Wuxian pointed out.

“I know, which is another part of why I called these two juniors here to help me.”

“What did you two do?” Lan Wangji asked them.

“Ah, Zewu-jun wanted to know how we’d managed to get memories about what you two had done inside the Cloud Recesses, where all spirits are blocked off,” Lan Sizhui explained. “We told him about the trick Xian-gege had shown us, of getting memories in the little traces of resentment lingering in even the most purified areas. Since, so long as there’s living people somewhere, there will be a bit of resentful energy too. It might be a lot more blurry and inconsistent than the spirit method, but it still works!”

Wei Wuxian was so, so proud of his little radish's big brain. True, Sizhui remembering that had sent who knew what into the past for the world to see, but still — he couldn't help but be proud!

Smiling, Lan Xichen continued, "After listening to their explanation, I thought… well, sending a spirit to follow after Meng Yao would be unreliable and an invasion of privacy, but using this trick of theirs might work. It's not someone watching him constantly, which would probably cause unnecessary panic for him, but it does give us the ability to see if we decide we need to."

"I see," Wei Wuxian said, falling into deep thought.

"I went into one of our libraries and found this," Lan Xichen said, pulling up one of the oldest-looking scrolls. "It details how to apply a talisman without sticking a physical piece of paper on something. It will need to be recharged every once in a while, but I thought if we combined it with what you've already made, then perhaps we could attack it to him in a way that would allow such information can be sent back to us. That way, those of us in the future can ensure that we agree with the choices they make on their end, and possibly use the influence you're gaining to push one way or the other. If Huaisang and I could have a failsafe for if something goes wrong and an investigation needs to happen… we could all be a bit more at ease."

Wei Wuxian reached forward to grab the frontmost scroll and opened it up so that both he and Lan Wangji could read it. He scanned his eyes over the page rapidly, growing more excited with every second.

"This… might actually work," Wei Wuxian grinned. "The privacy thing you mentioned will need to be dealt with since the past probably won't be happy if we can see everything they do, but I bet I could set it up in a way that would hide the information from us until someone on that side agreed to it. And hey, I bet Huaisang will be happy too. Maybe, if we show him this, he won't mind getting the position of Chief Cultivator tossed his way!"

Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, hopeful that would be the case.

"Not bad at all, kids," Wei Wuxian said, making the two juniors light up, before he turned to Lan Xichen. "Thank you. I really… this will help a lot. Thanks, Da-ge."

Lan Xichen smiled back, more genuinely than any other he'd given in the past few months.

On the other hand, a very different atmosphere had taken over the watchers in the past. The segment had ended, but most eyes were glued to where it had last been, unable to pull away. There were a few beats of complete silence.

…

"...I-"

Lan Xichen began, only to cut himself off, not sure what he was trying to say.

Madam Jin stared blankly, and even Jin Guangshan was gaping in shock.

To say nothing of how Lan Wangji looked.

Jin Zixuan felt dizzy, as if hallucinating or stuck in a dream. There was a washed-out look to the world, and he could hear a slight ringing in his ears, like he was being rapidly pulled underwater.

The watchers had been shown plenty of shocking things throughout the simulation. There was the Wen Sect's plans, the burning of the Cloud Recesses, the Massacre of Lotus PIer, and the Burial Mounds, most strikingly. Even in the future, things had happened. They had found Nie Mingjue's head, and Jiang Cheng's future self had used a dog against Wei Wuxian.

But the juniors — their stupid little narrators who kept throwing themselves into danger and having to be saved by Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji — had always been different. They were a spark of hope amongst everything else as the one thing that kept getting better and better — Jin Ling most of all.

'What, a donkey?' a boy in yellow groaned. 'I set more than 400 spirit nets, but I haven't been able to catch one ghost! I just find you idiots every single time!'

Those were the first words the non-narrating Jin Ling had said, and they conveyed quite a bit all on their own.

A captured young woman cried out, 'Please, Young Master! Do us a small favor and let us down!'

But Jin Ling just glared: 'You guys should just stay here! I don't want you messing around and getting in my way again!'

Those words had made the captured cultivators' faces fall, and the reason why had been immediately obvious to both Wei Wuxian and the watchers. There was a creature in Dafan Mountains. It was not known to anyone at the time that its identity was the Stone Goddess, so, for all anyone knew, it might have already been wandering around the mountain at the time, looking for prey. If those cultivators had happened to run into the creature while trapped like that, unable to move, they would be able to do nothing but wait for their souls to be sucked dry.

But Jin Ling was just a kid. And it probably wouldn't happen, given how much chance was required for the monster to just stumble across the captured people. And they were all cultivators; when they chose to go night hunting, they knew how dangerous it was. They were probably well prepared enough to defend themselves.

~~And Jin Ling was from the Jin Sect. He was the heir to one of the Great Sects! If what they were considering was his reputation and accomplishments as compared to their safety…~~

Looking back on it now, some part of Jiang Yanli couldn't help but recall Xue Yang.

(Because who would care about the finger of a child when a sect leader had somewhere he needed to be?)

It wasn't the same — the level of maliciousness Jin Ling showed was nowhere near what Sect Leader Chang had exhibited. However, in a hypothetical, different universe, she also wouldn't have been surprised to find out that Sect Leader Chang set up spirit nets as a child to cheat his way into getting fame. She didn't think her son could have ever done something as cruel as what Sect Leader Chang had done, but….

The initial traces were there.

And then Wei Wuxian had come into his life, and given him a chance to see things differently. With every time he saved Jin Ling's life, Wei Wuxian had made the boy reconsider his stance on the world. First the realization that maybe 'Mo Xuanyu' wasn't just a lunatic. Then Jin Ling had saved Wei Wuxian from Jiang Cheng, before admitting that perhaps two men could be together, so long as 'Mo Xuanyu' remained loyal to Lan Wangji and didn't go after his half brother. And then there was Yi City, and Jin Ling had to be saved from a demonic cultivator by a demonic cultivator, and 'Mo Xuanyu' became someone he could trust. Jin Ling relied on him, learned from him, and, slowly but surely, had begun making friends.

The watchers might not know everything that happened right before Wei Wuxian's death, but they could be certain that the rumors were far from accurate. How Wei Wuxian interacted with Jin Ling was some of the greatest proof of that. The Jin heir might not have known he was Wei Wuxian, but, given his future self's narration, it was all going to be fine-

"Er-right, the future!" Jiang Cheng exclaimed at once. "Wei Wuxian said he's been in contact with 'Mo Xuanyu's future self. So Wei Wuxian's obviously fine! He's not… he-"

"So at least Jin Ling didn't kill him?" Madam Jin asked. Jiang Cheng's mouth snapped shut at that.

None of them could get that last image — Wei Wuxian, collapsing at once, a sword having stabbed through his gut — out of their heads.

Most especially a certain Chief Cultivator.

"I knew it," he muttered. "Of course, my mistake for thinking he was the exception. Your family never fails to hurt Wei Wuxian in every way possible."

Madam Jin gaped at his audacity.

"You started the war!" Madam Yu shrieked, saying what they had all been thinking. "Your son is the one who threw him into the Burial Mounds!"

Nie Mingjue laughed, "And I hope you don't forget the Xuanwu your sect trapped him with."

"Of course," Wen Ruohan acknowledged easily. "Because he was our enemy; it wasn't our responsibility to protect him. It was, however, yours."

“Jin Ling is a child-”

“He’s a symptom of your actions,” Wen Ruohan scoffed. “Every bit of the resentment and hate within him is because of the lot of you. Wei Wuxian even saw the boy as Jiang Wanyin for a moment. If you’ve watched the simulation without covering your eyes, it should be clear that all your family ever does is-”

“Sect Leader!” Wen Qing spoke up, making quite a few of the people present turn to her in disbelief. What was even more difficult to believe was that, after her words, Wen Ruohan indeed cut himself off.

~~Because right now, he wanted nothing more than to tell them all where Jiang Wanyin’s new core had most likely come from. Wen Qing had stopped him from bringing it up because one of the last things Wei Wuxian would want was for that to be used as a weapon against the Jiangs. He had never agreed to them being shown any of this; the least she could do was keep everyone from hearing about it from Wen Ruohan of all people.~~

~~Wen Ruohan, on the other hand, had a fairly different reasoning in mind. Yes, it would hurt coming from him. He was almost positive he was right, and just the accusation would be enough to make the Jiangs rethink everything they had done thus far. Jiang Fengmian might be gone, but Wen Ruohan would be perfectly happy to tell him later and get the satisfaction all over again. However, from what he had seen so far, the simulation was choosing scenes quite carefully, and keeping certain things secret only to reveal them later, when it would have the strongest impact. And given how the Burial Mounds had been…~~

~~The Jiang family had seemed to make it their life goal to offend Wen Ruohan with their stupidity, but, for now, Wen Ruohan was willing to keep silent just a bit longer.~~

(Nie Huaisang, watching this all go down, wished once again that he had his fan, and hid an amused smile behind his hand.)

Then slowly, hesitantly, Jin Guangshan stepped forward.

“W-well,” he cleared his throat. “I must admit, I do think the Chief Cultivator has a point. That final scene shows us once and for all how corrupting Meng Yao’s influence on society was. He’s filled their minds with propaganda, until even Jin Ling would aim to kill someone who saved his life time and time again. We have to wonder how he got everyone to believe such ridiculous tales.”

“I’m sure we’ll find out soon enough,” Nie Mingjue said. “Given what those kids said when they first brought us into the simulation, the world in general realized their mistake, just a little too late.”

“Oh, right,” Jiang Yanli lit up. “This is A-Xian’s invention, isn’t it? And little A-Xian has been working with big A-Xian to make it better, and little A-Xian didn’t mention any sort of apparent injury or lack of health in big A-Xian.”

“Which doesn’t undo what’s happened,” Lan Wangji pointed out. Sure, Jin Ling was ‘just a kid,’ but it was hard for the juniors — who were on average less than a year older than him — to view it that way.

“Well, we know Wei Wuxian survives,” Wen Qing said. “We know Young Master Jin comes to regret his actions, and we know Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji will end up safe. When we started watching the simulation, the first thing those juniors told us was that they were sending this information over so that we wouldn’t make the same mistakes our past selves did. For now, all we can do is continue to watch.”

Continue to watch, and see how the world they all-but-ruled ended up twisted enough to have resulted in the outcome they had just seen. Having decided on that, the watchers slowly began to settle down, many retaking their seats. They weren’t happy, but most just wanted to see the next part of the simulation as soon as possible and turned all their focus to where they knew the next part would come from.

Then, finally, the world began to change.

The first thing they heard from this segment were footsteps. They were light, but rapid and hurried. A high level cultivator was moving over a long distance as quietly as he could. The next thing they heard, nearly too quietly to make out, was a name. It was soft, whispered, as the speaker was barely-conscious due to his injuries.

“...Lan Zhan?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Mn.”

Hanguang-jun’s breathing was beginning to come out heavily, but his response was as even-toned as ever.

Everyone relaxed slightly at the confirmation of the pair’s escape. The Lans, especially, felt their heart rates calm.

(Though most of Lan Xichen just wished his other self had prevented this from happening in the first place.)

“Lan Zhan-” Wei Wuxian began again.

“I am here,” Hanguang-jun continued. As they got farther and farther from Koi Tower, Lan Wangji allowed his footsteps to shift to a more even and less frantic pace, going for endurance rather than speed. The steady thumps echoed in Wei Wuxian’s mind, and he squeezed on tighter.

“At that moment, something that Wei Wuxian had never felt before sprouted in his heart,” Ouyang Zizhen read aloud, with no small amount of enthusiasm despite Jin Ling’s groan of embarrassment. “His chest hurt a bit, but it also felt a bit warm.”

And the spirits knew that, because they could feel the fluctuations in resentful energy caused by the Yiling Patriarch’s emotions. Now, with their new, ever-growing sensitivity to resentful energy, the watchers could feel it too.

An image was overlaid behind Hanguang-jun and Wei Wuxian, switching the background to one of Wei Wuxian's memories. The narration continued:

"Back in Jiangling, Hanguang-jun constantly came all the way over to assist Senior Wei, and yet Wei Wuxian felt like he hadn't appreciated the kindness at all. They had gotten into all kinds of disputes, and the two had often parted with disapproval."

And indeed, the memories shown proved that their reunion after Wei Wuxian's return from the Burial Mounds wasn't a one-time thing. The two apparently got into spats and arguments and shouting matches constantly, unable to fully understand each other during this time.

Lan Wangji frowned at the memories, and Lan Qiren quietly cursed his own past self for the simulated Lan Qiren's part in all this. Wei Wuxian hadn't even been serious when he brought up demonic cultivation initially. If Lan Qiren had been able to just-

He paused, unable to imagine himself having done anything else.

(He swore he could hear Cangse Sanren laughing at him from the world beyond.)

'But I hadn't expected this,' Wei Wuxian thought, continuing the story himself. 'Who could have known that, when everyone feared and flattered me, Lan Wangji would scold me right to my face, but, now that everyone spurns and loathes me, Lan Wangji stays by my side.'

Lan Wangji nearly did a double-take, switching from guilt to shock so quickly that even the other juniors were able to see it.

Meanwhile, Jiang Cheng had nearly the opposite reaction, knowing full well what category his other-self probably landed in of those two. He might have not flattered Wei Wuxian much, but as for the other parts….

(Why had Wei Wuxian seen Jin Ling as him, in that moment?)

"Ah, I remember now," Wei Wuxian suddenly said.

Lan Wangji glanced back, asking, "Remember what?"

"I remember now, Lan Zhan. Just like this… I-I carried you like this before, didn't I? In the cave of the Xuanwu."

"Oh, now he remembers," Wen Qing muttered, giving a soft, tired smile. "Don't you think you should be focusing on recovering, Wei Wuxian?"

Now was really not the time for him to be thinking about things like this, but, having slowly grown used to Wei Wuxian over time, she found it hard to be surprised.

Regardless-

“That was nice,” Wei Wuxian muttered, the blood loss forcing him to slur his words together drunkenly. “You sang me a song. It got stuck in my head, you know. I kept humming it… even at… Phoenix Mountain.”

The world began to grow black.

“Wait. Wait wait wait — what?!” Jiang Cheng shouted. “What’s going on?!”

“Why is it getting dark?!” Jiang Yanli asked, turning this way and that.

Wen Qing frowned, “He must be falling unconscious. The next memory we see will probably be after he wakes up.”

Unfortunately for them, it wasn’t.

“Is that… humming?” Lan Xichen asked.

Light began to appear, and a bustling, life-filled town formed around them. The very last place Lan Wangji would ever take Wei Wuxian when the whole world was out to get him.

“No,” Madam Yu shook her head. “No, this better not be a flashback-”

“I believe it is,” Wen Ruohan said, cutting her off. By the narrowing of his eyes, anyone would be able to tell he was less than pleased by this update.

A flashback? Now?! When Wei Wuxian had just been stabbed?!

~~A few weeks ago, at the request of the future’s juniors, a large group of spirits began putting the memories for the simulation together. When one of them brought up the idea of inserting a flashback here, the group’s subsequent laughter had frightened the youngest residents of Gusu into fleeing back into town, away from the unseen, cackling figures in the forest.~~

Red and yellow leaves fluttered by — not at all matching the season they had just been in — and were carried up by a soft breeze into a sunny sky.

“It was autumn in the hunting grounds of Phoenix Mountain,” Lan Jingyi explained. “Hundreds to thousands of cultivators gathered there, a place where demons and beasts often lurked, to hunt for an allotted period of time. Large sects would be displaying their skill, and rogue cultivators would also gather, eager to make themselves known.”

“Are you kidding me?!” Jin Zixuan asked. “A competition?! What we were watching in the future is a million times more important than that!”

“W-well, maybe it will be like the archery competition the Wens hosted?” Jiang Yanli suggested. “And-and it’ll lead to something more important?”

“Maybe,” Madam Yu said, though she sounded thoroughly unconvinced.

It was a strange sort of whiplash, to go back to something like this. They had started in this sense of normalcy, with the disciples being sent to the Cloud Recesses, but they most certainly hadn't ended there.

But the war was over. Things were going back to normal.

Supposedly.

~~The underlying feeling of dread throughout the watchers remained as strong as ever.~~

Within the most embellished and extravagant tower, the sect leaders, elders, and other high ranking members looked down at the pathway with their families. Behind them, rows and rows of maids carried fans, shades, and drinks, ready to offer support whenever requested. The women in the front rows covered their faces with small fans, remaining quiet and reserved as they gazed over the hunting grounds.

However, a moment later, that reservation disappeared.

"Oh," one gasped.

"Look, look," another whispered. "Over there!"

Excitement buzzed through the crowd. Women surged closer to get a better look, barely remembering to keep up appearances when faced with what was below.

"It's the Twin Jades!"

A slight, embarrassed blush appeared on Lan Xichen's face at the cheering, but he nevertheless appeared a little excited as he watched his and Lan Wangji's future selves ride in on horseback.

"In night-hunts, horses weren't actually needed when hunting down prey," Lan Jingyi summarized for them as the young women began to excitedly toss flowers down. "However, horsemanship was one of the arts that clan disciples were required to study. During formal events, entering on horseback was not only a symbol of respect, but would create an atmosphere of grandeur for the rest of the event."

Nie Mingjue levied a long look at Nie Huaisang, who had often declared his lack of interest in learning such things.

"Boiled down, there was no practical use — it was just for aesthetics."

Nie Mingjue seemed to falter at that description, while Nie Huaisang became increasingly smug.

"Well, it's-" Jin Zixuan began, only to pause as well, not really able to counter that.

Madam Yu rolled her eyes: "There's plenty of value in taking the time to give importance to important things. Would you rather go around showing disrespect to everyone you meet?"

“But no one uses it for anything else, right?” Nie Huaisang piped up, before turning to his Da-ge. “Even you’ve always said that you’d be willing to let me ‘flounce around on nothing more than a pony’ so long as I practiced my swordsmanship.”

“The issue is that you didn’t practice your swordsmanship even after agreeing to that,” Nie Mingjue scolded back.

He was about to continue but paused upon seeing the simulated Hanguang-jun suddenly raise his hand, stopping a flower that was coming from behind him. Well accustomed to receiving this sort of attention since they were thirteen, Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen were never anything other than poised while doing such processions.

What made this flower different, however, was who it was from.

Lan Wangji glanced behind and saw an impatient Jiang Cheng sitting next to a casual, seemingly-distracted Wei Wuxian. However, by this point, Lan Wangji had a far more thorough understanding of Wei Wuxian than his fifteen year old self had.

“Wangji? What’s wrong?” Lan Xichen asked, seeing that his brother was no longer moving forward.

“Wei Ying,” he said in response, feeling that was more than enough of an explanation.

(In many ways, it was.)

Jiang Yanli couldn’t resist a slight giggle at that.

“What?” Wei Wuxian turned around, as though suddenly being alerted to Lan Wangji’s presence. “Hanguang-jun, did you call me? What’s up?”

Innocent to a T.

“Oh no,” Jiang Cheng buried his face in his hands.

“Well, I am at least glad you two don’t seem antagonistic to each other,” Wen Qing commented, remembering their interactions in the last few flashbacks. No longer being at war ~~with her family~~ seemed to be helping them both.

Holding the flower out for Wei Wuxian to see, Lan Wangji coldly asked, “Was this you?”

“No, it wasn’t,” Wei Wuxian shook his head.

“Don’t believe him! It was him!” the maiden by his side shouted at once, smiling widely.

Wei Wuxian gasped and clutched at his chest, feelings of betrayal shining in his eyes as he said, “No, how could you treat a good person like this? I’m getting angry!”

Giggling, the maidens began moving back to their sects, knowing it was the Jiangs’ turn to move forward soon.

“Ah, like this, he really does look like the same A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli commented. With the similarities in Wei Wuxian and Mo Xuanyu’s appearance (especially given that Wei Wuxian styled his hair the same way he had when he was younger), it had almost felt like they were one identity, while the Yiling Patriarch was another. Like this, however, the softness she was used to seeing in Wei Wuxian was as apparent as ever.

She was glad to see it.

Then-

“Zewu-jun, Hanguang-jun, apologies. Don’t pay attention to him,” Jiang Cheng requested, throwing an annoyed look at an unrepentant Wei Wuxian’s way.

Lan Xichen smiled: “It’s fine. I will thank Wei-gongzi for his kindness behind the flower in place of Wangji.”

“Xiongzhang!” Lan Wangji hissed.

Lan Xichen turned to him and asked, “What? Don’t you think it’s sweet of him?”

“But… but he…”

“Well of course he means it!” Lan Xichen insisted, whispering just barely loud enough for Madam Jin to hear it and nod in unwavering agreement. “You’ve seen what he does after he comes back to life, haven’t you? From what I can tell, he’s quite interested.”

For the first time in a while, a pink blush formed on Lan Wangji’s ears.

The Lans rode off into the distance, and the Jiangs moved into position. As they did, Jiang Cheng glanced over at Wei Wuxian.

“Why are you throwing out flowers along with the girls?”

“Ah, Jiang-xiong,” Nie Huaisang sighed. “You’re so naive when it comes to matters of the heart.”

“I am not!”

“I think he looks nice. Can’t I throw a few as well?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Jiang Cheng pointed his nose in the air and huffed: “How old are you?! Who do you think you are, still playing tricks like that?”

“Tricks?” Madam Jin repeated, quite amused.

Nie Huaisang sent a smug ‘I-told-you-so’ look Jiang Cheng’s way, and there was nothing the heir could say in response.

“What, you want one too?” Wei Wuxian teased back. “There’s still quite a lot left on the ground. Should I get one for you?”

“Oh, get lost!”

At that moment, Jin Guangyao’s voice rang out: “The Qinghe Nie Sect’s Riding formation enters.”

Jin Zixuan couldn’t help but tense upon hearing his voice.

Nie Mingjue sat tall as the formation came in, unquestioned and confident as one could be. This time the women hesitated, then lowered their hands, unwilling to throw the flowers lest they anger such an intimidating man.

On the other hand, the males in the audience began cheering like crazy.

“Oh, how pitiful, Da-ge,” Nie Huaisang sniffled.

“Pitiful? What’s pitiful?”

Nie Huaisang just continued his silent mourning, realizing that things would be much easier for Nie Mingjue if he was interested in men. Then again, man or woman, Nie Huaisang had never really seen his brother show interest in anyone. The closest Nie Mingjue got to that was his favor of Meng Yao-

In any case, Nie Huaisang continued to send Nie Mingjue a pitying gaze.

Beside Nie Mingjue was Nie Huaisang, dressed with as much care as always. He wore a saber on his waist that was outshone by the glimmering jewels covering his clothes, and everyone present knew he wouldn’t be using that saber during the competition. If anything, he was far more likely to just head off to a place with a nice view and watch the sunset.

Wen Ruohan frowned, glancing between the still silently-sobbing Nie Huaisang and the simulated version before him. Through the simulation, there had been a few times that the Nie heir had seemed, strange as it was to believe, slightly dangerous to Wen Ruohan. Not physically, of course, but the feeling had been undeniable.

Looking at him now, that was nearly impossible to believe.

(Which, in some ways, just made him all the more concerning.)

Following them, the Jiang Sect came. Flowers rained down once again, making Jiang Cheng’s face darken and Wei Wuxian’s light up. He turned and waved at Jiang Yanli, who was sitting up in the grandest tower next to Madam Jin. Upon seeing that, Jiang Yanli brightened, said a polite (if quick) goodbye to Madam Jin, and walked to the edge of the balcony to join the others in throwing flowers at her shidis.

Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but allow a slight bit of pride to show on his face at that, and Jiang Yanli’s smile widened at her brother's obvious happiness. Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan began to smile as well, somewhat surprised to see his mother and fiance spending time together like that. He had come to truly like Jiang Yanli, and he wanted her to like his family too. She seemed a little uncomfortable right now, but, given time….

(Those had been Madam Jin's exact thoughts regarding Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli for a few years now. The past Jin Zixuan had been quite adamant about that never happening, but, given how wrong he had apparently been, it didn't seem unrealistic to hope.)

When Jiang Yanli had gotten ready to throw the flowers, she had done so by reaching back as far as she could and then throwing the flowers as hard as possible, trying to make up for her weak cultivation with earnestness. For a moment she seemed to stumble, the force of the throw shaking her balance, but she steadied herself a moment later. The simulated Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian had reached out at the same time and caught the flowers together, both giving her soft smiles in return.

Wen Ruohan hummed to himself. Once again, he was reminded that, whatever he felt about the situation, Wei Wuxian was happy with the Jiangs. If he genuinely wasn't, he could have left at any time. His gratitude towards Jiang Fengmian most certainly played a part, but Jiang Yanli and Jiang Cheng also held special places in his heart.

With Madam Yu taken out of the picture, the situation might be different.

Wen Ruohan glanced toward the simulated sky, wondering how, exactly, Jiang Fengmian was faring alone.

(Then again, if he hadn't been able to stop his own wife from taking action, then he couldn't be trusted with Wei Wuxian long term. It was only a matter of time before something went wrong, and Jiang Fengmian would surely be as passive as always in the face of that.)

(And, most importantly, the world turned against Wei Wuxian while Jiang Cheng was his sect leader. Madam Yu wasn't around anymore; she couldn't be the cause. So then, what was?)

Suddenly, a row of cultivators wearing white, gold-lined robes rushed out, donning ivory armor and riding on broad stallions. At the front, wearing the most extravagant armor of all, was Jin Guangshan.

Up on the towers, Madam Jin stepped forward, patting Jiang Yanli on the shoulder and pointing below. A single horse ran forward and did a circle around the square. Its rider, wearing snow-white robes and a vermillion mark on his forehead, was Jin Zixuan.

He drew his bow, then, briefly, glanced toward the towers.

"Oh, a courting ritual?" Nie Huaisang perked up. "How very peacock-like of you, Young Master Jin!"

Jin Zixuan blushed bright, bright red, shouting, "That's not it!"

Jiang Yanli's cheeks turned red as well, but she sobered slightly as she pointed out, "Given how our last interaction in the simulation went, I don't believe this version of young master

Jin has a very positive opinion of me."

"I'll learn better!" Jin Zixuan insisted. "I'll see the error of my ways!"

Wei Wuxian didn't seem like he would agree.

"I can't believe it," he muttered. "He really is just a peacock."

"Watch it," Jiang Cheng scolded. "A-Jie is still watching from the tower."

Wei Wuxian shrugged: "Don't worry. As long as he doesn't make Shijie cry again, I won't pay any attention."

Jin Zixuan flinched slightly at those words, and, once again, internally promised himself that he would do anything in his power to win Wei Wuxian's approval. Jiang Yanli was more than worth that.

"...You shouldn't have brought her in the first place."

"The Lanling Jin Sect insisted on it. I didn't have the face to refuse."

Hearing that, Madam Yu couldn't help but scowl.

"Oh, so our Jiang Sect is that inferior to the Lanling Jins?" she wondered. "You're right that A-Li should attend such events, but that's hardly the reason why."

(She knew Madam Jin was no longer friends with her because her other self had advocated for Wei Wuxian letting Jin Zixuan die. That didn't change the fact that Madam Yu felt more than a little betrayed by her once friend.)

"Well now," Jin Guangshan laughed, "I'm sure Young Master Jiang's future self meant no such thing. Our families have been friends for years. Doing a few small favors doesn't mean one's better than the other."

"And besides," Wen Ruohan couldn't help but pipe in. "If the future Jiang Wanyin really does think the Jiangs are weaker, despite having the Yiling Patriarch on their side, then his current actions are no surprise. Wasn't the request of a maid enough for you to whip your head disciple and consider giving over his hand?"

"This and that are completely different," Madam Yu hissed, and Jiang Cheng paled at the reminder of that day.

Wen Ruohan tilted his head in acknowledgement, ending the conversation there. No one present was dumb enough to think Madam Yu had actually changed his mind about anything, though.

While they were speaking, and although no one was really paying attention, the simulation had continued.

In response to Jiang Cheng's previous answer, Wei Wuxian had grumbled back, commenting that Madam Jin was the one who had insisted on Jiang Yanli's presence (undoubtedly as a way to get her and Jin Zixuan to spend more time together). His thoughts made him so annoyed that it took the cheering of the crowd for him to turn his focus back on Jin Zixuan again.

The Jin heir had ridden into the target area.

Nervousness filled Jin Zixuan, and he turned his head to see if Jiang Yanli was watching. She wasn't.

Instead, she was looking with concern at her fuming mother. Given what had just happened between Madam Yu and Wen Ruohan, there was really no way she could be looking anywhere else.

Jin Zixuan blushed at how self-centered his own thoughts had been. Put into perspective, his other-self's demonstration now seemed much less important.

The crowds in the simulation, on the other hand, appeared more excited than ever.

"To enter this competition, there was a test one had to pass first," Lan Sizhui reported, as the simulation moved to display the row of targets in front of Jin Zixuan. "The seven rings on the targets represented the seven different paths available to participants. People who hit the smallest ring would be able to enter through the most favorable path, and each successively larger ring became paths with fewer and easier prey."

'...Then hypothetically, if you fail to hit the target at all, would you not have to compete?' Nie Huaisang wondered in exactly the same way his future self had when he had first heard of this.

Jin Zixuan took out an arrow, hooked it, pulled back and aimed, then shot.

Dead center.

A roar of cheers came from all around, and the simulated Jin Zixuan seemed to puff up in pride.

'A war happened. I die, A-Li dies, A-Li's parents die, Nie Huaisang's brother dies, we still don't know why Lan-er-gongzi ended up whipped, and A-Ling just stabbed Wei Wuxian in the future,' the real Jin Zixuan thought. 'This feels…'

"Is something wrong?"

Jin Zixuan jumped slightly, then turned to his right where the voice had come from. Lan Wangji stared back at him evenly, waiting for a response.

"I just… I don't know, I feel a bit weird. It was an abrupt change, after what we saw with A-Ling and Wei Wuxian."

Lan Wangji nodded in agreement, not pressing further, but seemingly aware there was more than what Jin Zixuan was saying.

In the roaring noise, surrounded on all sides by the cheers for his other-self, Jin Zixuan couldn't help but stumble out "I-I don't really know why I feel this way. But this — I mean — we were talking about the horses earlier, you know. And how they were just theatrics. And there was that whole thing going on with Wei Wuxian refusing to bring his sword around for who knows what reason, and it just… it all feels a bit shallow, I guess. Three-fourths of us are dead in the future, and I don't really see why the simulation is showing us this."

Lan Wangji had been wondering the same thing. Nevertheless:

"There is still some value in celebration," Lan Wangji pointed out. "We need to appreciate what we have while we have it, don't we?"

Even as he said that though, his expression seemed to falter into annoyance when the simulated Jin Zixuan's victory lap passed in front of him. Jin Zixuan blushed deeper.

"But… you agree with me too?" he asked.

Lan Wangji pursed his lips minutely before nodding: "I do. It's something to consider, at least."

"Yeah," Jin Zixuan sighed.

(He was a little glad that the two of them had been speaking quietly enough to keep his parents from hearing. The more time he spent thinking throughout the simulation, the more his thoughts seemed to be turning in directions his parents wouldn't quite agree with.

(And the more that happened, the more he started to feel like that might not be such a bad thing.)

When the cheers finally died down, a Jin disciple stepped forward.

"If anyone still remains unconvinced, then try for yourself to see if you can shoot better than Zixuan!" Jin Zixun shouted.

Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng, who had remained unimpressed by the display, seemed to perk up at that. Although Jiang Cheng quickly talked himself out of it, Wei Wuxian turned considering.

'Just a little while ago, at the LanlingJin Sect's flower banquet, an argument broke out between me and Jin Zixuan,' he recalled, smiling as Jin Zixun turned and made direct eye contact with him. 'I see. I bet all this is here to provoke me.'

"Oh, that's not going to go well," Nie Huaisang muttered.

"Hey, I did okay!" Jin Zixuan protested, more than a little embarrassed by what his cousin had said. "I didn't embarrass myself."

“Yet.”

Nie Mingjue groaned: “Huaisang, you’re not even going to try when it’s your turn.”

“Well of course not. Competing over archery is stupid anyways.”

There were protests from many of the juniors, and Wen Qing felt her smile turn a little whimsical. If her brother had been given a chance to perfect his technique in the years since the previous archery competition, he might have wanted to compete as well. Perhaps, in their world, he could.

(But in this one, the Wen Sect had lost the war, and she still didn’t know where her brother was.)

(Or when, exactly, he became a fierce corpse.)

But within the simulation, even Wei Wuxian wasn’t worried about that quite yet. The sects went one after another, their members aiming and firing at the targets without delay. Then, it was the Jiang Sect’s turn.

“Hey, Lan Zhan, want to help me?”

Lan Wangji glanced over questioningly, and Jiang Cheng grumbled, “What are you up to this time?”

Lan Qiren sighed, sensing the mischief in Wei Wuxian’s tone. Despite that, the teacher’s eyes were warm.

(Unpredictable though he may be, Wei Wuxian was never untrustworthy.)

“What is it?” the second jade asked.

“Can I borrow your forehead ribbon?”

“What?!” Lan Qiren shrieked, mentally taking back everything he had just thought about Wei Wuxian.

“Now, now, Uncle,” Lan Xichen grinned. “Given what the future Wangji does while drunk, I’d say Wei Wuxian has every right to take-”

“Not in public!”

However, as they all knew, the Wei Wuxian being shown at this point in time didn’t know what the ribbon signified.

“Ah,” Lan Xichen cleared his throat. “Young Master Wei, you may not know this, but…”

“Brother, there is no need,” Lan Wangji interjected.

“I bet Hanguang-jun would have said yes,” Madam Jin proposed.

Lan Xichen beamed at the thought.

Gritting his teeth, Jiang Cheng hissed, “You knew he wasn’t going to say yes. Why did you ask for his forehead ribbon? Want to hang yourself and commit suicide? I can lend you my belt. You’re welcome.”

“Ha! You can keep your belt,” Wei Wuxian replied, slipping a black ribbon off his wrist guard. “I wouldn’t want that even if I can’t have his forehead ribbon.”

“You-”

“If you have your own ribbon, why ask for his in the first place?!” the real Jiang Cheng growled, overcome by embarrassment. Knowing what the ribbon meant, he legitimately couldn’t believe Wei Wuxian had asked for it so openly. What if someone got the wrong idea?! Mo Xuanyu might be, but it wasn’t like Wei Wuxian was a real cutsleeve-

Before anyone had even realized what was happening, Wei Wuxian had tugged Lan Wangji close, kissing him on the lips.

That memory brought an even stronger feeling of discomfort to Jiang Cheng, but he was forced to amend that previous thought. It definitely seemed like there was more going on than just the feelings of Mo Xuanyu’s body.

And Lan Wangji made Wei Wuxian happy but-

Jiang Wanyin buried his face in his hands, not knowing what he was trying to say.

By this point, however, even the simulated Jiang Cheng had stopped talking, eyes widening as he realized what Wei Wuxian wanted the ribbon for. It had been tied around his eyes, blinding him completely.

“No way,” Jin Zixuan gaped. “He’s not going to-”

Wei Wuxian rode forward, aimed, and fired.

It hit!

It all happened so fast, no one had even been able to react in disbelief before Wei Wuxian won. There was a moment of silence, then overwhelming cheers — even louder than the ones that had appeared for Jin Zixuan — rang out through the grounds.

‘Interesting,’ Wen Ruohan thought.

What the Jins had been doing just then went beyond just Jin Zixuan and Wei Wuxian. Jin Zixun’s words and the lack of spoken opposition to them had been a way to show the Jins as the unquestionable leaders of the event. It was a far more subtle method than Wen Ruohan’s seating arrangements at the archery competition, but, overtime, it would be effective nonetheless. The Jins were funding the event as the richest sect after the war; they could set things like this up however they pleased. No matter what happened on the mountain after, this was what the audience was watching so this was the part they would remember.

But, with a single shot, Wei Wuxian had just undermined that entirely.

The corners of Wei Wuxian's lips curved slightly and he gave a mock-bow to the crowd, casually tossing the bow back to demonstrate that he was finished. Seeing that Wei Wuxian's popularity had exceeded Jin Zixuan's, Jin Zixun snorted loudly, broadcasting his displeasure.

"This is only the opening archery event, and you're already acting so ostentatiously!" he scoffed. "You have your eyes covered now, but do you really think you'll be able to keep them covered throughout the hunt? When we're on Phoenix Mountain, we'll be able to see who's truly superior."

"Zixun!" Jin Zixuan protested, beyond embarrassed. "You can't just… please shut up."

He buried his face in his hands, and sank down deeper when Jiang Yanli gave a little laugh and patted the area around his head consolingly.

Meanwhile, Madam Yu couldn't help a slight frown. She didn't know why, but for some reason, after Jin Zixun spoke, she could hear her own words ringing out.

'A-Li, stop peeling that! You're the master here, not somebody's servant!' she had said.

The way Jiang Fengmian reacted every time she used that word brought her a bitter sort of amusement.

And the people in the future said much the same. Blamed him for far more. They said he was responsible for the destruction of Lotus Pier. They talked about how he 'bit the hand that fed him' and had been the main factor in her and Jiang Fengmian's deaths.

'You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!'

She had never been fond of Madam Jin's nephew. Jin Zixun's cultivation was atrocious, and he had never truly managed to accomplish anything except bothering the women around him. She and Jin Zixun were hardly comparable people.

(But they might be a little more similar than she'd like to admit.)

At that moment, a firework shot into the sky. The signal for the beginning of the competition was released.

A stampede of horses darted forward, Jin Zixun pushing to the front with a determination set in his gaze. His riding posture was impeccable — an obvious indication of having received the best training possible.

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng hadn't moved at all.

“Sect Leader Jiang, Young Master Wei,” Jin Guangshan moved closer. “What? You aren’t going to enter the mountain yet? If you’re too careless, Zixun might steal all your prey.”

A casual shrug: “No need to rush. He won’t be able to.”

The simulated Jin Guangshan was far from the only one to react with surprise.

However, that was only among the illusionary figures. The real Jin Guangshan, along with all the other watchers, remained unmoved. It would take a lot to surprise them now.

‘Even after the war, my other self seems to have only a surface level understanding of what Wei Wuxian can do,’ the real Jin Guangshan thought. ‘That makes sense, I suppose. He probably wasn’t able to see it first-hand like we were. Still, we haven’t seen what the Stygian Tiger Seal is capable of when wielded by its master. He must know more about it than us. I’m surprised he’s still so skeptical.’

Wen Ruohan glanced at the simulated crowd, who watched in blatant confusion as Wei Wuxian dismounted his horse and told Jiang Cheng to go ahead, still wearing the blindfold all the while. He had thought the same thing as Jin Guangshan, but his conclusion was slightly different.

‘They must think the reports they received were exaggerated,’ the Chief Cultivator thought. ‘Everyone thought the same about Wen Zhuliu, until the sect leaders saw him in action. Zhuliu is at least from a family of cultivators; it must be that much harder to believe that Wei Wuxian, the son of a servant who invented his style of cultivation, is capable of so much.’

He paused once more, looking up at the departing Sect Leader Jiang.

‘If you would just-’

“Take it easy,” Jiang Cheng called back over his shoulder. “Back down when it’s good enough.”

Wei Wuxian waved his hand casually, and the Jiang Sect departed towards the mountain.

And then, Wei Wuxian began to move as well.

The watchers were brought forward in time, getting various snippets of Wei Wuxian’s walk one after another. He ducked under the low-hanging branches of trees, hopped over large rocks, and spread his arms wide, balancing precariously on a fallen log as he used it to cross the shallow stream below. A blinding smile remained on his face the entire time, and the blindfold remained over his eyes just the same.

Lan Wangji swallowed, feeling all at once nostalgic and guilty, when he considered what his simulated self had done. The Lan Wangji being shown in the simulation might be older than the watching Lan Wangji was, but, watching now, the second jade couldn’t help but view his other-self as incomparably young.

There was a wall between this version of Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian, and, despite having received the title, the way this one acted was vastly different from how ‘Hanguang-jun’ did.

‘Was this you?’ Lan Wangji coldly asked, holding out the flower.

‘Thank you,’ Lan Wangji wished his other self had said. The Yiling Patriarch was still Wei Wuxian; if he had heard that, Lan Wangji had no doubt an enormous blush would have covered his face. Wei Wuxian would have tried to laugh the gratitude off, but anyone would have been able to see how it affected him.

If Lan Wangji had accepted the flower, and Wei Wuxian had seen-

‘Can I borrow your forehead ribbon?’ Wei Wuxian asked.

And, if Lan Wangji had answered ‘always,’ and taken it off in front of his Uncle and brother-

A blush, much like the one Lan Wangji had just been imagining on Wei Wuxian, appeared on his own cheeks and ears.

It had been beyond embarrassing to watch his future self tie his forehead ribbon around Wei Wuxian’s wrists, but, between that and the wall that existed between them now…

Lan Wangji couldn’t exactly say he preferred the latter.

(Now if only he understood why, every time Wei Wuxian expressed any interest at all, the far future Lan Wangji would back away. He even went so far as to knock himself out one time, and Lan Wangji didn’t have even the slightest idea why.)

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian had continued on his way, literally stopping to smell the roses whenever he could. The competition had been chosen at a very odd time, so it was surprising to see the plum trees in full bloom. They seemed to have somehow been bred to flourish all year round. Although Wei Wuxian couldn’t see them right now, his senses were more than good enough to tell they were there. To any outsider, he would appear to be a blind young master wandering through a garden, rather than a genius cultivator ready to hunt.

And then, a change occurred.

There was a hiss in the distance, and the sound of something slithering close by. The watchers, rather unexpectedly, were brought into first person point of view for the first time since the simulation began.

Even stranger, this point of view had a line of sight practically on the ground.

“What is this?” Madam Yu demanded, disliking the unexpected turn of events. Everyone else looked around as well, but couldn’t quite make out what was going on. Then, the snake reached its target.

Wei Wuxian was sitting down, having found a bunny mid-walk which was now situated in his lap. From their low hanging first person point of view, the watchers saw a line of vertically stacked blocks appear next to Wei Wuxian, seemingly being used to measure his height.

The watchers' confusion only increased.

"...The spirits must have added the blocks in, right?" Wen Qing speculated. "To demonstrate what this being was thinking."

Jiang Cheng scowled: "Okay, but who would be thinking about-"

His question was answered a moment later, when Wei Wuxian seemingly noticed the being approaching him and they switched to a third person point of view.

"Wait-"

"Is that-"

"A measuring snake?" Wei Wuxian asked, sensing its presence despite the blindfold over his eyes. The snake straightened itself up before him, hissing dangerously.

Jiang Yanli looked around at the other watchers, confused by their reactions, and asked, "Is… is that bad? I didn't think a measuring snake would be a threat to A-Xian."

"Uh, it's probably not," Nie Mingjue agreed. "It's just a little unusual to see one right now. They said it's autumn, right? Measuring snakes are docile during this season, so it's actually pretty weird to see one out."

"This one seems rather young, too," Lan Xichen pointed out.

Jiang Yanli blinked: "Then… what is it doing?"

"Ah, well…"

While they had been speaking, the snake had done everything it could to explain. It lifted its tail, pointing at itself, then pointed towards the sky, head held high. It then pointed at the still kneeling Wei Wuxian. The bunny that had been on Wei Wuxian's lap ran off in fear.

Everything paused for a moment, and two black bars formed. One, at Wei Wuxian's height; the other, at the snake's. The snake's line ended up approximately three centimeters higher.

"I…" Jiang Yanli was befuddled. "It's not attacking."

"Right, cause it's docile right now," Jiang Cheng confirmed, completely without humor.

"Then what is it-"

Nie Huaisang snickered on the side.

But Wei Wuxian grinned as well. If the snake knew anything about his reputation, it might have known to not be so easily fooled by his seemingly defenseless form. For, at that moment, Wei Wuxian stood up!

"Ha! You wanna defeat me in height? You can't 'cause you're too short!" Wei Wuxian cackled, displaying even more arrogance than Jin Zixuan had, giving the snake a thumbs down.

"Are you seriously playing along with it?!" Jiang Cheng asked, and Jiang Yanli couldn't help but join Nie Huaisang's laughter.

Lan Qiren sighed, but seemed simultaneously unsurprised and also (slightly) amused.

The snake moved closer, doubtful, and reached itself up to its fullest height. The horizontal black lines appeared again.

Despite its best efforts, the baby snake was still too short.

There was a pause as that realization settled in.

Then, the tears came.

With a distraught cry, the baby snake began to soak the surrounding grass in salt water, sending full waterfalls of tears falling to the ground. Wei Wuxian appeared victorious and he cackled in glee.

Then a shadow covered him from behind, and the sudden change in temperature alerted him to a new presence. He slowly glanced back, making out the energy of the newcomer as best he could.

The watchers, who could actually see what was going on, saw an older snake with a gentlemanly goatee look down, looming over Wei Wuxian. The Yiling Patriarch paused, gave a blank smile, then turned forward again to avoid any form of eye contact.

A moment later Wei Wuxian had sprinted away, and the simulation showed the older snake chase Wei Wuxian through the forest. The pair began bounding over trees and ducking under branches at lightning fast speeds as the snake hunted down one of the world's strongest cultivators.

"You disgrace of a snake!" Wei Wuxian shouted as he ran. "I can't believe you would have your dad fight your battles for you!"

"It's a snake, Wei Wuxian!" Nie Mingjue shouted at him.

"Now, now, Da-ge, you mustn't discriminate," Lan Xichen said, not bothering to hide his smile. "A snake spirit is a perfectly worthy opponent to face."

"It's a measuring snake!"

“I’m with Er-ge, Da-ge!” Nie Huaisang piped in. “All battles are honorable! A tiger uses its full strength even when hunting a rabbit! And you never know. If the snake truly believes in itself, it might have a shot!”

“This is ridiculous,” Lan Wangji sighed.

A moment later, however, he would find himself frozen in shock. For, as Wei Wuxian continued running from the father snake, he managed to come across someone he recognized.

“Lan Zhan!!!!” he shouted.

The simulated Lan Wangji glanced his way.

“Wei Ying.”

“Help me!!!!”

The sight of the fleeing Wei Wuxian, followed closely by the gigantic snake, spurred Lan Wangji into action. He stepped forward, unsheathing his sword and glaring at his opponent.

The real Lan Wangji subconsciously felt himself preparing for battle as well. Throughout the simulation, there had been far too many instances in which he had failed to help Wei Wuxian. This was hardly something Wei Wuxian needed help with (in fact, Lan Wangji wasn’t sure why Wei Wuxian was doing this at all), but that didn’t change the fact that there was almost nothing he wouldn’t be willing to do to help-

Suddenly, something jumped on top of the simulated Hanguang-jun’s shoulders.

It was Wei Wuxian.

A green horizontal line formed. The grinning Wei Wuxian stood taller than the father snake.

“I…” Lan Wangji gaped. “I…”

But then — in a shocking twist — the snake straightened itself up further, and managed to stand even higher!

Nie Huaisang gave an only somewhat-exaggerated gasp.

Wei Wuxian was similarly shocked.

However, despite what many believed, the Yiling Patriarch’s best weapon had always been his brain. In a flash, an idea came to him. He pulled out Chenqing and raised it as high as he could.

It was just above the second snake.

“This is, legitimately, one of the greatest things I’ve ever seen,” Nie Huaisang laughed.

Not even Wen Qing tried to disagree.

“Oh dear, I won again!” Wei Wuxian exclaimed with a sigh, as if the ease of his victory was proving tiresome. “Who else is in your family? Call the longest one here!”

As he spoke, he swung back and forth. Given his position on Lan Wangji’s shoulders, that meant the impassive Second Jade was swaying back and forth as well.

And Lan Wangji had to try very, very hard not to think about their current position.

(Wei Wuxian jumping on Lan Wangji’s shoulders was a joke, just the same as asking for his forehead ribbon had been. He probably would have been equally happy climbing on anyone’s shoulders, given how open he was with physical contact.)

(And yet, that was still just a slight bit too much.)

A cloud of dust was suddenly thrown into the air, and Wei Wuxian froze mid-word. This time, a measuring snake as tall as a building — this one with a pure white beard — stared down at him.

(A still-crying baby and a trembling father stood farther back, lowering their heads in shame.)

“Woah, this is even more challenging!” Wei Wuxian exclaimed, hopping down from Lan Wangji. Despite the fact that his eyes were covered, the watchers could easily imagine the excitement shining inside.

The simulated Lan Wangji scooted away.

‘That’s all for the best,’ the real Lan Wangji thought, breathing out a sigh of relief. ‘Not only was I not able to provide any real help, but I have no doubt my other-self was just as… distracted as me. Wei Wuxian is amazing and bright and irreplaceable, but he can also be very, very frustrating.”

It would take the second jade every ounce of self control he had to turn his attention to what the simulation was actually focusing on again (and even more focus to make sure his ears weren’t still burning red).

“Alright then,” Wei Wuxian rubbed his hands together as if warming up. “Hey, Lan Zhan, why don’t we-”

He cut off, suddenly realizing that Lan Wangji’s presence was no longer behind him.

“Wangji-xiong!” Nie Huaisang protested. “How could you abandon your darling in his time of need?! He practically begged you for help — or are you not into that?”

“Huaisang!” Nie Mingjue shouted.

“It’s a measuring snake,” Lan Qiren pointed out. “All it’s doing is trying to be taller. During this season it won’t even attack anyone over it. This is a completely ridiculous, arbitrary demonstration that won't impact anything.”

“Which, if you think about it, isn’t too different from the horseback riding we do,” Wen Ruohan posited, and he was answered by an awkward silence all around.

At that moment, however, the watchers’ attention was ensnared by the simulation once again, as a tremendous rumble shook the surrounding trees.

An unknown man gave a tired sigh, “Damn, we chased those high level walking corpses for so long, and he just called them away with his flute.”

He was a Jin disciple, walking next to someone from a sub branch of the Wuyang Sect.

“Ha! I guess he’ll do anything to win the competition.”

“They’re… talking about Wei Wuxian?” Jin Guangshan asked.

Madam Jin hummed consideringly, adding, “I would have thought he’d wait until he was finished with the snakes before he joined the competition. Given the way he was meandering about, he didn’t seem to be in any rush.”

“Hm. Wei Wuxian really is ruthless and cold blooded,” the other agreed. “Hm?”

They both turned to the left.

And, slowly, something faded into existence.

It was a fierce corpse on its hands and knees. Or rather, a moment later, it was revealed to be two — one on top of the other. Then, a half second later, the third formed before their eyes. One by one, the simulation revealed a conceptually unimaginable tower of fierce corpses, teetering wildly as they grabbed onto each other like their (un)lives depended on it. At the top of this obelisk of disaster stood a delighted Wei Wuxian, who was working diligently to not fall down.

Wen Qing couldn’t even begin to describe what her emotional reaction to this sight was.

“I… What?” Nie Mingjue gaped.

Well, that did seem to sum it up fairly accurately.

With a confident stomp, Wei Wuxian secured his position.

“Haha!” His smile nearly blinded all who saw it. “I’m still the winner!”

Out of a deep respect, Nie Huaisang broke into a standing ovation.

The eldest measuring snake fell to the ground in defeat.

"...Yay?" Lan Xichen supposed, not quite sure how to respond.

The world faded to darkness again, and, when light returned, Wei Wuxian had resumed his journey along the paths of Phoenix Mountain, finally finished with his measuring snake side quest.

Most of the watchers just shook their heads in amusement, but Lan Wangji became even more silent than usual. He closed his eyes momentarily, his memories of what just occurred weighing on him with an unusual intensity.

(Throughout this part of the simulation, Wei Wuxian had called out to Lan Wangji over and over again. He had thrown flowers and asked for his forehead ribbon and climbed on top of him with almost no acknowledgment of what those things would mean. He wasn't trying to be cruel, but he was most certainly frustrating in the ~~best~~ worst of ways.)

After walking for some time, Wei Wuxian came across a shaded grove. He reached forward and patted a large tree, testing the sturdiness of its bark.

'Here seems good.'

With a hop, he jumped onto one of the higher branches and sat, leaning against the trunk. Pulling out Chenqing, he began to play.

🎵♪♪🎵♪♪♩

The notes spread through the forest, not going unheard by even a single person there.

And the resentful energy jumped to his command without hesitation.

"Ah, I pity everyone else in that competition," Nie Huaisang said, pretending to wipe a mournful tear from his eyes.

'That should be good enough,' Wei Wuxian thought, leaning back. 'Now all I have to do is wait.'

"S-some of us might do okay," Jin Zixuan attempted.

Nie Huaisang didn't disagree, but he did cast a look at Wei Wuxian, who practically appeared to have fallen asleep.

"I mean… I guess," the Jin heir had to concede.

Even if someone did manage to do better than Wei Wuxian, what did it say that they were so proud of doing better than someone who spent thirty seconds actually working on the hunt itself?

"I mean, of course it's this way," Madam Yu huffed. "Demonic cultivation works completely differently. It's hardly a fair judgment!"

Wen Ruohan laughed: “Are you trying to say that spiritual cultivation doesn’t stand a chance against the demonic kind?”

“For this kind of a competition specifically! It’s hardly a-”

She cut off abruptly.

Lan Wangji turned and glanced in her direction, wondering why she had stopped. Madam Yu stood frozen, mouth still open mid-word.

Lan Wangji looked to the left, then the right.

Everyone was still.

Except for him.

(And Jin Guangshan.)

“Oh? Is this the Concealment Zone?” Jin Guangshan asked. “I thought we had only made that activate for intimate scenes. Why is it in place now?”

“...The application Wei Ying added picked what scenes to skip ahead of time based on our request,” Lan Wangji pointed out. “Perhaps it just got confused-”

There was a crunch of leaves.

Lan Wangji glanced over, and saw his other self standing there.

“I…” he paused, suddenly growing uncertain.

‘No killing intent,’ the simulated Wei Wuxian observed. ‘Who is it?’

He waited for a bit, but no greeting came.

‘I can feel their gaze on me. What? Not in a talkative mood?’

The silence reigned.

“...You’re here for the hunt?”

“...”

“Well, you won’t find any good spots around me.”

The simulated Hanguang-jun paused, then walked a few steps closer.

Lan Wangji looked back and forth between his other self and Wei Wuxian, his composure slipping away by the second.

‘Huh, this is kinda nice,’ Wei Wuxian thought, still just as confident as ever. ‘Most cultivators act a little scared of me these days. They won’t approach even when there’s a lot of people around, much less when we're alone.*'

The smile on his face was even more genuine than usual.

'I would've thought they were trying to attack me, if it weren't for the lack of malicious intent.'

Lan Wangji swallowed.

Wei Wuxian sat up, tilting his head in Lan Wangji's direction as he smiled, opening his mouth to speak. Then-

"Mphf-!" his voice was suddenly stolen. Hanguang-jun had come forward, slamming Wei Wuxian's back against the tree behind him due to his speed. When the Yiling Patriarch reached up to remove his blindfold, Lan Wangji grabbed his wrists, pressing them against the trunk as well.

His lips were now covering Wei Wuxian's own.

Wei Wuxian's leg, which had been raised to kick his attacker, suddenly faltered in his shock. The warmth of the other's mouth on his froze him in place, and the slight, fearful shaking of his attacker had him lowering his leg.

'They're… kissing me?' he realized. 'Although this maiden seems quite strong, she also appears to be scared. Easily embarrassed, too. She seems nervous.'

Although Lan Wangji flinched slightly at the 'maiden' description, he couldn't deny the rest of it.

'If she wasn't scared, there would have been no reason to approach me while I'm blindfolded. She must have had to muster up all the courage inside of her to even attempt this. Besides, her cultivation seems fairly powerful, so her sense of pride must be high as well. If I pull off my ribbon and reveal her identity, how ashamed would she be…'

'She' would be mortified. Lan Wangji knew that if his other self had been caught while doing this, he would have shriveled up on the spot and died. It was a weakness, to give into temptation like this.

But if Wei Wuxian hadn't been so frustrating all the time — always flirting and teasing but never meaning any of it — if he hadn't constantly misunderstood what Lan Wangji was asking him to come to Gusu for — if he, himself, had just been able to explain better-

Lan Wangji knew, from the future, that Wei Wuxian was interested in him, too. But as far as this past version of him knew, the closest Wei Wuxian would get to discussing relationships with him was what happened with Luo Qingyang. What could he do but assume that any seemingly-flirtatious acts Wei Wuxian did toward him were just jokes — born out of an enjoyment of embarrassing the second jade of Lan.

So, to the Hanguang-jun of this time, Wei Wuxian was something untouchable in all the most painful ways; always flickering and shining before his eyes, but never close enough to truly reach.

But now? Now Hanguang-jun's lips became more aggressive, switching from soft pecks around the edges to a more forceful penetration. Wei Wuxian's mouth had been relaxed all the while, so it gave way easily and allowed the other to intrude inside. A flush began to form on his cheeks, his still-trapped hands fidgeting as the seconds passed by.

'It's hard to breathe,' he thought, trying to turn his face away. However, Lan Wangji acted before he could, grabbing onto his face and turning it back, giving himself even better access. The hands which had been grabbing Wei Wuxian's wrists were now holding onto his chin and the back of his head, giving him full control. Wei Wuxian's hands, now released, moved as if to stop him, only to falter under the intensity of the experience.

'I feel… dizzy,' Wei Wuxian thought.

Heat began to fill Lan Wangji's body as well, and he could practically feel his brain turning to mush.

But Wei Wuxian was so-

He-

In the state Lan Wangji was in now, there was no way to properly finish that sentence. He could only continue to watch.

And listen.

(The sounds were almost worse.)

When Lan Wangji had first acted, Wei Wuxian's uneasy tension had turned into a startled intake of breath. It then became muffled exclamation of confusion, as Lan Wangji's lips covered his own. Slowly, though, as breathing became more and more difficult for him, the main noise in the otherwise silent area of the forest became short, cut-off gasps for air, intermixed with a few surprisingly high-pitched squeaks as Wei Wuxian's struggles increased.

Then, when Wei Wuxian started to feel dizzy, something else came. Lan Wangji had never personally heard it before, but he had caught a few troublemakers in previous years, and had picked up on a few details from their conversations.

The simulated Hanguang-jun stuck his tongue especially deep and Lan Wangji heard Wei Wuxian moan.

Once again he had to swallow, covering his mouth with one hand as he took a shaky step back. He wanted to cover his eyes but he couldn't bring himself to.

(Not that it would matter either way. This image of Wei Wuxian — red-faced, held in place, and practically gasping for more — would be sealed into his memory until the day he died.)

Wei Wuxian's body had become almost entirely limp, as though the sheer force of what he was experiencing was enough to bring him to his knees. He was shaking slightly, and Lan Wangji had never seen his skin glow in a more gorgeous red.

It was beautiful, and-

And…

And it was wrong.

'What am I doing?' Lan Wangji thought, and the flush in his ears vanished as though someone had poured a barrel of cold water over his head. 'I… what am I….'

He took another step back, this time, in horror.

'No matter how frustrated I was getting… no matter how much I thought I would never get a chance like this again… no matter how much it seemed like Wei Wuxian would never actually understand me….'

Now, a feeling like nausea was starting to rise up in younger form of Hanguang-jun.

'Wei Ying was blindfolded and tried to escape, at least at first. He didn't say yes. This version of me doesn't know what I know — he thinks Wei Wuxian didn't want this. Doesn't want him. And I… I pressed him against a tree and took him. This is worse than taking him to the Cloud Recesses. At least that was just for his own protection. This is…'

By now, both of Lan Wangji's eyes were wider than they had ever been before, and the gravity of what his other self had just done finally set in.

'This is assault,' he thought.

It was wrong.

Lan Wangji looked to the side, and saw the frozen figures of the other watchers.

How would Lan Qiren react, if he knew his nephew had done this? If he had seen how his nephew, who he had raised with the utmost consideration after what Qingheng-jun had done, followed the worst of the rumors surrounding the sect leader. What sort of expression would he give? Would it be hate? Disgust? Horror?

(Shame, despite the fact that this was Lan Wangji's sin, and not his own?)

Wei Wuxian made another whimpering sound.

And Lan Wangji flinched.

(Because it didn't matter if it seemed like Wei Wuxian was accepting it. He hadn't known that when he started, so that didn't make it okay.)

And how would Lan Xichen react? He had been so supportive of their relationship. First, in terms of getting Lan Wangji a friend, and later, maybe more.

But now….

And what about the Jiangs? Lan Wangji had been so furious at them when he saw how they treated Wei Wuxian. When Madam Yu whipped him for no reason, and when Jiang Wanyin had choked him that day in the rain…. When the future Jiang Cheng used a dog to torture Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji had been ready to fight.

But if they knew about this, they would be the ones up in arms, ready to protect Wei Wuxian.

(From him.)

How Jiang Yanli would react wasn't even under question.

And, over time, everyone else had grown attached to Wei Wuxian too. Nie Mingjue, Nie Huaisang, Wen Qing, Madam Jin, Jin Zixuan, Wen Ruohan — and what did it say that even Wen Ruohan would have the moral high ground over him in this?

With Wen Chao and Wen Xu gone, the only one who might react differently would be-

Lan Wangji paused, then turned. His gaze fell on the only other still-sentient person in the room.

Jin Guangshan.

"Oh my," the old Sect Leader whispered. "I certainly didn't expect this from you."

Lan Wangji couldn't move a muscle in protest.

There was a wet sound in the background, the two bodies still in contact.

"Perhaps we're more similar than I'd realized," he said.

All Lan Wangji could do was shake his head.

"Come now, you don't have to be ashamed of it," Jin Guangshan said, stepping closer. "You're clearly an amateur here, but that's nothing that can't be fixed with practice. Come on, look at how much he loves it."

And, despite his better judgment, Lan Wangji couldn't stop himself from glancing over once again.

The blindfolded Wei Wuxian was breathing heavily, unable to even lift his limbs as Lan Wangji kissed him over and over again. The bright red color covered his whole body now, and went wonderfully with the black of his robes. Short whimpers left his mouth every once in a while, and, if they weren't covered, his eyes would undoubtedly be-

Lan Wangji looked away.

Jin Guangshan laughed, but it wasn't mocking in the least. It was consoling; understanding. A parent trying to show a child the truth of the world, but understanding why they were having trouble and accepting it all the while.

"We can discuss this later," he offered.

Lan Wangji was no more pleased with that suggestion than the previous one. Jin Guangshan just smiled.

'I already thought it was quite something when Wei Wuxian forced a kiss on the drunk Lan-er-gongzi,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'He had been drunk as well, but that was still quite an interesting thing to watch. And now, we find out that Hanguang-jun did the same thing to Wei Wuxian even earlier — and much more thoroughly too.'

He glanced back at the simulation.

The Yiling Patriarch had proven himself time and time again to be an unparalleled resource. He was a one-man army and could completely flip the tide of a war if he wanted to. Best of all, the complete and total lack of political ambition he had meant whoever gained control of him had nothing to fear on that front.

A perfect weapon, and an ideal tool, so long as you could master it.

(And master it Lan Wangji did.)

A single kiss was enough to leave that monster weak-kneed and panting. The complete and total domination Lan Wangji had over the situation was more than Jin Guangshan had even dreamed of, and offered a few new ideas in itself.

Yiling Patriarch aside, Jin Guangshan knew he did prefer the female form. However, Lan Wangji didn't, and was more than attractive enough on his own. Wouldn't it be quite something, if Jin Guangshan were to be on a bed with his usual girls, and, right next to him, there was Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian?

And there were so many more ways to gain control than Lan Wangji realized! They might have seen the second jade use his forehead ribbon before, but that truly didn't even scratch the surface of what was possible. There was a world of potential out there, and Jin Guangshan could teach Lan Wangji each and every bit of it.

(He wondered how long it would take Lan Wangji to make Wei Wuxian cry. If he was taught properly, Sect Leader Jin was quite confident they could make that happen in less than ten minutes.)

A quiet chuckle escaped him once again, and a thousand possibilities filled his mind.

Jin Guangshan was delighted.

And that, more than anything, told Lan Wangji that he had done something very, very wrong.

At that moment, Lan Wangji bit down on Wei Wuxian's lower lip, making his breath hitch once again. They paused, the simulated second jade staring at the Yiling Patriarch with wide, desperate eyes. Then, after lingering for a moment longer, he let go and ran.

Wei Wuxian slumped to the ground, unable to keep himself up anymore. He panted, leaning on the tree to slowly regather his energy. He was exhausted and still a little stunned, as though he had just had an encounter with a mythical creature.

He pulled the blindfold off, and saw that no one else was there.

Suddenly, he clutched at his chest, noticing that the flower he had tucked into his robe was gone.

At that moment, the dried flower that the drunk Hanguang-jun tried giving Wei Wuxian appeared in Lan Wangji's mind.

Another thing Lan Wangji had taken. A reminder because he was sure he would never let himself do this again.

"I'm sorry," he muttered, fists clenched tightly by his sides. "I… I'm sorry. I'm sorry."

That wouldn't make up for it, but he didn't know what else to say.

Jin Guangshan hummed for a bit then shrugged to himself, figuring he'd focus on wearing Lan Wangji down later when he had more time. A beat later, however, as the simulated Wei Wuxian continued leaning on the tree trunk for support, a thought occurred to both him and Lan Wangji.

With this new information, something was suddenly making a lot more sense.

'Then you can stay like this for the whole night,' the simulated Hanguang-jun said, having just paralyzed Wei Wuxian.

'Oh?' the real Jin Guangshan had muttered. 'Are you going to have your way with him?'

But Hanguang-jun hadn't. They had really just slept.

And the simulated Lan Wangji did the same thing again, while drunk.

The next morning, too hot, Wei Wuxian had started taking his and Lan Wangji's clothes off. When Hanguang-jun saw that, he had panicked and flung himself out of bed,

'You were so bold last night, Hanguang-jun,' Wei Wuxian had teased. And despite being undeniably attracted to Wei Wuxian, those words had made the simulated Lan Wangji look disgusted and horrified all at once.

(Not at Wei Wuxian, but at himself.)

And then there was that most recent time, when Lan Wangji had knocked himself out after Wei Wuxian kissed him. Because he wouldn't have been able to hold himself back. He wasn't willing to lose control again.

This was more than not wanting to follow after his parents' footsteps. This was about him, and whether he could control himself.

It had confused all the watchers to see Hanguang-jun reject all of Wei Wuxian's advances.

It wasn't confusing anymore.

Wei Wuxian touched his lips, muttering, "How could this be. That was my…"

'First kiss' was left unfinished.

'His first?' Lan Wangji's eyes widened. 'But, he… but he was always….'

Well, as he'd realized earlier, most of Wei Wuxian's flirting didn't mean anything.

But that would mean he took Wei Wuxian's-

"It really is nothing to be ashamed of, young master," Jin Guangshan said, a warm smile on his face. "These instincts are perfectly natural. And besides, looking at Wei Wuxian, I'm sure anyone would understand."

Lan Wangji practically did a double take, spinning towards Jin Guangshan, eyes wide open in shock.

"Ah, it's rare to see you so expressive," Sect Leader Jin commented idly. "Like I said, you really-"

"Enough," Lan Wangji snapped back. "With all due respect Sect Leader Jin, a statement like that is highly inappropriate."

"You don't agree?"

"Not at all."

Jin Guangshan just laughed: "That might have fooled me before this scene, Lan-er-gongzi, but I'm afraid that white jade act won't work anymore. You see…"

He stepped closer and, if they had been able to touch, would have run his fingers comfortingly through Lan Wangji's hair.

"There's no need for you to fear judgment from me. I understand. More than anyone."

Lan Wangji stepped back, not responding — unable to respond, after what his other self had just done. But then-

"-fair measure of skill!" Madam Yu finished, unfreezing from the Concealment Zone and snapping both Lan Wangji and Jin Guangshan out of their thoughts. Everyone looked around at each other.

“Eh? Wangji, you moved,” Lan Xichen observed.

Wen Qing frowned: “Was it the Concealment Zone?”

Jin Guangshan glanced at Lan Wangji, waiting for him to answer. A few seconds passed, before Lan Wangji gave a single, shaky nod.

“Oh?!” Nie Huaisang jumped up, seeming quite excited. “Wangji-xiong, what happened? Did you sing a song to each other? Confess your feelings under an auburn sky? Kiss?!”

Lan Wangji flinched.

“You did! You did!” Nie Huaisang jumped. “What happened? What happened?”

“It’s not his responsibility to tell you!” Nie Mingjue growled.

Madam Jin nodded, “Let’s just give the happy couple some privacy. It appears the simulation is still going on.”

And, at that moment, something important did occur.

‘Lan Zhan?’ Wei Wuxian realized, spotting Lan Wangji in the distance.

A moment later, the second jade swung his fist and split a tree in two.

“Huh?!” many of the watchers shrieked.

“Lan Zhan, what are you doing?!”

“Maybe he’s overcome with happiness?” one watcher suggested.

But when Hanguang-jun spun around, his eyes appeared bloodshot and frightening.

Wei Wuxian was a little startled, blinking before teasing, “Wow, how scary.”

“Huh?” someone asked, again. Jin Guangshan seemed uncharacteristically content to let them all wonder among themselves, so many of the watchers turned to Lan Wangji.

The Second Jade remained silent and unreadable to a degree that, previously, only Hanguang-jun had seemed capable of. When Lan Xichen looked at him, he was only able to see a brief flash of guilt before Lan Wangji turned away.

“Wangji?” he asked.

Lan Wangji just shook his head.

Wei Wuxian took a step forward.

“Go away!” Hanguang-jun shouted.

Jiang Yanli looked back and forth between the simulated and real Lan Wangji in abject confusion.

Equally lost, Jin Zixuan suggested, “Is Wei Wuxian… not a good kisser?”

Nie Huaisang gasped, horrified Jin Zixuan would suggest such a thing.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian harrumphed: “I just came here and you already want me to go? Do you hate me that much?”

Lan Wangji could only shake his head hopelessly.

“Stay away from me!” his simulated self shouted again.

Confused, Wei Wuxian took a single step back.

“Hey, Lan Zhan, what’s wrong? It’s rare for you to lose your composure like this. Are you okay? If you’re not okay then say so, yeah?”

‘Kind, nice, caring, generous, stupid…’ Lan Wangji buried his head in his hands. ‘Wei Ying, I… I didn’t-’

Lan Wangji unsheathed Bichen, slashing through the air and sending the trees surrounding him toppling to the ground.

“...Lan Zhan?”

There was nearly a minute of silence.

Now both Jin Guangshan and Lan Wangji knew that this was when Hanguang-jun’s refusal to initiate anything beyond friendship with Wei Wuxian began.

‘What a shame,’ Jin Guangshan thought. ‘He could have made quite an amazing show if he’d just kept on a little longer.’

“...Nothing,” Lan Wangji responded. He began walking away, and dodged when Wei Wuxian, still concerned, tried to follow him.

Frowning, Wei Wuxian protested, “Don’t look at me like this. I just want to see what’s wrong with you. You’re acting too strange. You really haven’t been poisoned? Did something happen to you on one of your recent night hunts?”

“Nothing happened.”

“Clearly something did,” Lan Qiren said, glancing back. “Wangji?”

“I… I will tell you, uncle,” he promised. “Just… please give me some time to process this first.”

Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren both frowned at that response, but, upon making eye contact with each other, mutually decided to not press just yet.

“Lan Zhan, have you ever been kissed by someone?” Wei Wuxian suddenly asked.

Lan Wangji stopped in his tracks.

“Huh?” Jiang Cheng was too confused to even be mad at Wei Wuxian’s ridiculous question. “Wait… didn’t you two just… you know.”

“Not… exactly,” was all Lan Wangji could say.

Then, in a voice as cold as ice, Lan Wangji responded, “Why are you asking me that?”

Wei Wuxian grinned, face full of understanding, and sympathetically said, “You haven’t, have you? I knew it. I was just asking. You don’t have to be so angry.”

“What makes you so confident?”

“What do you think?” Wei Wuxian laughed. “You always seem so stiff, who would dare kiss you?”

Lan Wangji’s breathing stopped momentarily.

“Of course, I wouldn’t expect you to initiate a kiss either. I think you’ll have to keep your first kiss until the end of your life!” he declared, laughing.

“And yet, the future Wei Wuxian does kiss you,” Lan Xichen pointed out with a laugh. Rather than embarrassing Lan Wangji, however, those words seemed to only make him fall into deeper thought.

“What about you?” the simulated Lan Wangji wondered.

“Me? Of course, I’ve had loads of experience!”

“What? When?!” Jiang Cheng asked at once.

Jiang Yanli laughed, pointing out, “A-Cheng, this is years in the future. It probably just wasn’t shown to us.”

“Did the concealment zone activate for a kiss between Wei Wuxian and someone other than Lan Wangji?” Madam Jin speculated aloud, turning to her husband. He just smiled, refusing to answer.

“I suppose Wei-xiong has always been quite popular,” Nie Huaisang pointed out. “Don’t worry though, Wangji-xiong. I’ve never seen him talk about anyone like he raves about you~”

Lan Wangji still made no comment.

(They were wrong — Wei Wuxian had confirmed that himself with his reaction to having his 'first kiss' taken — but the current Lan Wangji hardly had the presence of mind to correct their assumptions.)

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji continued walking together, the wind blowing flowers past them gently. Despite not knowing the identity of the person who had just kissed him, Wei Wuxian couldn't help but cast his gaze on Lan Wangji once again.

A memory formed.

A bustling of street activity could be heard, and a crowded street formed below a tavern.

"One month before this," Jin Ling declared. "At Yunmeng."

"Ah, this one's pretty!" a girl suddenly declared. She and Wei Wuxian appeared, surrounded by a few other girls who were also looking at the flowers.

Her friend frowned back, "Eh? I think this one's prettier!"

"Do you know what kind of flower this is?" a third asked.

The eldest-looking one hummed for a moment before speculating, "I think it's an azalea."

Lan Wangji barely restrained himself from flinching. Wei Wuxian might have confirmed that he had never kissed anyone before, but that didn't mean he wasn't interested. Would anyone be able to look at this — a handsome and powerful man surrounded on all sides by beautiful women — and not reach the obvious conclusion?

'I took his first kiss,' Lan Wangji thought.

He looked over at the young women laughing in the nearly-abandoned tavern hall.

'It wasn't mine to take.'

"Shopkeeper!" Wei Wuxian spoke up at last. "Bring me two more jars of wine."

"Ah? Y-yes. Yes!"

Hearing that, Wen Ruohan frowned slightly.

Right as the shopkeeper hurried downstairs, they heard another customer's voice call out, "Shopkeeper-"

"W-what are you doing coming up?! Quick, go downstairs!"

"Huh?" Jiang Cheng asked.

Wen Qing's frown soon matched her uncle's.

“Huh? Shopkeeper, why is your forehead all sweaty?”

“Don’t you know? That customer upstairs is a demon!”

The hushed voices of the pair weren’t quiet enough to fool a cultivator’s ears. Wei Wuxian’s gaze gained a dull sheen. He looked far from surprised.

The abject fear in their stances and tones was hardly unusual to the Chief Cultivator. Wen Ruohan had heard people talking like that about him thousands of times before.

But the difference was that he wanted people to look at him like that and his actions and reactions justified their fear.

“But… Wei Wuxian would never do anything to them,” Jin Zixuan pointed out.

“That doesn’t matter,” Wen Qing shook her head. “They don’t know that. The rumors have gotten out of hand.”

“But-”

“Haven’t you noticed that all the other cultivators are sitting downstairs because they’re avoiding him? I hear those women beside him aren’t even human! They’re probably flesh-eating ghosts, getting hungrier by the second!”

At this, the watchers had to look around the hall again, reassessing it with the new information they had received. They could indeed hear a bustling street outside and a crowded hall below. But, with all the unknown women all hanging around Wei Wuxian, they hadn’t thought there was something keeping people away.

(And, even more so, would have never suspected that ‘something’ was Wei Wuxian.)

Come to think of it, the energy had felt a little strange in here. It had been hard to figure out exactly what that meant, given how new their sensitivity to resentful energy was. But, if the girls here weren’t human at all, what they were feeling would make perfect sense.

They turned to the newly identified ghost girls again.

“Hey, this one’s not bad!”

“That one’s so pretty!”

“No, no, look at this one! It’s got so many petals!”

“I love that color!”

“Oh dear,” Nie Huaisang muttered, giving an exaggerated sigh to himself. “Well, as everyone knows, I rank first in the ‘cultivators who are most terrified of ghosts’ rankings. If so many brave and noble cultivators are reacting like this, I’m sure I’d be petrified in my boots if I was there, too terrified to move. How fearsome.”

“Wait, wait, look at this one! It’s so big!”

“Really? I think the little ones are cuter.”

They laughed playfully, and a few eeps of terror could be heard from below.

Nie Mingjue clicked his tongue in disgust. Nie Huaisang was fully prepared to receive another lecture from him for his cheek.

Which was why he had to do a double take when Nie Mingjue instead grumbled, “Cowards, the lot of them. If they just got to know Wei Wuxian, this wouldn’t be….”

He trailed off, but his thoughts continued.

‘My sect doesn’t do demonic cultivation, but it’s not completely unrelated either. What was it Wei Wuxian said? That everyone fears and respects me, but people only fear him?’

He recalled the terror in Wei Wuxian’s eyes as he was thrown about by spirits in the Burial Mounds.

And then he recalled his own reasons for learning his techniques.

He didn’t regret it. He had defeated the Wens, which almost automatically made those riskier techniques worth it. But when comparing himself to Wei Wuxian….

At the very least, the difference in reaction shouldn’t be this big.

“Young master, I like this one the best!” the youngest girl said, displaying a five petaled flower to Wei Wuxian.

“What are you girls playing? Where did you get that many flowers?” he asked.

The rest of the ghost girls paused in their discussion, the eldest turning to Wei Wuxian to excitedly explain, “From that seller down at south street. We saw that his flowers were pretty, so we took them back.”

“...Took?” Wei Wuxian asked, voicing many of the watchers’ thoughts.

The giggling of the ghost girls resumed: “We saw him peddling at an alley from afar. We waited until he walked farther down the alley into an area where nobody else was around, and then floated in front of him and *d*id *this wit*h our tong*ues!”

Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli both eeped at the gross distortions of their faces the girls made, and even those used to fighting ghosts appeared momentarily taken aback. The girls had seemed indistinguishable from humans a moment ago.

But Wei Wuxian didn’t so much as blink, merely raising an eyebrow as the girls continued to describe their little prank.

“The seller was scared witless. He even left running without his flowers!”

Wei Wuxian shook his head and gave a half-laugh: "Why do you girls want so many flowers?"

The laughter this time took on a far more sweet, longing tone.

"Obviously to express my affection to a gentleman," another girl declared. "Young Master, you have a good view from your spot on the balcony. Help us find someone! If you see a good looking man, you have to tell us!"

As the discussion of romance was continuously brought up, Jiang Yanli couldn't help but sneak a glance toward Jin Zixuan, only to find that he was already looking at her. They both jumped a little as they made eye contact, not having expected the other person to see them, and then blushed simultaneously and stared down at the ground.

Meanwhile, bullied into it by the spirits he supposedly commanded, Wei Wuxian glanced out at the street with an appeasing, "Sure."

At the beginning, it really had seemed like Wei Wuxian was using his ghosty powers to gather a harem of girls around himself. Jin Guangshan had certainly thought that was the case. But now-

"He's… acting more like a father to them than a master," Madam Jin pointed out, disbelieving.

Upon hearing that, Wen Qing mentally added on, 'That's no surprise. Even as everyone calls him A-Ning's master, no one who sees them interact would ever be able to describe their relationship as something other than friendship. The sects may curse the lack of respect he had while he was digging up graves during the war, but he may have more respect for the dead than anyone else.'

Not that she expected the public to understand that. If they couldn't even eat in the same room as Wei Wuxian, how were they ever going to learn the first thing about him?

"Hey, did you know?" one of the ghost girls suddenly asked. "These flowers, apart from looking pretty, each have a meaning of their own."

"Meaning?"

"They do?" Nie Mingjue asked, causing Nie Huaisang to sigh heavily and make an exaggerated tutting sound a few times.

"Da-ge," he shook his head. "Oh my, I was wondering why you never understood the deep meaning hidden in my paintings. This certainly does explain a lot. Is the only one you know about the Sparks Amidst Snow Peony for the Jin Sect?"

Got it in one. Nie Mingjue had thought the Jin Sect's white peony having a special symbolic meaning was an exception among flowers, not the norm. The people who had educated Nie Mingjue had seen his lack of interest in the subject and didn't think he'd need to know anything more than that, despite his role as the young master of a great sect.

(With Nie Huaisang, the exact opposite had occurred.)

Which was why he was able to easily nod along as the initial ghost girl explained, "For example, this purple magnolia. Its meaning is 'To fall for your charming looks.' It is truly suitable for confessing your affection toward a handsome gentleman."

Once again, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan individually turned to look at each other to gauge the other's reaction, and, upon making eye contact, had to immediately look away.

"Then, what about the one I'm holding?" another asked. "What's its meaning?"

"Weigela!" Nie Huaisang immediately called out, overwhelmed by his own excitement. "For futures!"

"The one you're holding is Weigela," the ghost girl explained, examining the long stalk covered in small, pink flowers more closely. "It means 'Wishing you a bright future.'"

"That one sounds nice," Wen Qing commented, thinking it might be a useful gift in a platonic aspect as well. Wen Ning had always liked flowers, and maybe Wei Wuxian would too.

"Then what about this one?"

"Daphne. It means 'Wishing you good luck.'"

Which, like any of the other flowers mentioned, would have been a far more appropriate way for Lan Wangji to express his feelings.

(Well, anything would be more appropriate than what he had actually done.)

Wei Wuxian had thrown him flowers last time. Was it really too much for him to have tried to do the same back?

(It was. Because, for the past Lan Wangji, there was always an underlying question of whether Wei Wuxian was just messing with him, like he had been in their youth.)

(But the Hanguang-jun of thirteen years later would have thrown some back, because all that would matter to him would be that he wanted to.)

"What about this one?"

"A carnation. 'My heart aches for you.'"

"This one?"

"Tulip. 'I declare my love.'"

"This-"

"What about that one? On the right side corner of the table?" Wei Wuxian asked. "A peony?"

Suddenly turning much less excited, the ghost girl explained, "Ah, this one. Its meaning is, 'Wishing you will return my feelings,' or 'To part with a heavy heart.' That's why it's also called the 'farewell blossom.'"

Nie Huaisang's hands practically itched with how much he wished he had access to his paints right then.

However, at that moment, there was a new voice heard. This time, from outside.

"Isn't that Hanguang-jun?" a passerby couldn't help but ask.

"Lan Zhan?" Wei Wuxian wondered, glancing back. "Why is he here?"

All the watchers looked below, watching as Hanguang-jun walked through town, ignoring the many whispers his mere presence initiated.

"Hey, didn't you girls say you wanted to gift these flowers to a man who looks handsome? There's one right down there."

Lan Wangji did a double take, not at all expecting the comment, and Jiang Yanli, Nie Huaisang, and Madam Jin all breathed in an excited gasp of air.

(Lan Wangji might have even blushed over it, if it weren't for the small laugh Jin Guangshan gave out at Wei Wuxian's comment.)

"Who is it?" a ghost girl asked.

"His title is 'Hanguang-jun.'"

"Eh? But we don't know him."

But Wei Wuxian wasn't concerned: "Go look for the most handsome person on the entire street. That's him."

Lan Xichen smiled brightly at the comment, but faltered when, upon looking over at his brother, he found none of the excited, embarrassed happiness he expected.

"...Wangji?"

"I'm fine," Lan Wangji said at once, understanding immediately what was concerning Lan Xichen.

"...I see."

On the other hand, having received instructions from Wei Wuxian, the girls became excited to give it a try.

"Let's go, let's go," one of them requested.

"Alright!"

“Yes, let’s go!”

“Take a flower! Quick, quick!”

“Do you think he’s more handsome than Young Master Wei?”

They rushed downstairs, startling and terrifying the shopkeeper, who had been on his way up.

“G-gongzi,” he said at last, upon making it to the top. “Your wine.”

“Thank you.”

There was a beat of silence.

“Uh… Young Master, if you have nothing else to order…”

“You may go down.”

“Ah, yes. Yes!”

He scurried away.

Wen Qing couldn’t help but look on in disgust for a moment. It wasn’t fair. The shopkeeper was just a civilian. He would indeed be in danger if Wei Wuxian got genuinely mad, and it was far safer for him to err on the side of caution and listen to the rumors the other cultivators shared.

It still left a bad taste in her mouth.

(She wondered how people looked at the Wens, once the war was over. Whether her brother, a fierce corpse, would be able to interact with society ever again.)

“Gongzi,” a soft voice began. “Let me pour your wine.”

It was the eldest looking of the ghost girls.

“No need. I’ll drink from the jar,” Wei Wuxian said cheerily. “Hm? How come you didn’t go downstairs?”

“I… I was already engaged when I was alive.”

Several people felt their eyes widen at that. They knew full well that the ghosts were once human (one of their main solutions for ghostly problems was to free them of the regrets they had while they were alive), but they had never heard one talk so openly about it like this before. People could communicate with the dead through inquiry, and interview the people the deceased had known while they were still alive.

But these sorts of whimsical, longing statements?

The effect Wei Wuxian had on the dead was as shocking as ever.

Wei Wuxian finished a long gulp from the jar in his hand, setting it down with an exhale.

“You’re holding that peony,” he observed. “Do you like those ones?”

“Mn. I like the meaning behind peonies.”

Wei Wuxian hummed: “To return feelings or… to part.”

From below, laughter rang out.

“Aiyo! I see there are girls out to catch Hanguang-jun!”

“Indeed! I’ve never seen second young master Lan look so troubled!”

The kids glanced over at Lan Wangji with mischievous smiles, but found him staring blanky forward, even more humorless than usual.

Jiang Cheng, who had found himself lost in thought more than a few times throughout the simulation, looked away, deciding to give Lan Wangji some privacy.

(He might be the person who would one day take Wei Wuxian away from him, but he had also been there for Wei Wuxian, in times where Jiang Cheng just… wasn’t.)

“Hey,” Wei Wuxian said, suddenly perking up in interest. “Can you give me that flower?”

The ghost girl nodded, handing it over. As soon as she did, Wei Wuxian turned and threw it.

“Lan Zhan!” he shouted.

Now, at long last, this seemed to be enough to make Lan Wangji snap out of his thoughts. He looked up, watching wide eyed as the blossom floated down in front of him.

“Wei Ying?”

The simulated Hanguang-jun looked up, seeing the peony fall toward his head, and caught it.

“Hanguang-jun, what a coincidence!” Wei Wuxian called out, practically lighting up in excitement.

“It’s you,” Lan Wangji observed.

“It’s me. The only person who would do such a senseless, shameless thing is, of course, me!” Wei Wuxian grinned. “Why are you in Yunmeng? If you’re not in a hurry, why don’t you come up for a drink?”

Exhaling once, Lan Wangji turned and walked away. As Wei Wuxian watched him depart, his expression changed from playfulness into something that couldn't quite be described as sadness, but wasn't contentment either. His smile remained, but took on a much more longing feel. Not mourning and not sympathy. Nostalgia, perhaps.

'He really ignored me,' Wei Wuxian thought, giving a little laugh.

'I'm sorry,' Lan Wangji thought. 'I won't ignore you. I'll give you all the attention you want, I-'

The image of Wei Wuxian being pushed up against a tree filled his mind again, and his train of thought came to a grinding halt. That wasn't the kind of attention he should have given.

Once again, the actions of Hanguang-jun after the thirteen year time skip suddenly made a lot more sense.

Yawning, Wei Wuxian picked up the jar of wine again, drinking every last drop.

"I'll order another jar of wine for the young master," the ghost who had stayed behind offered. Wei Wuxian sent her off with a smile, before leaning back casually against the wall, lost in thought.

Then, footsteps began to echo.

"Lan Zhan?" Wei Wuxian asked, seeing the man reach the top of the stairs.

'Oh,' Lan Wangji thought. 'I didn't leave.'

That feeling brought with it the slightest bit of worry. After all, the last time the simulation had shown him and Wei Wuxian alone together-

His gaze turned toward Jin Guangshan, who had perked up with interest upon realizing the same thing.

"Mn." Hanguang-jun held out the colorful objects in his hand. "Your flowers."

"You're welcome," Wei Wuxian nodded once. "I gave them to you as a gift, so they're your flowers now."

Hanguang-jun looked down at the flowers in his hand, then slipped them into his sleeve with a nearly imperceptible sigh.

And, at that moment, the flashback faded away. They returned to the competition, where Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian were walking through the woods.

Wei Wuxian laughed to himself: 'When I threw a flower at him earlier today, he seemed so annoyed. Especially in comparison to how calm he was last month. It seems our dear Hanguang-jun is off his game today. Given what happened to those poor trees, he definitely had some pent up frustration in him before.'

“The frustration’s probably because of you!” Jiang Cheng pointed out with a shout. He was quite right about that.

(Even if the frustration was of a different variety than he currently realized.)

Lan Wangji’s ears turned scarlet with shame.

Then, there was a rustle in the distance. Reacting immediately, Wei Wuxian grabbed Lan Wangji and pulled him to the side, hiding both of them in the thick bushes below. Right as the simulated Lan Wangji opened his mouth to ask what was going on, he heard voices and fell silent. He and Wei Wuxian looked toward the source of the noise.

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan stood together, walking through the forest.

“Not again!” Jin Zixuan groaned, burying his face in his hands.

Jiang Yanli blushed as well, and, noticing the uncharacteristically frosty way her other self was interacting with him, sent her fiance a few mental apologies.

(Jin Zixuan, upon noticing the same thing, began saying his apologies out loud at rapid speed, knowing full well that Jiang Yanli had nothing she had to apologize for.)

Wei Wuxian clicked his tongue: ‘I should’ve known Madam Jin would make Shijie and Jin Zixuan come out alone.’

The speed of Jin Zixuan’s apologies increased, despite Jiang Yanli’s flustered attempts at getting him to stop.

“What happened between you and Jin Zixuan?” Lan Wngji asked, noticing the animosity.

Wei Wuxian snorted.

At that moment, from a figure they couldn’t see, there was an awkward clearing of a throat.

“Following the, um, ‘soup incident,’ Madam Jin-”

Ouyang Zizhen’s words were cut off when Lan Jingyi whispered, “She wasn’t a Jin yet.”

“Well, what else should I call her? 'Jin Ling’s mom?'”

The blush on Jiang Yanli’s cheeks deepened, and even Jin Zixuan finally got so embarrassed that he couldn’t keep up his endless tirade of apologies. Madam Jin smiled at the sight.

And Jin Guangshan, watching from the side, gave a little laugh.

At once Lan Wangji’s eyes snapped toward him, having become hyper-sensitive to everything Jin Guangshan did following their previous discussion. Sect Leader Jin noticed that action immediately, and his smile widened.

“The topic of romance is rather prominent in this segment, isn’t it?” he asked.

A sinking feeling of guilt returned to Lan Wangji at once, and the armor of apathy he wore began to show its cracks.

“...Isn’t it weird to call her just ‘my mom?’ She’s going to be watching this.”

“How did you forget?!” Jin Ling snapped. “You know what? Fine! Just call her my mom!”

Lan Qiren took a deep breath in.

‘The first few times they had arguments like this they at least made sure to whisper. I never thought a time would come when I’d miss those days.’

“After that incident, Sect Leader Jiang and Senior Wei brought Jin Ling’s mom back to Yunmeng. She showed no interest in spending time with Jin Ling’s dad, and ignored every attempt he made at communication. On the contrary, Jin Ling’s dad began to ask more and more about her after the sunshot campaign ended, either out of guilt or due to Madam Jin’s scoldings,” Ouyang Zizhen concluded. “Though it better have been out of guilt! If he only did it because of his mom… that would be so unromantic.”

Jin Zixuan deeply hope it was indeed because of that.

Which was very slightly supported by the awkward walk pattern his other self was caught in. His right hand would come forward when his right foot did, and his left hand came forward when the left one did. This stiff, unpractical style of movement simply oozed nervousness at every instant.

The glare in Wei Wuxian’s eyes remained unsympathetic, however.

“Those who heard of the incident said it was simply the result of a misunderstanding. Now that it had been clarified, there was no need to hold any grudges. No harm, no foul, after all. But Senior Wei disagreed. He, um… he hated Jin Zixuan, considering him to be a conceited male princess, an ostentatious peacock, and a blind man who looked only at appearances. He didn’t believe at all that Jin Zixuan would realize his mistake and suddenly take an interest in Jin Ling’s mom. Senior Wei was sure he’d just been scolded by Jin Ling’s grandmother too much and was responding accordingly.”

Jin Zixuan flinched at every word, hating the fact that his future son was listening in, but unable to really blame Wei Wuxian either.

Madam Jin, on the other hand, frowned deeply. She had long-since acknowledged that there must be more to the story and that Wei Wuxian wasn’t the sort of person who would kill for nothing, but the lines being narrated to them now made her son’s eventual fate impossible to forget.

‘Wei Ying, I understand your feelings, but… you would be the first to agree that’s nowhere near enough reason to kill someone.’

“But no matter how Senior Wei felt about it, in order to not put Jin Ling’s mom in a difficult situation, he had no choice but to remain hidden.”

Hanguang-jun was still waiting for an explanation, but Wei Wuxian could only put a finger to his lips and shake his head, not having time to explain.

Although this went unnoticed by most of the watchers, Jin Guangshan and Lan Wangji couldn’t help but notice the way the later’s other-self’s eyes lingered on Wei Wuxian’s lips for a moment, observing the still-wet skin.

At that moment, the future Jin Zixuan brushed a few trees away, revealing a monster’s corpse. He bent down for a moment, observing it closely.

“It’s dead,” he reported.

Jiang Yanli nodded.

“It’s a measuring snake,” he added on.

The young lady of the Jiangs looked back at him from where she’d turned away, asking, “What?”

“A beast from the Naman area. When it sees someone, it’ll straighten itself up to see if it’s taller. If it is, and it’s searching for food, it’ll devour the person. However, given their lack of aggressiveness during this season, it’s just as likely that this one was killed by another animal. It’s not a big deal. It only looks scary.”

Which was common information among cultivators. Even a non-practicing one like Jiang Yanli would have heard of this so long as she grew up in a cultivating family. Her blank gaze was quite telling.

The only significant thing about it was that it was probably the grandmother of the snake family Wei Wuxian had run into earlier in the segment. She was at least a week dead, so it was probably unrelated to the hunting competition.

Other than that, there was nothing strange about it.

But Jin Zixuan’s explanation continued on: “I-if you go to the LanlingJin Sect’s hunting ground, you can see all sorts of rare prey!”

‘Who would want to go to your hunting ground?!’ Wei Wuxian thought with a glare.

“I just so happen to be free next month! I could take you there, if you want!”

Not even making eye contact with him, Jiang Yanli responded with a blank, dispassionate, “Thank you for your kindness Young Master Jin, but there’s no need to bother.”

Madam Jin couldn't resist giving a long, drawn out sigh. Well, at the very least, she supposed she would prefer her son to have this level of proficiency in wooing someone over him taking after her husband.

Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan cleared his throat and, for the hundredth time that hour, bowed down: "I-I'm sorry for making you uncomfortable, A-Li. I… I mean, I don't regret trying to get to know you after what happened, but maybe this wasn't the best, I mean — anyways, it won't happen again!"

Hearing that, Jiang Yanli couldn't help but smile.

"Thank you for saying so, A-Xuan," she said, her eyes softening with appreciation. "It may have not been the current you, but apology accepted."

Jin Zixuan smiled.

(And Lan Wangji frowned, wishing his other self had exercised the same levels of consideration in regards to Wei Wuxian.)

But the simulated Jin Zixuan wasn't ready to give up.

After an additional beat of awkwardness, Jin Zixuan continued, "I-if you take a closer look, scales can be seen on this measuring snake, and its fangs are longer than its jaw. It's probably a mutant, given that these traits don't usually appear on measuring snakes during this season. Most people would find it difficult to deal with it. They won't be able to shoot through these scales…. But still, it really isn't much. None of the prey here is that difficult. It wouldn't be able to hurt people from the LanlingJin Sect at all."

As his words got more and more prideful, the stiffness of his walking also increased. His knees weren't even really bending anymore, and his arms still came forward when the foot below them did.

Jiang Yanli giggled slightly, but then-

"It's for the best if hunts don't hurt anyone," the simulated Jiang Yanli responded, barely speaking above a murmur.

Jin Zixuan wilted again. At her words, he recalled the slight disagreement he'd had with the real one.

(After danger had been shown time and time again, Jiang Yanli started considering whether it would be better for Jin Ling to not become a cultivator at all. In their world, and so long as he had proper supervision, becoming a cultivator was less dangerous for someone than being powerless, but the thought had still been there. Jin Zixuan hadn't been able to understand it at first.)

(And the simulated Jin Zixuan still couldn't understand this.)

"What value is prey that can't hurt anyone? There's no honor in catching something like that," he declared, but those words seemed to only make Jiang Yanli even less interested than before. "...You don't like watching hunts?"

Jiang Yanli nodded.

"Then, why did you come this time?"

'Because of Madam Jin being the one who invited her, of course!'

'He genuinely didn't realize?' Jin Guangshan thought, somewhat disbelieving. 'I could understand it if he hoped having more public appearances with her would put political pressure on her to officiate something with him — or at least believe that she should, which would make it easier to gain access to other things too. But with this… did he really come here hoping she would have a good time?'

He wasn't being malicious, just naive and stupid.

Jin Guangshan had essentially never been so disappointed in his son.

But now Jin Zixuan seemed to understand. His face turned from red to white.

"...Do you not like watching hunts, or do you just not like being with me?"

"And he gets it at last!" Nie Huaisang shouted from the side.

"Huaisang! Not helping!" Nie Mingjue shouted back.

"Ah, no…" Jiang Yanli trailed off.

'Shijie's worried Jin Zixuan only invited her due to Madam Jin's pressure, and doesn't really want to have her with him, so she's trying to not trouble him,' Wei Wuxian thought, his scowl growing deeper. 'But what would Jin Zixuan know about that?! He's probably never been so ashamed in his life. Not only is this the first time he's been refused by a maiden, but he invited her out and was coldly refused.'

Jin Zixuan's nervousness seemed to switch to anger.

"Fine, then," he said, turning away.

Jiang Yanli hesitated, adding, "I'm sorry."

"What would you have to be sorry for? You can think whatever you want to. I wasn't the one who wanted to invite you anyways. It's fine if you don't want to be here."

It appeared Jiang Yanli's fears had been confirmed.

Wei Wuxian clenched his fists, watching and Jiang Yanli's lips began to tremble at those words. However, she didn't truly respond except to bow lowly to Jin Zixuan one last time.

"Please excuse me," she said.

Madam Jin just rubbed her temples. They were happy together — Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli ended up happy together, and the real ones were getting along wonderfully — but this situation, brought about by her other self's schemes…

She had been fine getting married to a man she didn't love for the influence and power it would give her. Those feelings changed slightly with every bastard child that appeared, but, when she was young, she had been confident in her decision.

However, it now seemed obvious that Jiang Yanli didn't feel the same way. The young lady of the Jiang Sect was a different person than her, and would desire different things.

Despite having her best interests in mind, Madam Jin and Madam Yu had not managed to help her at all, it appeared.

But that view of the situation wasn't enough to explain Jin Zixuan's current reaction. As, while Jiang Yanli was walking away, he suddenly seemed to snap out of something.

"Stop!" he shouted, and, seeing that she wasn't willing to, he rushed up to her in an instant. He reached forward to grab at her hand, before a shadow suddenly threw him back.

He landed on his feet, but skidded a meter across the dirt.

"Wha-" he cut off, looking up. "Wei Wuxian! Why is it you again?!"

Watching this, Madam Yu was more silent than Jiang Yanli could ever remember her being before. In all honesty, she had been expecting her mother to criticize her, Wei Wuxian, or Jin Zixuan . If the fracture in Madam Yu's friendship with Madam Jin mattered more to her, then she would berate Jin Zixuan for his insistent actions. If the power and alliances of the Jiang Sect mattered more, she would scold Jiang Yanli for ruining that. If she was too distracted to focus on such implications, then she would admonish Wei Wuxian for all the world to hear.

Instead, she had just been silent.

(In fact, she had been surprisingly quiet the last few segments.)

All she had done was move slightly closer to Jiang Yanli as things went on.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian stood between the pair, blocking Jin Zixuan's access to Jiang Yanli with a terrifying glare:

"Ha. I hadn't even gotten to speak before you said my part for me. Let me ask: Jin Zixuan, why is it you again?!" Wei Wuxian demanded.

"Attacking me for no reason…." Jin Zixuan stood up straight. "Have you gone mad?!"

"What do you mean 'for no reason?'" With a sweep of his hand, Wei Wuxian sent a wave of resentful energy forward, bending the surrounding trees back and sending Jin Zixuan skidding a bit more. "What do you think you're doing trying to grab my Shijie to satisfy your own damaged pride?!"

A fight began.

Wei Wuxian was protecting Jiang Yanli from Jin Zixuan, in a way no one could really criticize while being aware of their history and what Jin Zixuan had just tried to do.

(And especially not while being aware of Jin Zixuan's father.)

But Madam Yu knew, from the glimpses the simulation had shown, that when the engagement between her daughter and Jin Zixuan was first dissolved Madam Yu was far from happy about it. She had gotten into an argument with Jiang Fengmian, and had blamed the situation on his preference for Wei Wuxian.

His preference.

'A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.'

Had she whipped Wei Wuxian over this? She probably wouldn't admit to it, but it was far from impossible that the frequency and intensity of her punishments would have increased in the days following the dissolution of the engagement. She didn't have any proof of that happening, of course, but if someone told her it had, she wouldn't be surprised.

Despite the fact that Wei Wuxian was protecting her daughter from something Madam Yu forced her into.

(She and Madam Jin had forced both Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan into this. Was it really any surprise that their relationship was nearly ended so many times?)

Meanwhile, both the physical and verbal fight continued.

"Trying to grab her to satisfy my pride?" Jin Zixuan repeated. "Then what? Should I just let her randomly walk around a monster infested mountain alone?"

"You think that excuses what you've done? Why was she here in the first place? To have a walk with you, right?"

"My mother-"

"Don't think you can get out of this through that! You tried to grab her while she was walking away!"

Jin Zixuan looked down at that, unable to respond.

'I shouldn't have grabbed her,' he thought. 'I should have made sure she got back safely, but grabbing her went too far. But I'm not like my father. I don't know how to make her want to stay with me. I was just trying to… trying to….'

Although he wanted his thoughts to go on, he felt himself growing fixated on one very specific part of his protests.

Jin Zixuan wasn't like his father. He didn't know how to make Jiang Yanli want to stay with him.

But he also couldn't say for sure that his father wouldn't grab a woman who was trying to walk away from him.

'No… no A-Die might not be loyal to A-Niang, but he's not like that,' Jin Zixuan told himself. 'I mean… he's said a few things that… are along those lines… especially in regards to Wei Wuxian. But he sees Wei Wuxian as a source of wealth and power. A weapon. Which is a problem in its own right! It's just not… he wouldn't….'

The more he thought about it, the more he couldn't help but feel like trying to grab Jiang Yanli was actually the closest he had ever been to acting like his father.

(And the simulated Wei Wuxian might be thinking the exact same thing.)

At that moment, the attack Jin Zixuan had launched towards Wei Wuxian was parried away by another sword glare. Both opponents turned to look at the source of that attack.

"Hanguang-jun?!"

The simulated Lan Wangji moved to stand between the three of them, maintaining his silence.

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli called out, rushing over and grabbing Wei Wuxian's arm now that the area was no longer a combat zone. Before she could continue, however, the thumping of a large number of footsteps approached.

"What happened?!" the person at the front of that crowd shouted.

"Woah, look at this!" Lan Jingyi's voice suddenly exclaimed. "It seems like Jin Ling's dad fought Hanguang-jun at once point!"

"Huh?"

The watchers looked around, realizing a half second later that what they were hearing was (meant to be) narration, and wasn't actually part of the scene.

"No way," Jin Ling said back. "Hold on, let me read!"

There was a rustling sound as papers were handed over.

"It turned out that, during the fight, Hanguang-jun and A-Die's sword glares shot into the sky, startling the cultivators near them. They could tell at once that two people were fighting, so they all rushed over to see the strange deadlock of four people in the forest," Jin Ling read aloud. "Huh. Did they really fight? I never heard anything about that!"

"I suppose they must have," Sizhui said. "I don't see any other way to interpret that line. However, if we haven't heard about it, perhaps it was a small matter."

“Weird,” Ouyang Zizhen commented.

“Yeah.”

The real Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan glanced at each other, then looked away. They were fairly sure that however weird it was to find out your teacher and father got into a fight, it was nowhere near as weird as hearing your future son and students reacting to something about you that you yourself hadn’t experienced yet.

At that moment, the crowd finally reached the scene of the fight, and Jin Zixun was in the lead.

“Zixuan! Is Wei Wuxian making trouble for you again?!” he called out.

“None of your business. Don’t worry about it for now,” Jin Zixuan responded, not taking his eyes off Jiang Yanli and Wei Wuxian.

At that moment, deciding he’d had enough, Wei Wuxian grabbed Jiang Yanli and started to leave with her.

“Stop!” Jin Zixuan protested.

“What? You really want to fight? That’s fine with me!” Wei Wuxian snapped back.

Growling, Jin Zixun stepped forward and shouted, “Wei, just what do you mean to say by going against Zixuan so many times?!”

Many, both in the crowd and among the watchers, expected Wei Wuxian to snap at him as well. He was obviously infuriated by Jin Zixuan’s actions, and the additional provocation from Jin Zixuan’s own cousin could easily be the straw that broke the camel’s back.

Instead-

“Who are you?” Wei Wuxian asked, turning to look at Jin Zixun with his brows furrowed in genuine confusion.

There was a beat of silence.

“Huh?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“I…. You don’t know who I am?!”

“Why would I know who you are?”

After clearing his throat, Lan Sizhui explained, “When the Sunshot Campaign first broke out, Jin Zixun insisted on defending the back lines due to an injury.”

“Huh?” Jin Zixuan added on, unintentionally making the exact same expression Jiang Cheng had.

“He didn’t have the chance to see what Senior Wei was like on the front lines, most of his knowledge coming from rumors instead. Assuming that all the rumors were exaggerated, he had paid him no mind.”

There were muffled snickers of amusement in the background. It appeared that the juniors had also had their fair share of experiences of people underestimating Wei Wuxian.

“However, just a short while ago, Wei Wuxian had summoned all the dark creatures in the forest with a whistle, calling away the fierce corpses Jin Zixun had been about the capture, and causing his efforts to be wasted. His anger at Senior Wei was higher than ever.”

Recalling the simple, casual string of notes the blindfolded Wei Wuxian had given, the Lan Qiren sighed.

“If it really is that easy for Wei Wuxian to do that, then we’re going to need to figure out a different kind of competition to hold in the future,” he said, rubbing his temples.

All they’d accomplish would be boring Wei Wuxian (and embarrassing themselves) otherwise.

However, Sizhui’s explanation wasn’t done yet:

“On top of all that, Wei Wuxian was asking who he was right to his face, stirring up a strange sense of indignation within him. He knew who Wei Wuxian was, yet not only did Wei Wuxian not know him, he had asked who he was right in front of everyone. The more Jin Zixun thought about it, the more irritated he felt.”

Which, considering Jin Zixun’s complete inability to hide his emotions, was pretty obvious just from looking at him.

Jin Zixuan flushed in second hand embarrassment.

Jin Zixun opened his mouth to speak-

A golden light flashed in front of them. A middle aged woman, dressed in shimmering golden robes and exquisite jewels, landed in the middle of the gathering. The numerous people accompanying her landed shortly after.

At that moment, both the real and simulated Jin Zixuan uttered the same phrase.

“A-Niang?!” they asked, eyes wide.

“Don’t gape,” Madam Jin scolded back, frowning disapprovingly. The real version of her son shrunk back a little.

“Aunt,” Jin Zixun realized.

“Mother, what are you doing here?” the simulated Jin Zixuan asked, before, a moment after, glancing down at his own sword and realizing their fight must have been visible from the watchtower. “I — why did you bring so many people over. There’s no need for you to interfere during the hunt.”

“Stop being so full of yourself,” Madam Jin snapped back. “Who said I’m here for you?!”

She looked around, making many of the cultivators who had been posturing and strutting just a few seconds before shrink back in shame. Finally, her eyes landed on Jiang Yanli, who had stepped back and hidden behind Wei Wuxian some time ago.

“A-Li, what happened to you?” she asked at once.

Jiang Yanli smiled slightly. Even before the simulation, when her and Jin Zixuan’s relationship was still made up of one-sided attempts and cold, distant courtesy, Madam Jin had always felt like an aunt to her.

(Well, calling her a ‘to-be mother in law’ might be more accurate.)

Their personalities didn’t mesh well, but the care could be felt regardless. With Jiang Yanli’s mother dead in this future….

It was nice to know she still had this.

The Jiang Yanli within the simulation, on the other hand, was a bit more uncomfortable than her real counterpart was. She had done her best to avoid attracting attention until then, but Madam Jin’s words had turned the entire crowd towards her. Nevertheless, after a half second she managed to pull herself together, sending Madam Jin a flawless polite smile.

“Thank you, Madam. I’m fine.”

Narrowing her eyes, Madam Jin immediately asked, “Did that damn little brat bully you again?”

“No,” Jiang Yanli shook her head at once, leaving no room for misunderstanding.

Jin Zixuan shifted awkwardly in the back.

And the real one did the same from his seat, recalling the many, many disastrous encounters the two of them had gone through in the past.

Unfortunately, the simulated Jin Zixuan’s shifting attracted his mother’s hawk-like eyes.

“Jin Zixuan! Do you want to die?!” she snapped.

Feeling the sound was familiar, Jiang Cheng slowly glanced back at his mother, only to accidentally make eye contact with her and hurriedly look away.

Madam Yu just scowled.

But the simulated Madam Jin was far from done:

“Are you insane? How could you have allowed the situation to go this badly?! What did you tell me before you came here?”

He jumped. “I-”

“No matter what your son told you before he came here, Madam Jin, everything will be fine so long as he and my Shijie avoid each other from now on,” Wei Wuxian interjected, a few spark of resentful energy turning his eyes a glowing red.

Lan Qiren frowned at that, but, shortly after, forced himself to relax. He could feel what the energy was doing. Wei Wuxian might be annoyed, but he had control over his powers. This was a cold anger, allowing him to command resentful energy with the upmost accuracy.

Additionally, despite the confrontational tone Wei Wuxian had used, Madam Jin didn’t seem to mind. She simply acknowledged Wei Wuxian’s point, before hurrying past him to Jiang Yanli’s side, making sure the girl was okay.

(Because Jiang Yanli’s happiness was more important to Madam Jin than her pride.)

And on the contrary-

‘If I had known Wei Wuxian would do something like this, I would have made him stay in Lotus Pier no matter what! Would Wen Chao have dared to do anything to the two young masters of the GusuLan and LanlingJin Sects?!’

And he would have. They all knew he would have. But-

‘Even if he did, that’d just mean they ran out of luck. Since when was it his turn to play hero?!’

Madam Yu had been scared then. And rightfully so. The Wens were coming — even if they would have come with or without Wei Wuxian’s actions — and they did, indeed, manage to nearly destroy Lotus Pier. She had died. It made sense that she was reacting like that.

And it made even more sense that Madam Jin was furious at her for saying that.

(The look of abject shock and betrayal that Madam Jin had gained upon hearing her words remained seared into Madam Yu’s mind.)

However, although Madam Jin didn’t care about Wei Wuxian’s rudeness, someone else saw it as an opportunity.

“Wei Wuxian, my aunt is your senior! Speaking to her like that is a bit presumptuous of you, don’t you think?” Jin Zixun accused, looking to resume the argument Madam Jin’s arrival had disrupted. The men by his side nodded in agreement.

But Wei Wuxian remained unfazed:

"What I said wasn't directed at Madam Jin," he explained. "Your cousin has spoken in regard to my Shijie with harsh words time and time again. If the Yunmeng Jiang Sect was one that would just roll over and tolerate that, then we wouldn't be called an elite sect!"

For a moment there, Madam Yu could almost see her husband standing behind Wei Wuxian, nodding in approval.

"Tell me, how am I being presumptuous?"

"How are you being presumptuous? How is any part of you not presumptuous?" Jin Zixuan growled back. "Today, during such an important hunt involving all our sects, you really had fun showing off, didn't you? One third of the prey was taken by you! I bet you feel pleased with yourself, don't you?"

Shocked whispers broke out among those who hadn't yet heard of Wei Wuxian's achievement.

The viewers, on the other hand, were much more subdued.

"Uh, yeah," Nie Huaisang said. "Shockingly, when you tell a demonic cultivator to capture resentful creatures, that kinda thing happens."

Lan Xichen appeared confused: "Did they really… not realize this was going to happen?"

Any of the watchers could have guessed how this was going to end the second they heard what the competition would entail.

But Wen Ruohan seemed unsurprised.

"Demonic cultivation is a new creation," he pointed out. "They'll fear it and covet it in equal measure, but they won't even try to understand. It's no wonder they were surprised by this outcome."

Lan Qiren and Madam Yu turned to glare at him, disliking the arrogance of his comment. Though, if you asked him, what he had just said would go without saying.

(After all, people had responded to Wen Zhuliu in the exact same way — and he hadn't even created the technique.)

And yet, the surprise of the people in the simulation was palpable. Their gazes refocused to be entirely on Wei Wuxian, with awe, bitterness, jealousy, and greed all mixed in.

Finally, growing impatient with the continuous whispers, Lan Wangji asked, "One third of the prey?"

The resentment of the cultivators who had accompanied Jin Zixun seemed to triple in intensity. However, it also looked like an opportunity.

'Doesn't Hanguang-jun hate Wei Wuxian?'

'I heard they had a terrible relationship.'

'Then maybe-'

"It looks like you haven't heard yet, Hanguang-jun. A little while ago, while we were hunting on Phoenix Mountain, we kept searching and searching, only to eventually realize there wasn't even a single fierce corpse left!"

Nodding in agreement, another cultivator stepped forward and added on, "We only realized what happened after we sent people to the watchtowers to ask Lianfeng-zun. Less than an hour after the hunt began, a flute melody sounded all throughout Phoenix Mountain, and all the corpses went and walked into the nets by themselves!"

"Walking corpses are one of the three main groups on Phoenix mountain," a third added. "With them gone, only the Yao and Guai are left!"

"As for the ghosts… Wei Wuxian alone summoned away all of them…."

'The whining of the incompetent,' both Nie Mingjue and Wen Ruohan thought. Luckily, neither of them bothered to speak their thoughts aloud, or they would have realized the other thought the same thing and gotten annoyed as a result.

Finally, the loudest whiner of them all, Jin Zixun, concluded, "You care nothing for others and only for yourself! Is that not presumptuous enough!"

"Zixun!" Jin Zixuan shouted, his anger and embarrassment all colliding into a cyclone of rage. "Just stop! You — don't talk to him like that! Didn't Sizhui just say you claimed to be injured and insisted on just defending the back lines during the war?! What is that if not selfish and cowardly?!"

"A-Xuan, that's your cousin," Jin Guangshan scolded.

"Cousin or not, he's right!" Madam Jin hissed back. "Trust me, I'll be watching Zixun carefully when we get out."

Seeing that public opinion among the watchers was pretty much in agreement on the matter, Jin Guangshan backed off quietly.

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian began to laugh.

"Really? And who was it that said the archery competition was only a warm up, and that our real skills would be shown on Phoenix Mountain?"

Scoffing, Jin Zixun continued, "What you're relying on is the crooked path! That's not the result of your talents! You're just playing a few tunes on the flute! With how much you blatantly disregard the rules, it isn't any better than tricks and schemes!"

Lan Wangji took a long, slow breath, reminding himself that getting annoyed at the simulation would be more than futile.

The simulated Lan Wangji frowned, but restrained himself as well.

"Zixun, that's enough," Madam Jin said at last, having finally confirmed for herself that Jiang Yanli was alright.

But, fed up with Jin Zixun's comments, Wei Wuxian laughed: "Fine, then I haven't the faintest clue what you would count as 'real ability.' Please, unsheath your sword and wield it against me, so that I can see for myself exactly what you're talking about."

Jin Zixuan had grown up with his cousin. They had been by each other's sides for years and seen each other progress every step of the way.

Which was why he could say without a shadow of a doubt that Wei Wuxian could be blindfolded, have both hands tied behind his back, or hop around the entire fight on only one leg and he would still win, even without using demonic cultivation.

It appeared Jin Zixun had realized the same, as he merely gaped for a few moments before scoffing.

"Ha! It's only natural that you don't think you're in the wrong-"

"Zixun!" the real Madam Jin snapped, infuriated both by Jin Zixun's actions and the fact that her command was being ignored.

"We all know this isn't the first time Young Master Wei has decided to disregard the rules. You didn't bring your sword today or to the flower banquet held just a little while ago. It's such a grand event, and yet you care nothing for courtesy. In what regard do you hold those of us who have also come to this competition?"

Everyone tensed, and Wen Qing and Lan Wangji's feelings on the matter were made crystal clear by their ice cold glares.

And then, in response to Jin Zixun's accusation, Wei Wuxian turned to Lan Wangji and said, "Lan Zhan, I forgot to say this earlier, but, in regards to you blocking that attack for me, thank you. Seriously."

A beat passed.

Nie Mingjue very nearly snorted, but quickly managed to cover it up with a cough. It was a good thing he did, because if Huaisang had heard him laugh at that, he would have taken it as an open invitation to be a menace for the rest of the simulation.

And then, at long last, Jin Zixun realized the insult he was being given. He gritted his teeth, glaring harshly at Wei Wuxian.

“So a disciple of YunmengJiang is worth nothing more than this-”

“Zixun!” Madam Jin snapped.

“Excuse me?” Madam Yu questioned. “What accomplishments does he have to be passing judgment in such a way?”

“Ah, apologies, Madam. That child is getting a little carried away, it seems,” Jin Guangshan said, hoping to lessen her rage.

‘Child?’ Lan Xichen thought. ‘If I’m right about the age the one in our world is, isn’t this version currently in his early thirties?’

Cultivators could live longer, so the age they would continue to view other cultivators as children was much higher than in the outside world. That said, he couldn’t help but feel like this was pushing it a little.

And unfortunately, Wei Wuxian’s anger was far from appeased.

“Discipline?” Wei Wuxian asked, tilting his head. “The crooked path?”

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji whispered.

“A-Xian?” Jiang Yanli asked, a little surprised by the reaction he was giving.

A bit of resentful energy filled the air. Many of the surrounding cultivators took a step back.

And Nie Mingjue paused and wondered, once again, what the crowd would look like if he were the one reacting like this.

(Well, first of all, if someone had tried to say that his style of cultivation didn’t count in competitions, he would have fought them for his honor right then and there. On the other hand, no one would dare say something like that to him.)

(And even more-so, if he had somehow been unable to defend himself, someone would have come to his aid. It wasn’t that Lan Wangji and Jiang Yanli weren’t on Wei Wuxian’s side, it was that defending Wei Wuxian was different from defending a sect heir or leader.)

He breathed out a long sigh.

‘No wonder Wei Wuxian’s furious.’

Which, despite the smile on his face, Wei Wuxian most definitely was.

“Do you know why I don’t bother carrying my sword? It’s because I want you all to know that sword or no sword, even just using what you call the crooked path, there isn’t a single one of you that can stand up against me.”

Hearing this, Nie Huaisang couldn't help but laugh. "Isn't one of the first things we heard about Wei-xiong that he killed five thousand people? Seems like they believe this threat of his, by the end."

Jiang Cheng gaped: "But for him to just say that-"

"Wei Wuxian! You're only the son of a servant! How dare you be so bold?!"

Madam Yu froze.

Wei Wuxian gritted his teeth together. The surrounding resentful energy was still perfectly under his control — notably present, but suppressed and subdued. However, with every word from Jin Zixun, his anger became-

"A-Xian!"

Wei Wuxian stopped from where he had been reaching for his flute, turning around to face Jiang Yanli.

"Shijie?"

"A-Xian," she said. "Come stand behind me."

"I…" Jiang Cheng blinked. "A-Jie?"

"A-Li?" Jin Zixuan asked.

Both were clearly extremely confused.

Because in their minds, the danger lied in what Wei Wuxian was capable of, and what Jin Zixun might provoke him to do. Why would Jiang Yanli put herself between them?

Wen Ruohan leaned back in his seat, just as confused as them.

Then, before Wei Wuxian could move, Madam Jin stepped forward.

"A-Li," she said. "Don't interfere with their business."
